For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

√225513

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012

http://archive.org/details/nation201julnewy

MAR 28 1966
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
225513

INDEX FOR JULY-DECEMBER, 1965

THE
NATION
America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

INDEX TO VOLUME 201
JULY to DECEMBER, 1965

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section, following main entries.

Centennial issue, Sept. 20, is indexed in back pages.

1- 28	July 5	205-232	Oct. 11
29- 48	July 19	233-260	Oct. 18
49- 68	Aug. 2	261-288	Oct. 25
69- 88	Aug. 16	289-316	Nov. 1
89-108	Aug. 30	317-344	Nov. 8
109-128	Sept. 6	345-372	Nov. 15
129-148	Sept. 13	373-400	Nov. 22
See back pages		401-428	Nov. 29
for Centennial		429-456	Dec. 6
issue of Sept. 20		457-484	Dec. 13
149-176	Sept. 27	485-512	Dec. 20
177-204	Oct. 4	513-540	Dec. 27

A

- Accidents. See Automobiles; Aviation; Ships
- Acropolis. By W. Gerchow; P 316
- Adolescents; Polish youth no longer rebellious. M. Kuncewicz; S 537
- Advertising; civil war on Madison avenue: F. M. Cone's warning against disparagement of competitive products; E 235
- Aerospace corp.; "nonprofit" advisory group's extravagant salary practices investigated by House subcommittee under Rep. P. Hardy, Jr.; E 262
- Affluence. Rexroth, K.; P 481
- Africa; black nations' vain plea for U.N. action against white Rhodesian government 488
  - On verge of blood bath if white enclaves, as in Rhodesia, prove intransigent; E 261, 322
  - Unionists cool to AFL-CIO cold-war groups 27-28
- Afro-Asian bloc; decline of influence in U.N. By A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 488
- After the solstice. W. S. Merwin; P 364
- Agriculture; California not hurt by end of bracero program; E 31
  - Chinese problems 181
  - Cuban conditions 52
  - North Dakota's shrinking farms 41
  - Polish problems .... 119 ff.
- Ahmad, Eqbal
  - Revolutionary warfare: how to tell when the rebels have won; S .... 95; see also C, opposite 129 and 429
- AIFLD; AFL-CIO affiliate's war on Communism in Latin America .... 10 ff.
- Air; poison in demonstrated by articles by E. K. Faltermayer in Fortune and G. D. Friedlander in IEEE spectrum; E 347
  - Pollution by cars 165, 166
  - Pollution in New York city by Con Ed 387, 389
- Airplanes. See Aviation
- Alabama; another "not guilty" verdict expected in civil-rights murder case 291
  - Hayneville deputy sheriff T. Coleman acquitted by white jury of murdering J. Daniels, civil-rights protester 278
  - Klansman C. L. Wilkins freed in Liuzzo murder trial at Hayneville 328, 329
  - Negroes must register to ensure re-election of Senator Sparkman over Governor Wallace; E 71

PAGE

- Alaga, Nicholas
  - Critique of W. W. Turner on FBI; C, with Turner reply, opposite 485; see also 322
- Alfred, William. Play Hogan's goat reviewed by H. Clurman; D 427
- Algeria; French intellectuals' plea for Ben Bella; E 179
  - Global tremors in Ben Bella's overthrow. A. Werth; S 31
  - Reasons why France couldn't crush independence movement 97
- Alliance for progress; transformation into alliance for militarization 345
  - Unfelicitous pun in Spanish form of title; C, opposite 89
- Alphaville. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 175
- American-Afro-Asian educational exchange. See China lobby
- American bar association. See Law
- American civil liberties union (ACLU). See Civil liberties
- American federation of labor-Congress of industrial organizations. See Labor—Union
- American federation of teachers (AFT). See Labor—Union
- American institute for free labor development (AIFLD); AFL-CIO affiliate's war on Communism in Latin America .... 10 ff.
- Americans for reappraisal of Far Eastern policy (ARFEP); formation as breakthrough for long pull after Vietnam settlement; E 289
- Anant, Victor; Daily Telegraph story charging CIA machinations in Pakistan; E 207
- Anderson, Myrtle M.
  - Praise for article on brother, Paul Y., by L. Elkin in May 31 Nation; C, opposite 49
- Angola; conditions in 136-137
- Animals. See Medicine
- Apalachin, N.Y.; 1957 raid publicized organized crime; blundering of FBI .... 322 ff.
- Architecture. For reviews, see McQuade, W.; Gutheim, F.
- Argentina; through McNamara, obtained jet attack planes at bargain to fight internal "Communism"; E 234
- Arkansas; Senator Eastland's influence on Governor Faubus in civil rights 192
- Armament; burden in Latin America 293
  - Exports pushed by Secretary McNamara, as in jets for Argentina to fight "Communism"; E 234
  - Missiles
    - Danger of use of nuclear warheads by U.S. and Soviets in escalated Vietnam war; E 50
    - NATO partners' fears of unilateral U.S. use, as threatened in 1962 Cuba crisis 237
  - Of undeveloped nations through the developed; plea for embargo; E 318
- Art; great exponents favor Left? D. Mandel and M. Marcus; C, opposite 205, 261, and 317
  - Psychedelic experimenters 25-26
  - U.S. cultural-exchange exhibitions should emulate Poles and disregard ideology; E 515
  - For reviews, see Kozloff, M.
- Arts. Cultural bandwagon; resignation through business-trustee pressure of R. Brown, Los Angeles county museum director; E 459
  - Risks in presidential leadership of cultural program 115-116
  - Rockport, Mass., Episcopal church's symposium on anatomy of prejudice .... 411 ff.
  - R. Stevens, commercial dramatic producer, unsuited as chairman of National council; E 234
- Assyria; U.S. likened to. P. Siekewitz; C, opposite 373

PAGE

- Astrology; revival of 472
- Atomic bomb
  - Atomic water vs. atomic power; problem of dual-purpose desalinazation plants; E 263
  - "Deterrent" use defended by U.S. "progressives" at Vatican council. G. Koski; C, opposite 261
  - No holocaust for V.I.P.s; elaborate business shelter near Hudson, N.Y.; E 430
  - Nuclear club, the: why the outs want in. M. Viorst; S .... 235; see also C, opposite 345
  - Nuclear weapons for West Germany through NATO revealed; E 458
  - See also Armament—Missiles
- Atomic energy. See Nuclear energy
- Auert, Edward
  - Sunday to a close at Gritman hospital; P 232
- Automobiles. Can we live with our cars? E. C. Guggenheimer; S 164
  - Contribution to air pollution 348
  - Is the automobile incurable? Smog today and smog tomorrow, as in Los Angeles area. M. Neiburger; S 432
  - National safety council's warnings underplay manufacturers' responsibility for accidents; E 150
  - Profits vs. engineering: the Corvair story; unstable G.M. car and lawsuits. R. Nader; S .... 295; see also correction, opposite 345
  - Stolen cars and FBI statistics 326
  - Tire-safety bill introduced by Senator G. Nelson; E 51
  - Turning southern California into parking lot. R. G. Lillard; S 435
  - U.S. exports to and new plants in South Africa 72
- Aviation. Air safety: the lethal lapses. K. M. Ruppenthal; S 525
  - Airplanes abroad: crashes and consequences of localized jurisdiction and low indemnification. K. M. Ruppenthal; S 408
- Ayre, John
  - Eisenhower's anger over demonstrations against U.S. Vietnam policy; C, opposite 289
- Ayub Khan, President. See Pakistan

B

- Balabanoff, Angelica: 1878-1965. T. Pol; S .. 485
- Ball, Ed; Florida du Pont executive's tax maneuvers; E 30
- Baller, Rev. Albert H.
  - Resents D. Cohen's attitude on flying saucers; C, opposite 149; see also 131
- Barnell, Harold; sketches of Mexican slums 530-531
- Bartók, Béla. Recorded string quartets reviewed by B. Boretz; M 231
- Bayh, Senator Birch; moves to counter Dirksen-sponsored amendment to nullify Supreme court's ruling on reapportionment 60-61
- Beating; of school children. R. M. Gummere, Jr.; S 442
- Beck, Clifford K.; AEC official quoted on reactor siting criteria and practice 242-243
- Beckett, Samuel. Play Happy days reviewed by H. Clurman; D 258
- Beirne, Joseph; role in AIFLD 10, 16
- Ben Bella, Ahmed. See Algeria
- Bentley, Eric
  - "Treason" of the experts from Johnson down, as on U.S. foreign policy and Vietnam; S 466
- Berkeley, California; poetry conference. D. Wesling; S .... 338; see also California

Index

PAGE

Berle, A. A.; spokesman for U.S. Latin-American policies, as at Toronto teach-in ... 301, 464
Berry, Wendell
  The tyranny of charity, as in case of Kentucky furniture maker; S ... 161
Biberman, Herbert. Film Salt of the earth reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 371
Bilbo, Theodore G.; late governor and senator's backing of Mississippi Senator Eastland ... 191, 193
Billings, James J.
  Praise for Nation articles and editorials on Vietnam; C, opposite 129
Birchites. See Conservatives, U.S.
Bird, a. W. Gerchow; P ... 316
Birnbaum, Norman
  I. Howe and L. Coser not revisionist liberals, as stated in J. Newfield in May 10 article; C, opposite 1
Birth control; crying need for expanded Federal programs; E ... 402
  Issue in French elections ... 405
  Significance of Supreme court's decision in Griswold v. Connecticut case. J. D. Carroll; S ... 121
Birthday dream, the. J. Dickey; P ... 170
Blaser, Robin
  The medium; P ... 126
Blackouts. See Power
Blau, Herbert, and J. Irving
  Lincoln center available for Sergeant Musgrave's dance; C, opposite 29; see also R. Hatch, June 21
Blee, Thomas; smut hunter interviewed ... 358 ff.
Boland, John
  The new guard, not The young guard, is organ of Young Americans for freedom; C, opposite 29; see also Apr. 12 editorial, The smell of Bond
Bond, Julian; SNCC co-founder elected to Georgia legislature ... 40
Books; by Nation contributors ... 511
  Censorship attempts by Citizens for decent literature, Knights of Columbus, etc. ... 5 ff., 358 ff.
Boretz, Benjamin
  Again, the Ford millennium; Ford foundation $85-million program for U.S. orchestras; M ... 368
  New music, big money from foundations; M ... 47
  Reviews of music
    Varèse, E. ... 426
  Reviews of recorded music
    Miscellaneous new recordings ... 286
    Records: 1965 ... 509
    Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Bartók ... 231
Borgese, Elisabeth Mann
  Letter from Rome; European community of writers' congress; S ... 313
Borneo; likely defection of Sabah and Sarawak from Malaysia ... 209, 211
Bosco, Philip; as Coriolanus ... 65-66
Boumedienne, Colonel Houari; role in overthrow of Ben Bella of Algeria ... 31-32
Bouquet, the. P. Brooks; P ... 26
Braceros. See Agriculture
Bradley, Sam
  Testament of the ringed snake; P ... 123
Brain y Suárez, José
  Infelicitous pun in title Alianza para el progreso; C, opposite 89
Brazil; example of Latin dictatorship; "hard" line against Communism in OAS ... 292
  Institutional act No. 2 reveals naked dictatorship of U.S. protégé government; E ... 345
Brecht, Bertolt, and K. Weill. Opera Mahagonny (Stratford, Conn., production) reviewed by J. Novick; D ... 107
Brewster, Arthur S.; phone--company official's collaboration with FBI tapping ... 501
British Guiana; financing of 1963 general strike against Jagan government by U.S. labor and government sources ... 11-12, 13, 16
Brockman, John; entrepreneur of underground films ... 539-540
Broderick, Thomas
  U.S. backing Soviets and China into dangerous corner by bombing North Vietnam; C, opposite 69
Brookhaven national laboratory; 1957 report on effects of major nuclear-energy-plant disaster ... 242 ff.
Brooks, Phyllis
  The bouquet; P ... 26
  To a good friend at a rest home; P ... 202
Brown, Allison W., Jr.
  Several states liberalizing residency requirements for voters; C, opposite 49; see also E, 2
Brown, Irving; aide to J. Lovestone in labor's cold war against Communism aboard ... 10 ff., 27-28

PAGE

Brown, Dr. Richard; resignation of Los Angeles county museum director through business-trustee pressure; E ... 459
Brzezinski, Prof. Z. K.; U.S.-policy spokesman at Toronto teach-in ... 301
Buckley, William; aide to Senator Eastland ... 184, 194
Buckley, William O.; National review editor uneasy over liberalization of Catholic church ... 218
  New York city mayoralty candidacy helped elect J. V. Lindsay ... 348
Buechner, George. Play Danton's death (Lincoln center production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 370
Bundy, McGeorge; espousal of military solutions as Presidential adviser ... 138, 139
  Televised debate with H. J. Morgenthau ... 239
  "Treason" as expert on foreign policy ... 466 ff.
Bundy, Assistant Secretary of State William P.; touch of tyranny in short-term authoritarianism expounded in Goals for Americans; programs for action in the sixties. R. F. Hamilton; S ... 75
Burbank. See California
Burford, William
  High office; P. ... 287
Burns, James MacGregor
  Shadow presidency by opposition party needed in U.S.; S ... 115; see also C, opposite 177
Burroughs, William S.; as psychedelic writer ... 25, 26

C

Cabin, William D.
  Praise for W. Ryan article on Moynihan report; C, opposite 513; see also 380
Caldwell, T. B.
  Scandinavia verifies E. Gertz on censorship; C, opposite 69; see also 7
California; automobile problems ... 165, 166
  Bail funds for Berkeley demonstrators solicited. S. Stein; C, opposite 89
  Berkeley judge R. Crittenden's harsh sentences on university demonstrators sow future trouble; E ... 70
  Burbank public library facilities closed to educational groups. T. Schoenman; C, opposite 129
  End of bracero program fails to hurt agriculture; E ... 31
  Life in the parking lot of southern part of state. R. G. Lillard; S ... 435
  Los Angeles county museum director, R. Brown, resigned through pressure of business-culture trustees; E ... 459
  Mayor Yorty of Los Angeles' get-tough advice on Vietnam war ... 515
  New law to recompense victims of violence. J. Cross; S ... 304
  Nonstudent Left in Berkeley and elsewhere. H. S. Thompson; S ... 154
  Riot as a weapon: the language of Watts. S. Sanders; S ... 490
  Smog today and smog tomorrow in Los Angeles from car exhausts. M. Neiburger; S ... 432
  Techniques of social engineering applied to public problems by aerospace firms under state contract; E ... 486
  Tough stand on water pollution ... 222
  Watts: riots in forgotten Los Angeles Negro slum. C. McWilliams; E ... 89; see also C, opposite 129 and 149
  Watts: the sad litany in findings of McCone report; E ... 487
  Watts riots not un-American, given U.S. violence in Vietnam and elsewhere; E ... 109
Callahan, Daniel
  Exceptions to W. Ryan article on Moynihan report; C, with Ryan reply, opposite 513; see also 380
Cambodia; charges of South Vietnamese incursions vindicated by control commission; country not major Vietcong sanctuary; E ... 402
  CIA machinations charged; E ... 208
  U.S. proposed conference on rejected ... 112
Canals; boondoggles of Cross-Florida barge and Dallas-Gulf; E ... 290
Cardona-Hine, Alvaro
  Listen Galaxea; P ... 46
Carnovsky, Morris; as King Lear ... 46
Carroll, James D.
  Forgotten Ninth Amendment cited by Supreme court in Griswold v. Connecticut birth-control case; S ... 121
Carruth, Hayden
  R. Duncan's poem Up rising a beauty; C, opposite 205; see also 146
  "Reverting still again"; P ... 200
  A spruce of Marshall Washer's; P ... 104

PAGE

Casady, Sy; crackdown on California Democratic council head for opposition to Vietnam policy and draft; E ... 205
Case, Senator Clifford
  Bills to provide protection for civil-rights workers in South ... 279
Castalia foundation; for LSD experimentation 25
Castro, Fidel. See Cuba
Cat Ballou. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 68
Catholic church; Cardinal McIntyre's contribution to Los Angeles riots. W. G. Hooke; C, opposite 129; see also E, 89
  Civil-rights activities in Chicago ... 93, 95
  Conservatives' discontent with secularity and racial positions. H. Cox; S ... 216
  Paul VI's plea for Vietnam peace at U.N. gives Johnson chance to declare cease-fire; E ... 233
  Portuguese underground publications ... 135
  Relations with Citizens for decent literature 7
  U.S. "progressives" at Vatican council spoke for "deterrent" nuclear weapons. G. Koski; C, opposite 261
Censorship. Censorship: fanatics and fallacies. 1. The anonymous smut hunters. N. Mark; S ... 5; 2. An end to all censorship. E. Gertz; S ... 7. See also C, opposite 69
  In Spain ... 422 ff.
  Silencing the children of Sanchez; attempted ban of O. Lewis book in Mexico. J. Sommers; S ... 530
  Smut hunters: the new jurisprudery, led by Citizens for decent literature. H. Junker; S ... 358
  Worst type: denial of services on ideological grounds, as in bus drivers' refusal to carry demonstrators to Washington peace march; E ... 459, 463
Charity, tyranny of, as typified in case of Kentucky furniture maker. W. Berry; S ... 161
Charulata. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 175
Chekhov, Anton. Play The cherry orchard (Minneapolis and Stratford, Ontario, productions) reviewed. J. Novick; D ... 87
Chicago; confrontation in: Mayor Daley meets the Negro civil-rights movement. L. Wille; S ... 92
Children; aid to dependent children program and Negroes ... 381
  Beating of in schools. R. M. Gummere, Jr.; S ... 442
  Health problems among poor; E ... 347
Chile; teetering between democracy and dictatorship; pressure from Brazil and U.S. By D. D. Ranstead; S ... 292; see also C, opposite 345
China, Communist
  Atomic installations as potential U.S. target ... 91
  Hackneyed U.S. script against admission to U.N. delivered by Ambassador Goldberg; E ... 205
  Ill informed on U.S., and vice versa; U.S. press's lack of enterprise on; E ... 178; see also C, opposite 261
  In background of Kashmir war ... 151 ff.
  Lessons of guerrilla warfare ... 34, 36, 38
  May be biding time in Vietnam war to suck U.S. into vortex; E ... 429
  Paradoxical role of peacemaker in Kashmir war; must be admitted to U.N.; E ... 177
  Possible responses to U.S. bombings; E ... 29
  Real enemy in new, bigger U.S. war in Vietnam; E ... 233
  Russia vs. China: clash over Vietnam. I. Deutscher; S ... 3
  Setback in Algeria with Ben Bella's overthrow ... 32
  U.S. military hawks risk war with ... 138
China lobby; has added South Africa to cause; now known as American-Afro-Asian educational exchange ... 73
Chinese; threat of racial dominance in Malaysia behind expulsion of Singapore ... 208 ff.
Chinese poems. K. Rexroth; P ... 425
Christenson, Reo M.
  Senator Dirksen against the (Supreme) court on reapportionment; S ... 60
Christianity. See Churches, Christian Churches, Christian; divisions on social questions foreseen. H. Cox; S ... 216
Cimring, Harry
  M. L. King, denounced by Senator Dodd, more competent to speak on foreign policy; C, opposite 205
Cities, U.S.; new Republican emphasis on. 348-349, 375 ff.
Citizens for decent literature and motion pictures, inc.; activities of smut-hunting group. N. Mark; S ... 5; H. Junker; S ... 358 Civil defense. See United States—Defense, national Civil disobedience; and foreign-policy crisis ... 241

PAGE

- Civil liberties; ACLU opposition to shootings by police 529
  - ACLU protest over use of draft to punish war protesters 521
  - Supreme court decision, as on Watkins, frustrating to Senator Eastland and HUAC 190 ff.
- Clark, Senator Joseph Sill; bill to regulate interstate commerce in animals 404
  - Supported Fulbright memorandum on Dominican intervention. H. Lore; C 223
- Cloward, Richard A.
  - The war on poverty: are the poor left out? S 55
- Clurman, Harold
  - Notes from afar. Part I: Japanese theatre; D 84
  - Notes from afar. Part II: London theatre; D 105
  - Plays and politics in contemporary U.S.; S 270
  - Reviews of plays
    - Country wife, the (Lincoln center production) 538
    - Danton's death (Lincoln center production) 370
    - Devils, the 483
    - Happy days 258
    - Hogan's goat 427
    - Inadmissible evidence 508
    - Long day's journey into night (in Japan) 85
    - Man of La Mancha 484
    - On a clear day you can see forever 398
    - Right honourable gentleman, the 398
    - Royal hunt of the sun, the 397
    - Skyscraper 484
    - You can't take it with you (ANTA production) 484
- Cohen, Carl
  - Punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick; S 520
- Cohen, Daniel
  - Jeane Dixon: psychic star of the year; S 470
  - The return of flying saucers; resurgence of myth among public; S 131; see also C, opposite 149 and 177, with Cohen reply
- Cold before the moonrise, the. W. S. Merwin; P 364
- Cold war; background as proper subject for Vietnam teach-ins 240-241
  - H. A. Wallace's efforts to stop; E 431
- Cole, Edward; G. M. executive's role in development of Corvair 296-297
- Coleman, Thomas; Alabama deputy sheriff acquitted in murder of J. Daniels, civil-rights protester 278
- Colombia; liberal Catholic ferment 218
- Committee for an effective and durable peace in Asia; "Presidential front"; E 207; see also E, opposite 261
- Committee for nuclear disarmament; decline of British peace movement. T. Roszak; S 273
- Common market; dangers from French intransigence 407-408
- Communism
  - Chinese will to world leadership 184
  - Combating of placed above morality in U.S. foreign policy, as shown by spokesmen at Toronto teach-in. R. H. Welker; S 301
  - Cyprus strength minor 495
  - V. Glaser article charging fomenting of Vietnam and civil-rights demonstrations; E; 29
  - Ideological basis for Soviet-Chinese clash over Vietnam. I Deutscher; S 3
  - Latin-American threat less than that of military dictatorship. D. D. Ranstead; S 292; See also C, opposite 345
  - Paranoid fear of conspiracy in U.S. politics;; E 401
  - Portuguese underground activities 135
  - Strength in Greece 160-161
  - Support of Mitterrand in French elections 406
  - U.S. "experts" on 467-468
  - Workers party in Turkey 378, 379
  - World target of AFL-CIO crusade 10 ff.
- Cone, Fairfax M. See Advertising
- Connecticut; law against birth-control information abolished by the Supreme court in Griswold case 121
- Conrad, Charles III
  - "Free press" sensitive to leaders' wishes, as on Vietnam; C, opposite 261; see also E, 205 and 207
- Conscription. See United States—Defense, national
- Conservation; proponents' campaign against Con Ed Hudson river plant 388-389
  - Public relations in the national forests; signs extolling lumber companies' practices. G. McConnell; S 522
- Conservatives, U.S.; Birchite ghost haunts Republican party; E 513

PAGE

  - Counterdemonstrators on Vietnam never supported Johnson's other programs. H. Prasentnik; C, opposite 317
  - Exponents of paranoid style in politics, such as Birchers; E 401
  - Helped defeat A. L. Holton, Republican moderate in Virginia gubernatorial election 376-377
  - Panel on at Socialist scholars' conference 196
  - Possible schism in Catholic church 218
  - Republicans' belated purge of Birchites; E 261
- Consolidated Edison co. Hudson river caper; proposed Storm King plant. D. Cort; S 387; see also C, opposite 429
  - Economics behind New York blackout; E 373; 387
- Conspirators, the; play. See Books section of Index
- Constantine II, King; faces Greek constitutional crisis. C. Poulos; S 158
- Consumer reports (periodical); report on U.S. loan industry 178
- Cook, Fred J.
  - Snoopers and tappers: law-enforcement underground, investigated by Senator E. V. Long; S 496
- Cooley, Representative Harold D.; sugar-quota stickup as chairman of House agriculture committee; E 206
- Cooper, Sherman; administration spokesman to Nov. 27 anti-war march-on-Washington leaders 465
- Cort, David
  - Consolidated Edison: the Hudson river caper; proposed Storm King plant; S 387; see also C, opposite 429
  - Soccer: the rabble game; S 100; see also C, opposite 177
  - The Westchester gorillas: suggested removal of animal species for survival; S 249
- Corvair. See Automobiles
- Cosa nostra. See Crime
- Country wife, the (Lincoln center production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 538
- Cox, Harvey
  - Ferment in the churches: the new Christian soldiers; probable diivsions on social issues; S 216
- Cox, Judge Harold; Eastland protégé's conduct of civil-rights cases 188, 195
- Cox, William D.; promoter of soccer in U.S. 101
- Crane, Sylvia E.
  - W. Goodman disputed on HUAC's probe of Klan; C, with Goodman reply; opposite 401; see also 328
- Cranston, Alan; address of California controller on automobile problems 165
- Creeley, Robert; readings at Berkeley poetry conference 339-340
- Crime; attempt to demonstrate link with New York and Los Angeles riots 355 ff.
  - Pretext for invasion of privacy by government snoopers and tappers 496 ff.
  - Recompense for victims of violence; California follows British example. J. Cross; S 304
  - Too big for the FBI. W. W. Turner; S 322; see also C, with Turner reply, opposite 485
- Crittenden, Judge Rupert; sowing future trouble by harsh sentences for U. of California demonstrators; E 70; see also S. Stein; C, opposite 89
- Croiset, Gerard; alleged crime-solving psychic 473
- Crosby, John; columnist on ineffectiveness of FBI 323
- Cross, Jennifer
  - Recompense for victims of violence; California follows British lead; S 304
- Crossman, William
  - J. P. Scott disputed on origins of violence among animals, in June 21 Nation; C, with Scott reply, opposite 89
- Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
- Crows on the north slope. W. S. Merwin; P 364
- Cuba. Cuba: a revolution revisited. L. Huberman; S 51
  - Kennedy's unilateral decision in 1962 missile crisis 237
  - U.S. lies on 1961 invansion 466, 467
- Culture. See Arts
- Cycle. By J. Schevill; P 253
- Cyprus; issue in Turkish elections 380
  - Who cares about Cyprus? C. Poulos; S 493

D

- Daley, Mayor Richard J. See Chicago
- Dana, Robert
  - Riddles; P 67
- Danton's death (Lincoln center production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 370
- Daniels, Jonathan; theology student-civil rights protester's murderer acquitted by Alabama jury 278

PAGE

- Darling. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 108
- Davidson, Robert
  - D. Cort ignorant of soccer; C, opposite 177; see also 100
- Debt. See Loan industry
- DeCanio, Steve. See Spider
- December among the vanished. W. S. Merwin; P 364
- de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
- Delaney, George P. (Phil); AFL-CIO liaison with State department 12
- Democratic party; divided on Negroes in Mississippi 212, 214
  - Riding Great Society wave—conviction or convenience? R. F. Hamilton; S 384
- DePauw, Father Gommar Albert; hero of ultraconservative Catholics 218
- Detroit; water pollution 222
- Deutscher, Isaac
  - Moscow restoration: the dragon of centralized bureaucracy in Soviet Union following Khrushchev's downfall; S 264
  - Russia vs. China: clash over Vietnam; S 3
- Devils, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 484
- Dickey, James
  - The birthday dream; P 170
- Dickinson, William B.
  - Philadelphia Bulletin ran C. Taylor articles on Communist China; C, opposite 261; see also E, 178
- Diem, Ngo Dinh; buildup of in U.S. during 1950's 110
- Dirksen, Senator Everett M.; opposition to Republican extremists 377, 378
  - Sponsors constitutional amendment to nullify Supreme court ruling on reapportionment. R. M. Christenson; S 60
- Disarmament. See Peace and pacifism
- Dixon, Jeane; psychic star of the year. D. Cohen; S 470
- Dodd, Senator Thomas J.; disputed on claim that M. L. King has no competence to speak on foreign policy. H. Cimring; C, opposite 205
- Doherty, William C., Jr.; special projects head for AIFLD 10, 16
- Dombrowski, James; integrationist harassed by Senator Eastland 188-189
- Dominican republic; AFL-CIO convention's support of U.S. intervention 516
  - Anti-Bosch coup abetted by AFL-CIO group 27
  - Fulbright dissent on intervention; blanket approval of same by House; E 178; E, 205
  - Fulbright memorandum supported by Senator J. S. Clark. By H. Lore; C 223
  - Johnson's intervention as reflex to Republican "squeeze"; E 1
  - Roughshod U.S. intervention; Congressional uneasiness 139, 141
  - Trujillo dictatorship praised by Senators Eastland and Jenner 193
- Donner, Frank J.
  - Aftermath to Harlem riot: the Epton anarchy trial; S 355
- Dorn, Edward; readings at Berkeley poetry conference 339
- Draft. See United States—Defense, national
- Dream like wind, a. W. Gerchow; P 316
- Drugs; LSD: "the contact high." H. Junker; S 25
  - Organized crime's control; ineffectiveness of FBI 323 ff.
  - Waste and spoilage in civil-defense hospital program; E 514
- Dubinsky, David; ILGWU president's promotion of anti-Communist union abroad 10, 12, 13, 14
- Dugger, Ronnie; liberal Texan at Nov. 27 anti-war demonstration 463, 464, 465
- Dulles, John Foster; as official of National council of churches 513
- Dumont, Wayne. See New Jersey
- Duncan, Robert
  - Up rising; P 146; see also C, opposite 205
- du Pont; underpayment of taxes by Florida interests; E 30
- Durkheim, Emil; monograph on suicide 415, 417
- Duverger, Maurice; on Gaullist nationalism 407
- Dyne, Michael. Play The right honourable gentleman reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398

E

- Eastland, Senator James O. James Eastland: child of scorn. R. G. Sherrill; S 184
- Education; Chicago's segregated schools 92 ff.
  - Cuba's literacy campaign 53
  - Discipline in the dark: on beating school children. R. M. Gummere, Jr.; S 442
  - Draft provisions unfair 351
  - Engineering alienated from civilian economy by Federal funds, according to Dr. J. R. Pierce; E 111

PAGE

  - Experts' "treason" on U.S. foreign policy .... 466 ff.
  - Free university of New York: academy for mavericks. H. Junker; S 78
  - M. B. Freedman article of June 14, Roots of student discontent, criticized and praised; C, opposite 1
  - New curriculum for teach-ins: history of cold war and U.S. Left. C. Lasch; S .... 239; see also C, opposite 289
  - Nonstudent left in U.S. colleges. H. S. Thompson; S .... 154; see also C, opposite 205
  - Notes on the Toronto teach-in: irrelevance of morality in U.S. foreign policy shown by spokesmen. R. H. Welker; S 301
  - Papers on academic Socialists at Socialist scholars' conference 195-196
  - Polish students no longer rebellious. M. Kuncewicz; S 537
  - Residence requirements for Negroes in Mississippi 214
  - The student Left: idealism and action, as in SDS. J. Newfield; S .... 330; see also C, opposite 457
  - Teachers' unions: rift without differences between AFT and NEA. S. Elam; S .... 247; see also C, opposite 317 and 345
  - Use of draft to punish war-protesting students. C. Cohen; S 520
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.; anger over demonstrations against U.S. Vietnam policies. J. Ayre; C, opposite 289; see also C, opposite 457
  - Hatred of war and of intelligentsia. B. Q. Seldes; C, opposite 457
- Elam, Stanley
  - Teachers' unions: rift without differences between AFT and NEA; S .... 247; see also C, opposite 317 and 345, with Elam reply
- Elections
  - Candidacy of de Gaulle: America's elder statesman. A. Werth; S .... 404; see also Werth postscript, opposite 457
  - Escalated Vietnam war may be major U.S. issue in 1966; E 457
  - The GOP today: schism within a dilemma. M. Viorst; S 375
  - Miracle of J. V. Lindsay's mayoralty victory in New York city. C. McWilliams; E 348
  - New Jersey leftist-baiting Republicans found demand for ouster of Rutgers Prof. E. D. Genovese unavailing in gubernatorial contest; E 345
  - New York city mayoralty race; J. V. Lindsay as Nation's choice; E 130
  - Painful choices for Negroes among segregationist Southern candidates; E 346
  - Turkey's discovery of politics. C. Poulos; S 378
  - U.S. Presidential, 1968, should offer candidate beyond Johnson-Goldwater choice. Mr. and Mrs. L. Seibel and Dr. and Mrs. R. K. Heintz; C 223
  - Vietnam as dirty 1966 Republican issue; E 513
  - See also Negroes—Civil rights; Voting
- Elkin, Lillian; May 31 article on P. Y. Anderson praised. M. M. Anderson; C, opposite 49
- Ely, Gladys
  - On receiving as a memento a stone from Alaska; P 506
- Engineering; education in alienated from civilian economy by Federal funds, according to Dr. J. R. Pierce; E 111
- Engineering, social. See Social engineering
- Englehard, Charles W.; South African publicist in U.S. 73
- "English." By R. Lourie; P 259
- Epton, William; anarchy trial as aftermath of 1964 Harlem riot. F. J. Donner; S 355
- European community of writers. Rome congress reviewed by E. M. Borgese; S 313
- Evans, Mary
  - Letter from Tokyo; S 203
- Exiled. A. Gregor; P 479
- Experts; treason on foreign policy in U.S. E. Bentley; S 466
- Extrasensory perception (ESP); inconclusive findings on 473

F

- Fallout shelters. See Atomic bomb
- Faltermayer, E. K.; Fortune article on air pollution; E 347
- Federal bureau of investigation (FBI). See United States—Justice department
- Feinstein, Robert
  - Plea for participation in New York committee to end the war in Vietnam; C opposite 69

PAGE

- Fellini, Federico. Film Juliet of the spirits reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 371
- Fensterwald, Bernard; counsel for Senator E. V. Long's investigation into invasion of privacy .... 496 ff.
- Figueirdo, Antonio de
  - Portugal: imperialism on credit; S .... 134; see also C, opposite 233
- Films. For reviews, see Hatch, R.; Kentfield, C.
- Findley, Representative Paul; protest over sugar-quota stickup by House agriculture committee under H. D. Cooley; E 206
- Fiscalini, J. C.
  - R. Duncan's Up rising a fine political poem; C, opposite 205; see also 146
- Fishel, Wesley; worked to involve U.S. in Vietnam 110
- Flemming, Dr. Arthur S.; former HEW secretary behind National council of churches' statement on Vietnam 513
- Fletcher, Allen; director of Stratford, Conn., Shakespeare festival 45-46, 65
- Florida; canal boondoggle; E 290
  - Officials lax in collecting du Pont estate's taxes; E 30
- Flowers, J. Richmond; Alabama attorney general realizes implications of white juries' acquittal of civil-rights murderers 278, 292
- Flying saucers; resurgence of reported sightings. D. Cohen; S .... 131; see also C, opposite 149 and 177, with Cohen reply
- Foot, Michael
  - Harold Wilson: Labour's Lloyd George?; S 518
- Force ouvrière; French anti-Communist labor group supported by AFL-CIO 11-12, 15, 28
- Ford foundation; $85-million program for U.S. orchestras. B. Boretz; M 368
- Forman, James; SNCC executive secretary .. 38-39
- Fortune (periodical); E. K. Faltermayer article on air pollution; E 347
- Foundations; Michigan and J. M. Kaplan funds' alleged relationship to CIA and AIFLD 11
  - Ford foundation's $85-million program for U.S. orchestras. B. Boretz; M 368
  - Support of new music. B. Boretz; M 47
- France; advocacy of Vietnam negotiations 112
  - Aid to Algeria; de Gaulle displeased by Ben Bella's overthrow. A. Werth; S 31
  - Algerian withdrawal more feasible politically than U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam 240
  - Could not crush Algerian independence movement 97
  - De Gaulle: America's elder statesman. A. Werth; S .... 404; see also Werth postcript, opposite 457
  - De Gaulle's rejection of U.S. intervention in Vietnam 469
  - Intellectuals' plea for Ben Bella; E 179
  - U.S. misunderstanding of nuclear goals 236
- Free Southern theatre; plea for funds. R. S. Lehman; C, opposite 49
- Free speech movement; disbanded following repression; J. E. Hoover's charge of Communist infiltration 154, 156
  - Harsh sentences for U. of California demonstrators at Berkeley; E .... 70; see also S. Stein; C, opposite 89
  - Pioneered free university movement in U.S. 78
  - Showed possibilities of civil disobedience 241
- Free trade union committee; former anti-Communist group backed by AFL-CIO 13, 15, 15
- Freedman, Mervin B.
  - June 14 article, Roots of student discontent, criticized and praised; C, opposite 1
- Friedlander, Gordon D.; IEEE spectrum article on air pollution; E 347
- Fromm, Erich
  - Psychology of a guaranteed income; S 439
- Fulbright, Senator J. William; Dominican memorandum supported by Senator J. S. Clark. By H. Lore; C 223
  - Few public supporters of dissents on U.S. foreign policy, as in Dominican intervention; E 177
  - Isolation in Senate 317
  - Press crackdown on for opposition to Dominican policy; E 205

G

- Gaulle, President Charles de. See France
- Geller, Lawrence H.
  - Send U.S. peace group to Vietnam; C, opposite 233; see also B. Svahnström; C, opposite 149
- General motors corp. See Automobiles
- Geneva conference, 1954; pattern for North Vietnamese four-point negotiation proposal 113
- Geneva conference on disarmament
  - U.S. proposal barring nuclear proliferation .... 235 ff.

PAGE

- Genovese, Eugene D.; demand for ouster of leftist Rutgers professor fell flat as Republican issue in New Jersey gubernatorial contest; E 345
- Gerchow, William
  - Acropolis; P 316
  - A bird; P 316
  - A dream like wind; P 316
- Germany, East; I arrive at socialism by train; writer's life. S. Heym; S 228
- Germany, West; interest in reunification and in nuclear weapons 236-237
  - Revelation of nuclear weapons for through NATO; E 458
- Germi, Pietro. Film The railroad man reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 371
- Gertz, Elmer
  - Censorship: fanatics and fallacies. 2. An end to all censorship advocated; Supreme Court rulings in obscenity cases cited; S .... 7; see also C, opposite 69
  - Legal defense of Tropic of Cancer and Fanny Hill 6-7
- Getting, Dr. Ivan A.; princely emoluments of Aerospace corp. head; E 262
- Gettleman, Marvin E.
  - Announcement of Socialist scholars' conference; C, opposite 89 and 129
- Giao, Cao; pseudonymous Vietnamese journalist's peace plan 353-354
- Gitlin, Todd
  - Errors in J. Newfield article on student Left; C, opposite 457; see also 330
  - Movement; P 331
- Gittings, John
  - Addendum to "Why Vietnam?": a basis for negotiation exists; S 111
- Glaser, Vera; article charging young Communists with inspiring Vietnam and civil-rights demonstrations; E 29
- Godwin, Mills E.; newly non-racist Democrat elected governor of Virginia 376
- Goldberg, Arthur J.; Sept. 23 U.N. speech on nuclear-weapons controls held little for non-nuclear nations 236, 238
  - Significance of appointment as U.S. ambassador to U.N.; E .... 49; see also 153
  - Whither ambassador to U.N. after hackneyed script on Chinese admission?; E 205
- Goldman, James
  - Aid solicited for Poor people's corp. in Mississippi; C, opposite 205
- Goldman, Michael. Poetry |editor of The Nation 391
- Goldwater, Barry
  - Approves J. M. Burns idea of shadow presidency; Free society association's similar goal; C, opposite 177; see also 115
  - Followers still powerful in Republican party 348, 376-377
  - Puts Birchites on probation in Republican party 262
- Good, Paul
  - Southern juries: the white hand of justice in murders of civil-rights workers; S 278
- Goodman, Walter
  - The Klan discovers HUAC; S .... 328; see also C, opposite 401, with Goodman reply
- Gorillas; threatened extinction in Africa; possible removal to protected environments. D. Cort; S 249
- Gottlieb, Sanford; co-ordinator of Nov. 27 march on Washington 463, 465
- Graetz, Wolfgang. See Books section of Index
- Graham, Dr. Frank; Kashmir mediator ready to file report 177
- Grass, Günther
  - In the egg (translated by M. Hamburger); P 82
- Great Britain; against nuclear proliferation 237-238
  - British peace movement: looking for the marchers. T. Roszak; S 273
  - Controversy over corporal punishment in schools 442-443
  - Crushed Malayan guerrillas in 1950's 96
  - Cyprus involvement .... 493 ff.
  - Harold Wilson: Labour's Lloyd George? M. Foot; S 518
  - Investment in South Africa .... 71 ff.
  - London theatre reflects national frustration. H. Clurman; D 105
  - Pioneered legislation to recompense victims of violence 304
  - Police unarmed 529
  - Pressure on government for disassociation from U.S. on Vietnam 111-112
  - Stake in and burden of Singapore base 209, 211
  - Steps against Rhodesian rebels .... 261, 319 ff., 488

PAGE

  U.N. support for mild actions against Rhodesia 488
Great Lakes; increasing pollution .... 221 ff.
Great Society; trap of. R. F. Hamilton; S .... 384; see also Johnson, President Lyndon B.; United States—Economics
Greece; Cyprus involvement .... 493 ff.
  U.S. military aid to; arms may be used against Greeks; E 149
  What the palace fears. C. Poulos; S .... 158; see also C, opposite 205
Greenfield, Allen H.
  Errors in D. Cohen article on flying saucers; C, opposite 177, with Cohen reply; see also 131
Gregor, Arthur
  Exiled; P 479
Gregoris, A. Y.
  New chapter of protest on Vietnam; C, opposite 317
Gregory, Dick; Negro comedian's civil-rights activity in Chicago and elsewhere 95
Gregory, Lee H.
  Greetings to Nation, citing E. Burke, on 100th anniversary; C, opposite 29
Griffin, Truman
  Absurdity of phrase "unconditional negotiations"; C 223
Griswold, Estelle T.; co-appellant in Connecticut birth-control case 121
Gruening, Senator Ernest; congratulations to Nation on 100th birthday; C, opposite 29 Guerrilla warfare. The Pentagon's dilemma, as in Vietnam: Goliath and the guerrilla. E. Hobsbawn; S 33
  See also War
Guevara, Ernesto (Che); speculations in Cuba on disappearance 54
Guggenheimer, Elinor C.
  Can we live with our cars? S 164
Gummere, Richard M., Jr.
  Discipline in the dark: on beating school children; S 442
Gutheim, Frederick
  Reviews of architecture
    Watergate apartments, Washington, D.C.; S 395
Guthrie, Tyrone, theater. Production of The cherry orchard reviewed by J. Novick; D 87

H

Haagen-Smid, Prof. A. J.; identified nature of smog 433
Haase, Martin R.
  E. Ahmad to speak at Quaker-sponsored conference on Social revolution—world imperative; C, opposite 429; see also 95
Halberstam, David; correspondent on Secretary McNamara and Vietnam war 138, 141
Hall, Representative Durward G.; investigation of post-office snooping 498-499
Hall, Richard
  Sighters of flying saucers not crackpots; C, opposite 149; see also 131
Halpern, Representative Seymour
  Dissent from M. Viorst on nuclear proliferation; C, opposite 345; see also 235
Hamilton, Richard F.
  The abyss of policy. 2. A touch of tyranny in short-term authoritarianism abroad as expounded by W. P. Bundy in Goals for Americans: programs for action in the sixties; S 75
  Conviction or convenience? The trap of the Great Society; S 384
Hanly, V.
  U.N. as world bore; C. opposite 29
Hansen, Kai; headed G.M.'s Corvair project 296, 297
Happy days. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 258
Hardy, Representative Porter, Jr.; armed services subcommittee investigating salary practices of Aerospace corp.; E 262
Harris, Jack; ex-IRS man's testimony on snooping .... 496 ff.
Harris, Louis. See Polls
Hart, Moss. Play You can't take it with you (ANTA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 484
Hatch, Robert
  Reply to remark on Lincoln center in June 21 Nation. H. Blau and J. Irving; C, opposite 29
  Reviews of motion pictures
    Alphaville 175
    Cat Ballou 68
    Charulata 175
    Darling 108
    Hill, the 288
    Ipcress file, the 108
    Juliet of the spirits 371
    Knack, the 68

PAGE

    Loved one, the 316
    Married woman, the 259
    Mickey One 259
    Railroad man, the 371
    Salt of the earth 371
    Shakespeare wallah 175
    Shop on High street, the 176
    Third New York film festival 175
    To die in Madrid 288
    What's new Pussycat? 68
Hauser, Phillip M.; sociologist's figures on segregation in Chicago schools 92
Hawaii; Eastland's opposition to statehood 193
Health. See Medicine
Height. J. Miles; P 420
Heintz, Dr. and Mrs. R. K. See Seibel, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Hemingway, Ernest; record of readings reviewed by K. Vanderbilt; S 284
Herbert, Robert L.
  S. Elam superficial on AFT and NEA; C, with Elam reply, opposite 345; see also 247
Hermann, J.
  Cruelty of Vietnam guerrillas; C, opposite 129; see also 95
Hershey, General Lewis B. See United States—Defense, national Heym, Stefan
  I arrive at socialism by train; writer's life in East Germany; S 228
Higgs, William Leon
  LBJ and the Negro vote: case of the missing registrars in South; S 460
High office. W. Burford; P 287
Hill, Gladwin
  The politics of (water) pollution; S 220
Hill, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 288
Hobsbawn, Eric
  The Pentagon's dilemma in Vietnam: Goliath and the guerrilla; S .... 33; see also C, opposite 109
Hofstadter, Richard; on paranoid style in U.S. politics, reflected in current foreign policy; E 401
Hofstadter, Justice Samuel H.
  Editorial Justice for homosexuals confuses issues; C .... 428; see also E, 318
Hogan's goat. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 427
Homosexuals; justice for sought by San Francisco group; E .... 318; see also C, 428
Hooke, Walter G.
  Cardinal McIntire's contribution to Watts riots; C, opposite 129; see also E, 89
Hoover, J. Edgar; charge of Communism in Free speech movement 154
  Effective opposition to consular treaty with Soviet Union 110
  Omnipotence pricked by R. Stout in Nero Wolfe book and in interview; E 291
  See also United States—Justice Department
Hospitals. See Medicine
Howe, Irving; views on SNCC quoted in J. Newfield, 39, disclaimed; Editor's note, opposite 69; see also N. Birnbaum; C, opposite 1
Huberman, Leo
  Cuba: a revolution revisited; S 51
Hudson river; as supplemental source of New York city water; E 1
  See also Consolidated Edison co.
Hughes, Governor Richard J. See New Jersey
Hughmanic, J. W.
  Sesquicentennial of Canton, Ohio, Repository, early friend of The Nation; C, opposite 1
Hurkos, Peter; alleged psychic solution of crimes 473
Huxley, Matthew
  The incompleat suicide; incidence, prevention, health problem; S 414
Hynek, Haakon H.
  High cost of killing Vietcong; C, opposite 373

I

IEEE spectrum (periodical); G. D. Friedlander article on air pollution; E 347
Illegitimacy; among Negroes analyzed in Moynihan report 381
Imperialism; panel on at Socialist scholars' conference 196
In autumn. W. S. Merwin; P 364
In the egg. G. Grass (translated by M. Hamburger); P 82
Inadmissible evidence. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 508
Income; psychology of guaranteed income. E. Fromm; S 439
India; pressure on government to initiate nuclear program 236
  U.S. military aid to 149
  See also Kashmir

PAGE

Indonesia; attitudes on Malaysia and Singapore 209, 211
Installment buying; pay-later economy of the U.S.; E 178
Insurance; against atomic-energy disasters: the ticklish statistics. D. E. Pesonen; S 242
Intellectuals; role in peace movement 469-470
  See also Eisenhower, Dwight D.
International confederation of free trade unions (ICFTU); relations with AIFLD 11, 14-15
Iron mountain atomic storage corp.; elaborate shelter for business V.I.P.s 430
Ipcress file, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 108
Irving. See Blau, H.
Israel; international theatre institute congress, Tel Aviv. H. Popkin; D 127
Italy; letter from Rome; European community of writers' congress. E. M. Borgese; S 313

J

Japan; letter from Tokyo. M. Evans; S 203
  Notes on theater. H. Clurman; D 84
Javits, Senator Jacob K.; asks Congressional debate on Vietnam 486
John XXIII, Pope; work for peace 470
John Birch society. See Conservatives, U.S.
Johnson, President Lyndon B.
  Acknowledgment of virtual war in Vietnam clears air of hypocrisy 180
  Attitude toward Nov. 27 peace march on Washington 465-466
  Chance to declare cease-fire given by Pope's U.N. plea for Vietnam peace; E 233 Conviction or convenience? Trap of Great Society program. R. F. Hamilton; S 384
  Foreign policies blinded by reliance on military force to crush presumed Communist conspiracies 139
  LBJ and the Negro vote: case of the missing registrars. W. L. Higgs; S 460
  Love of intrigue and personal power result in loss of credibility in administration's statements on foreign affairs; E 429 Overwhelming power of his presidency; need for shadow presidency by opposition. J. M. Burns; S .... 115; see also C, opposite 177
  Own war in Vietnam, without Congressional authorization; should take issues to U.N.; E 401
  Plea in vacuum to U.N. security council on Vietnam peace negotiations; E 69
  Problem of public image could be solved by ending slaughter in Vietnam; E 30 Protagonist of T. H. White book The making of the President 1964; E 49
  Reasons for stolid response to statement on gravity of nuclear proliferation 235, 238
  Relations with Senator Eastland 184, 187
  Republican "squeeze" on in foreign policy, leading to escalation of Vietnam war; E 1
  Significance of H. C. Lodge and A. J. Goldberg appointments; E 49
  Stage-management of Vietnam war; E 69
  "Treason" as expert on foreign policy .... 466 ff.
  Wrong-way road to Vietnam victory through bombing of north; race against time; E 91
Johnson, Robert; UAW official's revival of National water resources commission idea 91
Juliet of the spirits. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 371
Junker, Howard
  Free university of New York: academy for mavericks; S 78
  Smut hunters: the new jurisprudery; S 358
  The underground renaissance in film-making MP 539
Jury system. See Law

K

Kashmir; China's indirect role in obtaining cease-fire; E 177
  India-Pakistan war over not irrational, like that of U.S. over Vietnam; E 149
  India's back stiffened by CIA vendetta against Ayub of Pakistan?; E 207
  U.N.'s perilous chance to settle war. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 151
Kastenmeier, Representative Robert; publicized J. R. Schmidhauser article on obstacles to voting in U.S. 2
  Published book Vietnam hearings, record of discussions he organized in own Wisconsin district 457
Katzenbach, Attorney General Nicholas deB. See United States—Justice department
Kaufman, Arnold S.; June 21 article on violence in man paralleled by J. P. Scott's on violence in animals; C, opposite 29

PAGE

Kaufman, George S. Play You can't take it with you (ANTA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 464
Kealy, Robert L.
  Reasons for doubting E. Hobsbawm on Vietcong victory; C, opposite 109; see also 33
Keating, Charles H.; founder-leader of Citizens for decent literature 5
Keating, Charles J., Jr.; Citizens for decent literature lawyer ..... 358 ff.
Keating, Edward (editor). See Ramparts
Keech, Scott
  Exceptions to A. de Figueirdo on Portugal; C, opposite 233; see also 134
Kennedy, President John F.; disingenuous on foreign policy 467
  J. Dixon's prophecies on ..... 470 ff.
  Tasteless memories of administration by A. M. Schlesinger, Jr., in Life; E 49
Kennedy, Senator Robert F.; asks Congressional debate on Vietnam 486
  Concept of U.S. "nuclear umbrella" for non-nuclear nations 236, 237
  Established image of independent political figure on South American trip; E 430
  On need for aid to mentally retarded; E 151
  Victory over Governor Rockefeller on New York state water pollution 223
Kentfield, Calvin
  Reviews of motion pictures
    Ninth annual international film festival, San Francisco 398
Kentucky; plight of furniture maker and coal miners; tyranny of charity. W. Berry; S .. 161
Kerouac, Jack; new nonstudents on 155
Keyhoe, Major Donald E.; True magazine articles on flying saucers 131, 132
Kheel, Theodore W.; mediator's constructive suggestions for prevention of newspaper strikes; E 262
Khrushchev, Nikita S.; decentralization being reversed in Soviet Union. I. Deutscher; S 264
King, Rev. Martin Luther, Jr.; crackdown on him and other dissidents from administration policies; E ..... 205; see also C, opposite 261
  De facto Catholic bishop in Selma 217
  More competent than critic, Senator T. J. Dodd, to speak on foreign policy. H. Cimring; C, opposite 205
  Work for peace 470
Knack, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 68
Koski, George
  At Vatican council, U.S. "progressives" spoke for "deterrent" nuclear weapons; C, opposite 261
Kosygin, Premier Aleksei N.
  Reluctant recentralization of Soviet economy ..... 264 ff.
Kozloff, Max
  Reviews of art
    Motherwell, Robert 256
    Munch, Edvard 342
  See also Books section of Index
Krebs, Allen; co-founder of free university of New York 79
Ku Klux Klan; discovers HUAC. W. Goodman; S ..... 328; see also C, with Goodman reply, opposite 401
  Grandstand investigation by HUAC; E 290
  HUAC investigation veers to Negroes and Communists; E 515
Kuncewicz, Maria
  Letter from Poland; unrevolutionary youth; S 537

L

Labor
  Union
    AFL-CIO convention: strong arm of the status quo. B. J. Widick; S 516
    American labor abroad: Lovestone diplomacy. S. Lens; S 10
    Federal harassment of Mine, mill and smelter workers; E 150
    Lovestone's foreign policy of cold warriorism followed by AFL-CIO; E 2
    Obstacles in North Dakota 41
    Should support new strong radical party. J. B. C. Woods; C, opposite 373
    Stake in prevention of newspaper strikes; E 262
    Teachers' unions: rift without differences between AFT and NEA. S. Elam; S ..... 247; see also C, opposite 317 and 345
Labour party (Great Britain). Harold Wilson: Labour's Lloyd George? M. Foot; S .. 518
  Relations with peace movement ..... 273 ff.
La Paglia, Umberto
  Integration policies of AFT and NEA; C, opposite 317; see also 247

PAGE

Lasch, Christopher
  New curriculum for teach-ins: cold war and history of U.S. Left; S ..... 239; see also C, opposite 289
Lasch, Christopher, and A. B. Spitzer
  The abyss of policy. 1. The unthinkable target—saturation bombing of North Vietnam; S 74
Latin America; absence of morality in U.S. policies demonstrated by spokesmen at Toronto teach-in 301
  Communism combated by AIFLD, AFL-CIO affiliate ..... 10 ff.
  Continent on a teeterboard between democracy and dictatorship. D. D. Ranstead; S ..... 292; see also C, opposite 345
  Johnson and R. F. Kennedy positions on; E 430
  Military domination of U.S. policies on 138-139
  U.S. House's resolution endorsing use of force against Communist take-overs; E 177
Law; and censorship ..... 5 ff.
  Silence of bar in abuses of Southern jury system; E 291
  Southern juries: the white hand of justice by which murderers of civil-rights workers are set free. P. Good; S 278
League for industrial democracy; relations with SDS 331
Leary, Timothy; LSD experiments 25
Lecanuet, Jean; young candidate for French presidency ..... 406; opposite 457
Lee Kuan Yew, Prime minister. See Singapore
Left, the; favored by great artists? D. Mandel and M. Marcus letters; C, opposite 205, 261, and 317
Left, U.S.; relation to Communism as subject for Vietnam teach-ins 241
  Strong radical party required. J. B. C. Woods; C, opposite 373
  The student Left: idealism and action, as in SDS. J. Newfield; S ..... 330; see also C, opposite 457
  See also Radicals, U.S.
Lehman, Rev. Robert S.
  Funds plea for Free Southern theatre; C, opposite 49
Lens, Sidney
  American labor abroad: Lovestone diplomacy; S 10
Lerner, Alan Jay. Musical On a clear day you can see forever reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398
Levine, Steven
  M. B. Freedman, in June 14 article, Roots of student discontent, fails to understand problem; C, opposite 1
  Resort-ad atmosphere in H. M. Thompson's article on nonstudent Left; C, opposite 205; see also 149
Leviten, David
  October; P 197
Lewis, Frank W.
  Crosword puzzles. See back pages
Lewis, John; SNCC chairman 38
Lewis, Oscar. See Sommers, J.
Liberal party (Great Britain); tacit alliance with Labour 520
Liberal party (New York); enabled Lindsay to win 376
Life (periodical); tasteless memoirs of Kennedy administration by A. M. Schlesinger, Jr.; E 49
  Uncritical article on prophetess J. Dixon 471
Lillard, Richard C.
  Is the automobile incurable? Life in the parking lot that is southern California; S 435
Lincoln, Abraham; anecdote on political danger of opposing war. W. Lowenfels; C, opposite 49
Lincoln center, New York city. Danton's death. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 370
Lindsay, John V.; failed to carry New York Republicans to victory 375
  Miracle of election to New York mayoralty. C. McWilliams; E 348
  Nation's choice for New York city mayor; E 130
Lion and the jewel, the. Reviewed by R. Green; D 224
Listen Galaxea. By A. Cardona-Hine; P 46
Loan industry; U.S. pay-later economy; E 178
Lodge, Henry Cabot; quoted as saying U.S. would not withdraw from Vietnam even if requested by government; E 90
  Significance of reappointment as ambassador-proconsul in Vietnam; E 49
Logan, John
  Prison poem; P 390
London. See Great Britain
Long, Senator E. V.; investigation of invasion of privacy by Federal law-enforcement officials. F. J. Cook; S 496

PAGE

Long day's journey into night (Japanese production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D .. 85
Lore, H.
  Senator J. Clark's support of Fulbright memorandum on Dominican intervention; C 223
Los Angeles. See California
Lourie, Richard
  "English"; P 259
Loved one, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP .. 316
Lovestone, Jay; American labor abroad: Lovestone diplomacy. S. Lens; S 10
  Cold-war foreign policy followed by AFL-CIO; E 2
Lowenfels, Walter
  Lincoln anecdote on political danger of opposing war; C, opposite 49
LSD. See Drugs
Lumber industry; signs extolling practices in national forests. G. McConnell; S 522
Lundberg, Ferdinand
  Supplement to R. Wilhelm on selective service; C, opposite 401; see also 350
Lundy, Victor; critique of IBM building, Cranford, N.J. By W. McQuade; S 86
Lynd, Staughton; Yale professor's course in U.S. radical tradition at free university of New York 78

M

McAteer, Eugene; California state senator's bill to compensate victims of violence .. 304, 305
McCarthy, Joseph T.; succeeded by Senator J. O. Eastland as No. 1 "patriot" 191, 192, 193
McCarthyism; resurgence via Vietnam war; E 514
McCarty, Judge Francis; inspired California law to compensate victims of violence .. 304, 305
McClellan, Andrew; AFL-CIO official's role in anti-Communist unions abroad 10, 12, 16, 27
McCone, John A.; commission's report on Watts (Los Angeles) rioting; E 487
McConnell, Grant
  P.R. in the national forests; signs extolling lumber companies' practices; S 522
McGarry, Bernard; victim of internal-revenue snoopers 496-497
McIntyre, Cardinal; contribution to Los Angeles riots. W. G. Hooke; C, opposite 129; see also E, 89
  Los Angeles prelate's removal for malfeasance on racial issue requested of Pope by priest 217
McLuhan, Marshall; philosopher of LSD 25-26
McNamara, Secretary Robert S. See United States—Defense, national McQuade, Walter
  Reviews of architecture
    Museum of modern art's 65 years of modern architecture in the U.S.; S 86
McWilliams, Carey
  Miracle of J.V. Lindsay's mayoralty victory in New York city; E 348
  Poland's perennial problem of geography solved; S 118
  Watts: riots in forgotten Los Angeles Negro slum; E ..... 89; see also C, opposite 129 and 149
Mafia. See Crime
Mahrer, Jerry
  Disturbed by D. Cort's low opinion of soccer; C, opposite 177; see also 100
Makarios, President-archbishop. See Cyprus
Malaya; lessons of guerrilla warfare of 1950's 34, 35, 96
Malaysia; expulsion of Singapore. C. P. FitzGerald; S 208
Man of La Mancha. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 483
Mandel, David
  Great art favors Left; C, opposite 205; see also M. Marcus, C, opposite 261, and Mandel reply, C, opposite 317
Marcus, Mordecai
  D. Mandel disputed on great art favoring Left; C, opposite 261; see also C, opposite 205 and 317
Mark, Norman
  Censorship: fanatics and fallacies. 1. The anonymous smut hunters; S 5
Married woman, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 259
Marshall, Thurgood; judicial appointment delayed by Senator Eastland 188
Martin, Jean
  Hospitals without nurses; S 245
Martin, William McChesney. See United States—Federal reserve board
Maryland; new law liberalizing residence requirements for voting in Presidential elections. A. W. Brown, Jr.; C, opposite 49
Matute, Ana Maria
  Spain's wounded generation of writers; S .. 420

Index

PAGE

Meany, George; AFL-CIO head's cold-war foreign policy; E .... 2; 10 ff.; 516 ff.
Medicine; Cuban health services 53
  Health problems among poor children revealed by Head Start survey; E 347
  Hospitals without nurses. J. Martin; S 245
  Proposed legislation to curb abuses of laboratory animals; E 404
  Symposium on suicide. M. Huxley; S 414
  Waste in civil-defense hospital program; E 514
  White House conference on health; warnings on uncontrolled birth rate 402
Medium, the. R. Blaser; P 126
Meisler, Stanley
  Our stake in apartheid; trade with South Africa; S 71
Mekas, Jonas; leader of underground film movement 539
Mellen, James; co-founder of free university of New York 79 Mentally retarded; help needed for; Senator R. F. Kennedy on; E 151
Merwin, W. S.
  After the solstice; P 364
  The cold before the moonrise; P 364
  Crows on the north slope; P 364
  December among the vanished; P 364
  In autumn; P 364
  New moon in November; P 364
Metzner, Ralph; work in LSD 25, 26
Mexico; attempted ban of O. Lewis book, The children of Sánchez. J. Sommers; S 530
Michigan state chamber of commerce; alarums over Federal take-over in water pollution 222-223
Mickey One. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 259
Mies van der Rohe, L.; influence on contemporary architecture 86-87
Miles, Josephine Height; P 420
Miller, Jason
  (Square in Savannah); P 24
Miller, Margaret
  The new Russian revolution, in management, distribution, and planning; S 437
Miller, Warren; new literary editor of The Nation 261
Mills, C. Wright; on power of U.S. military and lack of civil service 138, 140
Mine, mill and smelter workers. See Labor—Union
Missiles. See Armament—Missiles
Mississippi; aid for Poor people's corp. solicited. J. Goldman; C, opposite 205; see also 214
  Background of Senator J. O. Eastland .... 184 ff.
  Racist Jackson TV station, WLBT; FCC's license-renewal decision; E 374
  Summer of discontent; unclear future of civil-rights movement. E. Sutherland; S 212
Mississippi river; disastrous floods should be controlled; E 91
Mitchell, Clarence. See National association for the advancement of colored people (NAACP)
Mitterrand, François; candidate of Left in French election .... 404 ff.
Mobilization for youth; New York city's early poverty program "saved" by P. R. Screvane; 57, 58
Montague, Henry B.; testimony of post office department inspector on snooping 498-499
Moody, Reynolds
  Let Vietnamese hold democratic election; C, opposite 373
Morgan, Charles; ACLU official on ways of improving Southern justice, as by inclusion of Negroes on juries 279-280
Morgenthau, Hans J.; televised debate with McG. Bundy; role in Vietnam teach-ins 239
Morse, Senator Wayne; strictures on AFL-CIO cold-war policies; E 2
Moses, Robert Parris. See Parris, Robert Moss, Stanley
  Prayer; P 534
  A Valentine's Day sketch of Negro slaves, Jews in concentration camps, and unhappy lovers; P 451
Motherwell, Robert. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 256
Motion pictures; anti-pornography films by Citizens for decent literature 6, 358-359
  Underground renaissance in film-making. H. Junker; MP 539
  For reviews, see Hatch, R.; Kentfield, C.
Movement. By T. Gitlin; P 331
Moynihan, Daniel Patrick; report on Negro family as savage discovery. W. Ryan; S .... 380; see also C, with Ryan reply, opposite 513
Mozambique; conditions in 136-137
Mulford, Don; California legislator's "anti-outsider law" barring nonstudents from demonstrations 154, 155, 157

PAGE

Multilateral force (MLF). See North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO)
Munch, Edvard. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 342
Mundt, Senator Karl; outconservatived by Birchite rival for seat; E 261 Museums; for reviews of exhibitions, see Junker, H.; McQuade, W.
Music. Again, the Ford millennium; Ford foundation's $85-million program for U.S. orchestras. B. Boretz; M 368
  Foundations' support of new music. B. Boretz; M 47
  For reviews, see Boretz, B.
Muskie-Blatnik bill; against water pollution 222-223
My hand. C. Simic; P 314
My legs. C. Simic; P 314
Myth: mantle. I. Schram; P 536

N

Nader, Ralph
  Profits before engineering: the Corvair story; unstable G.M. car and lawsuits; S .... 295; see also correction, opposite 345
Narcotics. See Drugs
NASA. See United States—National aeronautics and space administration
Nash, Ernest
  E. Ahmad on revolutionary warfare as required reading; C, opposite 129; see also 95
Nation, The
  Canton, Ohio, Repository as early friend. J. W. Hughmanic; C, opposite 1
  Congratulatory letters; C, opposite 29; see also 17
  Hundredth anniversary; will publish special centennial issue for Sept. 20; E 3
  Lindsay as choice in New York city mayoralty race; E 130
  W. Miller new literary editor 261
  The Nation at 100: a compilation of birthday greetings .... 17; see also C, opposite 29
  Praise for articles and editorials on Vietnam. J. J. Billings; C, opposite 129
  R. G. Sherrill's appointment as Washington correspondent 180
National association for the advancement of colored people (NAACP); spokesman C. Mitchell's exposition of tricky choices for Negroes among segregationist Southern candidates; E 346
National council of churches; statement on Vietnam; E 513
  Work of Mississippi Delta ministry among Negroes 214, 219-220
National decency reporter, the; organ of Citizens for decent literature 5
National education association (NEA). See Labor—Union
National investigations committee for aerial phenomena (NICAP); on flying saucers .... 131 ff; see also C, opposite 149
National liberation front (Vietcong); speaks with different voice from Hanoi's on negotiation of Vietnam war. J. Gittings; S 111
National safety council. See Automobiles
Negroes
  Civil rights
    Anarchy trial of W. Epton as aftermath of 1964 Harlem riot. F. J. Donner; S 335
    Confrontation in Chicago: Mayor Daley meets the movement. L. Wille; S 92
    Inadequate treatment on U.S. stage 270
    LBJ and the Negro vote: case of the missing registrars in South. W. L. Higgs; S 460
    Leaders identified with Communists by HUAC chairman Willis; E 515
    Mississippi: summer of discontent; unclear future of movement. E. Sutherland; S 212
    Probable schismatic force in Christian churches. H. Cox; S 216
    The question of SNCC. J. Newfield; S .... 38; see also Editor's note, on I. Howe's views, opposite 69
    Senator J. O. Eastland's opposition .... 185 ff.
    Stake in defeat of Dirksen-sponsored amendment to nullify Supreme court's reapportionment ruling 60
    Stake in taking prompt advantage of voting-rights act. E 71
    White murderers of workers freed by Southern juries. P. Good; S 278
  On TV; E 374
  Painful choices among Southern segregationist candidates; E 346
  Prejudice against in Rockport, Mass., and participation in Episcopal church program on anatomy of prejudice. F. Potter; S 411

PAGE

  Riot as a weapon: the language of Watts. S. Sanders; S 490
  Riots in Watts section of Los Angeles. C. McWilliams; E .... 89; see also C, opposite 129 and 149; E, 487
  Riots incited by police use of guns 527
  Role in anti-poverty programs, such as HARYOU-ACT in New York 56, 59-60
  Role in Virginia gubernatorial election 376
  Savage discovery: the Moynihan report on Negro family. W. Ryan; S .... 380; see also C, with Ryan reply, opposite 513
  South African natives' cause hurt by U.S. trade with apartheid government .... 71 ff.
  Status in Portuguese Africa 136-137
  Violence, as in Watts riots, not un-American; E 109
Neiburger, Morris
  Is the automobile incurable? Smog today and smog tomorrow; S 432
Nelson, Senator Gaylord; social-engineering bill 486-487
  Tire-safety bill; E 51
New England; backward stand on water pollution 221-222
New Jersey; Republican gubernatorial candidate W. Dumont's demand for ouster of Prof. E. D. Genovese of Rutgers fizzled as issue despite Nixon backing; E .... 345; see also 376
New moon in November. W. S. Merwin; P 364
New York city; anarchy trial of W. Epton as aftermath of 1964 Harlem riot. F. J. Donner; S 355
  Another costly newspaper strike; ways must be found to prevent recurrence; E 262
  Automotive problems 165, 166
  Free university of; new radical institution. H. Junker; S 78
  In mayoralty race, The Nation chooses J. V. Lindsay; E 130
  Limited involvement of poor in poverty programs .... 55 ff.
  Miracle of J. V. Lindsay's election as mayor. C. McWilliams; E 348
  Mobilization for youth, early poverty program, "saved" by P. R. Screvane 57, 58
  1963 near-strike by teachers; UFT's debt to AFL-CIO 247-248
  Power-blackout debacle; E .... 373; D Cort, 387; Ottinger letter, opposite 427
  Shakespeare festival. J. Novick; D 146
  Water shortage; Hudson as potential supplemental source; E .... 1; E 91
  Water shortage dramatizes problem of Hudson pollution 223
New York committee to end the war in Vietnam; plea for participants. R. Feinstein; C, opposite 69
New York state; ineffective measures to combat water pollution 221, 223
New York Times (newspaper); harassment by Senator Eastland, as in Shelton case 189-190
  Historical hiatus whenever shut down by strike; E 262
  Reported only trivialities of Nov. 27 anti-war march on Washington 463
Newfield, Jack
  The question of SNCC; S .... 38; see also Editor's note, opposite 69, on I. Howe's denial of views cited in article, and N. Birnbaum letter on Howe and L. Coser; C, opposite 1
  The student Left: idealism and action, as in SDS; S .... 330; see also C, opposite 457
Newspapers. See Press
Niagara Mohawk; power link with Consolidated Edison and with blackout; E 373
Nixon, Richard M.; 1960 deceit on prospective invasion of Cuba 467
  Vain support of New Jersey Republican gubernatorial candidate in demanding ouster of Prof. E. D. Genovese; E 345
Norstad, Lauris; Owens-Corning president's confidence in South Africa 73
North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO); divisive Cyprus problem .... 493 ff.
  French opposition to U.S. hegemony 407-408
  Gives military cast to U.S. policy in Europe 138
  Multilateral-force concept retards agreement on nuclear proliferation; problem of dual-purpose water-desalting plants; E 263
  Nuclear weapons for West Germany revealed; E 458
  U.S. problems on nuclear proliferation and multilateral force 236-237
North Dakota; North Dakota runs down. A. Stern; S 41
Novick, Julius
  Finding Shakespeare; Stratford, Conn., festival; D 45

PAGE

  Shakespeare for the people; J. Papp and New York Shakespeare festival; D 146
  Stratford II; D 65
  Reviews of opera
    Mahagonny (Stratford, Conn., production) 107
  Reviews of plays
    Cherry orchard, the (Minneapolis and Stratford, Ontario, productions) 87
Nuclear energy. Atomic insurance: the ticklish statistics. D. E. Pesonen; S 242
  Atomic water vs. atomic power; problem of dual-purpose desalinazation plants; E 263
Nuclear weapons. See Atomic bomb; Armament—Missiles Nurses. See Medicine

O

O'Brien, Conor Cruise; on imperialism 196
Obscenity. See Censorship
O'Connor, James
  What is a Socialist?; discussions at Socialist scholars conference; S 195
October. By D. Leviten; P 197
Oglesby, Carl
  The bourgeois gentlemen of Saigon; peace-seeking Vietnamese group; S 352
  Remarks on U.S. "corporate liberalism" at Nov. 27 Washington march 463-464
Olson, Charles; readings at Berkeley poetry conference 338, 339
On a clear day you can see forever. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398
On a receiving as a memento a stone from Alaska. G. Ely; P 506
O'Neill, Eugene. Play Long day's journey into night presented in Japan. H. Clurman; D 85
Opera. For reviews, see Novick, J.
Organization of American states (OAS); force in Dominican republic as forerunner of rightist inter-American peace force 292, 294
Osborne, John. Play Inadmissible evidence reviewed by H. Clurman; D 508
Ottinger, Representative Richard L.; bill to create Hudson riverway, and other conservation measures 388, 389
  Praise for D. Cort article on Con Ed.; company's contribution to blackout; C, opposite 429; see also 387
Owens-Corning fiberglas corp.; expansion plans in South Africa 73

P

Pacific gas & electric co.; pressure on AEC to drop Brookhaven report on effects of atomic-energy-plant accident 243-244
Painting; reviews of. See Kozloff, M.
Pakistan; CIA's machinations in 1964 election and subsequent vendetta against Ayub charged in story by V. Anant; E 207
  U.S. military aid to 149
  See also Kashmir
Palfrey, John G.; AEC commissioner on Price-Anderson law and safety 243
Pallier, Archbishop André; foresees schism in Catholic church, led by ultraconservatives 216, 218
Papandreou, Andreas; economist-politician scapegoat for father, George 159
Papandreou, George; veteran Greek politician thorn in side of king .... 158 ff.
Papp, Joseph; impresario of New York Shakespeare festival .... 146 ff.
Parapsychology. See Dixon, Jeane
Parris, Robert (formerly R. Moses); Negro leader's new approach to Mississippi problems 215
  SNCC's center of gravity 39, 40
  Vietnam teach-ins should stress theories as well as facts on Vietnam 240, 241
Patman, Representative Wright; investigation of du Pont tax deficiencies in Florida; E 30
Patterson, Bennett P.; book Forgotten ninth amendment cited 121, 122
Paul VI, Pope. See Catholic church
Peace and pacifism
  British peace movement: looking for the marchers. T. Roszak; S 273
  Civil disobedience in movement limited 241
  Counterdemonstrators, approving Vietnam war, never supported Johnson's other policies. H. Prasentnik; C, opposite 317
  Draft-card-burning hubbub; E 373
  Epidemic of the heart; moral crusade against Vietnam war; E 375
  Honor and hazard of protest against Vietnam war in U.S.; E 289
  National council of churches' policy statement on Vietnam; E 513
  New chapter of protest on Vietnam. A. Y. Gregoris; C, opposite 317

PAGE

  Patriotism of protest: the consensus marchers on Washington against Vietnam war, led by SANE. R. G. Sherrill; S 463
  Peace-seeking bourgeois gentlemen of Saigon. C. Oglesby; S 352
  Persecution and vilification escalating along with Vietnam war; E 514
  Press's and patriots' mindless denunciation of Vietnam war resisters; E 317
  SANE-led march on Washington hampered by refusal of bus drivers' services; E 459, 463
  State department's "nyet" to proposals of White House conference on international cooperation (arms control) and disarmament committee; E 485
  Uses of movement analyzed 469-470
  War protesters' punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick. C. Cohen; S 520
  What it means to be an American among British peace workers. T. Roszak; S 277
  Work of Pope John XXIII and M. L. King 470
Peru; teetering between democracy and dictatorship 293
Philippines; revival of guerrilla movement .. 96-97
Phonograph records. For reviews, see Boretz, B.; Vanderbilt, K.
Pierce, Dr. J. R.; article in Science contends that government funds alienate engineering education from civilian economy; E 111
Pierini, Mrs. Rose; suit against General motors in Corvair accident 295
Planned parenthood. See Birth control
Plays. For reviews, see Clurman, H.; Green, R.; Novick, N.
Poems
  Acropolis. By W. Gerchow 316
  Affluence. K. Rexroth 481
  After the solstice. W. S. Merwin 364
  Bird, a. W. Gerchow 316
  Birthday dream, the. J. Dickey 170
  Boss hires, the. C. Simic 314
  Bouquet, the. P. Brooks 26
  Chinese poems. K. Rexroth 425
  Cold before the moonrise, the. W. S. Merwin 364 Crows on the north slope. W. S. Merwin 364
  Cycle. By J. Schevill 253
  December among the vanished. W. S. Merwin 364 Dream like wind, a. W. Gerchow 316
  "English." R. Lourie 259
  Exiled. A. Gregor 479
  Height. J. Miles 420
  High office. W. Burford 287
  In autumn. W. S. Merwin 364
  In the egg. G. Grass (translated by M. Hamburger) 82
  Listen Galaxea. By A. Cardona-Hine 46
  Medium, the. R. Blaser 126
  Movement. By T. Gitlin 331
  My hand. C. Simic 314
  My legs. C. Simic 314
  Myth: mantle. I. Schram 536
  New moon in November. W. S. Merwin 364
  October. By D. Leviten 197
  On receiving as a memento a stone from Alaska. G. Ely 506
  Prayer. S. Moss 534
  Prison poem (after Tollas). J. Logan 390
  "Reverting still again." H. Carruth 200
  Riddles. R. Dana 67
  Spruce of Marshall Washer's, a. H. Carruth 104
  (Square in Savannah). J. Miller 24
  Sunday to a close at Gritman hospital. E. Auert 232
  Testament of the ringed snake. S. Bradley 123
  To a good friend at a rest home. P. Brooks 202
  Up rising. R. Duncan .... 146; see also C, opposite 149 and 205
  A Valentine's Day sketch of Negro slaves, Jews in concentration camps, and unhappy lovers. S. Moss 451
  See also Centennial index
Poetry; Berkeley, California, conference. D. Wesling; S 338
Pol, Therese
  Angelica Balabanoff: 1878-1965; S 482
Poland. Letter from Poland; unrevolutionary youth. M. Kuncewicz; S 537
  Perennial problem of geography solved. C. McWilliams; S 118
  Unideological art exhibition sent to New York; U.S. should reciprocate; E 515
Police; conduct toward Negroes as background of 1964 New York city riots .... 355 ff.
  Cops, guns and homicides. S. Rubin; S 527
  Hounding of homosexuals in U.S.; E 318
Polls; L. Harris's on campus teach-ins 29
Pollution. See Air; Water
Poor people's corp.; aid solicited for Mississippi group. J. Goldman; C, opposite 205; see also 214

PAGE

Popkin, Henry
  International theatre institute congress, Tel Aviv; D 127
Population. See Birth control
Pornography. See Censorship
Portugal; imperialism on credit. A. de Figueirdo; S .... 134; see also C, opposite 233
  Ineffective U.N. resolutions against in regard to African possessions 488
Potter, Frank
  Conscience of an art colony (Rockport, Mass.): prejudice by the sea; S 410
Poulos, Constantine
  Greece: what the palace fears; S .... 158; see also C, opposite 205
  Turkey: the discovery of politics in recent elections; S 378
  Who cares about Cyprus?; S 493
Poverty. See United States—Economics
Powell, Representative Adam Clayton; pressure to include poor in poverty programs 55
Power; debacle of blackout in northeast; E .... 373; see also 387 and C, opposite 427
Prasentnik, Harned
  Counterdemonstrators on Vietnam never supported Johnson's other programs; C, opposite 317
Prayer. S. Moss; P 534
Presidency, U.S. See United States—Executive branch
Press, Cuba; poor quality 53
Press, Greece; increased freedom under Papandreou 160
Press, U.S.; crackdown on M. L. King, Fulbright, and others opposed to U.S. Vietnam policy; E .... 205; see also C, opposite 261
  "Cuckolded" by administration on Vietnam and other crises; E 429
  Future strike shutdowns of New York and other newspapers must be prevented by constructive action; E 262
  No-enterprise system, as in informing public on Communist China; E .... 178; see also C, opposite 261
  Reflex condemnation of Vietnam war resisters; E 317
  Shortcomings in reporting Vietnam war and foreign opinion 141
Price-Anderson indemnity act, 1957, for major atomic-energy-plant disasters; controversy over renewal. D. E. Pesonen; S 242
Prickett, Jim; nonstudent co-editor of Spider 157-158
Prison poem (after Tollas). J. Logan; P 390
Prophecy. See Dixon, Jeane
Protestantism. See National council of churches
Psychedelics. See Drugs
Psychology; of guaranteed income. E. Fromm; S 439
Puzzles, crossword. F. W. Lewis. See back pages

R

Raby, Alfred; Chicago Negro teacher, head of CCCO, united civil-rights groups .... 92 ff.
Radicals, U.S. Nonstudent Left, the. H. S. Thompson; S 154
Rahman, Tunku Abdur. See Malaysia
Raimón; "little battle" for Spanish folk singer's public appearance 422
Railroad man, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 371
Ramparts; controversial liberal Catholic publication 217-218
Randolph, A. Philip, et al.
  Plea for Africa defense and aid fund (for South Africa); C, opposite 233
Ranstead, Donald D.
  Latin America: continent on a teeterboard between democracy and dictatorship; S .... 292; see also C, opposite 345
Rauh, Joseph L., Jr.; attorney's quizzing of Senator Eastland, 190-191
Records, phonograph. For reviews, see Boretz, B.; Vanderbilt, K.
Republican party; belated purge of Birchites; E 261
  Cannot challenge Great Society effectively 384-385
  Ghouls, ghosts and the GOP; timidity on rightist extremists; dirty issue of Vietnam; E 513
  The GOP today: schism within a dilemma. M. Viorst; S 375
  Significance of Lindsay victory in New York city; E 348
  "Squeeze" on Johnson, leading to escalation in Vietnam; E 1 Retarded. See Mentally retarded

Index

PAGE

Reuther, Walter; joins AFL-CIO support of U.S. foreign policies 516-517, 518
"Reverting still again." H. Carruth; P 200
Revolutionary warfare. See War
Rexroth, Kenneth
  Affluence; P 481
  Chinese poems; P 425
Rhine, Dr. J. B.; inconclusive work in extrasensory perception 473
Rhodesia; African nations' vain plea for U.N. action against white government 488
  Eleventh hour in. N. M. Shamuyarira; S .. 319
  Whites' independence action threatens African blood bath; E 261
Riddles. R. Dana; P 67
Right honourable gentleman, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398
"Right-to-work" laws; movement for repeal in North Dakota 41
Riots. See Negroes
Rivers, Representative L. Mendel; considers use of atomic power to wipe out Chinese atomic capability 91
  Steered law against draft-card burning 374
Roads. See Automobiles
Robinson, George W.; private detective on phone tapping 501
Roche, John P.; professorial cold warrior 468-469
Rockefeller, Governor Nelson A.; and Hudson river conservation controversies 389
  Skirmish with Senator R. F. Kennedy on New York water pollution 223
Rockport, Mass. See Potter, F.
Rodia, Sam; late creator of Watts towers sculpture in Los Angeles; E .... 90; see also C, opposite 149
Roman, Dr. Melvin; on art and psychedelics .. 26
Rome. See Italy
Romualdi, Serafino; AIFLD head .. 10, 14, 16, 27
Roosevelt, Mrs. Eleanor; Chicago hotel room "bugged" 499-500
Rosenberg, Paul N.
  U.S. Vietnam policy is to spread hopelessless; C, opposite 109; see also E. Hobsbawn article, 33
Roszak, Theodore
  British peace movement: looking for the marchers; S 273
  What it means to be an American among British pacifists; S 277
Royal hunt of the sun, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 397
Rubin, Sol
  Cops, guns and homicides; S 527
Ruppenthal, Karl M.
  Air safety: the lethal lapses; S 525
  Airplanes abroad: crashes and consequences of local jurisdiction and low indemnification; S 408
Rusk, Secretary of State Dean; "antennae" told him Hanoi was not sincere in wishing to negotiate Vietnam war 429
  Messages to Latin Americans compared with R. F. Kennedy's 430
  October 5 tirade against "Peiping" supplied diplomatic justification for Vietnam buildup; E 233
  Ovation at AFL-CIO convention 516
  See also United States—State department
Russell, Bertrand, Lord; recent achievements for peace obscure 275
Ryan, William
  Savage discovery: the Moynihan report on the Negro family; S .... 380; see also C, with Ryan reply, opposite 513
Ryan, Representative William Fitts; able aspirant for New York city Democratic mayoralty nomination 130, 223

S

Sabah. See Borneo
Sacher, Harry; lawyer's defiance of Senator Eastland 190
Salazar, Antonio Oliveira de. See Portugal
Salt of the earth. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 371
San Francisco, Calif. International film festival reviewed by C. Kentfield; MP 398
Sanders, Stanley
  Riot as a weapon: the language of Watts; S 490
Sandys, Duncan; former British Commonwealth secretary's responsibility for Rhodesia crisis 319-320
SANE. See Peace and pacifism
Sahlins, Marshall
  The best torture: "Once you've broken him down . . ."; U.S. "motivation" teams in Vietnam use Communist methods; S .. 266
Sarawak. See Borneo
Sarnoff, David; one-world address on future direct home reception of TV and radio satellite programs; E 207

PAGE

Savio, Mario; harsh sentence for U. of California demonstrator meted by Judge R. Crittendon; E .... 70; see also 154
Scalapino, Prof. Robert; U.S.-policy spokesman at Toronto teach-in 301
Scheer, Robert; pamphlet How the United States got involved in Vietnam as required reading; E 110
Schevill, James
  Cycle; P 253
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.; doubtful taste of Kennedy memoirs, A thousand days; E 49
Schmidhauser, Representative John R.; article on state residency requirements as obstacle to voting; E 2 Schoenberg, Arnold. Recordings reviewed by B. Boretz; M 230
Schoenman, Theodore
  Burbank, Calif., public library facilities closed to educational groups; C, opposite 129
Schram, Irene
  Myth: mantle; P 536
Scott, John Paul
  Reply to W. Crossman letter disputing thesis on origins of violence among animals, in June 21 article; C, opposite 89; see also S. Whitman; C, opposite 29
Screvane, Paul R.; New York city mayoralty aspirant "saved" Mobilization for youth 57, 58
Sculpture; S. Rodia's Watts towers, Los Angeles .... 90; see also C, opposite 149
Sefton, Douglas; Daily news article on Hudson, N. Y., shelter for business V.I.P.s 430
Segregation. See Negroes
Seibel, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd, and Dr. and Mrs. R. K. Heintz Candidate should be developed to avoid 1968 Johnson-Goldwater choice; C 223
Seldes, Bartlett Q.
  Eisenhower quoted on hatred of war and of intellectuals; C, opposite 457 Selective service system. See United States—Defense, national Shaffer, Peter. Play The royal hunt of the sun reviewed by H. Clurman; D 397
Shahn, Ben; participation in Rockport, Mass., art and church show on the anatomy of prejudice; drawing of Frederick Douglass 411
Shahn, Ezra
  Facts vs. theories in Vietnam teach-ins; C, opposite 289; see also 239
Shakespeare, William; for reviews of productions, see Novick, J.
Shakespeare wallah. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 175
Shamuyarira, N. M.
  Eleventh hour in Rhodesia; S 319
Shelton, Robert; Times reporter's defiance of Eastland subcommittee 189-190
Shelton, Robert M.; Klan's imperial wizard before HUAC .... 328 ff.
Sherrill, Robert G.
  James Eastland: child of scorn; Mississippi senator's career; S 184
  Patriotism of protest: the consensus marchers on Washington against Vietnam war, led by SANE; S 463
  Washington correspondent of The Nation .. 180
Ships; lax regulations for foreign-flag vessels behind Yarmouth Castle-type disasters; E 403
Shop on High street, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 176
Siekevitz, Philip
  Belligerent U.S. likened to Assyria; anti-war demonstrators as true lovers of country; C, opposite 373
Sihanouk, Prince Norodom. See Cambodia
Simic, Charles
  My hand; My legs; The boss hires; P 314
Singapore; expulsion from Malaysia. C. P. FitzGerald; S 208
  Prime minister Lee Kuan Yew's charge of attempted bribery by CIA belatedly confirmed by U.S. State department; E .... 129; E, 208
Skyscraper. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 484
Smith, Prime minister Ian. See Rhodesia
Smog. See Air
SNCC. See Negroes—Civil rights
Soccer; the rabble game. D. Cort; S .... 100; see also C, opposite 177
Social engineering; aerospace firms' application to public problems through state contracts in California; E 486
Social work; role in New York city anti-poverty programs .... 57 ff.
Socialism; Socialist scholars' conference announced. M. E. Gettleman; C, opposite 89 and 129
  What is a Socialist?; discussions at Socialist scholars conference. J. O'Connor; S 195

PAGE

Sommers, Joseph
  Silencing The children of Sánchez; Mexican government's attempted ban of O. Lewis book; S 530
South, U.S.; division in Protestant churches foreseen on racial issue 218-219
  Eastland as symbol 185-186
  LBJ and the Negro vote: case of the missing registrars. W. L. Higgs; S 460
  Republicans' future in 376-377
  Silence of American bar association in face of juries' acquittal of civil-rights murderers; E 291
  Southern juries: the white hand of justice in murders of civil-rights workers. P. Good; S 278
  Tricky choices for Negroes among segregationist candidates; E 346
South Africa, republic of; our stake in apartheid; U.S. trade. S. Meisler; S 71
  Support needed for Africa defense and aid fund. A. P. Randolph et al.; C, opposite 233
Soyinka, Wole. Play The lion and the jewel reviewed by R. Green; D 224
Space; lavish programs compared with lagging measures for auto safety; E 51
  Program now shared with NASA by ascendant Air Force; E 130
Spider (periodical); radical California student and nonstudent publication edited by S. DeCanio 156-157, 158
Spitzer, Alan B. See Lasch, C.
Spock, Dr. Benjamin; participation in Nov. 27 march on Washington 463, 466
Sports. Soccer: the rabble game. D. Cort; S .... 100; see also C, opposite 177
Spruce of Marshall Washer's, a. H. Carruth; P 104
(Square in Savannah). J. Miller; P 24
Stahl, Thomas K.
  D. D. Ranstead underestimates Communist threat in Latin America; C, opposite 345; see also 292
Stanton, Dr. Frank; CBS president on electoral-law reform 3
States, U.S.; Dirksen's campaign to nullify Supreme court reapportionment ruling. R. M. Christenson; S 60
  Obstacles to voting, as in residency requirements; E .... 2; see also C, opposite 49
Steinmann, Dr. Anne
  Praise for M. B. Freedman article of June 14, Roots of student discontent; C, opposite 1
Stengel, Dr. Erwin; on suicide statistics 415
Stennis, Senator John C.; relations with Mississippi colleague J. O. Eastland 194
Stern, Albert
  North Dakota runs down; S 41
Stern, Richard
  Dream world of Watts towers, Los Angeles; C, opposite 149; see also E, 89
Stevens, Roger; success as commercial dramatic producer implies conflict of interest as chairman of National council on the arts; E 234
Stevenson, Adlai E.; embarrassing position as U.S. spokesman in U.N. 49, 153, 466, 467
Stewart, Michael; British foreign secretary inaccurate on Hanoi's four-point proposal 111, 112
Storm King mountain, N.Y.; proposed Con Ed plant. D. Cort; S .... 387; see also C, opposite 429
Stout, Rex; pricked E. J. Hoover's omnipotence in Nero Wolfe book and interview; E 291
Stratford, Conn. Production of Mahagonny reviewed by J. Novick; D 107
  Shakespeare festival. J. Novick; D 45, 65
Stratford, Ontario. Shakespeare theater's production of The cherry orchard reviewed by J. Novick; D 87
Stravinsky, Igor. Records of Apollo and Orpheus reviewed by B. Boretz; M 230
Student nonviolent coordinating committee (SNCC). See Negroes—Civil rights
Students for a democratic society (SDS); part of student Left in idealism and action .... 330 ff.; see also C, opposite 457
Sugar; Cuba's big 1965 crop 52
  Quota stickup by House agriculture committee under Rep. H. D. Cooley; E 206
Suicide; symposium on incidence, prevention, and health problem. M. Huxley; S 414
Sunday to a close at Gritman hospital. E. Auert; P 232
Sutherland, Elizabeth
  Mississippi: summer of discontent; unclear future course of civil-rights movement; S 212
Svahnström, Bertil
  Swedish Vietnam committee's aims; C, opposite 149; see also C, opposite 233

Index

PAGE

T

- Taft-Hartley act; AFL-CIO's hopes for repeal of section 14(b) 518
- Tait, Charles W.
  - Whatever happened to the State department?; S 137
- Tanakos, T.
  - Praise for C. Poulos on Greece; C, opposite 205; see also 158
- Taylor, Charles
  - China from within: image and reality; S 180
  - See also Toronto Globe and Mail
- Taylor, William Palmer
  - Best to ignore stories by CIA and Soviet counterpart; C, opposite 233
  - Vietnam war less enjoyable for lack of body count of victims; C, opposite 289
- Teach-ins. See Education
- Telephones; tapping of by government agencies 496, 499-501
- Television; advertising that disparages competitive products deplored by F. M. Cone; E 235
  - Negroes on; WLBT's racism challenged; E 374
  - One-world address by D. Sarnoff on future direct home reception of satellite programs; E 207
- Testament of the ringed snake. S. Bradley; P 123
- Texas; Dallas-Gulf canal boondoggle; E 290
- Thant, Secretary-general U. See United Nations
- Theater; international theater institute congress, Tel Aviv. H. Popkin; D 127
  - Lincoln center available for Sergeant Musgrave's dance; H. Blau and J. Irving; C, opposite 29; see also R. Hatch, June 21
  - Plays and politics in contemporary U.S. H. Clurman; S 270
  - Psychedelic (LSD) groups 25-26
  - R. Stevens, commercial producer, unsuited as chairman of National council on the arts; E 234
  - For reviews of plays, see Clurman, H.; Green, R.; Novick, J.
- Thomas, Norman; in Nov. 27 anti-war demonstration 463, 464, 465
- Thompson, Hunter S.
  - The nonstudent Left in U.S. colleges; S 154; see also C, opposite 205
- Tires, See Automobiles
- Tixier-Vignancour, Jean-Louis; rightist candidate for French presidency 404, 405-406
- To die in Madrid. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 288
- To a good friend at a rest home. P. Brooks; P 202
- Tokyo. See Japan
- Toronto teach-in; notes on: irrelevance of morality in U.S. foreign policy shown by spokesmen. R. H. Welker; S 301
- Toronto Globe and Mail (newspaper); C. Taylor articles on Communist China not reprinted by most of U.S. press; E 178; see also C, opposite 261
- Torture; Communist methods used by U.S. in Vietnam. M. Sahlins; S 266
- Trade; Communist Chinese 181
  - Cuba's under Castro 52 ff.
  - Greek problems 159
  - Poland's state-controlled 119
  - U.S. with South Africa. S. Meisler; S 71
- Trading stamps; biggest gimmick; investigation by Rep. L. L. Wolff; E 130
- Travel; tourists imperiled by lax U.S. regulations on foreign-flag ships like Yarmouth Castle; E 403
- True (periodical); articles on flying saucers 131, 132
- Truman, President Harry S.; break with H. A. Wallace over cold war 431
- Turkey; Cyprus involvement 493 ff.
  - Discovery of politics in recent election. C. Poulos; S 378
  - U.S. military aid to 149, 380
- Turner, William W.
  - Crime is too big for the FBI; S 322; see also C, with Turner reply, opposite 485

U

- Unemployment; among Negroes; crux of Watts riots 487
- Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  - And the United States
    - AFL-CIO's Lovestone foreign policy opposed to improved relationship 12-13
    - Congressional timidity delays consular treaty and kills wheat sales; E 109
    - Joint backing of U.N. peace efforts in Kashmir 151-152

PAGE

    - Nuclear policies 236 ff.
    - Possible mutual use of nuclear-warhead missiles in escalated Vietnam war; E 50
    - Should embargo arms to underdeveloped nations; E 318
  - Cyprus involvement 493
  - New Russian revolution, in management, distribution, and planning. M. Miller; S 437
  - Polish ties 118 ff.
  - Relations with France; new rapprochement 407
  - Relations with Turkey 378 ff.
  - Russia vs. China: clash over Vietnam. I. Deutscher; S 3
  - Vietnam policy 111 ff.
- United Nations
  - Assembly resolution against Rhodesian rebels 261
  - Debates on Rhodesia, 1962 to date 319-320
  - Good offices should be utilized to effect Vietnam negotiations; E 401
  - Hackneyed U.S. script on Chinese admission delivered by Ambassador Goldberg; E 205
  - Ineffectual world bore. V. Hanly; C, opposite 29
  - Perilous chance to settle Kashmir war. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 151
  - Pope's plea for Vietnam peace gives Johnson chance to declare cease-fire; E 233
  - Power shifts in: decline of the unaligned nations. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 488
  - Role of many large nations, including China indirectly, in obtaining Kashmir cease-fire; necessity of Chinese membership; E 177
  - Security council not in position to act on Johnson plea for Vietnam peace negotiations; E 69
  - Significance of A. J. Goldberg's appointment as U.S. ambassador; E 49
  - Thant's efforts for Vietnam peace slapped down by U.S.; E 429
- United States
  - And the Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  - And Vietnam. See Vietnam
  - Agency for international development(AID)
    - Backing of AFL-CIO anti-Communist crusade abroad 16, 27
    - Niggardly allotment for birth-control instruction 403
  - Agriculture department
    - Forest service's national-forest signs extolling practices of lumber industry; rivalry with Interior's Park service. G. McConnell; S 522
  - Atomic energy commission
    - Caginess on insurance. D. E. Pesonen; S 242
  - Central intelligence agency
    - Domination over State department, as in Singapore bribe incident and Bay of Pigs; E 129, 140
    - Derring-do surpasses Marines', as in electoral machinations in Pakistan; E 207
    - Inspired news stories best ignored. W. P. Taylor; C, opposite 233
    - Relations with AIFLD 10 ff., 26-27
  - Civil aeronautics board
    - Certain accident areas beyond purview 525
    - Investigation of air crashes compared with European practices 408-409
  - Commerce department
    - Condones lax requirements for foreign-flag ships 403
  - Congress
    - Duty to debate Vietnam war; individual members organizing public discussions in own districts; E 457
    - Fundamental debate of foreign policy as well as Vietnam needed; E 486
    - Hasn't declared war in Vietnam; E 401
    - House armed services subcommittee investigating Aerospace corp. salary practices; E 262
    - House banking committee's investigation of du Pont estate in Florida 30
    - HUAC's grandstand investigation of Klan; E 290
    - Joint atomic subcommittee on inadequate safeguards of nuclear weapons for West Germany; E 458
    - Klan discovers HUAC, the. W. Goodman; S 328; see also C, with Goodman reply, opposite 401
    - Little support for Senator Fulbright's dissents on foreign policy; House's resolution endorsing use of force in Western Hemisphere; E 177
    - Members on military pay 350, 351
    - Offers no counterweight to presidential power 116 ff.

PAGE

    - Power of Southerners would be cut by large Negro vote. W. L. Higgs; S 460
    - Pushover for pressure groups charging softness on Communism; E 109
    - Senator Eastland's power 187-188
    - Senator E. V. Long's investigation of Federal invasions of privacy. F. J. Cook; S 496
    - Sugar-quota stickup by House agriculture committee under H. D. Cooley; E 206
    - Unrest on administration policies in Vietnam and Dominican republic 141
    - Work for the "fabulous" 89th in its second session, notably on foreign policy; E 317
  - Constitution
    - Amendment proposed by Senator Dirksen to nullify Supreme court on reapportionment. R. M. Christenson; S 60
    - "Forgotten" Ninth Amendment, by implication guaranteeing marital privacy, cited by Supreme court in Griswold v. Connecticut birth-control case. J. D. Carroll; S 121
  - Culture
    - Risks in presidential leadership 115-116
  - Defense, national
    - Army engineers' tricky cost re-evaluation of Cross-Florida barge canal; E 290
    - Ascendant Air Force now shares control of space program with NASA; E 130
    - Civil-defense hospital program's waste; E 514
    - Department taking over State's foreign-relations responsibilities; E 129; 137 ff.
    - The great draft-card-burning hubbub; E 373
    - How to end the draft. W. Wilhelm; S 350; see also C, opposite 401 and 429, 456
    - Increased spending because of Vietnam war; something for nearly everybody; E 69
    - McNamara's zeal in exporting arms to fight "Communism," as in jet planes to Argentina; E 234
    - The Pentagon's dilemma: Goliath and the guerrilla. E. Hobsbawn; S 33
    - Selective service's punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick for war protesters. C. Cohen; S 520
  - Economics
    - Conviction or convenience? The trap of the Great Society. R. F. Hamilton; S 384
    - Of the long war in Vietnam; E 485
    - Pay-later economy, the; E 178
    - War on poverty, the: are the poor left out? R. A. Cloward; S 55
    - War preparations for Vietnam continue national way of life; E 69
  - Executive branch
    - Need for shadow presidency by opposition party. J. M. Burns; S 115; see also C, opposite 177
  - Federal communications commission
    - Provisional renewal of license of racist Mississippi station, WLBT-TV; E 374
  - Federal power commission
    - Approved Con Ed Storm King plant 388-389
  - Federal reserve board
    - Chairman Martin's rise in discount rates to slow Vietnam boom; E 485
  - Foreign policy
    - The abyss of policy. 2. A touch of tyranny in short-term authoritarianism abroad expounded by W. P. Bundy in Goals for Americans: programs for action in the sixties. R. F. Hamilton; S 75
    - AFL-CIO convention's uncritical support. B. J. Widick; S 516
    - American labor abroad: Lovestone diplomacy. S. Lens; S 10
    - Arms diplomacy; selective military to foreign countries; E 149
    - Backs measures against Rhodesian rebels 261
    - Chinese domestic views on 180 ff.
    - Cold-warism abetted by AFL-CIO under J. Lovestone's tutelage; E 2
    - Conflicting Soviet and Chinese views on in Vietnam. I. Deutscher; S 3
    - Domestic Chinese propaganda on 180
    - "Goliath" imperiled by Vietnamese escalation; possible Chinese responses; E 29
    - Holy alliance force against subversion tends to tip teetering nations toward rightist dictatorships. D. D. Ranstead; S 292; see also C, opposite 345
    - Handcuffed by pressure groups charging softness on Communism; E 109
    - Influence of Southern Congressional committee chairmen 460
    - Irrelevance of morality demonstrated by spokesmen at Toronto teach-in. R. H. Welker; S 301

PAGE

  Lacking in candor, credibility, and confidence; recent instances; E 429
  Latin-American positions of Johnson and R. F. Kennedy compared; E 430
  Long pull to change vis-à-vis Far East even after Vietnam settlement; formation of Americans for reappraisal of Far Eastern policy as breakthrough; E 289
  Need for serious Congressional debate on; E .... 457; E, 486
  C. Oglesby on "corporate liberalism" 463-464
  On nuclear proliferation. M. Viorst; S .... 235; see also C, opposite 345
  Paranoid syle; E 401
  Treason of experts in misleading people. E. Bentlye; S 466
  Whatever happened to the State department?; domination by military. C. W. Tait; S 137
  Work for second session of "fabulous" 89th Congress; E 317
  See also Vietnam
Foreign relations
  Our stake in apartheid; trade with South Africa. S. Meisler; S 71
  Responsibility taken over from State department by Defense; E .... 129; 137 ff.
  With Brazil; dictatorial regime as protégé; E 345
  With Cambodia; backed South Vietnamese incursions; E 402
  With Cyprus .... 493 ff.
  With France; disapproval of de Gaulle will win him million votes 405
  With Turkey 380
  With Vietnam. See Vietnam
Health, education and welfare department
  Laggard in establishing birth-control clinics 403
  Measures against water pollution 222, 223
Justice department
  Crime is too big for the FBI. W. W. Turner; S .... 322; see also C, with Turner reply, opposite 485
  FBI official's vilification of peace advocates 514
  FBI wiretapping 500-501
  Few registrars in South to ensure Negro franchise 461-462
  Harassment of Mine, mill and smelter workers; E 150
  Secretary Katzenbach's detached reaction on Southern juries' condonation of civil-rights murders 279
Labor department
  Moynihan report on the Negro family as savage discovery. W. Ryan; S .... 380; see also C, with Ryan reply, opposite 513
National aeronautics and space administration
  Now shares control of space program with ascendant Air Force; E 130
Office of economic opportunity
  Project Head Start survey reveals health problems of poor children; E 347
Post office department
  "Mail cover" snooping 498-499
State department
  Abject subordination to CIA in Asia, as in Singapore bribe case; E 129
  Decline of; abdication of responsibility to Defense; E .... 129. See also Whatever happened to the State department? C. W. Tait; S 137 Liaison with AFL-CIO affiliate AIFLD in foreign policy .... 10 ff.
  "Nyet" to proposals of Arms control and disarmament committee of White House conference; E 485
  See also United States—Foreign policy
Supreme court
  Implications of birth-control decision in Griswold v. Connecticut. J. D. Carroll; S 121
  Rulings in obscenity cases uphold freedom of press. E. Gertz; S 7
  Watkins case and other civil-liberties decisions frustrating to Senator Eastland .... 190 ff.
Treasury department
  Internal-revenue snoopers .... 496 ff.
Universal military service. See United States—Defense, national Unruh, Jesse; assembly speaker investigating higher education in California 154
Up rising. R. Duncan; P .... 146; see also C, opposite 205

PAGE

V

A Valentine's Day sketch of Negro slaves, Jews in concentration camps, and unhappy lovers. S. Moss; P 451
Vanderbilt, Kermit
  Reviews of records
    Ernest Hemingway reading 284
Varèse, Edgard. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 426
Vatican council. See Catholic church
Vietcong. See National liberation front; Vietnam Vietnam
  Absence of morality in U.S. policies demonstrated by spokesmen at Toronto teach-in. R. H. Welker; S 301 Absurdity of U.S. term "unconditional negotiations." T. Griffin; C 223
  The abyss of policy. 1. The unthinkable target—saturation bombing of north. C. Lasch and A. B. Spitzer; S 74
  Addendum to "Why Vietnam?": a basis for negotiation exists. J. Gittings; S 111
  AFL-CIO convention's support of war .... 516 ff.
  Americans for reappraisal of Far Eastern policy (ARFEP) designed to function after settlement of conflict; E 289
  Cambodia not major Vietcong sanctuary; South Vietnamese incursions; E 402
  Chinese confrontation unlikely 183
  Congressional debate on war needed; E 486
  Consensus marchers on Washington against war. R. G. Sherrill; S 463
  Counterdemonstrators against peace protesters never supported Johnson's other programs. H. Prasentnik; C, opposite 317 Demonstrations against war Communist-inspired, according to V. Glaser article; E 29
  Eisenhower's anger over demonstrations against U.S. policies. J. Ayre; C, opposite 289
  Epidemic of the heart; U.S. moral crusade against war; E 375
  Escalation imperils "Goliath" U.S.; possible Chinese responses; E 29
  Escalation of war could bring use of nuclear missiles by Soviets and U.S.; E 50
  Example of revolutionary warfare. E. Ahmad; S .... 95; see also C, opposite 129 and 429
  High cost to U.S. of killing Vietcong. H. H. Hynek; C, opposite 373
  Honor and hazard of peace protests in U.S.; E 289
  Humanitarian actions espoused by Swedish Vietnam committee. B. Svahnström; C, opposite 149; see also L. H. Geller; C, opposite 233
  Hypocrisy of "just" war increasingly rejected in U.S.; E 179
  Ineffective opposition to war of British peace movement .... 274 ff.
  Johnson administration's propaganda and machinations; E 429
  Let people hold democratic election. R. Moody; C, opposite 373
  Limitations of Johnson plea for U.N. security council to act on peace negotiations; E 69
  Mass bombings and Johnson image; E 30
  Mindless denunciation by U.S. press and patriots of war resisters; E 317
  More escalation of war; may be disastrous politically for Johnson; E 457
  Nation editorials and articles on praised. J. J. Billings; C, opposite 129
  New, bigger U.S. war really against Communist China; E 233
  New chapter of protest against war in U.S. By A. Y. Gregoris; C, opposite 317
  New curriculum for teach-ins on. C. Lasch; S .... 239; see also C, opposite 289
  Peace and Protestantism; National council of churches' statement; E 513
  Peace-seeking bourgeois gentlemen of Saigon. C. Oglesby; S 352
  The Pentagon's dilemma: Goliath and the guerrilla. E. Hobsbawn; S .... 33; see also C, opposite 109
  Pope's plea for peace at U.N. gives Johnson chance to declare cease-fire; E 233
  President Johnson's war not authorized by Congress; issues should be taken to U.N.; E 401
  "Presidential front" in U.S.: Committee for an effective and durable peace in Asia; E .... 207; see also C, opposite 261 Republican "squeeze" on Johnson as factor in escalation of conflict; E 1
  Russia vs. China: clash over Vietnam. I. Deutscher; S 3
  R. Scheer pamphlet, How the United States got involved in Vietnam, as required reading; E 110

PAGE

  Sensation caused by Ambassador Lodge's alleged statement that U.S. would not withdraw even if requested by government; E 90
  Significance of H. C. Lodge's reappointment as ambassador-proconsul and A. J. Goldberg as U.N. ambassador; E 49
  Torture techniques borrowed from Communists used by U.S. "motivation" teams. M. Sahlins; S 266
  "Treason" of U. S. experts on, from Johnson down. E. Bentley; S 466
  "Unconditional discussions" by U.S. becoming less and less so as war is seen as preventive action against China; E 429
  U.S. bombing of North driving Soviets and China into dangerous corner. T. Broderick; C, opposite 69
  U.S. military's control of U.S. policy on 138-139
  U.S. press's crackdown on M. L. King for opposition to administration policy; E 205
  U.S. violence in is reflected back home, as in Watts riots; E 109
  U.S. war over truly irrational, not like that of India and Pakistan over Kashmir; E 149
  U.S. war protesters as true lovers of country; demonstrators lack faith in governing institutions. P. Siekewitz and M. Wales; C, opposite 373
  U.S. war protesters' punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick. C. Cohen; S 520
  Victory formula of Los Angeles' mayor Yorty; E 515
  War as continuation of recent U.S. way of life, with little dissent; E 69
  War as dirty issue for U.S. Republicans; E 513
  War boom in U.S. economy; E 485
  War hysteria brings resurgence of McCarthyism in U.S.; E 514
  War less enjoyable for lack of body count. W. P. Taylor; C, opposite 289
  Wrong-way Johnson's road to victory through bombing of north; race against time; E 91
Violence; among animals and men; J. P. Scott and A. S. Kaufman article of June 21 cited; C, opposite 29 and 89
  Of U.S. in Vietnam feeds back to civilian population; Watts Negro riots not un-American; E 109
  See also Crime
Viorst, Milton
  The GOP today: schism within a dilemma; S 375
  The nuclear club: why the outs want in; S .... 235; see also C, opposite 345
Virginia; major gubernatorial candidates' nonracist campaign; Conservative party Birchist helped defeat Republican 376
Vivisection. See Medicine
Voting; obstacles to in U.S., as in state residency requirements; E .... 2. See also C, opposite 49
  Senator Dirksen vs. the (Supreme) court; proposed constitutional amendment to nullify reapportionment ruling. R. M. Christenson; S 60
  Voting-rights bill passed only after summer volunteers left South; E 71
  See also Elections; Negroes—Civil rights

W

Wales, Michael
  Vietnam war protesters lack faith in governing institutions; C, opposite 373
Wallace, Henry A.; tribute to man who tried to stop cold war; E 431
War. Revolutionary warfare: how to tell when the rebels have won. E. Ahmad; S .... 95; see also C, opposite 129 and 429
Warhol, Andy; underground films 539, 540
Warsaw convention, 1929; provides low indemnity for air-crash victims 409-410
Washington, D.C.; November 27 march on. See Peace and pacifism Watergate apartments reviewed by F. Gutheim; S 395
Washington Post (newspaper); decline to administration mouthpiece; slanted reporting of Nov. 27 anti-war march 463
Water. Atomic water vs. atomic power; problem of dual-purpose desalinazation plants; E 263
  Effects on of proposed Con Ed plant up Hudson .... 387-388; see also C, opposite 429
  Politics of pollution, the. G. Hill; S 220
  Shortage and pollution problems, as in New York city; Hudson as supplemental source; E 1
  Too little in East, too much from Mississippi River; E 91

Index

PAGE

- Watkins, John T.; Supreme court decision on freedom of association as civil-liberties landmark 190
- Watts section, Los Angeles. See California
- Weill, Kurt. See Brecht, B.
- Weill-Tuckerman, Anne
  - U.N. power shifts: decline of the unaligned nations; S 488
  - The U.N.'s perilous chance to settle Kashmir war; S 151
- Welker, Robert H.
  - Notes on the Toronto teach-in: the irrelevance of morality in U.S. policies as seen in apologists' talks; S 301
- Werth, Alexander
  - De Gaulle: America's elder statesman; S .... 404; see also Werth postcript, opposite 457
- Wesling, Donald
  - Berkeley: free speech and free verse; poetry conference; S 338
- Westchester county, New York; enlightened wild-animal policies 249, 250
- What's new Pussycat? Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 68
- White, Theodore H.; successful journalism of book The making of the President 1964; E 49
- White citizens councils; Eastland creation taken over by poor whites 195
- White House conference on international cooperation. See Peace and pacifism
- Whiting, John; play The devils reviewed by H. Clurman; D 483
- Whitman, Samuel
  - J. P. Scott and A. S. Kaufman articles of June 21 cited on social disorganization as cause for violence among animals and men; C, opposite 29
- Widick, B. J.
  - AFL-CIO convention: strong arm of the status quo; S 516
- Wiesner, Dr. Jerome B.; peace proposals rebuffed by State department 485
- Wildlife; means of conservation. D. Cort; S 249
- Wilhelm, Ross
  - How to end the draft; S .... 350; see also C, opposite 401 and 429, 456
- Wilkins, Collie Leroy, Jr.; Klansman freed in Liuzzo murder case at Hayneville, Alabama 328, 329
- Wille, Lois
  - Confrontation in Chicago: Mayor Daley meets the movement for Negro civil rights; S 92
- Williams, Morva
  - New Zealander 50-year reader of Nation; C, opposite 177
- Willis, Benjamin, C.; Chicago school superintendent as symbol of inferior, segregated education .... 92 ff.
- Willis, Representative Edwin; HUAC chairman and investigation of Klan; associates Negro leaders with Communists .... 328; E 515
- Wilson, Prime minister Harold. See Great Britain
- Wiretapping. Snoopers and tappers: law-enforcement underground, investigated by Senator E. V. Long. By F. J. Cook; S 496
- Wolff, Representative Lester L.; investigation of trading-stamp practices; E 130
- Woll, Matthew; late conservative unionist's activity in anti-Communist labor groups abroad 13, 14
- Wright, Frank Lloyd; Unity church as forerunner of modern architecture 86-87
- Writers and writing. European community of writers' congress reported by E. M. Borgese; S 313
  - Spain's wounded generation. A. M. Matute; S 420
  - Writers on vacation. R. Barthes; S 474
- Wycherley, William. Play The country wife (Lincoln center production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 538

Y

- Yarmouth Castle (ship). See Ships
- Yorty, Sam; Los Angeles mayor's tough advice on Vietnam; E 515
- You can't take it with you (ANTA production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 484
- Young Americans for freedom; The new guard, not The young guard, is journalistic organ. J. Boland; C, opposite 29; see also editorial The smell of Bond, Apr. 12

Z

- Zambia; relations with Rhodesia 319, 320

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

R	Reviewer
B	Book review

PAGE

A

- Achebe, Chinua
  - No longer at ease; B 224
- Adler, Bill (ed.)
  - The (L. B.) Johnson humor; B 282
- Administration of a revolution: executive reform in Puerto Rico under Governor Tugwell, 1941-1946. C. T. Goodsell; B .. 449
- Africa. Three books on politics reviewed 198
- Africa: from independence to tomorrow. D. Hapgood; B 200
- Africa: a political travelogue. T. Molnar; B 198
- African bourgeoisie, an: race, class, and politics in South Africa. L. Kuper; B 198
- Africans. Two books by reviewed. 224
- Algren, Nelson
  - Notes from a sea diary: Hemingway all the way; B 283
- All the collected short poems 1923-1958. L. Zukofsky; B 311
- Alperovitz, Gar
  - Atomic diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam; B 123
- America's lost plays, Vols. I-VIII. Reviewer B. H. Clark, ed. H. Popkin missed point in June 14 issue. R. O'Brien; letter, opposite 69
- Andersch, Alfred
  - The night of the giraffe and other stories; B 226
- Andrist, Ralph K.
  - The long death: the last days of the Plains Indians; B 167
- At play in the fields of the Lord. By P. Matthiesen; B 475
- Atomic diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam. By G. Alperovitz; B 123
- Autobiography of Malcolm X. With the assistance of A. Haley; B 336

B

- Bajo palabra. M. González; B .... 251; see also 53
- Baldwin, James
  - Going to meet the man; B 478
- Barthes, Roland
  - Article Writers on vacation 474
- Beaumont, Gustave de, and A. de Tocqueville
  - On the penitentiary system in the United States and its application in France; B .. 168
- Berger, Klaus
  - Odilon Redon; B 503
- Beti, Mongo
  - Mission to Kala; B 225
- Beyond culture: essays on learning and literature. L. Trilling; B 334
- Bray, Donald W.; R 450
- Bride and the bachelors, the. C. Tomkins; B 504
- Brock, William R.; R 197

C

- Caldwell, T. B.
  - Erotica not censored in Denmark. Letter, opposite 69; see also E. Gertz, An end to all censors, 6
- California, the destruction of. R. F. Dasmann; B 252
- Camus, Albert
  - Notebooks: 1942-1951. Translated by J. O'Brien; B 310
- Canvases and careers. H. C. and Cynthia A. White; B 504
- Caplan, Ralph; R 23
- Carter, Gwendolyn M.; R 198
- Casares, Alfredo Bioy
  - The invention of Morel and other stories; B 226
- Castroism: theory and practice. T. Draper; B 62
- Censorship. An end to all censors. Article by E. Gertz .... 6. See also T. B. Caldwell letter, opposite 69
  - Of O. Lewis's The children of Sánchez, in Mexico. Article by J. Sommers 530
- Chile, nationalism and Communism in. E. Halperin; B 450
- Christman, Henry M. (ed.)
  - The South as it is: 1865-1866, by J. R. Dennett; B 197

PAGE

- Clurman, Howard; R 171, 310
- Colonizer and the colonized, the. A. Memmi; B 535
- Coming of age in America: growth and acquiescence. E. Z. Friedenberg; B 254
- Communism. Strange Communists I have known. B. D. Wolfe; B 341
- Congo republic (Léopoldville). Politics in the Congo: decolonization and independence. C. Young; B 198
- Conover, Grandin. Exception taken to June 21 review of Letters from Mississippi. P. M. Quinn; letter, opposite 49
- Conspirators, the (manuscript play by W. Graetz on 1944 anti-Hitler plot). Article by G. K. Romoser 172
- Cook, Fred J.; R .... 361; see also M.A. Fellows letter, 526
- Cuba. Book Bajo palabra, by former exile in Miami, reviewed 251

D

- Daisne, Johan
  - The man who had his hair cut short; B 480
- Darcy, Samuel Adams; R .... 341. See also C. P. Larrowe letter, opposite 457
- Dasmann, Raymond F.
  - The destruction of California; B 252
- Davie, Donald; R 311
- Death, Grief and mourning: a study of contemporary society. G. Gorer; B 533
- Dennett, John Richard
  - The South as it is: 1865-1866. Edited by H. M. Christman; B .... 197. See also Centennial index
- Destruction of California, the. R. F. Dasmann; B 252
- Diary of a mad old man. J. Tanikazi; B 171
- Discount houses. Great discount delusion, the. W. H. Nelson; B 255
- Dog Years. G. Grass; B 81
- Draper, Theodore
  - Castroism: theory and practice; B 62
- Dreiser. By W. A. Swanberg; B 102
- Dulles, Foster Rhea
  - Yankees and Samurai: America's role in the emergence of modern Japan; B 452
- Dyson-Hudson, Neville
  - J. Wellard misread E. M. Thomas's Warrior herdsmen in June 21 review; letter, opposite 289

E

- Education. Coming of age in America: growth and acquiescence; B 254
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.
  - Waging peace: the White House years, 1956-1961; B 368
- Elliott, George P.
  - In the world; B 477
- Elsner, Gisela
  - The giant dwarfs; B 202
- Everything that rises must converge. F. O'Connor; B 142

F

- Fanny Hill, by J. Cleland; in obscenity suit 6, 8-9
- Feifer, George; R 366
- Fellows, Margaret A.
  - Lawyer E. Bloch slurred by F. J. Cook; letter, 526; see also 361
- Fetish, the, and other stories. A. Moravia; B 226
- Fliegel, Norris. See Rosenberg, B.
- Ford, Daniel; R 64
- Foucault, Michel
  - Madness and civilization: a history of insanity in the age of reason; B 22
- Frame, Donald
  - Montaigne: a biography; B 307
- Friedenberg, Edgar Z.
  - Coming of age in America: growth and acquiescence; B 254
- Friedman, Leon (ed.)
  - Southern justice; B 366

G

- Gadda, Carlo Emilio
  - That awful mess on Via Merulana; B 306
- Gascar, Pierre
  - Women and the sun; B 226
- Genovese, Eugene D.
  - The political economy of slavery: studies in the economy and society of the slave South; B 390
- Germany. Conspirators, the (manuscript play by W. Graetz on 1944 anti-Hitler plot). Article by G. K. Romoser 172

PAGE
Germany, East. Writer's life in. Article by S. Heym 228
Giant dwarfs, the. G. Elsner; B 202
Goals for Americans: plans for action in the Sixties (1960). Analysis of W. P. Bundy chapter by R. F. Hamilton 75
Going to meet the man. J. Baldwin; B 478
González, Marta
  Bajo palabra; B .... 251; see also 53
Goodsell, Charles T.
  Administration of a revolution: executive reform in Puerto Rico under Governor Tugwell, 1941-1946; B 449
Gorer, Geoffrey
  Death, grief and mourning: a study of contemporary society; B 533
Graetz, Wolfgang
  The conspirators (manuscript play on 1944 anti-Hitler plot). Article by G. K. Romoser 172
Grass, Günther
  Dog years; B 81
Great discount delusion, the. W. H. Nelson; B 255
Green, Robert; R 224
Green berets, the. R. Moore; B 64
Gutheim, Frederick; R 225
Guttmann, Allen; R 281

H

Haley, Alex. See X, Malcolm
Halley, Anne; R 424
Halperin, Ernst
  Nationalism and Communism in Chile; B 450
Hapgood, David
  Africa: from independence to tomorrow; B 200
Hatch, Robert; R 394
Hemingway, Ernest. Notes from a sea diary: Hemingway all the way. N. Algren; B 283
Heym, Stefan
  I arrive at socialism by train; writer's life in East Germany. Article 228
History of surrealism, the. M. Nadeau; B 504
Hoffman, Frederick J.; R 334
Howard, Richard; R 306, 480

I

In the world. G. P. Elliott; B 477
Indians, American. Two books on reviewed 167
Introduction to surrealism, an. J. H. Matthews; B 504
Invention of Morel, the, and other stories; A. B. Casares; B 226 Invitation to an inquest. W. and M. Schneir; B .... 361; see also M. A. Fellows letter, 526

J

Jackson, Gabriel
  The Spanish republic and the civil war: 1931-1939; B 418
Jacobs, Paul; R 368
Japan. Yankees and Samurai: America's role in the emergence of modern Japan. F. R. Dulles; B 452
Johnson humor, the. Edited by Bill Adler; B 282

K

Kazin, Alfred
  Starting out in the thirties; B 281
King, Larry L.; R 282
Kostelanetz, Richard; R 226
Kozinski, Jerzy
  The painted bird; B 424
Kozloff, Max
  Art books: 1965 503
Kraditor, Aileen S.; R 390
Kuper, Leo
  An African bourgeoisie: race, class, and politics in South Africa; B 198

L

Lamott, Kenneth; R 252, 452
Laner, Elinor; R 124
Larrowe, Charles P.
  Congratulations on choice of S. A. Darcy as reviewer. Letter, opposite 457; see also 341
Lasch, Christopher; R 123
Lebow, Victor; R 255
Letters from Mississippi. Exception taken to G. Conover review of June 21. P. M. Quinn; letter, opposite 49
Lewis, Gordon K.; R 449

PAGE
Lewis, Oscar; book The children of Sánchez censored in Mexico. Article by J. Sommers 530
Life of the mind in America, the: from the Revolution to the Civil War. P. Miller; B 446
Lind, Jakov
  Soul of wood and other stories; B 226
Littlejohn, David; R 478
Long death, the: the last days of the Plains Indians. R. K. Andrist; B 167 Lost universe, the. G. Weltfish; B 167

M

Machine in the garden, the: technology and the pastoral ideal in America. L. Marx; B 42
McNickle, D'Arcy; R 167
Madness and civilization: a history of insanity in the age of reason. M. Foucault; B 22
Man who had his hair cut short, the. J. Daisne; B 480
Mandelbaum gate, the. M. Spark; B 392
Marx, Leo; R 102
Marx, Leo
  The machine in the garden: technology and the pastoral ideal in America; B 42
Marxism. One hundred years in the life of a doctrine. B. D. Wolfe; B .... 341. See also C. P. Larrowe letter, opposite 457
Matthews, J. H.
  An introduction to surrealism; B 504
Matthiesen, Peter
  At play in the fields of the Lord; B 475
Matute, Ana María
  Article A wounded generation (of writers in Spain) 420
Meisler, Stanley; R 200
Memmi, Albert
  The colonizer and the colonized; B 535
Mexico; censorship of O. Lewis's The children of Sánchez. Article by J. Sommers 530
Meyer, Donald
  The positive thinkers: a study of the American quest for health, wealth and personal power from Mary Baker Eddy to Norman Vincent Peale; B 23
Miller, Michael Vincent; R 254
Miller, Perry
  The life of the mind in America: from the Revolution to the Civil War; B 446
Miller, Warren; R 502
Miller, Warren
  New literary editor of The Nation 261
Mishima, Yukio
  The sailor who fell from grace with the sea; B 171
Mission to Kala. By M. Beti; B 225
Mitford, Jessica; R 533
Modern image, the: outstanding stories from the Hudson review. Edited by F. Morgan; B 226
Molnar, Thomas
  Africa: a political travelogue; B 198
Montaigne: a biography. D. Frame; B 307
Moore, Robin
  The green berets; B 64
Moravia, Alberto
  The fetish and other stories; B 226
Morgan, Frederick (ed.)
  The modern image: outstanding stories from the Hudson review; B 226
Morris, Norval; R 168
Morse, J. Mitchell; R 475
Mowry, George E.
  The urban nation (U.S.), 1920-1960; B 225
Myth, the, and the powerhouse. P. Rahv; B .. 334

N

Nadeau, Maurice
  The history of surrealism; B 504
Nation, The; books by contributors 511
  Titles of interest to readers 66
  W. Miller new literary editor 261
Nationalism and Communism in Chile. E. Halperin; B 450
Nelson, Truman; R 336
Night of the giraffe, the, and other stories. A. Andersch; B 226
No longer at ease. C. Achebe; B 224
Notebooks: 1942-1951. A. Camus. Translated by J. O'Brien; B 310
Notes from a sea diary: Hemingway all the way. N. Algren; B 283

O

O'Brien, Conor Cruise
  Writers and politics; B 502
O'Connor, Flannery
  Everything that rises must converge; B 142
Odilon Redon. By K. Berger; B 503

PAGE
Oldsey, Bernard S.; R 477
On the penitentiary system in the United States and its application in France. G. de Beaumont and A. de Tocqueville; B 168

P

Painted bird, the. J. Kozinski; B 424
Peril and a hope, a: the scientists' movement in America. A. K. Smith; B 124 Political economy of slavery, the: studies in the economy and society of the slave South. E. D. Genovese; B 390
Politics in the Congo: decolonization and independence. C. Young; B 198
Popkin, Henry; missed point in June 14 review of America's lost plays, Vols. I-VIII. R. O'Brien; letter, opposite 69
Positive thinkers, the: a study if the American quest for health, wealth and personal power from Mary Baker Eddy to Norman Vincent Peale. By D. Meyer; B 23
Prisons. On the penitentiary system in the United States and its application in France. G. de Beaumont and A. de Tocqueville; B 168
Puerto Rico. Administration of a revolution: executive reform in Puerto Rico under Governor Tugwell, 1941-1946. G. T. Goodsell; B 449

Q

Quinn, Patrick M.
  Mrs. Liuzzo, even if a "professional," would have been murdered despite implication by G. Conover in June 21 review of Letters from Mississippi. P. M. Quinn; letter, opposite 49

R

Rahv, Philip
  The myth and the powerhouse; B 334
Redon, Odilon. By K. Berger; B 503
Reider, Norman, M.D.; R 22
Romoser, George K.
  Article Preview of a German controversy, on manuscript play The conspirators, by W. Graetz, on 1944 anti-Hitler plot 172
Rosenberg, Bernard, and N. Fliegel
  The vanguard artist; B 504
Rosenberg, Ethel and Julius. Case examined in Invitation to an inquest. W. and M. Schneir; B .... 361; see also M. A. Fellows letter, 526
Russell, John
  Seurat; B 503

S

Sailor who fell from grace with the sea, the. Y. Mishima; B 171
Schneir, Walter and Miriam
  Invitation to an inquest; B .... 361; see also M. A. Fellows letter, 526
Schott, Webster; R 142
Scientists. Peril and a hope, a: the scientists' movement in America. A. K. Smith; B 124
Semonin, Paul F.; R 535
Seurat. By J. Russell; B 503
Shapiro, Samuel; R 62
Short stories. Five collections reviewed 226
Slavery, the political economy of: studies in the economy and society of the slave South. E. D. Genovese; B 390
Smith, Alice Kimball
  A peril and a hope: the scientists' movement in America; B 124
Sobell, Morton. Relation to Rosenberg case examined in Invitation to an inquest. W. and M. Schneir; B 361
Sommers, Joseph
  Silencing The children of Sánchez; Mexican censorship of O. Lewis book 530
Soul of wood and other stories. J. Lind; B 226
South as it is, the: 1865-1866. J. R. Dennett. Edited by H. M. Christman; B .... 197. See also Centennial index
South Africa, republic of. African bourgeoisie, an: race, politics, and class in South Africa. L. Kuper; B 198
Southern justice. L. Friedman, ed.; B 366
Spain's wounded generation of writers. Article by A. M. Matute 420
Spanish republic, the, and the civil war: 1931-1939. G. Jackson; B 418
Spark, Muriel
  The Mandelbaum gate; B 392
Starting out in the thirties. A. Kazin; B 281

PAGE

Strange Communists I have known. B. D. Wolfe; B .... 341. See also C. P. Larrowe letter, opposite 457
Surrealism. Three books on reviewed 504
Surrealism. P. Waldberg; B 504
Swanberg, W. A.
  Dreiser; B 102

T

Tanikazi, Junichiro
  Diary of a mad old man; B 171
That awful mess on Via Merulana. By C. E. Gadda; B 306
Thomas, Elizabeth Marshall. Book Warrior Herdsmen misread in J. Wellard review of June 21. N. Dyson-Hudson; letter, opposite 289
Titles of interest to Nation readers 66
Tocqueville, Alexis de. See Beaumont, G. de Tomkins, Calvin
  The bride and the bachelors; B 504
Trachtenberg, Alan; R 42, 446
Trilling, Lionel
  Beyond culture: essays on learning and literature; B 334
Tropic of Cancer. by H. Miller; in obscenity suit 6-7
Tugwell, Rexford Guy. See Puerto Rico

U

United States. The life of the mind in America: from the Revolution to the Civil War. P. Miller; B 446
Urban nation, the (U.S.), 1920-1960. G. E. Mowry; B 225

V

Vanguard artist, the. B. Rosenberg and N. Fliegel; B 504

W

Waging Peace: the White House years, 1956-1961. D. D. Eisenhower; B 368
Waldberg, Patrick
  Surrealism; B 504
Warrior herdsmen, by E. M. Thomas, misread in J. Wellard review of June 21. N. Dyson-Hudson; letter, opposite 289
Warriors, the. S. Yurick; B 394
Wellard, James. June 21 review of E. M. Thomas's Warrior herdsmen criticized. N. Dyson-Hudson; letter, opposite 289
Weltfish, Gene
  The lost universe; B 167
West, Paul; R 81
White, Harrison C. and Cynthia A.
  Canvases and careers; B 504
Wolfe, Bertram D.
  Marxism. One hundred years in the life of a doctrine; B .... 341. See also C. P. Larrowe letter, opposite 457
  Strange Communists I have known; B 341
Woman and the sun. P. Gascar; B 226
Wounded generation of writers in Spain. Article by A. M. Matute 420
Writers and politics. C. C. O'Brien; B 502
Writers on vacation. Article by R. Barthes 474

X

X, Malcolm, the autobiography of. With the assistance of A. Haley; B 336

Y

Yankees and Samurai: America's role in the emergence of modern Japan. F. R. Dulles; B 452
Yglesias, Helen; R 392
Yglesias, José; R 418
Young, Crawford
  Politics in the Congo: decolonization and independence; B 198
Yurick, Sol; R 283
  The warriors; B 394

Z

Zukofsky, Louis
  All the collected short poems 1923-1958; B 311
Zweig, Paul; R 307

Index to 100th ANNIVERSARY ISSUE

Sept. 20, 1965

PAGE

A

Ad hoc committee on the triple revolution; concern over automation, civil rights, and nuclear war 200-201
Adams, Charles Francis, Jr.; contributions to The Nation 46
  Opinions on U.S. democracy 59
Adams, Henry; in genteel literary tradition 203-204
  Opinions on U.S. democracy 59-60
  Relations with The Nation 46
Adams, John; aspirations for future Americans unrealized 202
Addams, Jane; on charity applicant's death from working outdoors in cold 192
Adolescents; criteria for admission to Job Corps 197
  Revolt against stereotyped lives 199
  Wide use of "lighter" narcotics 120-124
Advertising; power over TV .... 228 ff.
Africa; European colonization isolated U.S. Negroes from support 146
Agriculture, U.S.; decline of rural population 92-99
Alabama; Selma - Montgomery civil-rights march described 149-150
Aldrich, Thomas Bailey; poem "Unguarded Gates" quoted 248
Alger, Horatio; editorial on centenary 326
Alpert, Hollis; exponent of psychedelic drugs 117, 119
American civil liberties union; early history, with Villard as co-founder 291-292
Anderson, Paul Y.; Nation's muckraking reporter 308, 311
Anti-imperialists, first in U.S. Article by B. Tuchman 77-82
Aptheker, Herbert; Communist theoretician interviewed on U.S. Left 109-110
Arendt, Hannah; on existentialism 330
Aubrey, James; writer's episode with former CBS boss 230-231
Aurthur, Robert Alan
  TV: the 21" bore 227-231
Automation. Time to kill: automation, leisure and jobs. E. Larrabee 198-202
  Undermining union leaders' world 105

B

Baird, Martha
  E. Siegel poems still in print. Letter, Oct. 11. See also 212.
Balch, Emily; peace worker-suffragist on The Nation 29
Baldwin, Roger N.
  Congratulatory message 146
  Correspondence with J. W. Krutch on support of Soviet Union in 1930's 317
Barr, Stringfellow
  Congratulatory message 114
Barzun, Jacques; on decline of formality in U.S. 332
Baudelaire, Charles; early Nation's hostility toward 276
Beals, Carleton
  In quest of Sandino: imperialism still rides; U.S. in Nicaragua and elsewhere in Latin America 83-87
  Nicaragua articles in 1920's as Nation correspondent 31-32
Becker, Howard S.
  Deviance and deviate in U.S.; new militance of homosexuals, drug users, etc. 115-119
Bellow, Saul; hero Herzog's life of the mind 205
  Most representative contemporary novelist; ambiguity of Herzog 233-234, 235
Bendiner, Robert
  Former managing editor's reminiscences of The Nation 39-41
  On bankruptcy of U.S. liberals in 1950's 64, 65
  On imperialism, Soviet Union, and Finland 320-321
Bernstein, Victor; former managing editor 20, 27
Berry, Wendell
  Two elegiac poems: Harry Erdman Perry, 1881-1965 220

PAGE

Bison, European; Soviet extinction of charged by American museum of natural history; Nation's editorial rejoinder 300
Black, Justice Hugo; on importance of The Nation 21
Boroff, David; tribute by Centennial publisher to late colleague. J. J. Storrow, Jr. .. 14
Boynton, H. W.; Nation reviewer's conservative likes 281-282
Brenner, Anita; disputed L. Fischer on Spain 318-319
Broadfield, George W.
  A different drum; lack of opportunity for educated U.S. Negro: career in Liberia; return to U.S. to devise programs for underprivileged youth 161-165
Bronowski, J.
  Congratulatory message 226
Broun, Heywood; abrupt defection to New Republic 313
Brown, Norman O., in book Life against death, seeks renewal of psychoanalysis by end of all repression 168, 207-208, 235
Bryan, William Jennings; anti-imperialists and 81-82
  Presidential aspirations opposed by Nation 268-269
Bryce, James, Viscount; advised Americans against imperialist adventures 79
  Compared with Tocqueville on U.S. 61
Burroughs, William; fictional de-civilization 169, 234, 235-236
Business; closed-door experience of educated Negro 162
  U.S. public education oriented toward needs of 171-175

C

Caldwell, Erskine
  Congratulatory message 211
California; political reminiscences by C. McWilliams .... 22 ff.
Capital punishment; opposition to in 1867 editorial; Kentucky execution as horrible example 53
Cartoons. Selections, 1924-1952 .... 88 ff.
Cather, Willa; praised by The Nation 281-282
Catholic church; adherents as large sector of U.S. life without regard to (white) ethnic backgrounds .... 137 ff.
Censorship; in World War I 286
Chaplin, Charles
  Congratulatory message 231
Charity; changing attitudes in U.S. .... 191 ff.
Chase, Stuart; 1929 Nation series on prosperity 302
Chicago; militant Back of the yards council of 1939-1940 194-195
Cities, U.S.; waiting for reality: birth of the megalopolis. S. Greer 98-102
Civil War, U.S. Aftermath in 1865: year of transition. A. S. Eisenstadt 54-61
Cleveland, President Grover; appointment of Negro praised by The Nation 246, 248
  1895 Venezuela message revealed latent U.S. jingoism 77, 78, 79
  Nation's break with in Venezuela crisis 78, 252
  Opposed to imperialist annexations 79, 82
  Tariff-reduction stand backed by Nation 265-266
Clurman, Harold
  Theatre: the laggard art 221-226
Coal industry; Nation and New Republic on Federal regulation 300 Colleges and universities. See Education
Colombia. See Panama
Commentary; as organ of anti-Communist liberalism 65
Communism, U.S.
  Bogy facilitated decline of U.S. Left .... 184 ff.
  Liberals' split on .... 63 ff.
  What's left of the Left? H. Swados 108-114
Constitution, U.S.; Nation's varying interpretations concerning Reconstruction and railroad regulation 261-262
Cook, Fred J.; renowned for special articles .. 20, 232
Coser, Lewis A.
  The fear of positive thinking; anti-intellectualism as U.S. tradition 166-170
Covarrubias, Miguel
  D. Rivera caricature, 1924 88
Cowell, Henry
  Congratulatory message 202
Crane, Stephen; writer consciously unrelated to society 205
Criticism. See Literature
Crossword puzzle. J. J. Storrow, Jr 271
Cuba. See Spanish-American War

D

Darwinism; early Nation's theistic version 276
  Inimical to Negroes' progress 143-144
  Tenets used against the poor 192-193
  Tennessee "monkey trial," 1925 307

Index

PAGE

- Debs, Eugene V.; imprisonment under Wilson 288
- Del Vayo, Juan Alvarez; controversial foreign editor 322 ff.
- Democracy; anti-intellectual tradition in U.S. 166-170
  - Continues flourishing, as in academic-freedom cases 179
  - 1865: the great transition. A. S. Eisenstadt 54-61
  - Town meeting in Huntington, Vermont 95-96
- Dennett, John Richard
  - 1865-1866 Nation series, "The South As It Is," quoted: 44, 153 ff., 242
- Dewey, John; anti-intellectual "life adjustment" theories of disciples 168, 169
- Dobbs, Farrell; Trotskyist leader interviewed 110
- Dominican Republic; The Nation on U.S. intervention 31, 272, 297-298
- Das Passos, John; reviews of work 327, 328
- Douglas, Justice William O.
  - Congratulatory message 20
- Dreiser, Theodore; images of corrupt U.S. cities in novels 99
- Drugs. New improved drug scene, the; "lighter" types among adolescents. J. Larner 120-124
  - New militancy of users and changing attitudes toward; psychedelic groups 115 ff.
- DuBois clubs; new left group based on colleges 109, 110, 111

E

- Edel, Leon
  - Henry James and The Nation 237-240
- Education; anti-intellectual bias among Dewey disciples 168
  - Is freedom academic? L. Joughin 176-182
  - New Left on U.S. campuses 108 ff.
  - F. Parkman on public schools (1869) 49
  - Problem of use by women 125 ff.
  - Public schools for private enterprise; oriented toward business and status quo. E. Z. Friedenberg 171-175
- Eisenhower, President Dwight D.; worked to halt wage-price spiral 105
- Eisenstadt, Abraham S.
  - 1865: the great transition in U.S. history 54-61
- Eliot, Dr. Charles W.; praise of The Nation 50
- Eliot, T. S.; characteristics of criticism; Nation's review of The waste land 304, 305
- Elliott, George P.
  - Congratulatory message 182
- Ellison, Ralph;
  - "Tell it like it is, baby"; Negro intellectual's dream of death of father figure Lincoln 129-136
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo; J. R. Lowell on 47
- Epton, William; Harlem leftist interviewed 111-112
- Ethiopia; Nation on Italian aggression 316
- Europe; importance of success of American idea 58, 61
- Evolution. See Darwinism
- Existentialism; H. Arendt on 330

F

- Fairchild, Henry Pratt; opposed to refugee immigration 319-320
- Family, the; recent structural changes in U.S. 70
- Fantozzi, Adeline Henkel; long association with The Nation as accountant 34
- Fascism; early attraction for many liberals 310
  - Nation on in 1930's 313 ff.
- Faulkner, William; on work 201
- Fischer, Louis; articles in Nation sympathetic toward Soviet Union 299, 318, 319
- Foundations; of radical Right 189
- France; Nation's opposition to Napoleon III's suppression at home and imperialism in Mexico 241, 250
  - Nation on during World War II 322
- Frank, Waldo
  - Congratulatory message 97
- Free trade. See Tariffs
- Friedenberg, Edgar Z.
  - Public schools for private enterprise; status quo-oriented U.S. education 171-175
- Fritz
  - Ethiopian war cartoon, 1935 90
- Frost, Robert; not regular Nation's poet. Letters, Oct. 25.
- Fuller, Harold deWolf; Nation editor, 1914-1918 53, 241, 274, 282

G

- Gannett, Lewis S.; association with The Nation 33, 34, 284

PAGE

- Garrison, Wendell Phillips; Godwin's successor as Nation editor 49, 50-51
- Garrison, William Lloyd; defended The Nation's Reconstruction stand 242
- Genet, Jean
  - French writer as arch-hipster of Europe 207, 209, 234, 235
- George, Henry; single-taxer congratulated by Nation for stand on Venezuela 252, 260
- Germany; Nation on during Hitler's ascendancy 313 ff.
- Glazer, Nathan
  - The peoples of America 137-142
- Godkin, Edwin Lawrence; concept of journalism and press in 1865 73
  - Cultural mission for America in founding The Nation 203-204
  - Life and contributions 42 ff., 241 ff.
  - On significance of Northern victory in 1865 58-59
  - Relations with H. James 237 ff.
  - Split with Cleveland in 1895 over Venezuela message 78, 252
- Goldburg, Rabbi Robert E.
  - Congratulatory message 175
- Golden, Harry
  - Congratulatory message 190
- Goldwater, Barry M.; anti-intellectual appeal 167-168
  - Standard-bearer of radical Right 188
- Gompers, Samuel; opposed to foreign conquest 78, 81
- Goodheart, Eugene
  - The new apocalypse; N. O. Brown, H. Marcuse, N. Mailer, et al. would change world through liberated psychoanalysis 207-211
- Graham, Frank
  - Congratulatory message 71
- Granger movement; Nation's opposition to 262, 264
- Grant, President Ulysses S.; The Nation's disillusionment with 246, 261-262
- Great Britain; Nation's criticism of Irish and Palestinian policies 298
- Greenberg, Clement; sued by Nation for letter in New Leader 323
- Gropper, William
  - Wall street cartoon, 1929 88
- Greer, Scott
  - Waiting for reality: birth of the megalopolis 98-102
- Gruening, Senator Ernest
  - Former managing editor's reminiscences of The Nation 36-39
  - Hopes for New Deal 316
  - F. Kirchwey's reminiscences of 28, 30-31
  - On U.S. occupation of Haiti and Dominican Republic 297-298

H

- Haiti; The Nation on U.S. intervention 31, 37, 272, 297-298
- Hall, Gus; U.S. Communist spokesman 109, 110-111
- Harding, President Warren G.; The Nation on 300-301
- Harrington, Michael; attacks drudgery and saving as measures of worth 200
  - Ideologist for Left in U.S. 113
  - Influence of book The other America 196
  - On irrelevancy for Negroes of European groups' experience in U.S. 138
- Hatch, Robert; successively literary editor and managing editor of The Nation 20, 27
- Hawaii; annexation opposed by U.S. anti-imperialists 79, 81
  - Nation's opposition to annexation 252, 254
- Hazel, Robert
  - NYC (poem) 219
- Hazlitt, Henry; association with The Nation, 1930-1934 308, 325
- Hermann, Eve
  - Huey Long cartoon, 1935 91
- Higginson, Thomas Wentworth
  - Poetry criticism, 1877-1903; animus toward Whitman 215, 216
- History; flight from by U.S. Negroes. C. Vann Woodward 142-146
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- Hofstadter, Richard; on academic freedom 176, 177, 178
  - On "life adjustment" education 168
  - On tides of U.S. anti-intellectualism 166
- Hollywood. See Motion pictures
- House un-American activities committee. See United States—Congress
- Howells, William Dean; on money-making spirit of late 19th-century U.S. 61
  - "Realist" novelist still in genteel literary tradition 204, 205
- Hubbard, Elbert; scornful of "deserving poor" 192
- Humphrey, Vice-President Hubert H.
  - Congratulatory message 41

PAGE

I

- Immigration. Peoples of America, the. N. Glazer 137-142
- Intellectuals; traditional target in U.S. 166-170
- Ireland; "Villard commission" on conditions in 1921 298

J

- Jacobs, Paul
  - America's schizophrenic view of the poor 191-197
- James, Henry; on life of rich in Newport, R. I. 238
  - Relations with and contributions to The Nation 46, 47, 237-240 (L. Edel article), 278
  - Sympathetic with Southern racism 146
  - Unfriendly reviews of Whitman 215, 216, 274, 276
- James, William; disquiet over Cleveland's Venezuela message 78
  - On E. L. Godkin 73
  - Relations with and contributions to The Nation 46, 49
- Japanese; exclusion from U.S. by 1924 act condemned by Villard 295
- Javits, Senator Jacob K.
  - Congratulatory message 128
- Jews; Nation on Zionist demands in Palestine and praise for Soviet's establishment at Biro-Bidjan region 298-299
  - Nation's advocacy of U.S. admissions of refugees from Hitler 319-320
  - Nation's linkage of Rosenberg case with anti-Semitism 324
  - Postwar religious activity; adaptation in U.S. irrelevant for Negroes 137 ff.
  - C. Weizman quoted on Palestine settlement 299
- Johnson, President Andrew; The Nation on policies 241, 242, 244, 246
- Johnson, President Lyndon B.; plea for racial justice not backed by protection against violence in South 153
  - Schizophrenic anti-poverty program 191, 194, 196
  - TV holdings 229, 230
- Joughin, Louis
  - Is freedom academic? 176-182
- Journalism. See Press, U.S.
- Joyce, James; prophet-rebel of novel 232, 233, 282, 305

K

- Kazin, Alfred
  - The literary mind in America; changes since founding of The Nation 203-206
- Kennedy, President John F.; continuing intellectual disarray of U.S. liberals under 66
  - Ethnicity emphasized in campaign; Irishness as basis for opposition from big business 138, 139
  - Formula to slow wage-price spiral 105
- Keynes, John Maynard; assimilation of economic ideas by U.S. liberals 63, 64, 66
  - Consumption doctrine carried to logical conclusion by R. Theobald 201
  - On Versailles treaty 288
- Killens, John Oliver
  - Hollywood in black and white; treatment of Negroes in films and TV 157-160
- Kimball, Penn
  - American journalism: from essay to assay 72-76
- Kirchwey, Freda
  - Former editor and publisher's reminiscences of The Nation 27 ff.; see also correction, Oct 4 issue, opposite 177
  - Reminiscences of by C. McWilliams 22, 24 ff.
  - Split with Villard, 1940 312
  - Successively co-editor and editor of The Nation 302, 314, 320 ff., 332
- Kirstein, George C.
  - Editor McWilliams's relations with 26-27, 332
  - On being publisher of The Nation since 1955 18 ff.
- Kores, Edward T., Jr.; ordered to change hair style or be prosecuted as truant 174
- Krech, Hilda Sidney
  - The identity of modern woman 125-128
- Kronenberger, Louis
  - The staggered culture of U.S. 67-71
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; association with The Nation 22, 33, 284-285, 302, 306, 312, 326, 330, 332
  - Report on Tennessee "monkey trial" 307; see also Baldwin, R.

L

- Labor, union; early opposition to unemployment insurance 193
  - Fat cats of labor, the. A. H. Raskin 103-107
  - Opposed by Nation in late 19th century 266, 268-270
  - Opposition to automation 199
  - Resistance to acceptance of newcomers from war on poverty program 197
  - Retreat on issue of Negro equality 144

PAGE
La Follette, Robert M.; 1924 Presidential candidacy backed by The Nation 301, 309
La Follette, Senator Robert M., Jr.; quoted on unemployment, 1931 309
Laing, Alexander
  The Nation and its poets 212. See also letters, Oct. 11 and 25
Lamont, Hammond; Nation editor, 1906-1909 51
Larner, Jeremy
  The new improved drug scene; "lighter" types among adolescents 120-124
Larrabee, Eric
  Time to kill: automation, leisure and jobs 198-202
Law; changing on deviants 116
League of Nations; Villard's position on 296, 316-317
Leary, Timothy; exponent of psychedelic drugs 117, 119
Left, U.S.; anti-intellectualism in 168-170
  Self-victimization amid anti-Communist hysteria 185
  What's left of the Left? H. Swados 108-114
Leisure. Time to kill: automation, leisure and jobs. E. Larrabee 198-202
Lekachman, Robert
  Fashions in U.S. liberalism since Depression 62-66
Lerner, Max; co-editor of The Nation in late 1930's 312, 320
  On World War II as revolution 321
Levellers; 1648 petition for the poor of England quoted 197
Levertov, Denise
  A man (poem) 220
  Poetry editor of The Nation 20, 218, 332
Liberalism, U.S.; decline of on Negroes following Reconstruction 246, 248
  Early attraction of fascism 310
  Fashions in. R. Lekachman 62-66
  Split on Soviet Union 22, 24
Liberia; educated U.S. Negro's government career in 163-164
Life; anti-intellectualism in review of Mailer 169
  Misleading articles on drug addiction 122, 123
Lincoln, President Abraham; as father figure; Negro writer's dream of death 130-136
Lindsay, John V.
  Congratulatory message 136
Literature; and ideas: 1865-1918; Nation's idealistic standards 274, 276, 278, 280, 325 ff.
  Literary mind, the, in U.S.; changes since founding of The Nation. A. Kazin 203-206 Nation's rediscovery of America between wars 304 ff.
  Notes on the new style in novels. W. Phillips 232-236
Lowell, James Russell; admiration for The Nation 78, 203
  1865 Harvard Commemoration Ode glorified America 58
  On Emerson in Nation 47
  Poems in The Nation summarized 214
LSD. See Drugs
Lusk committee, 1920; New York state body's anti-radical report as catchall 292
Lynching; The Nation on 250, 295

M

McCarthyism; animus against intellectuals 167
  Effect on U.S. Left 108 ff., 324
  Effect on U.S. liberalism 24, 25, 26, 64-65
MacDonald, William; article on 1919 Seattle general strike 290
  Editorial on Versailles treaty 287-288
  F. Kirchwey's reminiscences of international-relations editor 28 ff.
  Relations with Villard 283
McKim, James Miller; Abolitionist "midwife" of The Nation 42
McKinley, President William; used by U.S. imperialists 79 ff.
McWilliams, Carey
  Editor's reminiscences of The Nation 21 ff.
  Publisher G. Kirstein's relations with 18 ff., 332
Mailer, Norman; self-flagellation; exaltation of primitive action vs. intellectualism 169, 206, 207, 209, 210, 232 ff.
Malraux, André; as editor of L'Express 314
  Quoted on Spanish civil war 318
Man, a (poem). D. Levertov 220
Marcuse, Herbert; book Eros and civilization attempts transvaluation of psychoanalytic values 208
Marijuana; among high-schoolers 120, 122
  Users' new militancy 115, 118
Marshall, Margaret; as literary editor 326, 332
Matthews, Herbert L.
  On value of The Nation 27
Maverick, Maury, Jr.
  Congratulatory message 211
Mazzini, Giuseppe; on meaning for Europe of Northern triumph in Civil War 59
Melville, Herman; praised by R. Weaver 303-304

PAGE
Mencken, H. L.; contributions to The Nation; quoted on liberty in U.S. 284
Mexico; Nation's opposition to French intervention in 1860's 250
Mill, John Stuart; letter to Godkin on article "Aristocratic Opinions of Democracy" 252
Mississippi; visitor's impressions of Negro question in Vicksburg, 1965 150-153
Morality, U.S. Deviance and deviates; new militancy. H. S. Becker 115-119
  1924 Nation series on 32, 69, 307
More, Paul Elmer; Nation editor, 1909-1914 51-52, 241, 272, 280-281, 304
Motion pictures; industry's abandonment of Hollywood ten 183-186
  Industry's treatment of Negroes and Indians 157-160
Muckrakers; generally indifferent to Negro and racial justice 145
  Nation lukewarm toward 74, 69-270
Mumford, Lewis; pioneering work on significance of automation 198
  "Utopia" described in 1927 Nation 302

N

Napoleon III. See France
Narcotics. See Drugs
Nation, The
  And its poets. Article by A. Laing 212. See also letters, Oct 11 and 25
  Congratulatory messages from:
    Baldwin, R. N. 146
    Barr, S. 114
    Bronowski, J. 226
    Caldwell, E. 211
    Chaplin, C. 231
    Cowell, H. 202
    Douglas, Justice W. O. 20
    Frank, W. 97
    Goldburg, Rabbi R. E. 175
    Golden, H. 190
    Graham, F. 71
    Humphrey, Vice-President H. H. 41
    Javits, Senator Jacob K. 128
    Lindsay, J. V. 136
    Maverick, M., Jr. 211
    Pickett, C. E. 190
    Pike, Bishop J. A. 124
    Proxmire, Senator W. 165
    Randolph, A. P. 107
    Russell, B. 17
    Saroyan, W. 175
    Seagar, A. 236
    Shahn, B. 202
    Smith, Senator M. C. 24
    Taylor, H. 170
    Thomas, N. 240
    Wallace, H. A. 66
  Key themes under Villard 290
  Military rule for South advocated (editorial, 1867) 51
  The Nation and its century; history of magazine. R. C. Sterne 42-53, 241-334
  On F. D. Roosevelt 62-63
  On Soviet Union 37, 64, 287, 298-299
  Personal note, the; memoirs by publishers and editors 18-41
  Position as independent journal of opinion in 1865 and 1965 72
  Prospectus, 1865 45
  Sanguine 1866 prophecies 75
  U.S. literary mind reflected in 203-206, 304 ff.
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); O. G. Villard as co-founder 248, 282
Negroes
  Civil rights
    Liberals' involvement in movement in attempted transformation of U.S. society 66
    Radicalization of movement ignores ethnic distinctions among whites 138, 140-141
  Conditions in South compared with those described by J. R. Dennett in 1865. H. Zinn 147-153
  A different drum; educated Negro's frustrating job experience in U.S.; career in Liberia. G. W. Broadfield 161-165
  Flight from history: the heritage of the Negro in U.S. By C. Vann Woodward 142-146
  Hollywood in black and white; treatment in films and on TV. J. R. Killems 157-160
  In new U.S. Left 108 ff.
  Limited benefit from national affluence 195, 196
  Nation's conservative stand toward question following Reconstruction 246, 248
  Nation's 1865 goals for 55 ff.
  Negro intellectual's dream-essay on group's problems. R. Ellison 129-136
  See also South, U.S.
New Deal. See Roosevelt, President F. D.
New Humanism; The Nation as voice of under P. E. More 280-281, 304

PAGE
New Republic, The; early lukewarmness toward New Deal 63
New Leader, The. See Greenberg, C.
  Compared with The Nation between wars 300, 313
New York City
  NYC (poem). R. Hazel 219
  Unsanitary conditions noted in 1865 editorial and poem 48, 214
New York Evening Post; The Nation's relations with 46, 50, 52, 53, 240, 241, 264, 272, 274, 286
Newport, R.I.; H. James on leisured rich 238
Newspapers. See Press, U.S.
Nicaragua; The Nation on U.S. intervention 31-32
  U.S. campaign against Sandino as vivid Latin-American memory. C. Beals 83-87
Niebuhr, Reinhold; Nation quote on U.S. business's nostalgia for laissez faire 325
Norris, Senator George W.; boomed for President by Nation in 1928 301
Norton, Charles Eliot; "midwife" of The Nation 42, 43, 44, 46, 49, 50, 78
  Mutual admiration for literary set; advocacy of idealism 203, 204
  Opposition to U.S. turn-of-century imperialism 78-79, 80, 82 Novels. See Literature
NYC (poem). R. Hazel 219

O

Olmsted, Frederick Law; association with early Nation 42-43, 242
O'Neill, Eugene; Negro's attempt to adapt play The emperor Jones 158-159
  Play Beyond the horizon. 1920, as milestone in U.S. theatre 224

P

Panama; Nation's opposition to T. Roosevelt's abetting of revolution against Colombia to acquire Canal Zone 259-260
Parkman, Francis; on public education (1869) 49
Phillips, William
  Notes on the new style in fiction 232-236
Philippines; annexation opposed by U.S. anti-imperialists 80-82
  Independence as Nation cause 37, 250, 256 ff.
Phillips, Wendell; opposed The Nation's Reconstruction stand 242, 244
Pickett, Clarence E.
  Congratulatory message 190
Pike, Bishop James A.
  Congratulatory message 124
Poems
  Man, a. R. Hazel 219
  NYC. By R. Hazel 219
  Two elegiac poems: Harry Erdman Perry, 1881-1965. W. Berry 220
Poets. The Nation and its poets. Article by A. Laing 212. See also letters, Oct 11 and 25
  M. Van Doren's relations with on The Nation in the 1920's 35-36
Police, U.S.; part of rightist "popular front" 189 Treatment of deviants 116 ff.
Populism; deprivation of Negroes' rights in South 145-146
Pound, Ezra; Nation's notices of controversial poet over fifty years 216-217
  Quoted on U.S. governmental immunity to criticism 302
Poverty. America's schizophrenic view of the poor. P. Jacobs 191-197
Press, U.S. American journalism: from essay to assay. P. Kimball 72-76
Progressive labor movement; pro-Peking Communist group in U.S. 111-112
Proust, Marcel; The Nation on 306
Proxmire, Senator William
  Congratulatory message 165
Psychedelic drugs. See Drugs
Psychoanalysis; "renewal" sought by N. O. Brown and H. Marcuse 169, 207-208
Puerto Rico; anti-imperialists' stand against U.S. annexation 81, 82
  Nation's interest in rights for people 257-258
Puzzle, crossword. J. J. Storrow, Jr. 271

R

Radio; impact on U.S. culture 70
Railroads; early Nation stand on regulation 260-261, 262, 264, 270
Randolph, A. Philip
  Congratulatory message 107
Raskin, A. H.
  The fat cats of labor 103-107
Reconstruction. See South, U.S.

Index

PAGE

- Recreation; development for as hope for many rural U.S. towns 96-97
- Reed, Representative Thomas B.; Speaker's antipathy to U.S. turn-of-century imperialism 79, 80, 81-82
- Refugees; from Hitler's Germany 316, 319-320
- Religion; anti-intellectualism in U.S. 166
  - Succeeding ethnicity as basis for division in U.S. ..... 137 ff.
- Reporters; changed status and occupational hazards ..... 72 ff.
- Right, U.S.; phenomenal rise of radical wing through use of Communist bogy 188-190
- Roosevelt, President Franklin D.
  - Liberals, including The Nation, had mixed feelings on in 1930's 62-63, 308-309
  - Measures to alleviate poverty 193-194
  - Nation's support, with reservations, in 1940 and 1944 322
  - 1940 congratulations to The Nation 48
  - New Deal backed by Nation ..... 309 ff.
  - Use of academics and intellectuals 166, 177
- Roosevelt, President Theodore
  - Appeased Southern prejudice on Negroes 145
  - Nation critical of on Panama policy 259-260
  - Opposed by Nation in 1904 campaign and on railroad regulation 269, 270
  - Statement on lynching welcomed by The Nation 250
- Rose, Carl
  - Klan and Hitler cartoons, 1933 ..... 89, 90
- Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel; sentencing linked to anti-Semitism 324
- Rosenthal, M. L.; poetry editor in late 1950's 20, 217-218
- Ross, Edward Alsworth; academic-freedom case of dismissal from Stanford in 1900 177
- Round Table, The; early rival of The Nation 47-48
- Russell, Bertrand
  - Congratulatory message 17
  - Quoted on morality 307
  - Report on Soviet Union in The Nation 37

S

- Sacco-Vanzetti case
  - Cartoons 89, 91
  - Nation articles on exposed injustice 32, 292-295
- Sandino, Augusto C.; Nicaraguan as symbol of Latin-American defiance of U.S. imperialism. C. Beals 83-87
- Santo Domingo. See Dominican Republic
- Saroyan, William
  - Congratulatory message 175
- Saturday Evening Post; survey of "typical American woman" 125
- Schools. See Education
- Schaper, Prof. William A.; dismissed from Minnesota during World War I hysteria 178
- Schurz, Carl; early U.S. anti-imperialist 77, 79, 81, 82
- Seager, Allan
  - Congratulatory message 236
- Seattle, Wash.; general strike of 1919 supported in Nation 287-289
- Shahn, Ben
  - Cartoons: Sacco and Vanzetti, Senator McCarthy, 1952 91
  - Congratulatory message 202
- Shriver, Sargent; traditional attitudes as head of anti-poverty program 196
- Shultz, Lillie; financial backing of Nation 332
- Siegel, Eli; controversial prize-winning poem Montana of 1925 ..... 36, 212, 306-307; see also letters, Oct 11
- Slavery, U.S.; E. L. Godkin on 43, 44
  - Shame of affects Negroes' attitude toward own history ..... 142 ff.
- Slums. See Cities, U.S.
- Smith, Alfred E.; Nation's reluctant support of in 1928 302
- Smith, Senator Margaret Chase
  - Congratulatory message 24
- Social work; changing attitudes in U.S. .... 192 ff.
- Socialism; praised for opposition to militarism early in 20th century 260
  - Villard's sympathy with moderates 270
- Socialist labor party; remains stagnant 108
- Socialist Party, U.S.
  - Depression economic programs 310, 311
  - Early advocates of white supremacy 144
  - Leading intellectuals in 109, 113
- Socialist workers' party. See Trotskyists
- Somoza, Anastasio; responsibility for murder of Sandino 87
- South, U.S.
  - Ante-bellum report on by E. L. Godkin 43-44
  - 1865: the great transition. A. S. Eisenstadt 54-61
  - Deprivation of Negroes' rights following Reconstruction 145-146
  - J. R. Dennett 1865-1866 series, "The South As It Is," quoted: 44, 153 ff.

PAGE

  - Military rule advocated (editorial, 1867) 51
  - Reconstruction stand of The Nation 241-242, 244, 246, 261-262
  - Relatively unaffected by European immigration 138, 139
  - Revisited in 1965, in footsteps of J. R. Dennett. By H. Zinn 147-153
- Spain; civil war and The Nation 318-319
  - A. Malraux quoted on in The Nation 318
- Spanish-American War; and first U.S. anti-imperialists. B. Tuchman ..... 77 ff.
  - Nation's opposition to 254-256
- States, U.S.; Nation series on in 1920's 307
- Stearns, George Luther; "angel" of fledgling Nation 47, 241
- Steffens, Lincoln; on E. L. Godkin 49
  - On U.S. cities 99
- Sterne, Richard Clarke
  - The Nation and its century; history of magazine 42-53, 241-334
- Stevens, Thaddeus; Reconstruction stand compared with The Nation's .. 56, 242, 244, 246, 261
- Stevenson, Adlai E.; supported by Nation 324
- Storrow, James J., Jr.
  - Centennial publisher's tribute to late colleague, D. Boroff 14
  - Crossword puzzle 271
  - Foreword to Centennial 15
- Strikes. See Labor—union
- Suburbs, U.S. Waiting for reality: birth of the megalopolis. S. Greer 98-102
- Sumner, William Graham; Reconstruction stand compared with The Nation's 242, 244, 246
- Swados, Harvey
  - What's left of the Left in U.S.? 108-114
- Swinburne, Algernon Charles; Nation on 215-216, 276
- Swing, Raymond Gram; Nation articles 310, 312
- Symbolists; The Nation cool toward 280
- Synanon; drug-cure establishments run by ex-addicts 117

T

- Tariffs
  - Civil War measures as tributes to individual enterprise 57
  - Nation's opposition to 265-266, 270, 272
- Tate, Allen; reviews for The Nation 306
- Taylor, Harold
  - Congratulatory message 170
- Teen-agers. See Adolescents
- Television; impact on U.S. culture 70-71, 73, 74
  - Treatment of Negroes 157, 160
  - TV: the 21" bore. R. A. Aurthur 227-231
- Tennessee; Dayton "monkey trial," 1925 reported in Nation 307
- Tennessee Valley Authority; praised by Nation 311-312
- Tennyson, Alfred; approved by early Nation 276
- Theatre; as laggard art in U.S. By H. Clurman 221-226
- Theobald, Robert; on job losses through automation; advocacy of right to income 200, 201
- Thomas, Norman; association with The Nation; views on Haiti and Ireland 298
  - Congratulatory message 240
  - 1933 article on banking 310
  - 1928 Presidential candidacy not supported by The Nation 301-302
- Time; on Sacco-Vanzetti case 293-294
- Tocqueville, Alexis de; on U.S. democracy 56, 58-59, 61
- Tolstoy, Leo; The Nation on 279-280
- Trade. See Tariffs
- Trilling, Diana and Lionel; literary and social criticism 329-330
- Trotskyists. What's left of the Left? H. Swados 108-114
- Truman, President Harry S.; Nation on 324
  - In Spanish civil war 318-319
- Trumbo, Dalton
  - Honor bright and all that jazz; HUAC's persecution of Hollywood 10 as symbol of reaction's use of Communist bogy .. 183-190
- Tuchman, Barbara
  - The first anti-imperialists (U.S., in 1890's) 77-82
- Turgenev, Ivan; novels admired by early Nation 276, 278
- Twain, Mark; literary friendships; contrasted with loner S. Crane 204, 205
- Two elegiac poems: Harry Erdman Perry, 1881-1965. W. Berry 220

U

- Unemployment; changing attitudes toward victims ..... 192 ff.
  - Time to kill: automation, leisure and jobs. E. Larrabee 198-202

PAGE

- Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  - Changing attitudes toward among U.S. liberals ..... 63 ff., 317-319
  - Nation's sympathy for during 1920's 299
  - Praised by Nation for assignment of Biro-Bidjan region to Jews 298-299
  - U.S. liberals' split on 22, 24, 41
- United States
  - Congress
    - House un-American activities committee's persecution of Hollywood ten 183-186
  - Culture
    - Anti-intellectual tradition 166-170
    - Literary mind, the, since founding of The Nation. A. Kazin 203-206
    - Staggered culture, the. L. Kronenberger 67-71
  - Economic conditions
    - Waiting for reality: birth of the megalopolis. S. Greer: 98-102
    - Waiting for realty: death of a small town (Huntington, Vermont); decline of rural communities. D. Wakefield 92-97
  - History
    - 1865: the great transition. Article by A. S. Eisenstadt 54-61
    - First anti-imperialists, the. B. Tuchman 77-82
    - Flight from history: the heritage of the Negro 142-146
  - Office of economic opportunity
    - Traditional attitudes exclude "undeserving poor" from war on poverty 196-197
  - Population
    - Peoples of America, the. N. Glazer 137-142
  - Supreme Court
    - Nation split on Roosevelt's attempted purge 312
    - Refused to review convictions of Hollywood ten 185

V

- Van Doren family; F. Kirchwey's reminiscences 32-33
- Van Doren, Carl; on U.S. literary "revolt" 305
- Van Doren, Mark
  - Reminiscences as literary editor, 1924-1928 35-36
- Van Loon, Hendrik Willem; association with The Nation 34-35
- Venezuela. See Cleveland, President Grover
- Vermont; 1939 Nation correspondence on autonomy vs. federalism 311
  - Waiting for realty: death of a small town (Huntington). D. Wakefield 92-97
- Versailles treaty; Nation's opposition to 287-288, 296
- Vicksburg. See Mississippi
- Villard, Henry; on railroad regulation 264
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Ancestry 283-284
  - Contradictory tendencies as editor ..... 282 ff., 313 ff.
  - Early association with The Nation 51, 52-53
  - F. Kirchwey's reminiscences of late publisher of The Nation ..... 27 ff.
  - On need for The Nation 300
  - Relations with President Wilson 258-259, 272, 285-288
  - Sympathy with moderate Socialists 270
  - M. Van Doren's reminiscences of 35-36
  - Valedictory, 1940 314

W

- Waite, Byron A.
  - Absence of R. Frost in A. Laing's The Nation and its poets. Letter, Oct 25, with Laing reply
- Wakefield, Dan
  - Waiting for realty: death of a small town (Huntington, Vermont) 92-97
- Wallace, Henry A.
  - Congratulatory message 66
  - Presidential campaign not supported by The Nation 23, 24, 324
- Walters, Miriam; as circulation manager 34
- Warner, Arthur; association with The Nation 33
- Washington, Booker T.; conciliatory policy opposed by militant Negroes 248
- Weaver, Raymond; rediscoverer of H. Melville 303-304
- Weizmann, Chaim; 1924 Nation article on Jewish settlement in Palestine quoted 299
- Wertheim, Alma; F. Kirchwey's reminiscences of at The Nation ..... 29, 34-35; see also correction, Oct 4 issue, opposite page 177
- Wertheim, Maurice; backer's disagreement with Nation's 1937 Supreme Court stand 312, 313

PAGE

Westchester county, New York; adolescents' use of drugs ... 120 ff.

Whitman, Walt; on U.S. democracy ... 60, 61
  Praised in 1919 Nation ... 304
  Unfriendly review by H. James in Nation ... 215, 216, 238, 274, 276

Whittier, John Greenleaf; contributions to The Nation ... 45, 46, 242

Wilson, President Woodrow; early support by The Nation ... 258-259, 272
  Villard's break with on Versailles ... 285-288

PAGE

Women; changing status and codes in U.S. 68-70
  Identity of modern woman, the. H. S. Kretch ... 125-128
Woodward, C. Vann
  Flight from history: the heritage of the Negro in U.S. ... 142-146
Work; and automation ... 198-202
World Court; Nation's position on ... 296-297
World War I
  And academic freedom ... 178
  The Nation's stand on ... 28, 30-31, 53, 241, 272, 274, 285-287, 296-297
World War II; The Nation's stand on ... 320 ff.

PAGE

Y

Young, Art
  Klan and Sacco-Vanzetti cartoons, 1925 and 1927 ... 88, 89
Youth. See Adolescents

Z

Zinn, Howard
  The South revisited in 1965; journey in J. R. Dennett's footsteps of 1865-1866 .. 147-153
Zola, Emile; condemned in early Nation ... 274, 276, 278

THE
NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

JULY 5, 1965 . . 35c

KNOXVILLE PUBLIC LIBRARY
KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE

225513

JUL 2 1965

AMERICAN LABOR ABROAD

Lovestone Diplomacy

Sidney Lens

Censorship: Fanatics & Fallacies

THE ANONYMOUS SMUT HUNTERS
Norman Mark

AN END TO ALL CENSORS
Elmer Gertz

Reviews & Essays

'Madness and Civilization'
Norman Reider

The Protestant Computer
Ralph Caplan

LSD: The Contact High
Howard Junker

LETTERS

Student discontent

Madison, Wis.

Dear Sirs: Mervin B. Freedman ["Roots of Student Discontent," The Nation, June 14] is justly concerned with student dissatisfactions. However his solutions sound like more of the same, if not worse. . . . He wishes the students to understand themselves so they will not "fall prey" to the wrong leadership. He does not ask them to understand the "many features of the society they were about to enter" so that they may achieve the freedom that comes with that understanding. There is no use in understanding ourselves if the same abuses continue to exist in the university and the society. . . .

I agree with him that there should be smaller classes, more faculty-student rapport and more interdisciplinary studies. But he does not say how this is to be brought about. This fault indicates that he does not understand the problem. The question is one of control and authority. The present American university is an authoritarian institution which seeks to control the mind and behavior of its students in social, intellectual and political contexts. As a dean, Dr. Freedman proposes the usual solutions from above without the slightest hint that a little good old American democracy might help. . . .

Stephen Levine

New York City

Dear Sirs: I have read "Roots of Student Discontent" by Mervin B. Freedman and would like to tell you that I feel this article is brilliant.

Mr. Freedman has done a remarkable job of analyzing the problem of student discontent, which is really the problem of our discontent, the modern man's discontent.

Dr. Anne Steinmann

Early friend

Canton, O.

Dear Sirs: While you are celebrating the 100th anniversary of your renowned weekly, you may be interested in knowing that our daily newspaper, the Canton (O.) Repository, celebrated its 150th birthday on the 30th of last March. . . . In 1865, when our paper was celebrating its 50th anniversary, its founder, John Saxton, did his utmost to secure subscribers for your weekly long before it appeared.

The bound volume of the Repository for 1865 shows that he printed The Nation's prospectus . . . many times before your first issue appeared in July of 1865. He heartily endorsed the objectives for which The Nation was being launched. Several of these, namely, "to stress the importance of public education . . . to spread the principles of democracy . . . and to offer sound and impartial literary and art criticism," undoubtedly reminded him of the promise he made to his readers in the first issue of the Repository on March 30, 1815: "Truth shall be my guide, and public good my aim."

The bound volumes of the Repository of 1815 to 1865 show that he kept this promise. For instance, when in the summer of 1839, William H. McGuffey, later famed for his McGuffey Readers, lectured in Canton to stress the democratizing influence of the public school system, his audience was very small. Saxton, an ardent champion of the then unpopular common school system, publicly scolded the indifference of his townsmen. Saxton's impartiality in literary matters is shown by his publishing many of Walt Whitman's earlier prose works while that writer was unpopular elsewhere. . . .

The files give an intimate account of John Quincy Adams' canal trip through Massillon, O., when the canal was opened shortly after 1828. Again, the Repository volume for 1840 contains an account of Gen. William H. Harrison's Presidential campaigning by stagecoach, and description of log-cabin parades. . . .

Decades ago, one of your readers, George F. Milton, of Chattanooga, Tenn., while gathering material for his book, Eve of Conflict, appealed for help through your columns. He was referred to the files of the Repository, where he obtained the desired information. . . .

Microfilms of the Repository are available at Canton Public Library.

J. W. Hughmanic

Suspicion of power

Strasbourg, France

Dear Sirs: In his article, "The Student Left" [The Nation, May 10], Jack Newfield listed Irving Howe and Lewis Coser—along with a number of persons described as "revisionist liberals" —as hostile to the new student Left. This is both inaccurate and unfair. It is quite true that both have expressed skepticism about various aspects of the new movement (including some things criticized by Mr. Newfield himself), but they have done so from a consistently radical position. Memories are short. When some in the elder generation were announcing that Eisenhower's America was, in effect, the fulfilled revolution—Coser and Howe were launching Dissent magazine, which earned them nothing but patronizing contempt from some of the "revisionist liberals." Coser and Howe . . . are intrinsically suspicious of all organized power, and they see no reason why criticism should stop at the door of their comrades' house. The New Left ought to distinguish these totally admirable traits from the satisfied conformity of others. . . .

Norman Birnbaum

THE NATION

Monday, July 5, 1965
Volume 201, No. 1

In this issue

EDITORIALS

1

ARTICLES

3 Russia vs. China:
Clash over Vietnam
Isaac Deutscher

Censorship: Fanatics and Fallacies

5 The Anonymous Smut Hunters
Norman Mark
7 An End To All Censors
Elmer Gertz
10 American Labor Abroad:
Lovestone Diplomacy
Sidney Lens
17 The Nation at 100:
A Compilation of Birthday Greetings

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

22 Madness in the Age of Reason
Norman Reider, M.D.
23 Programing the Protestant Computer
Ralph Caplan
24 (Square in Savannah) (poem)
Jason Miller
25 LSD: "The Contact High"
Howard Junker
26 The Bouquet (poem)
Phyllis Brooks
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 28)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry

Alexander Werth, Europe

Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, July 5, 1965, Vol. 201, No. 1

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

EDITORIALS

The Squeeze

Judging by his every action since his election, the President consistently and habitually thinks of foreign-policy problems in terms of domestic politics. If he is capable of a larger view, he has not demonstrated it. His swift reactions when the rebellion broke out in the Dominican Republic showed how his reflexes work. He could hear, as if they had already said it, what the Republicans would say if he failed to act fast, and with overwhelming force. In Vietnam, likewise, his successive escalations indicate that he fears the Republican right wing more than he fears the critics in his own party—and not without reason. If domestic political alliances are to be the governing factor and the President is unwilling, or unable, to take a statesmanlike stand on foreign issues, the Republicans can cause him more trouble, in the immediate future at least, than the intellectuals and their friends in Congress.

The Republicans, having so far "gone along" with the President on foreign policy, have staked out a position which they can sooner or later exploit to great advantage. Like all effective political ploys, it is an either-or proposition. As the build-up in Vietnam continues, the Republicans can at some point beat their breasts and cry that they never suggested the United States should get involved in a ground war on the Asian mainland. Did not another Democratic President get us into such a war in Korea, and was it not a Republican President who got us out and warned against a recurrence? All we wanted, the script will read, is aerial bombing, in which we are supreme, and that is what you, LBJ, started to do but then you chickened out for fear of Chinese reaction. So much for the "either" part; the "or" is equally simple. Should the President finally find someone to negotiate with, the Republicans will scream sell-out, and equate negotiation with appeasement. Addressed to the thoughtless and the violent, it will be a convincing argument, since concessions will have to be made on both sides if the war is to be ended, and such groups are never satisfied with anything but total victory.

Precisely because he translates foreign policy into domestic tactical moves, the President should ponder well the horns of this dilemma, and look ahead to where it leads. Better that he should stand up manfully to the charge of being, of all things, a negotiator, than that he should stagger into a full-scale war on the mainland of Asia. The longer he maintains his "hunkering" posture, which, as he himself says, is the posture of a Texas mule, the greater the risk of an uncontrollable escalation at the end of a series of controlled escalations. We have witnessed a steady, one-way progression. We have poured in more and more men and materiel, and steadily enlarged the fighting, we have bombed to little effect and we will bomb in larger and more dangerous areas; because what we have done has not sufficed, we must always do more. If the President does not stop "hunkering" and start negotiating—with the Vietcong—the Goldwater faction will have him where it wants him.

N.Y. Discovers the Hudson

We are a bright, perceptive, ingenious people. We perform prodigies of engineering and our love of technology is matched only by our love of apple pie. We are all set to send space vehicles to the moon and, even before we get there, we are planning to explore Mars, some 150 million miles away. But in the relatively simple matter of water management—which is no more than orderly ecological housekeeping—we are monumental incompetents. We know what should be done, but in a tangle of conflicting interests and pursuit of the fast buck we too often fail to do it.

The disgrace is national, but just now the spotlight is on the City of New York, the seat of the United Nations and in many ways the center of Western civilization. In this supposedly great metropolis one must ask for a drink of water in a restaurant, a matter of 8 fluid ounces, and feel a little guilty in asking. Fountains and swimming pools, even though the water is recirculated and only moderate amounts must be added to make up for evaporation, are shut down by official edict. Car washing and lawn sprinkling are banned. More stringent regulations are in store if the drought continues. Yet it is not a very severe drought; in an area normally blessed with 40 inches of rain a year, an average deficiency of about 10 inches has occurred in each of the past three years. The Los Angeles area, where something like 10 inches is the annual precipitation, would in its best year envy New York in its worst.

There is no water shortage, actually, either over the nation or in the New York area; the problem is one of misuse and waste. The Water Commissioner of New York has just discovered the Hudson River as a possible source of water. The Hudson is one of the country's great rivers, with an inexhaustible supply to be had for the pumping, but of course it is polluted, as are practically all our great rivers. The Hudson was turned to once before, during the 1949-

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated July 19, Aug. 2, Aug. 16, and Aug. 30.

50 drought, and a pumping station was built at Chelsea, about sixty miles upstream from the city and above the tidal limit. The plant cost about $3 million and never produced any water, because by the time it was operative more upland sources had been developed and it was felt inadvisable to mix treated water with the Croton, Catskill and Delaware water New Yorkers are accustomed to, and which is admittedly of the finest quality. It would be a pity to dilute it, but there is no sense in being fanatical in such matters. The plant was dismantled in 1957, on the theory that the upland sources would be adequate for all time. Eight years later, there is another crisis. It was a mistake to take the equipment out, but the building stands and should be re-equipped as a stand-by source, with whatever chemical treatment may be required to make the water potable.

The real solution, of course, is to purify the Hudson not only as a water supply but because it is one of the country's great recreational and aesthetic resources. The legislature did indeed approve, speedily and unanimously, Governor Rockefeller's $1.7 billion pure-water program. A billion-dollar bond issue must be voted on in November and the voters should be given full information on the need for its passage, lest the penny-wise-pound-foolish policy continue.

Lovestone's Foreign Policy

In this issue Sidney Lens, most of whose adult life has been spent as a trade union organizer and official, lifts the curtain of secrecy and silence which has long obscured the role of Jay Lovestone in what Business Week calls "labor's own version of the Central Intelligence Agency." More than one observer has been astonished that a man of Lovestone's background should, for so many years, have played a key role not merely in orienting the American labor movement well to the right on foreign policy issues, but in setting up a world-wide intelligence network which, throughout the cold war, has worked in close liaison with the official CIA and unofficial militants. On reflection, however, it is not as surprising as it appears. After the labor movement conducted the great post-1947 "purge" [see "Labor and the Cold War," The Nation, Dec. 10, 1955], the ascendancy of an embittered anti-Communist with past leadership experience in the Communist Party was a natural sequel.

But in itself this does not explain the unqualified willingness of labor's Meany-Lovestone faction to back the cold-war program. With only isolated exceptions, labor has made its political policies conform to its day-by-day economic interests. It has dismissed as irrelevant counsel like that of Sen. Wayne Morse, its best informed and most consistent friend in the Congress. In his eloquent assault on the foreign-aid program, Senator Morse no doubt had the Meany-Lovestone machine in mind when he said: "Too many American labor leaders seem to think that we can justify these millions of dollars in foreign aid because 80 per cent of the money is spent in the United States and thereby makes jobs for American workers. Let me say to American labor, 'I do not intend to support your program in the advocacy of blood money.' I yield to no man in Congress or in the country in support of the legitimate objectives of organized labor. But if it is a make-work program for the arms industry which labor desires—what an immoral premise on which to stand."

But Senator Morse touched on only one aspect of labor's reactionary foreign-policy position. It is not only that its Washington leadership supports the arms program as a make-work scheme; it also resists alternative policies and programs that promise to yield better long-term dividends to unions and their members. The ironical result is that big businessmen are generally more progressive than big labor leaders. It is Thomas Gates, chairman of the board of Morgan Guaranty Trust Company, who advocates reconsideration of our China policy, not George Meany. It is the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that would explore means of expanding East-West trade, not the AFL-CIO.

Perhaps the latter's policies are too benighted to prevail much longer without stirring up opposition. In May, Lovestone found it necessary to conduct a series of regional conferences for U.S. unionists to justify the AFL-CIO views in the foreign field, and to rebut arguments that the United States should give more attention to its domestic problems. Now and then opposition comes out into the open, as when U.A.W. treasurer, Emil Mazey, denounced American policy in Vietnam and the Dominican Republic. These voices are in the minority at the moment, but they are evidence that some sections of the labor movement have begun to feel that the AFL-CIO serves neither abstract justice nor the interests of its own members by expediting, and sometimes even instigating, the stratagems of American foreign policy.

Obstacles to Voting

One of the standard laments about the state of our democracy is that even in a hot national election less than 65 per cent of the supposedly eligible voters cast their ballots, while in off-year elections a 50 per cent turnout has never been reached. What is not generally realized is that nonvoters include not only those who don't care, but also millions who are disqualified on technical grounds. In addition to those who are barred because of their race, citizens ranging from migratory workers to relocating executives and professional men lose the right to vote. If the latter groups stay put they become voters once more, but the migrants may never gain a chance to vote.

Rep. Robert Kastenmeier has performed another of his public services by calling attention to an article bearing on this subject by Rep. John R. Schmidhauser, which appeared in the Michigan Law Review of February, 1963, when Mr. Schmidhauser was professor of political science at the State University of Iowa. Since 1900, the U.S. population has been increasingly on the move, and under our present laws moving often results in disenfranchisement. Most recent census figures show that persons who do not live in the state of their birth increased by 5.7 per cent during the sixty-year period beginning in 1900; among the nonwhite population the rise was 12.2 per cent (accompanied by a large increase in their percentage of the total population). State laws prescribing voting eligibility take no account of geographical mobility. They were passed to deal with "floaters" at a time when respectable people mostly lived where their ancestors had lived. Thus twelve states require a minimum term of residence of six months, four exclude newcomers for two years; the majority — thirty-seven — stipulate one year. (The total of fifty-three is accounted for by Guam, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.)

The American Heritage Foundation has analyzed the causes of nonvoting and finds that at the time of the November, 1964, elections 104 million adult citizens were of voting age, and of these 8 million were mobile adults unable to meet state or local requirements. Eight million is surely not a negligible number. If all these citizens were free to exercise the franchise, our 62 per cent top might rise to a mark comparable with Denmark's 87 per cent, 85 per cent in Finland, 81 per cent in Israel, 79 per cent in Norway, 77 per cent in Great Britain, 72 per cent in France, 71 per cent in Japan, etc.

Two states have taken the initiative in seeking a remedy for geographical disqualification. In 1963, the Connecticut legislature passed a law permitting former residents to vote by absentee ballot for Presidential and Vice Presidential electors for fifteen months after they had moved from the state or, within the same period, until they had fulfilled the residency requirements in the state to which they had moved. In the same year, Wisconsin passed legislation allowing new residents to vote in Wisconsin if they were eligible in their former places of residence. Several other states have taken action on either the Connecticut or Wisconsin pattern. In 1962, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws adopted a proposed act embodying the Connecticut plan. Representative Schmidhauser favors federal action to clear up the confusion.

In a commencement address at the California Institute of Technology, Dr. Frank Stanton, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, characterized our whole electoral system as a horse-and-buggy affair. He called for a twenty-four-hour election day, with the polls opening and closing at the same time all over the country. Registration would be automatic, permanent and nationally valid. Voting would be electronic, and counting would be done by computers. Dr. Stanton believes these measures would bring out the vote and cost less in the long run.

Since 1865

The first issue of The Nation appeared on July 6, 1865. Since the date of this week's issue falls closest to that of the actual centennial date, we have included (pp. 17-21) some of the messages and greetings we have received in recent months. The special Centennial Issue, of approximately 350 pages, which will go to all subscribers, will be published on September 20, 1965. It will contain the first complete history of the publication, a section devoted to memoirs by various staff members, editors and others, and a section of essays surveying selected aspects of American life and culture over the last century. Among the contributors will be: Mark Van Doren, Sen. Ernest Gruening, Harvey Swados, Dalton Trumbo, Barbara Tuchman, Howard Zinn, Freda Kirchwey, Leon Edel, Lewis Coser and many others. The survival of The Nation for a century must be regarded as one of the major miracles of American journalism. But it is a miracle that has been made possible by the support of many thousands of friends, subscribers, advertisers, well-wishers, readers and contributors down the years; to all these go our thanks for their continued loyal and generous support.

Russia vs. China

CLASH OVER VIETNAM

Isaac Deutscher

London

The latest Chinese attacks on Soviet policy and the Russian reply in Pravda of June 20 put an end to the ideological truce between Moscow and Peking which, despite occasional snipings, has lasted since Khrushchev's fall. "We had hopes regarding the new Soviet leaders," the Chinese say, "and we have watched and waited for several months." But the waiting period is over, because the present Soviet leaders have proved "incurable revisionists," arrogant power politicians and chauvinists, whose aim it is "to rule the world in partnership with the American imperialists." As Trotskyists and at one time even Titoists used to say, so the Maoists now claim that the opportunism of Soviet foreign policy has had its source not just in the mistakes of individual leaders but in the interests of a quasi-bourgeois "privileged stratum" which dominates the Soviet Union. (It should be noted that Peking uses Trotsky's formula "privileged stratum" rather than Djilas' "new class," a subtle difference to the layman, but a significant one to the specialized student.)

The Soviets have replied to this

Isaac Deutscher is the author of many books on the USSR, among them The Great Contest: Russia and the West, and a three-volume life of Trotsky (both Oxford University Press).

that "a Communist who rejects joint action in the struggle against the common enemy, under the pretext that there are differences of opinion, is not fulfilling his sacred international duty."

It is over Vietnam that this new Soviet-Chinese crisis has come to a head, after a long and intense tug of war behind the scenes. While it is broadly true that the Russians stand for moderation and that the Chinese argue from revolutionary irreconcilability, the sharpness of the present discord is due to a more specific and more complicated issue which is of crucial importance for the immediate future.

To intervene or not to intervene? Paradoxically at first sight, Moscow is eager for intervention in Vietnam, while Peking objects to it. A first indication of this was given last March, when the Chinese were reported to have stopped at their frontier Soviet arms transports for North Vietnam. The Russians protested then and the Chinese, it was said, yielded and allowed the transports to pass. It now appears that they opened the road to only some of the Soviet transports, and that others had to return to the USSR. The affair is enigmatic, for both sides are extremely reticent about it, but it is virtually certain that the trains the Chinese allowed to pass carried only supplies of munitions. The mysterious cargo that returned to Russia is said to have consisted of military specialists and advisers detailed to Hanoi. According to information coming indirectly from a Chinese source (but not confirmed from other sources), Peking denied transit to no fewer than 20,000 Soviet specialists and advisers. If this report is correct, then the Chinese Government has vetoed and, for the time being, frustrated a Soviet attempt to build up in Vietnam a military establishment that might match the American establishment.

Such an action may appear inconsistent on the part of Peking. The Chinese have repeatedly denounced Russian reluctance to aid North Vietnam and the Vietcong; why then do they themselves sabotage Soviet aid? On the other hand, how is one to square Russian "moderation" with Moscow's willingness to commit itself so heavily to direct intervention in Vietnam? These contradictions may not seem so strange if the following points of the Russo-Chinese controversy are considered:

(1) The Chinese believe that the Vietcong can win the war in South Vietnam by its own forces. For this it needs generous aid in munitions, but no Soviet military establishment with thousands of specialists and advisers. Peking argues that with the support of an overwhelming majority of the local population, the Vietcong will be able to drive into an impasse any American expeditionary forces, even ones far larger than are at present engaged in Vietnam. They draw a parallel with the Algerian War, in which a French army, half a million strong and superbly equipped, could not defeat the partisans. The Vietcong is in this respect even better placed than was the Algerian FLN, which had to contend with the hostility of a huge mass of French settlers and colons.

The Russians are less confident of the Vietcong's chances. Nor do they believe that President Johnson will ever be able to afford admitting defeat and withdrawing in the way General de Gaulle admitted defeat and withdrew from Algeria. Moscow fears that the United States will go on pouring men and munitions into Vietnam and raising the stakes as long as its military power is confronted solely by the Vietcong. Only the presence of a Soviet military establishment in Vietnam, so the argument runs, can deter American escalation and eventually allow the Vietcong to obtain advantageous terms through negotiation.

(2) The Chinese suspect that through their specialists and advisers the Russians may obtain control of all the key positions in North Vietnam, turn the country into its satellite, and eventually strike a bargain with the Americans at the expense of Hanoi's and Southeast Asia's revolutionary interests. The Russians do in fact favor some new version of the 1954 Geneva settlement. The Chinese, who at the time endorsed that settlement, now think that it gave undue advantages to the anti-Communists; and they refuse to repeat the experiment. They do not wish to be involved in any international bargaining, for they are convinced that in any such meeting the Vietcong will be "betrayed." They have vetoed Russian plans to appeal to the United Nations and the Security Council, and all attempts by neutral governments, especially by India, to act as umpires or mediators. The real belligerents in Vietnam, so the Chinese argue, are the Americans and the Vietcong; and the Americans and the Vietcong should be the only partners in any negotiations for armistice or peace. The Russians reply that as the Americans will never consent to such a loss of face, a negotiated settlement can be achieved only at an international conference, to which the Vietcong is brought by the major Communist powers.

(3) Moscow and Peking disagree also over the prospects of American escalation. Here the Chinese are in a sense more moderate than the Russians. They fear that Russian intervention may precipitate escalation just as did Khrushchev's intervention in Cuba, and the installation of a Soviet missile base there. During the Cuban crisis they criticized Khrushchev for his "adventurism" (in needlessly provoking the United States), as well as for his "opportunism" (in meekly climbing down). "We want neither your adventurism nor your opportunism in Vietnam," the Chinese now say to Kosygin and Brezhnev.

(4) Peking maintains that the Russians are secretly negotiating a Vietnamese settlement with the Americans. Hints to the same effect come occasionally also from authoritative American sources. It is difficult to say just how much truth there is in them; but even if Russo-American soundings are taking place, their effect has so far been negligible, because Moscow has had little or no influence on what is going on in South Vietnam.

It is therefore logical for Moscow to try to increase its influence by establishing a closer contact with the North Vietnamese Government. Only the other week a delegation from Hanoi was received in the Soviet capital with a great show of cordiality. The North Vietnamese are in a quandary: they must show Moscow their gratitude for the aid received; but they are wary of antagonizing Peking, and they hardly wish to see legions of Soviet "advisers" and "specialists" in Vietnam.

For the time being, everyone in the Communist world is waiting to see just how much ground the Vietcong gains through its offensives in the monsoon season. Some of the points at issue between Peking and Moscow may be resolved by the time the rains are over.

Censorship: Fanatics and Fallacies

The Anonymous Smut Hunters . . . Norman Mark

Chicago

The saturation of our civilization with obscenity and pornography shackles and enslaves to lust and depravity. It is necessary to slip these surly bonds. This means it is necessary for each person in America to become a citizen for decency.

That is the vow of Charles H. Keating, Jr., founder and co-chairman of Citizens for Decent Literature, a nation-wide organization devoted to book-shelf purification. Claiming 300 chapters throughout the nation and untold numbers of followers, CDL's statement of policies says that its purpose is "the creation of an awareness and knowledge among the peoples of the world of the quantity and nature of obscene literature. With this background of awakened public opinion we expect law enforcement by duly constituted authorities against the illegal activities of the obscenity peddlers."

The emphasis is on "law enforcement" and, because of this orientation, CDL pursues its goals with a fervor mixed with sophisticated caution. It is against "smut," but prints no lists or guides for merchants—thus avoiding court charges of prior restraint. It is for legal action, but tries hard not to become a party with the prosecution—thus avoiding costly countersuits. It says it is against boycotts, although it has been frequently accused of suggesting them at meetings of the membership. It is for orderly judicial processes, although it has been accused of trying to influence judges and prosecutors by such tactics as letter-writing campaigns and courtroom packing.

Although called Citizens for Decent Literature and Motion Pictures, Inc., the organization concentrates on paperback books, magazines and tabloid newspapers. Keating, who founded it in Cincinnati in 1957, is billed in CDL literature as an attorney, father, former all-American swimmer and fighter pilot. According to one pamphlet, "Keating's concern over the flood of printed poison was galvanized one day in 1956, when he noticed youngsters at a newsstand snickering over a display set apart from the rest of the magazines and paperbacks. Moving over for a look, Keating was shocked. Beside the 'girlie' magazines featuring nudes in suggestive poses, dozens of publications depicted not only raw sex but stories of abnormal sex behavior. By any decent citizen's definition, this was pornography, dirt for dirt's sake."

After some success in enlisting the Cincinnati police chief and mayor in an anti-obscenity campaign (climaxed in 1959 by a "Decency Day"), CDL became a national organization in 1962. By 1964, it claimed 200 chapters and a year later listed 100 more. Although it never defines a "chapter" (is it 100 people or one letter-writing lady?), and although understatement is not a CDL weakness, it must be classed as a major force for censorship in this country.

It has three informal levels of membership. At the top are Keating and the Cincinnati group, the strong chapters in Fort Wayne, Ind., Chicago, New York, parts of California and other towns. On the next level is the unknown number of people who send $5 to CDL headquarters and receive The National Decency Reporter, containing stories of victories over pornography and advice on how to fight it. Below the dues payers are the hundreds and thousands of people who have been subjected to CDL programs and movies, and may be considered the hidden strength of the organization.

An evening with CDL was described by one of its founders:

> We'd volunteer to address any group that would have us: PTAs, fraternal orders, women's clubs. After we had described the problem, we'd pass around to the audience a typical group of pornographic publications. Invariably, everybody would be shocked. They would say, "But we don't have this kind of magazine in Cincinnati; this is from New York or Los Angeles. Our children don't see this horrible stuff."
>
> Then the CDL speaker would drop the bomb: "I bought these magazines half an hour ago at the newsstand just around the corner."
>
> The outraged listeners would demand immediate action. "Let's picket the stores," they would say. Or "boycott the newsstands!" or "Burn the trash!"
>
> The cool legal minds of CDL had a much better solution.
>
> "Write a letter" was our answer every time.

A magazine publisher has claimed that the magazines shown at CDL meetings are made to look dirtier than they really are because CDL members paste black paper over the areas of the body that they find offensive even though the girl pictured was dressed in a bathing suit.

City officials who have received letters from CDL after such meetings say that they range from polite thank-you notes (sent before the bewildered prosecutor has instituted any criminal action) to vile hate notes. Most are signed, but none carries CDL identification.

Much of the letter writing is conducted by CDL's youth group, and that presented a vexing problem to a writer in the Christmas, 1964, issue of The National Decency Reporter. There is an "iron-clad rule" that "great care must be taken to insure that no one in the youth group is exposed to the material in any way."

"So how do they recognize the

Norman Mark covers city hall for the City News Bureau of Chicago.

enemy—or even know why it is an enemy—when they have never met it in person?" the decency writer asks, only to neatly solve his conundrum in the next paragraph: "Well, that's where all the complimentary adjectives come in, like 'mature,' and 'intellectually competent,' and 'reasoned.' All these citizens know enough to keep covered when it snows, though few of them have experienced pneumonia. They can recognize communism as an enemy of human freedom, though none of them has debated with Mao Tse-tung or flown a U-2 over Moscow."

Speakers at CDL public meetings often echo far-Right lines and inject a strong religious appeal. Fight smut and you fight for God and against communism. Keating has called CDL a religious crusade and has written: "The question posed by this onslaught of evil is not one involving freedom or censorship. The question is the survival of Judeo-Christian civilization. If the decent citizens of this nation continue lethargic and apathetic in the face of this pernicious enemy, the families of Western Civilization will live under the anarchy of the libertine, and 'the plum soon thereafter will become ripe for plucking' by Communism."

Films have recently been added to the public programs and are available for $25 on four-day rental. Their titles are I'd Rather Have a Paper Doll (how a marriage is ruined by a young husband's penchant for pornography), Perversion for Profit (exposé of the pornography racket) and Pages of Death. The last is described as "a dramatization of an actual sex crime by a 16-year-old boy, which traces the stimulation of his act to exposure to obscene magazines and paperback books: THIS FILM IS SUITABLE FOR SHOWING TO ALL AGE GROUPS OF HIGH SCHOOL LEVEL AND ABOVE. ALSO RECOMMENDED FOR TELEVISION SHOWING." (Their caps.) A national magazine publisher has complained that "hundreds of little old ladies in gym shoes have gotten their first sexual kicks in years from this film."

Besides encouraging a positive public attitude toward censorship, CDL conducts a secret campaign for stricter law enforcement. Booksellers never know when they have become targets, prosecutors never know if the individual letter writer is expressing his opinion or the group's, and judges never know if the innocent-looking person taking notes in the back of the courtroom is representing CDL, a church group or just wants to be titillated when an allegedly dirty book is read aloud to the jury.

The guerrilla campaign begins with a group of women visiting a bookstore or a drugstore. They look through the magazines and books and suggest that certain ones be removed from the shelves. If the owner demurs, there are veiled threats of boycott or legal action.

Sometimes the visit is a conscious attempt at entrapment, as described by Joseph W. Faulkner, president of the Booksellers Association of Greater Chicago:

> The other day an expensively dressed North Shore matron type pushed her son into Main Street Book Store before her and, after much prodding by mommy, sonny asked for a copy of Candy. The salesman refused to sell the boy a copy and, after much more prodding by mommy and insistence by the boy that he be sold a copy, the salesman told the lady that he would be glad to sell her a copy but not one to her son. They left without exploding their booby trap.

Was the lady a member of CDL or just a mother who sincerely wanted her son to read Candy (a book unofficially banned for awhile in Chicago)? No one knows. In fact most booksellers claim that they have never met anyone who identified himself as a CDL member.

State attorneys, city officials and police receive books and magazines mailed to them by individuals. Other individuals meet with them from time to time to encourage more stringent enforcement of obscenity codes. Citizens for Decent Literature never officially does any of these things.

Lawyers have complained that after several CDL members spend hours in a public official's office arguing against smut, it seems that a large segment of the community is up in arms. The official gets an inflated opinion of the support for an anti-smut campaign.

Even in a city like Chicago where CDL claims a certain degree of success in its campaign (newsstands near public transportation purged, several obscenity convictions now being appealed, a friendly attitude on the part of public officials towards CDL), Chicago chairman and national executive vice president Edward Recruciak admits that less than thirty people do the work, give the speeches and make the decisions about what is or is not obscene.

The pressure for prosecution, even in the face of Supreme Court decisions, is relentless and intense. Some attorneys have said that CDL is helping foment a lower-court rebellion against the Supreme Court. Elmer Gertz (see page 7), who defended Tropic of Cancer and Fanny Hill in court, has warned that in addition to the great expense booksellers must incur to prove points that have already been ruled upon, "this flouting of the law by the lower courts is the greatest menace to freedom of the press in this country. In obscenity actions there is as much rebellion among Northern local and state courts against U.S. Supreme Court decisions as in court tests of integration in the South."

Others have complained that CDL picks only on the "little guy," the corner drugstore, the neighborhood newsstand, and avoids rich hardcover publishers or large booksellers. CDL claims that the prosecutors choose the targets.

In any case, once an anti-obscenity campaign is started it is hard to stop and hard to prevent excesses from happening. Just as CDL claims that once a boy is "hooked" on men's magazines he will graduate to the wildly smutty; a drive tends to begin with pornography and end with literature. As one attorney said, "Parkinson's law applies. When a group is established to fight pornography, it has to go out and find business for itself."

Once a case is in court, CDL offers experts to testify that youth is indeed harmed by pornography (with the defense usually claiming that the problem with most juvenile delinquents is that they don't read at all), offers attorneys as friends of the court, organizes letter-writing campaigns, and has representatives in court to take notes and attempt to advise the prosecutor at every recess.

In early 1962, when an obscenity ruling on Tropic of Cancer was being appealed, CDL prepared and distributed a pamphlet containing the nineteen dirtiest passages from the book. Elmer Gertz pointed out: "This pamphlet, which was supposed to show how bad the book was, had no plot, no redeeming qualities. While fighting pornography, CDL had actually created a piece of pornography."

Some authorities have claimed that CDL gains false strength through a confusion of its name with that of the Catholic Legion of Decency. Booksellers, lawyers and others say that it is a front group for the National Office for Decent Literature (NODL), which was formed to fight obscenity by the Bishops of the United States in 1938. NODL officials deny a connection between the two groups.

Playboy magazine, in the twelfth installment of its mammoth philosophy, stated that "Catholic censorship is implemented at the local community level by an organization called Citizens for Decent Literature. It is a Catholic lay organization, though it gains its acceptance in some communities by appearing to be a civic group with no specific religious affiliation." CDL says that its membership is open to anyone, that it doesn't seek and doesn't have any official church affiliation. But laymen cite articles with a CDL by-line in Catholic newspapers and note that in Chicago CDL has a priest as an adviser.

The adviser, Father Francis X. Lawlor, a high school religion instructor, has stated that the church "has absolutely nothing to do with CDL. All I do is read the books and advise them which I think are obscene." Chicago chairman Recruciak agrees with Father Lawlor, but adds: "We would seek the help of any church. We would like them to speak out against obscenity." A Catholic attorney, Paul C. Ross, who has defended many booksellers, agreed that judges think CDL is an arm of the Catholic Church, but asserted: "It is not. Many Catholics resent this inference and I happen to be one of them."

Despite its emphasis on legal methods and law enforcement. CDL has recently run into some difficulties with the courts. When Keating testified for the prosecution in a Visalia, Calif., obscene literature trial in 1964 (allegedly the first time he appeared in court as a CDL official) and then did not show up to be cross-examined by the defense, the judge rebuked Keating for violating his oath as an attorney and indicated that he may have been in contempt of court. Keating wrote that press of business kept him from returning.

In Chicago, a $375,000 damage suit has been filed by Universal Publishing in Federal Court claiming that an alleged illegal boycott by Citizens for Decent Literature forced it out of Chicago. Filed in 1963 and yet to be tried, the suit claims that CDL "undertook an illegal plan and conspiracy designed to deprive the plaintiff . . . of its lawful right to distribute Beacon-Signal books (a paperback line) in the Chicagoland area."

The suit asks for an injunction to prevent CDL from trying to stop the circulation of Universal's goods and $125,000 assessed at triple damages under anti-boycott provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. CDL, in pleadings thus far filed with the court, has denied Universal's claims and put forward the defense of "unclean hands," stating that Universal was "engaged in illegal business," the distribution of allegedly obscene books.

An End To All Censorship

Elmer Gertz

There is a scene toward the end of Bernard Shaw's minor masterpiece, Captain Brassbound's Conversion, that should be read by all book burners. No one in the pirate captain's crew appears to be more bereft of the higher virtues than Drinkwater—until he is confronted with the imminent burning of his "library": "Four books, torn and dirty, made up of separate numbers, value each wawn penny, and entitled Sweeny Todd, the Demon Barber of London; The Skeleton Horseman. . . ." Drinkwater rushes forward in painful alarm and anxiety, and pleads with Cockney eloquence: "It's maw lawbrarry, gavner. Downt burn em." He is told that he will be better without that sort of reading — the usual self-righteous retort. In intense and mounting distress, Drinkwater appeals to the all-knowing Lady Cicely: "Yer dunno wot them books is to me. They took me aht of the

---

Elmer Gertz is a Chicago lawyer who has long interested himself in civil rights and censorship cases. He is the author most recently of A Handful of Clients (Follett).

sawdid reevelities of the Worterloo Rowd. They formed maw mawnd; they shaowed me sathink awgher than the squalor of a corster's lawf. . . ." Touched, Lady Cicely gently commands the American captor to return Drinkwater's penny-dreadful library to him.

There is a 1965 moral in that typically Shavian scene of the 1890s: the real difficulty today, as yesterday, is not bad books, but no books, and this leads to a basic conclusion. For some years, I have been engaged as a lawyer in defending books, magazines and newspapers against obscenity charges in the courts of several states. All my life the freedom of the press has intrigued me, and more now than in the past. I have not confined my activities to the courts—my first book dealt with that once-forbidden writer, Frank Harris. It is evidence of our occasional progress that there has been no prosecution anywhere, so far as I know, of Harris' unexpurgated autobiography, My Life and Loves, since its first open publication in 1963.

On countless platforms, alone and in debate, over radio and television, and before live audiences of all kinds, I have talked about the subject of obscenity, and I have written many articles for newspapers, magazines and books. In long hours of reading, I have tried to absorb the growing literature, from the classics and topical pieces to the ephemera and emotional exercises—and not least the decided cases and law review articles and commentaries.

I have observed a slow progression in my thinking about the subject. In the beginning, I was prepared to maintain, however reluctantly, that there was an area in which the courts and police might intervene. That area was broad where the reading matter of juveniles was involved, less inclusive for adults. Roughly, my thinking was similar to that of Justice Brennan in the Roth case when, in 1957, the Supreme Court for the first time passed directly on the constitutionality of obscenity legislation. The issue then was: "Whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interests." Like the Court, I was prepared to juggle with different definitions and uncertain decisions, if the end result was to keep utterly worthless obscenity from distribution. But as I worked almost daily with the problem, I began to sense that, for adults at least, to permit any limitation on the access to reading was, in practice, to allow all encroachments dictated by local illiterates, bigots and prudes. I found that one can theorize about the banning of hard-core pornography, but that in fact the phrase becomes the excuse for banning, or harassing, everything that the less-enlightened decry. I now believe that adults should be permitted to read anything, literally anything. Perhaps my reasons for arriving at this absolutist view may be of some interest, because I have been for so long, and professionally, preoccupied with the subject.

The United States Supreme Court, unlike many of the lower tribunals, is much concerned about the speech and press freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment. Again and again, it has stressed that the area of inhibition is very narrow, and dictated by social necessity alone. Generally, the door to prosecution must be kept tightly shut, and only in the clearest case will an obscenity conviction be sustained. The Court thought it was giving sufficient guidance to legislators, lower tribunals and the police in the Roth decision, but very soon it appeared that the meaning of the words was distorted and prosecutions were intensified, rather than diminished.

So, in a series of one-paragraph per curiam decisions, the Court overturned one conviction after another. It became clear to the experts—though not to those who make public policy on the local level—that only hard-core pornography (however defined) could be proscribed. The Court then passed beyond the summary reversal of cases, as in the per curiam decisions, and began to define and redefine in more clear terms. It explained that scienter, or personal knowledge, of the contents of the publication is required before there can be a prosecution; that the community whose standards of acceptability are the norm is much broader than any little village—that, in fact, it encompasses the nation as a whole; that there is to be no weighing of good against bad, of redeeming values against obscenity; that to be banned material must be utterly worthless; that obscenity is not simply a factual matter to be determined by a jury or court, like negligence, but is a sensitive constitutional issue which the courts at each level must pass upon; that for adults the standards are those of adults, and not the hobbling limitations of youth or immaturity.

The Supreme Court restricted searches and seizures; threw out all forms of prior restraint and extralegal pressure; insisted upon adversary judicial proceedings with full safeguards; re-emphasized, and perhaps increased, the heavy burden that has to be assumed by the prosecution. With each case, it became more difficult, in theory, for the censors to interfere with the reading matter of adults.

These decisions influenced some courts momentarily, but for the most part they were as ineffective as the school integration decisions in the South, and for the same reasons. The Supreme Court once thought it could balance constitutional rights and racial prejudice by the doctrine of separate-but-equal facilities. It learned, in time, that such a formula, besides being constitutionally and morally wrong, would not work even if the states attempted to carry it out in good faith. In the end, the Court had to look realistically and courageously at the situation and ban all discrimination. At first, the Court was content to let the implementation of its decisions proceed at a snail's pace. Then it insisted upon real speed and considered the invoking of genuine sanctions.

In the same way, the Supreme Court has tried in the area of the First Amendment to balance freedom against local pressures and passions, and the local feelings are what survive, except in the rare instance when someone can afford the time, expense, wear and tear and uncertainty of carrying his case through the judicial hierarchy to the Supreme Court.

To illustrate what happens everywhere, let me cite a few examples. A Connecticut court recently threw out an obscenity statute as unconstitutional because Supreme Court findings had given it no choice, and then proceeded to adjudicate a number of cases involving tabloid newspapers as if the statute were valid. In Chicago, a jury (eleven members of which had read no books during the previous year!) convicted a bookseller of obscenity for selling Fanny Hill, despite the fact that another reputable bookseller had been discharged in the same city for the same offense. In Chicago, as in many other large cities, to be charged with obscenity is tantamount to conviction, as few courts or juries will acquit, regardless of the book or the evidence in its favor.

Life, 1903

Anthony Comstock

If freedom of the press for adults is to survive, there must be a rule of certainty, an absolute rule that no one can trifle with, and this must be the constitutional fiat that adults may read what they will, be it good or bad, pure or impure. This may shock some people, even so-called liberals. They will ask if the net result will not be to open the gates to a deluge of filth which will drive out the best material and in the end cause a reaction, a return to Victorian prudery. There is a fear that given absolute freedom, men will choose the worse, rather than the better, reading matter.

As Justice Black has repeatedly pointed out, the First Amendment is absolute in its language—Congress and (through the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment) the states shall make no laws abridging the freedom of the press. The general rule is that expression is limited only at that point where there is clear and present danger that anti-social consequences will ensue. The great exception to this rule seems to be the obscenity laws which, in effect, penalize dirty thoughts. Some arbiter is thought able to pry into the mind of the average person to determine prurient appeal, whatever that is.

Is there any scientifically acceptable evidence that individual misconduct or social evils result from the reading of obscenity, hard-core or merely erotic or realistic? There are what I have styled elsewhere cigarette testimonials, by J. Edgar Hoover and others, which attest to the dire consequences of reading pornography. But there are no empirical studies by psychiatrists, psychologists, biologists, physiologists, criminologists, statisticians, sociologists, or scientists generally, which would indicate such adverse effect on particular individuals or on society as a whole. Lacking such evidence, we cannot anticipate any calamitous results from a permissive attitude. If it should be established through objective testing at some later date that there is a measurable connection between delinquency, disease, crime, social evil, on the one hand, and obscenity on the other, it will be time enough to reject, or modify, an absolutist solution to the problem of dealing with the local people who thwart the Supreme Court.

It should be remembered, too, that there are undoubted ill consequences flowing from overeating, but we don't try to curb gluttony by law. We tried to create a temperate nation by law, but Prohibition was a disastrous failure, and we are still paying the price for it. We scarcely talk of banning cigarettes and smoking generally, despite the clearly established proof that diseases and death are caused by tobacco. Why, then, should reading, the least baneful and, alas, least prevalent of human habits, be limited by law?

Those who are afraid that the filth will fall into the hands of children take that chance with liquor and tobacco. They ban the sale of such products to minors, and these laws are enforced often enough to be effective; the same should hold true for pornography. While the ostensible purpose of all censorship is to protect the young mind, there are very few instances of prosecution against those who actually sell to the young. Here, too, there will be difficulties as to definition, and doubt as to the evil effect of the reading matter. It is as an expedient rather than as a matter of principle that one makes this exception with respect to pre-adult readers.

There are social instrumentalities other than the law which should be employed for the purpose of curbing bad literature. What is wrong with a reliance upon parents, teachers, clergymen, critics — everyone with vocal chords or a pen at his disposal? Merchants respond to public disapproval.

On the other hand, I think it can be demonstrated that obscenity prosecutions increase, rather than decrease, the production and sale of dirty literature. Let a book be the subject of public attack and some people must buy it; let a book lead a tranquil existence and few clamor for it. The American public, which purchases shockingly few books per capita, does not wend its way to the stands until the cops point the direction.

In our devotion to the freedom of utterance, we permit all sorts of lies and propaganda to circulate; we tolerate anti-Semitism, racism, fascism and other nonsense of all sorts —the most heterodox and explosive of ideas. We are content, with Milton, to permit truth to grapple with falsehood, confident that in the long run (which may be long, indeed) truth will prevail. There may be a subconscious realization that human beings need the stimulation of such contests if they are not to grow stale. And who is to say that the human system does not require contact with so-called obscenity? Certainly, it has been part of all civilizations through the centuries. There are psychiatrists who say that there is a kind of release, even therapy, in it. In an eloquent essay that should be better known, Henry Miller has proclaimed that war and violence are the real obscenities, not sex or its expression in any form. The world will survive with free utterance; it will die when the human mind is fettered in any way.

An adult nation is one that has truly grown up. It can choose not only its rulers but its reading matter. It is time that the Supreme Court says so in self-enforcing terms. There must be an end to all censorship of books for adults.

American Labor Abroad

LOVESTONE DIPLOMACY . . . . Sidney Lens

In a fourth-floor office of the AFL-CIO's "marble palace," just across from the White House, sits Jay Lovestone, once head of the American Communist Party, but for the past quarter century as embittered an anti-Communist as you can find in the United States. From his bureau he directs an assortment of men who, at the behest of George Meany, are fighting a world battle against communism. Harry Goldberg has been with Lovestone in and out of Communist bondage for decades, but gives the impression of wishing he were back at his old job of writing music criticism for The New Leader. Andrew McClellan, once an amateur bullfighter, is low keyed, easy to talk to; his anti-communism seems steadfast as the polestar. Ernest Lee, a former Marine major, is Meany's son-in-law; Henry Rutz is a former Socialist from Milwaukee, and there are a few others of lesser consequence.

About a mile away, on K and 19th Streets, in the building which also houses Joseph Beirne's Communications Workers of America, is the office of the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), whose mission is to keep communism out of Latin America. Here sits Serafino Romualdi, AIFLD's major-domo, a pleasant, round-faced man of retirement age, who hopes soon to be rewarded with the Ambassadorship to Costa Rica. A floor or two above him is the office of William C. Doherty, Jr., who runs the special projects department of AIFLD. He is the son of a former AFL-CIO vice president who later served as Ambassador to Jamaica. The younger Doherty, though technically under Romualdi, runs his own show.

Finally, 250 miles away in New York are two offices—one on Second Avenue and another on East 46th Street—which are the stamping grounds of Irving Brown, next to Lovestone the most important member of this assemblage. Wherever there is a "Communist problem," there you are likely to see Irving Brown. On Second Avenue he is a representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU); on East 46th Street he is the executive director of a new outfit called the African-American Labor Center. Helping Brown, on a part-time basis in his ICFTU capacity, is Arnold Beichman, a capable writer and political theorist who contributes often to the New York Herald Tribune and The Christian Science Monitor.

These men—along with Meany, Beirne and David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union — are organized labor's cold warriors; for two decades they have been conducting what would be called "outside subversion" if the other side were doing it. They have in effect interfered in the internal affairs of sovereign states, without being accountable for their acts to Congress, the American people, or for that matter the American working class.

Traditionally, the labor movement has been expected to confine its activities on the international front to two pursuits: (1) To pressure its own government to adopt a foreign policy favorable to world labor; (2) to prevent international strikebreaking, assist foreign unions in strikes and organizing efforts, and exchange information with labor organizations abroad.

But since the end of World War II, the Lovestone-Meany team has gone three steps beyond these limits:

(1) Except in a few instances where it disagreed with U.S. policy (usually because it was not "tough" enough on communism), it has acted virtually as an agent for the American Government on a broad basis.

(2) It has followed overseas a role so aggressive as to be a factor in the internal life of other nations.

(3) It has become involved, indirectly at least, in intelligence activities.

Equally disturbing in the Lovestone-Meany record has been its negative approach to world affairs. It is not that these men oppose communism, as most of us would, or even that they resist contact with Communist countries. It is rather that their basic strategy has been a schematic anti-communism in many instances indistinguishable from that of the far Right. They have pitted themselves, not merely against Communist organizations, but against many non-Communist groups which only in the lexicon of the rightists would be considered "soft on communism."

An amusing incident last March focused attention on the role of the AFL-CIO in foreign affairs, a subject seldom aired in public. It also indicated a certain tension in the alliance of union diplomats. George Meany, that "honest plum-

---

Sidney Lens, active in the sit-down strikes of the 1930s, head of a local union of the AFL Building Service Union in Chicago for more than twenty years, with which he is still associated, is currently concentrating on writing and lecturing. He is the author of eight books, of which the latest is The Futile Crusade: Anti-Communism as American Credo. As a writer for many publications and newspapers, Mr. Lens has visited eighty-one countries. Some of the material in this article was gathered during such trips.

ber" who heads the AFL-CIO, denounced the 130-man staff of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions as an "ineffective bureaucracy right down to the fairies."

After the titters had died down, Meany explained that he was referring only to the "gossips and so on you find in any bureaucracy." He wasn't impugning anyone's virility, just their effectiveness. The ICFTU machine was "a complete and absolute bureaucracy" which engaged in practices that were "unethical if not worse." However, in the labor movements of industrial Western Europe the matter was not dismissed so lightly. Arbetet, a Socialist paper in Sweden, published an article: "Double-Dealing in the Trade Union International/Trade Union Boss in USA Crushes Aid Fund." It found Meany's claim that there was something wrong with the fund "peculiar" because he is "the Chairman of the Board of the Solidarity Fund. It is he who leads the work, and as a Chairman rules the decisions which the fund makes."

Other non-Communist unionists abroad also found Meany's behavior "peculiar," but no one seems eager to probe further. American critics of Meany's foreign policy, like Walter and Victor Reuther, or James B. Carey, or Ralph Helstein of the United Packinghouse union, keep their dissent to themselves. But in the corridors of the trade union movement, here and abroad, one hears ominous rumors about secret activity and links to intelligence services, about collaboration with government that far exceeds union duty, about a policy that clings to the extreme Right.

One hardly expects a moderate labor movement like the AFL-CIO to swing wide from the trail marked out by the State Department, and pursue its own course to end the arms race. But neither does one expect that it will be an active ally of the most belligerent elements in our State Department. Nor is one prepared to find that the AFL-CIO has a sizable, world-embracing apparatus and spends millions of government funds for its work.

What the U.S. Government does not do directly, because it would be flagrant meddling with the internal affairs of other nations, and what the CIA cannot do because it is suspect, the AFL-CIO does on their behalf. In ostensibly innocent relationships between unions of one country with another, the AFL-CIO throws its weight toward the making and unmaking of governments, with the purpose of instilling abroad the phobic anti-communism that has become entrenched at home. Jay Lovestone holds no public office, but it would be naive to deny that he influences national policy.

Edwin Lahey, Washington correspondent for the Knight newspapers, once described Lovestone as "a real mystery man, whose personality is part cloak and dagger, part cloak and suit." (Lovestone was then working out of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union headquarters.) Lahey noted that "Lovestone insists rather sheepishly that there is no formal connection between him and the Central Intelligence Agency, nor between him and the Department of State, [but] it can be stated without qualification that the CIA . . . has in recent years obtained much of its primary information about international communism from Lovestone." A Chicago Tribune dispatch of December 17, 1954, said that "Lovestone readily agreed that his AFL Free Trade Union Committee is engaged in intelligence work." A laudatory Reader's Digest article on Irving Brown by a former AFL staffer, Donald Robinson, reports that Hans Jahn, head of the German rail union "told me about an undercover organization he has set up. . . . Irving Brown helped us. . . . Much of what he [Brown] has done in the cloak-and-dagger realm cannot be recounted. It would endanger the lives of his associates and jeopardize their missions."

When AIFLD was formed in 1962, three or four men were considered for the top post before it was given to Romualdi. Two of them, whom I have known for many years, told me that they veered away from the job when they heard background whispers of a certain Michigan Fund. The Michigan Fund is one of eight foundations which, according to Rep. Wright Patman, funneled almost $1 million to the J. M. Kaplan Fund of New York from 1961 to 1963. And the Kaplan Fund was in turn, says Representative Patman, a "secret conduit" for the Central Intelligence Agency. The Michigan Fund has an address but no telephone listing. One year, before it got Internal Revenue permission to withhold operating data, it listed total annual expenses of $60.51. One of the candidates for the AIFLD job, on being told that the Michigan Fund would "give us lots of money," was venturesome enough to check it out at the Internal Revenue Service. When he found no record of it, he removed himself from competition.

Wherever one turns in this area of international union activity there are overtones of secret funds and secret intelligence. The New York Times of October 5, 1947, reported the formation of an organization called the Free Trade Union Center in Exile. It has offices in Paris with the Force Ouvrière, which has received packets of money from Irving

Brown. According to the Times, it also "appears to have at its disposal a working intelligence division." After the 1963 general strike in British Guiana—which Drew Pearson claims was "inspired by a combination of C.I.A. money and British Intelligence" — Prime Minister Cheddi Jagan charged that $1.2 million had been made available to his enemies from American sources. His figure may be high, but with 20,000 to 25,000 laborers on strike for eleven and a half weeks it would come to only $45 or $60 each. When I was in British Guiana in August, 1963, a union official named Pollidor informed me that the strikers had received $3 a week in food benefits for the whole eleven-and-a-half-week period. That adds up to something between $700,000 and $850,000. Andrew McClellan, who handles inter-American affairs for the AFL-CIO and was in and out of Georgetown during the walkout, told me that he didn't know exactly how much had been contributed by American labor. He personally could recall about $50,000, but perhaps there was more. Even so, a sizable gap remains between the figures of Pollidor and Jagan and those of McClellan. Who contributed the balance? If it was AFL-CIO money, why hasn't there been an accounting, particularly since U.S. labor's role in British Guiana has been criticized both here and in England? If it was CIA money, who was the go-between?

The roster of American unionists who were in Georgetown before, during and after the strike is formidable, considering that the country has a population of only 600,000. Among the visitors were McClellan, William Doherty, Jr., and Ernest Lee of the top echelon; William McCabe, a special AFL-CIO representative; Gene Meakins, of the Newspaper Guild; two Retail Clerks union officials; Pat Terrill of the Steelworkers; Ben Segal of the Electrical Workers; and four or five others, as well as a couple of Latin Americans. McCabe, it is said, was present the whole time. Some of the unionists, Segal, for example, had long associations with the Guianese, but others were new to the country. Gerard P. O'Keefe of the Retail Clerks told me that he was supposed to help draft a labor bill in opposition to the one proposed by Jagan. Meakins was doing "public relations" work for the Man Power Citizens Association (MPCA), the union for whose allegiance the two major political parties were fighting. No economic issues were in dispute; the strike was called in protest against Jagan's labor bill, modeled on the U.S. Wagner Act, and designed to give the 20,000 MPCA workers a chance to vote for union representation. (MPCA leader, Richard Ishmael, was so unpopular, according to Segal, that mention of his name at a union meeting was the signal for a round of boos.) Why were American union men involved in a political dispute, in a foreign country? Did they collaborate with the U.S. Government?

The links between the State Department and Meany's international missionaries are indisputable. The AFL-CIO has its own liaison man in the Department; he is George P. (Phil) Delaney, who serves as Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for International Labor Affairs. It is almost impossible for any labor attaché to be appointed to a diplomatic post if Meany and Lovestone advise Delaney that he does not please them. A man who sought a labor position with the Agency for International Development (AID) told me that his application was held up because Meany had reservations about his anti-communism. He was advised by his sponsors to seek a letter of recommendation from Dubinsky to overcome Meany's suspicions. Another such man, whose record was less controversial, told me that he submitted to a lengthy interview with Lovestone before being given the green light.

The implacability with which the AFL-CIO opposes communism on the international front makes it regard every thaw in the struggle with Moscow and Peking as a trick, and every step toward coexistence a disaster. Recently, when both the government and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce proposed increasing trade with the Soviet Union, Meany and his friends condemned it on the ground that it would "only finance and facilitate further Soviet aggression against the democracies." On this, as on other subjects, the labor leaders are often to the right of big business. When Secretary-General U Thant hailed changes in Russia which might result in "competitive coexistence," Lovestone pounced on him in a long article which recounted all the old Stalinist crimes and asserted that Khrushchev had never repudiated "his predecessor's foreign policy.

Lovestone and Meany's extra-union associations reflect these same views. Lovestone is a charter member of the Committee of One Million, formed to keep China out of the UN, and was involved with the Council against Communist Aggression, a China Lobby front He appears, along with Admiral Arleigh A. Burke (Ret.) and Edward Teller, on the letterhead of the Citizens Committee for a Free Cuba In December, 1959, Meany and Lovestone were given the Grand Cross, Second Class, by Konrad Adenauer. They were also honored last year by the Assembly for Captive European Nations, a group of conservative Socialist and peasant party leaders from nine East European countries, who receive their money from the Radio Free Europe Fund.

In the world view of Meany and his subalterns the cold war is permanent until one side or the other is beaten. Russian peace proposals should thus be scorned as frauds. "Throughout its history," says a 1964 AFL-CIO Executive Council statement, "the Soviet government has launched 'peace offensives' whenever it deemed it necessary to have a breathing spell for overcoming difficulties or a pause during which to consolidate its international position and dull the vigilance of the forces opposing it." The Geneva Conference of a decade ago was a terrible thing for, as Irving Brown told the Chicago Council of Foreign Relations, it "was the beginning of the attainment of one of Russia's long-sought objectives—the banning of nuclear warfare." At a press conference in Tokyo recently, Lovestone stated flatly that George F. Kennan's proposal for reducing tensions "was wrong," and Sen. William Fulbright was ignorant of the true facts of the "Communist conspiracy" when he made similar suggestions.

Do these fellows ever do anything but grit their teeth? "The Russians completely control the Chinese," Lovestone told a New York Post man in December, 1955. In July, 1949, just two months before Mao set up his government, Lovestone's Free Trade Union Committee was advising Washington: "We categorically repudiate the notion that all is hopelessly lost." Two years later, Brown, speaking at a Radio Free Europe ceremony, predicted, in the words of The New York Times, "that the dictatorship and armies of Premier Stalin would not long endure." Such analysis and prognostication can come only from a lopsided view of the world.

The Meanyites' actions are tailored to their humorless words. They can claim credit since 1945 for:

(1) Helping to split the French and Italian labor movements.

(2) Encouraging the emergence of conservative leaders in many German unions, and keeping them on the narrow cold-war path.

(3) Involving themselves—some of them, not all—in the gathering of hard intelligence which has nothing to do with legitimate trade union work.

(4) Subsidizing questionable elements in Marseilles and other European ports to break dock workers' boycotts of American arms shipments.

(5) Giving support to unionists in British Guiana in an effort to depose the elected Jagan government.

(6) Endorsing right-of-center laborites in the Dominican Republic who were dissatisfied with Juan Bosch and played a role in his ouster.

(7) Training Brazilians who joined the generals in jettisoning the constitutional regime of Goulart.

(8) Infiltrating American embassies with many labor attachés who share their views and put them into practice.

(9) Defending every military intervention by the United States including, most recently, Cuba, Vietnam, the Congo and the Dominican Republic; and condemning nationalist forces, such as those in Panama, who oppose U.S. policy.

(10) "Educating" literally tens of thousands of unionists in the Lovestone brand of anti-communism and setting them loose, with money and inspiration, against unions with left-of-center leadership.

It would be wrong to say that the Lovestone activity has been all of one piece. Irving Brown gave considerable aid to unionists in North Africa who were fighting French imperialism. He also supported Lumumba, until his death. The AFL-CIO as such has denounced Fascist Spain, apartheidist South Africa, and the military dictatorships of Paraguay and Haiti. But its anticolonialism and anti-racism are usually subordinate to its anti-communism. An AFL-CIO executive council statement in 1959 proclaimed that "the longer colonialism lasts, the greater is the danger of Communist penetration." It is significant that it has never condemned neo-colonialism by the United States in Latin America. The AFL-CIO would prefer, Brown and Beichman told me, to build genuine mass movements—unions, student groups, women's councils, peasant organizations—as the best counterweight to communism. However, if that fails, they stand four-square with military intervention and coups d'état to subdue not only Communists but nationalists who might "open the door" to Communists.

How did the AFL-CIO, which is usually on the side of freedom and progress in domestic affairs, fall into such a quagmire on the international front?

The tale begins with two AFL leaders of divergent purpose, David Dubinsky, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, and the late Matthew Woll of the Photo-Engravers' Union. Dubinsky, a colorful ex-dress cutter who was once a Socialist, hated the Communists, partly from principle and partly because of an internecine war in his own union. Woll, on the other hand, was to the end of his days an arch conservative, violently anti-Communist, not because he believed in socialism, but because he was labor's fiercest champion of capitalism. At one time he was acting president of the National Civic Federation, an organization of employers and right-wing unionists initiated by Mark Hanna and supplied with money by the Morgans and August Belmont. He was also head of the Union Labor Life Insurance Company. Unlike Dubinsky, his interest in foreign affairs was pragmatic rather than ideological. If you were going to beat the Communists you had to fight them on their own terms, world-wide.

Except for these two men, the AFL's interest in world affairs was remote before World War II. Even George Meany, still waiting to climb the ladder, was an onlooker. But with the outbreak of war there arose an obvious need for international activity, if only to aid the many unionists in Germany, Italy and Vichy France who had gone underground and needed help just to stay alive. In 1940, Dubinsky and Woll formed the Labor League for Human Rights "for war relief purposes and for the support of labor causes everywhere." In 1941, Dubinsky's New York locals agreed to raise $300,000 to help rescue labor leaders from the Nazis. With one eye cocked on the Communist problem, the two men nonetheless did invaluable humanitarian work. But as the war approached its end the Dubinsky-Woll team again became concerned with the menace of communism. In 1944, together with the late William Green, then president of the A. F. of L., and George Meany, they established the Free Trade Union Committee (FTUC) to revive the free union movement in Europe and Japan, and "to help such unions . . . resist the new drives of totalitarian [i.e., Communist] forces." For executive secretary they chose Jay Lovestone.

Then in his mid-forties and a vigorous man, Lovestone had been one of the founders of the Communist Party after World War I; he was its general secretary in 1929 when Moscow ordered him expelled. Lovestone had been unfortunate enough, in the three-way race among Stalin, Trotsky and Bukharin, to place his bets on Bukharin. Though ousted from power, he was not fully disenchanted for another decade. First he formed the Communist Party (Opposition), whose purpose—aside from polemics and normal union activity—was to seek readmission to the official movement. In mid-1933, he re-emphasized his "fundamental objective . . . to unite and rehabilitate the Communist movement in America. . . ." Years later he protested, in a letter to Hearst columnist George E. Sokolsky, that "from the very moment that I broke with the Communist Party . . . I fought Soviet totalitarianism." But as late as 1935, he acrimoniously berated A. J. Muste, in a public debate, because the latter called Russia a "degenerated" rather than a real "workers' state." When some of his comrades suggested that his league give up its orientation on unity with Moscow, he fought a faction fight against them. Even the first Moscow trials did not disillusion him; it was only when his former friends among the Bukharinists, including Bukharin himself, stood in the dock that he denounced the trials.

During this unhappy decade Jay Lovestone enjoyed two spectacular successes in the trade union movement. One was in the auto union, where Lovestone became for a time the behind-the-scenes mentor for U.A.W. President Homer Martin and was able to place some of his members, including Irving Brown, in top posts. This base, however, proved tenuous when Martin lost office, and Lovestone won more durable success in the garment union. His followers helped Dubinsky to stabilize his hold on the union and to enlist new members. It was not unnatural, then, that when Lovestone dissolved his political organization in 1941, Dubinsky should offer him a job.

Lovestone was in many respects an ideal man for Dubinsky. He was one of the few people in the country who could talk the language of Marxism to European labor leaders. From previous associations, he knew many dissident Communists and Socialists on the Continent. Furthermore, he impressed not only Dubinsky but Woll, and above all George Meany, whose star was beginning to rise. What Meany, as a good American and a good Irishman, felt viscerally—namely, anti-communism and anti-colonialism—Lovestone could put into elaborate left-wing political verbiage. Though Lovestone did not hold any post in the AFL's own international affairs committee (this was variously headed by Robert Watt, Frank Fenton and Phil Delaney) his special status with the men of power gave him control of actual operations. Thus, out of an unlikely alliance of two ex-radicals and two ongoing conservatives, whose way was made easier by William Green's lack of interest in foreign affairs, was born the AFL-CIO's anti-Communist crusade.

Before long, old and new Lovestone recruits, some on the Free Trade Union Committee payroll, others on that of the AFL itself, began to appear in the international labor movement. Henry Rutz went to Germany; Richard Deverall, former executive secretary of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists (ACTU), to Japan and other Asian outposts; Harry Goldberg to Indonesia, later to Italy. The team also included Mrs. Page Morris, an Arab-Moslem expert who was once an assistant to William Donovan of the OSS, Maida Springer, Ely Borochowitz, Carmel Offi, as well as a number of American labor attachés and local men in India, Israel and elsewhere. Romualdi, who had worked for Dubinsky long before Lovestone, joined the force independently and carved out a niche as Latin American delegate.

The key figure of the operation was Irving Brown. Son of a Teamster, having worked his way through college, active in union and unemployed circles, he had been with Lovestone since the mid-thirties when he infiltrated a left-wing Socialist Party caucus on his behalf. After serving in a number of government posts during the war, he wound up as the AFL representative in Europe.

The Communists, having played so decisive a role in the European underground, inevitably assumed postwar leadership of many unions. They predominated in Italy and France, were influential in Greece, and had sizable forces elsewhere. In the first years of peace there was, furthermore, expansive hope for coexistence. British unions and the CIO joined hands with Soviet and Communist-dominated unions in the West to form the World Federation of Trade Unions (the AFL refused to join). The Communists, far from being obstreperous, were quite moderate. They agreed meekly, at Stalin's behest, to give up arms used in the resistance, and to yield factories which they had occupied afterward. They were so intent on rebuilding Europe's shattered economies that they impressed even Joseph Alsop, who attributed the re construction of France in grea measure to "the enthusiastic co laboration of the French Commu nist Party."

Perhaps the cold war was inev table and schism in the internation al labor forces predestined, but ce tainly American unionists shoul have tried to prevent it. That wa not the view of Irving Brown an Jay Lovestone. Their first order o business was to prevent the Com munists from entrenching them selves in Germany, and to split o the non-Communists in Italy an France. Their method of operatio was prosaically simple. Europe wa digging out from the shambles o war; everyone was hungry. Unio leaders lacked food for their fam ilies; they lacked typewriters, mim eograph machines, newsprint, o fices, for their unions. A man wh could produce such items wa months, perhaps a year or two ahead of his rivals. Under "Opera tion Food" the AFL sent 5,000 pack ages to Germany, 15,000 to France 2,000 to Austria, and 5,000 t Greece. And Brown chose the re cipients.

How much was given out, t whom it went, how it was used, w may never know. Brown's Germa operation was not large, but he buil up an anti-Communist cadre tha settled itself into various unions How simon-pure a cadre it was i suggested by a dispatch in The New York Times of October 26, 1948 which records that a delegation o German unionists, accompanied b Lovestone himself, visited the Sec retary of the United States Army to offer "former German war pilot to fly the airlift into Berlin." Du binsky may well have been righ when he wrote in January, 1949 that "had it not been for the exten sive educational activities of the Free Trade Union Committee of the AFL . . . the Communists . . . migh by now have seized control of the reviving German trade unions." This might have been unfortunate but it is odd that Dubinsky neve asked himself whether the Germa workers had a right to make thei own choice without "educationa activities" from the outside. Ha the help been given to all unio leaders, or even to all non-Commu nist union leaders, it is possible tha a different movement might have evolved.

In France, Brown prodded hi contacts to split from the General Confederation of Labor (CGT) as quickly as possible, and to refuse any collaboration with the Communists in strikes. Beginning in May, 1947, a wave of walkouts took place for wage increases. A few business unionists and mild Socialists, spurred by Brown, argued that the strikes were both unnecessary and politically inspired. They withdrew from CGT and regrouped around a publication called Force Ouvrière. The aging Leon Jouhaux, leader of French labor for decades, opposed the premature split, insisting that it would be far better to remain within CGT, if only to win over a larger constituency. But he was outvoted by Brown's friends and dragged along in a rump group that was stillborn from its inception. F. O. was never strong except in a few white-collar unions, and is even less impressive today.

The most interesting drama of this period was Brown's support of a man named Pierre Ferri-Pisani. In 1949-50, Communist trade unionists were refusing to unload American arms at Marseilles and other ports. Whether they were right to do so is, of course, a matter of opinion, but it was certainly farfetched that an American unionist should undertake the thwarting of workers in France. Apparently at Brown's instigation Ferri-Pisani formed the Mediterranean Committee, with funds that suddenly appeared for the purpose of getting the arms unloaded. The actions of the Mediterranean Committee were so flagrant that the Mayor of Marseilles, Gaston Defferre, wrote a letter to his Socialist Party chief, Guy Mollet, pleading with him to stop Brown and Ferri-Pisani's activities.

In France, Brown had helped so-called Socialist unions and had been lukewarm to the Christian CFTC, which was willing to form ad hoc alliances with the Communists to advance common objectives. In Italy, the position was reversed. Brown and Harry Goldberg were hostile both to Nenni's Socialists and to the right-wing Saragat Socialists, who for tactical reasons did not want to break immediately with the Italian General Confederation of Labor (C.G.I.L.). Instead, the Americans supported the Christians in their secession from the main body of Italian labor.

In Greece, Brown built a little empire around Fotis Makris after the Communists had been purged from the unions through government pressure. This was to be an interesting (though incidental) chapter, for it showed to what lengths anti-communism could go. Makris was a loyal Brown man, and fairly solid with the regime. He had to be, because Greek law requires workers to pay a certain sum to the unions, the money being checked off from their wages, sent to the minister of labor, and then relayed — at the minister's whim — to the unions. But there came a time when even Makris could not tolerate government cuts in worker benefits. In the mid-1950s he decided to mount a legitimate campaign of limited strikes to culminate in broader national action. At this point Brown's pressure was enough to force Makris to yield. They quarreled and the American representative thereafter placed his support with another segment of the Greek movement organized around Dimitrious Theodorous of Salonika.

There is more to the record, but the story is the same. Right-wing columnist Westbrook Pegler says Lovestone spent "millions." Robert Lewin of the Chicago Daily News said, in 1950, that it was $250,000 a year, and, "including special union gifts . . . $5,000,000." Donald Robinson, whose praise for Brown is unqualified, said in 1952 that he had spent "close to $1 million." When I interviewed Brown in 1965, he claimed that in twenty years he had donated about $100,000 to foreign unions.

For his work abroad, U.S. Ambassador to France, James G. Dunn, hailed Brown as a "superb fighter for freedom." Life called him labor's "most effective ambassador." But throughout Europe, most non-Communist unionists look on Lovestone and Brown with hostility. "Many people say," wrote the official weekly of the Swedish Federation of Labor (L.O.) in 1955, "that Brown's maniac anti-Communist attitude is a valuable asset to communism. When it comes to a consistent and effective fight against the dictatorship ideology of communism, Irving Brown has nothing at all to teach — and everything to learn from others."

In December, 1955, when the A. F. of L. and CIO merged, there was hope that Lovestone's influence would finally be curbed. Walter Reuther and his brother Victor—for much the same reasons as the Swedish L.O.—disliked the Lovestone-Brown techniques. They felt that AFL-CIO activity should be subordinated to that of the international confederation in Brussels. They wanted Lovestone out of the picture and his Free Trade Union Committee liquidated. They did not like the constant quarreling between Meany and the ICFTU.

Unfortunately, what was expected to be a showdown turned out to be a whisper in the corridors. Meany continued to lean on Lovestone as his main foreign policy adviser. The FTUC was, indeed, scrapped, but Lovestone continued with his work of overseas manipulation, first as a member of the AFL-CIO's Department of International Affairs, and after 1963 as its director.

As a matter of fact the Lovestone-Meany alliance has become more aggressive in recent years. In particular, the quarrel with ICFTU officials in Brussels has become hotter. As The New York Times has said editorially, Meany's relations with ICFTU leaders "have rarely run smoothly for more than a year or two at a time. At least a half-dozen major reorganizations have been undertaken, largely to satisfy his complaints. . . ."

At root, however, is a fundamental dispute between the Socialist unionists of Europe, especially those of Great Britain and Scandinavia, who would like to see a relaxation of tensions, and Meany who wants to pursue the cold war to the bitter end. As a result, Meany is by-passing the world body and leaning on the U.S. Government more openly than ever in the past. Since the foundation of the American Institute for Free Labor Development in 1961, the Meanyites have more and more embarked on a unilateral course, and the trend became even more pronounced a few months ago when Irving Brown formed the African-American Labor Center. There is no longer a question as to the source of money used by the AFL-CIO in its international work — the overwhelming bulk of it comes from government sources. Labor has had access to about $110 million of public funds to further its anti-Communist purpose.

The newest chapter in the international affairs of the AFL-CIO begins in 1959, and introduces another generation of anti-Communists. Late in that year, Joseph Beirne, president of the Communications Workers of America (CWA), held a class for sixteen Latin American unionists at Front Royal, Va. Instead of financing the Front Royal conference through the union, Beirne conceived the novel idea of having the International Cooperation Administration, predecessor to AID, put up most of the funds. This gave Beirne enough money not only to educate Latin unionists but to pay their salaries for a period of nine months after they returned home. In that time, presumably, they were to put their training into practice. Apparently it never occurred to Beirne that legitimate Latin unionists, who have an ingrained hostility to "Yankee Imperialism," might find ICA money distasteful; for the kind of people he recruited it didn't seem to make much difference.

On the strength of the Virginia experience, Beirne suggested to Meany that the program be widened, and after a preliminary study AIFLD was founded. It first opened its doors to students in June of 1962. Inter-American union machinery for educating workers already existed. The Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) had been formed in 1951, and there were also eight or nine "trade secretariats"— international bodies of unions in the same industry, such as metal workers or culinary workers—to do the job. Beirne and Meany, however, wanted something more directly under their control.

As a trade union instrument — particularly one that must appeal to Latin Americans engaged in bitter struggles with their own oligarchies—AIFLD is a little bizarre. Its board of trustees includes not only union men but representatives of the very corporations with which Latin American unions must bargain. Meany is president. Chairman of the board, however, is J. Peter Grace of W. R. Grace & Co., which owns shipping companies, sugar haciendas, distilleries, box factories, light-bulb subsidiaries, textile plants and other enterprises in Latin America. It is a more enlightened firm than, say, United Fruit, but it does not burst with union fervor. Vice chairman of the board is Berent Friele, a Nelson Rockefeller man. Among the trustees are Charles Brinckerhoff, president of the Anaconda Company; Juan Trippe, president of Pan American World Airways; Henry S. Woodbridge of the True Temper Company; William M. Hickey of the United Corporation; and Ambassador Robert C. Hill of Merck & Company. These men do not run the show, but the association of their names with a "labor school" is not likely to draw a large student body from among those laborites in the Latin states who see the answer to their problems in social revolution.

Nor will the financing quiet suspicion. Official press releases and speeches by William Doherty, Jr., give the impression that government, business and labor each pay about one-third of the costs of the educational program (now about $2 million annually). But Romualdi told me that business contributes only 8.5 per cent and labor 11 per cent; the other four-fifths come from AID. (The social projects department of AIFLD also gets the bulk of its money from government agencies, some of it being in the form of guarantees.)

What does AIFLD do? As of its latest report, its fourteen Latin American field offices have trained more than 20,000 students in trade union procedures, and 317 have gone through more advanced courses at 1830 Nineteenth Street in Washington. The latter not only receive travel money and expenses while in the United States but are put on AIFLD's payroll for nine months after they return home. During the general strike in British Guiana this was extended by four or five months, so that the graduates could participate more actively in the attempt to topple the Jagan government.

Both the selection of trainees and the curriculum are designed to stress an anti-Communist position. Communists, of course, are banned but so, according to Romualdi, i anyone to the left of the Accion Democratica, which rules Venezuela, or the middle-of-the-road Aprista in Peru. Originally, even Christian unionists were excluded A few Peronistas from Argentina were inducted recently, but they kicked up so much anti-U.S. dust that others are not likely to be enrolled. The kind of people trained can be gauged from AIFLD's reports: "Former AIFLD Students Help Oust Reds from Uruguay Port Union." "Two Institute Graduates Challenge Communist Control of Honduran Union." Student Hugo Solon Acero of the Confederation of Colombian Workers (CTC), we are told, eliminated "the last vestiges of Communist influence in the regional federation of Cundinamarca." When the government of Joao Goulart was deposed in Brazil William Doherty, Jr., boasted that AIFLD graduates "were so active that they became intimately involved in some of the clandestine operations of the revolution before it took place. . . . Many of the trade union leaders—some of whom were actually trained in our institute — were involved in the revolution, and in the overthrow of the Goulart regime."

The classes, in addition to instruction in collective bargaining and grievances, include two sessions on the history of U.S. labor, two on the U.S. system of government, one on "totalitarianism," one on communism in Latin America, one on the politics of U.S. labor, one on the Sino-Soviet conflict, and one on the German labor movement. How Latin Americans, armed with this knowledge, can finish their revolution against the atavistic oligarchies is not entirely clear. Romualdi is evidently convinced that it can be accomplished through simple "collective bargaining." Andy McClellan, the AFL-CIO Inter-American representative, who works closely with AIFLD, expresses it well: "Peaceful revolutions can be brought about by a militant democratic trade union movement practicing the collective bargaining procedure."

If education is not enough to keep hemispheric unionists in line AIFLD has another way to sweeten the carrot. Its social projects department, run by Doherty, armed with tens of millions of U.S. AID dollars

(Continued on page 27)

The NATION at 100

A Compilation of Birthday Greetings

The following messages have come to The Nation in response to the announcement that on July 6 the magazine attains its 100th birthday. The editors acknowledge them with deep gratitude, but also in the knowledge that they celebrate a tradition established ong before we came upon the scene. It was James Russell Lowell who said of The Nation: "All the time I was without it, my mind was chaos and I didn't feel hat I had a safe opinion to swear by." On an earlier birthday Bernard Shaw wrote somewhat ominously: "It is certainly curious that so outspoken a journal as The Nation should have survived for 60 years in a country where truth is tarred and feathered, lynched, imprisoned and expatriated as undesirable three times a week or so." To which H. L. Mencken perhaps gave the explanation when he noted: "The Nation is unique in American journalism for one thing: it is read by its enemies. . . ." That is the tradition which the present greetings celebrate and which the presiding editors hold in trust for successors as yet unknown.

For one hundred years The Nation has lent its voice to he causes of freedom and progress. . . . I take great pleasure in congratulating you on this landmark anniver-ary. . . .

Hubert H. Humphrey
Vice President

I have always regarded The Nation an eloquent voice, and ften a necessary voice. . . .

Harry S. Truman

A century ago, the United tates committed itself to the ask of safeguarding individ-al rights for its individual itizens. The Nation has never et go concerning itself with hese rights and with indi-dual people. . . .

Rep. John V. Lindsay

It is good that we have a magazine of its sort going so ar back into our history. It even better that it should ave its present vigor. . . .

Norman Thomas

I send greetings and my hope that 2065 will see this uniquely important periodical still carrying out the task set out for it by one of its founders—to "make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit." Such an objective has never been more indispensable than today. . . .

RALPH J. BUNCHE

As a kid in the public library in Fresno, on Broadway, across from the Orpheum Theater, I discovered The Nation, and I looked forward to examining the new issue every week. It always had fight, which a kid has, too, and I felt that I was in there, in that fight. . . . I have visited the brand new handsome public library and it is great, but that old library was where I was a kid fighting on the side of The Nation, on the side of Mencken, against all of the frauds that now, at 56, I am able to almost cherish, because they are still alive. . . .

WILLIAM SAROYAN

Let me say a word of deep gratitude that The Nation . . . has not escalated into an advertising medium printed on expensive paper and in tiresome colors. Its sheer dedication to simplicity of format and searching for truth is reason for praise. . . .

CLARENCE E. PICKETT

I have particularly valued it in the post-World War II period, not because its independent radical thinking was not needed before but because the climate of oppression and bigotry in the United States has made all the more noteworthy The Nation's outspokenness since 1945. . . .

BERTRAND RUSSELL

Congratulations to The Nation. . . . That such a publication could endure for a hundred years is proof indeed that age need not stale pursuit of the new and untried, nor blunt the goads that puncture our complacencies.

Adlai E. Stevenson

In a world full of orthodox timidity, someone must point out that the Emperor wears no clothes. . . . Causes . . . are never lost as long as you and people like you are there to fight for them.

Kingsley Martin

The Nation* has always inspired respect for its intellectual integrity. I look upon its praise as a most valued endorsement of an artist's effort, whether of the arts, of the theatre, or of the films. . . .

Charles Chaplin

If you care to measure what The Nation has meant to our country, imagine American life without it.

Waldo Frank

The Nation* has survived a hundred years of critics and detractors on a diet of controversy and stimulating—but often exceedingly unpopular—causes. It has survived and grown because there has continued to be a vital need for its voice. . . .

Sen. Jacob K. Javits

If The Nation follows its past formula it will probably live another one hundred years. That formula has always been the deliberate choice of not living safely but thinking clearly.

Harry Golden

Never complacent and often controversial in its independent promotion of liberal journalism, The Nation's voice remains loud and clear as it crosses its 100th milestone. . . .

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy

There are magazines I am glad to buy quite often at the newsstand. There are magazines I gladly receive free copies of from friendly publishers. But The Nation is a magazine I take the extreme position on: I subscribe to it. . . .

Eric Bentley

I was thirty when I commenced a four-year term on the staff of The Nation, and now that I am seventy I sometimes find it difficult to remember that in those days I always thought the paper wise and right. But I do at least remember. And another thing I remember is that men of seventy then were more than likely to think it foolish (or vicious) and wrong. So in my fashion I keep young with The Nation, which I am confident, will never itself be old. . . .

MARK VAN DOREN

In 1947-48, when I was at Yale Law School, my conservative ideas were constantly challenged by the radicalized veterans who were my classmates. (They are now Wall Street lawyers.) To prove my open-mindedness, I took a subscription to The Nation and the magazine played an important role in a political education that turned me from Robert Taft to Norman Thomas within the course of a year. . . .

MICHAEL HARRINGTON

What a dull place this smug over-solemn backbiting U.S.A. would have been except for The Nation! . . .

If you are interested in preventing the United States from becoming a gold-plated dinosaur with a peanut brain that is bound to become as extinct as the dodo, read The Nation. Maybe, in time, the American people will rejoin the human race.

CARLETON BEALS

For me, the great pleasure in reading The Nation has been its sustained interest in the whole of modern culture. . . . It is a delight to read a journal which is so consistently literate on every page; and it is a special delight in a journal whose main purpose, after all, is not literary. That seems to me a true contribution to culture.

J. BRONOWSKI

Anyone called upon to wander through the past century of American history has met The Nation at every significant turn, speaking reasonably and forcefully on the side of truth, freedom and humanity. The war declared by Godkin "upon the vices of violence, exaggeration and misrepresentation" in political discourse has never been won; but that it has never been wholly lost, even under the oppressive development of the mass media, is due in no small part to The Nation.

WALTER MILLIS

I have read The Nation across more than fifty years . . . and have accompanied it into the subjects of mankind. . . . I mention here only

In my teens . . . it helpe me untangle many a web o confusion.

And during the rest of m life it has prodded, provoke challenged, questioned an protested—leaving no vital i sues untouched. . . .

Justice William O. Dougla
Supreme Cour
of the United State

It has served for a century and serves now, as a goad t the consciences of Americans . . . Without it the countr would be the stupider and mor complacent. Not congratula tions: gratitude. . . .

George P. Elliot

I have always admired th clarity and vigor of The Na tion and have appreciated th fairness that it has granted i the expression of its editoria views.

Sen. Margaret Chase Smit

In my University of Texa days, Professor J. Frank Dobi taught me a favorite expres sion of his: "He will do t ride the river with." Well . . The Nation will do to ride th river with. And ride it has—fo the right of dissent, for wha my father called "liberty an groceries," and for the famil of man.

Maury Maverick, Jr

The one hundred years of he Nation's publication have een illuminated by its strik- ng intellectual leadership nd its courageous explora- on of current conditions and vents. . . .

Sen. Wayne Morse

I doubt whether any jour- al anywhere has a more con- stently fine record in the ause of freedom. . . .

Michael Foot

The amount of fact modest- offered as opinion by The ation goes a fair way toward ounterbalancing the quanti- es of opinion disguised as act in the rest of the public ress.

Ben Shahn

Democracy does not make e work of citizens easier or mpler. . . . For a century, he Nation . . . and its con- ibutors have been willing to ke the risks — the risks of stigation and the risks also being wrong — as well as aving the satisfaction of ointing the way. . . .

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy

two items. In the decade of the American Indians' struggle for their chance to live (1922-1932) it was The Nation, along with one religious periodical, which helped to sustain the effort. And Fred J. Cook's almost book-length writing, down through his absolutely conclusive writing on the Hoffa trial, have remained as a high-water mark of journalism in America or any other country. . . .

JOHN COLLIER, SR.

A few journals of opinion are willing to think the unthinkable, and gradually their seepage finds its way into the columns of the establishment and into the minds and hearts of men.

For one hundred years The Nation has been bidding us use fresh eyes, as we contemplate the political, economic and social scene. We should be grateful. . . .

MIKE WALLACE

In 1885, when I was a precocious politician of ten . . . a neighbor gave me a copy of The Nation. It astonished me: it was on the side of the people. But it distressed me. Though on the right side it was too mild for a ten-year-old radical politician. . . . When liberals agree, liberalism will be dead. But agreeing or not, I have found The Nation always honest, always intelligent, always creative.

It seems to me almost incredible that a journal launched with principles of honesty and freedom has never departed from them in 100 years.

ALVIN JOHNSON

I have been reading The Nation almost ever since I could read anything at all. It has always been a stimulating and at the same time comforting magazine—comforting in that in a sometimes dark world to me it has always seemed to stand for light and decency and fair play for the Negro and other victims of unequal chances.

LANGSTON HUGHES

Newspapermen, in the old days, were less prone to accept press relations handouts as the "news." Paul Y. Anderson and others in the pages of The Nation gave the lead to crusading journalists in other magazines in probing beneath the surface and picturing the world as it was, not as it was painted by the Establishment. Most of the other journals have given up that kind of reporting. Not so The Nation.

LEO HUBERMAN

For a periodical just to keep going for a hundred years is itself a formidable achievement. However, this could happen to a publication devoted to bad purposes or as a result of com-

The Nation has rendered outstanding public service and I hope it will continue to do so for another hundred years. . . .

Hugo L. Black
Associate Justice
United States Supreme Court

I have recently been reading up on the Civil War and the Reconstruction period and I have run across a number of quotes from The Nation which made striking good sense. Its independence of thought and its courage have marked its progress ever since I have known it.

Mark Ethridge

In arousing meaningful discussions on politics, literature, science and art — all inseparably related within the framework of a progressive society — The Nation is of abiding value.

Sen. Claiborne Pell

Sometimes I have thought over the half-century I've read The Nation that I could get along without it. . . . But I found I just couldn't. I need its confirmation of my views just as I need its critical dissent from them. . . .

Roger N. Baldwin

Year in and year out The Nation has stood like a rock of truth, clarity and witty good judgment in the field of publishing opinion and fact. . . .

Gov. Edmund G. Brown

We have a long way to go, but it would be further still by a good measure were it not for The Nation.

William A. Williams
Professor of History
The University of Wisconsin

One of the greatest chronicles of liberal thought. . . .

Rep. William F. Ryan

The Nation* has provided fire and light for the liberal community, and a platform for good writers, regardless of the moment's fashion.

Gore Vidal

promises. . . . What makes the hundredth anniversary of The Nation cheering and something to cheer about is that through the decades its editors have so written and acted as—in one of Stephen Spender's great lines—to "leave the vivid air signed with their honor."

A. J. MUSTE

We are a successful, comfortable people by and large, and change and self-analysis and self-criticism are not considered urgent. . . . Here is where a journalistic national conscience is called for. . . . To this journalistic national conscience The Nation has contributed mightily for 100 years.

GEORGE I. SANCHEZ

Robespierre once warned that "any man who will rise to defend public right and public morals will be overwhelmed with outrage and proscribed by the knaves . . . that every friend of liberty will ever be placed between duty and calumny. . . ."

Perhaps The Nation has not always faced that awesome burden, but certainly its role has not been easy over the past century. . . . A niche in American history has long ago been assured for this indispensable journal.

JUSTICE STANLEY MOSK
Supreme Court of California

I have a distinct feeling that the last two decades of The Nation's century-long career . . . were the most dangerous years. During the dark McCarthovingian days of the early fifties the will to "burn books" . . . was given the strongest support in high places . . . and our big press showed itself weak in resistance to such repression. . . . Very few periodicals upheld the right to dissenting or nonconformist opinion, and The Nation was one of the "happy few. . . ."

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

When I was a college student, a friend introduced me to The Nation. As I read it week after week, I began to look at the world differently, and began to see what I had never seen before. The Nation then motivated me to act as well as to think. . . . Whatever I have been able to do to promote social justice, in the course of my ministry, my writing, teaching or influence, has in no small measure been inspired by this great American magazine. . . .

RABBI ROBERT E. GOLDBURG

I cannot believe much of what I read in the papers. It is not even a question of whether they are venal or not, it is rather their accepted mode of presenting the news, a blank undigested recital of actions. . . . The Nation has

We have all been proud write for it, and we hope will long outlast what we ha written. . . .

C. P. Sn

From Grant to the "Gre Society" The Nation has be a brocade of ideas and trumpet of protest. . . .

Malcolm Mo

Your past 10 years ha more than fulfilled the pro
ise of the 90 prelimina years. . . .

Henry A. Walla

Forward, with your glorio heritage!

A. Philip Randolp

The Nation* has commen ably defied the witch-burne who would blur the differen between dissent and here and who would enthrone o
thodoxy as ruler. . . .

Rep. Edith Gre

been publishing long enough to have identified itself with one of the major traditions of this country, a liberalism that does not operate by fiat but one that has experienced enough trials to take into account all the actions and digest them and present them in the light of an honest concern for the public welfare. Thus, when I read The Nation, I think I am getting something pretty close to the truth, give a little, take a little. This is a great satisfaction. . . .

ALLEN SEAGER

On occasions . . . I have turned away because I thought I knew in advance The Nation's views. . . . But whenever I returned . . . I was always surprised by the healthy orneriness of its editorial attitudes, no less its articles and reviews, which proves how wrong it is to take The Nation for granted.

MICHAEL BLANKFORT

In a time of increasing machine tooling of reading, the perpetual youthfulness, the ability to surprise and be personal, is one of the great charms of The Nation. And its great value beyond charm, of course, is that it is also so often exactly right.

HERBERT GOLD

The Nation is an indispensable bridge. Its 100-year history of moral and intellectual leadership in the progressive movement enables it to be a bridge between generations, to connect America's young intellectuals with tested values from this country's liberal heritage. But it just as sharply introduces aging progressives to the newest and most advanced ideas from America's universities and Greenwich Villages. The Nation also connects practical politicians with political scientists, creative artists and critics with scholars, and editors of mass media with the forthright and uncensored opinions of frontier thinkers and independent researchers and reporters. . . .

EDWIN F. SELF

The publication has pro- oked both thought and con- roversy, both of which are ssential in a democracy such s ours. . . .

Sen. William Proxmire

The Nation* . . . has served s the conscience of a grow- ag, dynamic country for 100 ears. It continues to repre- ent the best in independent, ourageous, and stimulating ought. I have no doubt of s future.

Sen. George McGovern

You are a subversive force, the best sense of that term —subversive of complacency, ogmatism, and prejudice. . . .

Roger L. Shinn

The Nation* continues to be . . . the supreme American journal of social, political and literary contemporaneousness. . . .

Erskine Caldwell

No nation can afford to be without a Nation. . . .

Roger J. Traynor
Chief Justice,
Supreme Court of Calif.

America is freer because The Nation has been open and free.

Frank Graham

The Nation* has been the conscience monitor for all who believe in the cause of liberalism.

Dore Schary

etters of congratulation have also een received, and are gratefully cknowledged, from:

SAUL ALINSKY
CARLOS BAKER
STRINGFELLOW BARR
EDWARD L. BERNAYS
HARRY L. BILLINGS
REP. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.
HENRY COWELL
BARROWS DUNHAM
JOHN C. ESTY, JR.
DOROTHY FULDHEIM
HENRY GEIGER

HAROLD J. GIBBONS
MARK HARRIS
REP. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS
LISA HOWARD
PALMER HOYT
JOHN L. HULTENG
ROBERT W. KENNY
EDWARD LAMB
ARTHUR LARSON
WILL MASLOW
HERBERT L. MATTHEWS
SEYMOUR MELMAN
JUDGE LOREN MILLER
EDWARD P. MORGAN

JAMES G. PATTON
MILES PENNYBACKER
BERNARD B. PERRY
THE RT. REV. JAMES A. PIKE
JACOB S. POTOFSKY
ALAN REITMAN
REP. JAMES ROOSEVELT
TIMOTHY SELDES
MAYOR JOHN F. SHELLEY
HARVEY SWADOS
PAUL M. SWEEZY
HAROLD TAYLOR
MAURICE B. VISSCHER
WILLIAM WINTER

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Madness in the Age of Reason

MADNESS AND CIVILIZATION: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason. By Michel Foucault. Translated by Richard Howard. Pantheon Books. 299 pp. $5.95.

Norman Reider, M.D.

Recent developments in community psychiatry emphasize the malevolent effect of the exclusion from society (or from the family) of the mentally ill. The proponents of social psychiatry partly argue that the mentally ill receive more effective treatment in the milieu that played a role in the formation of the illness; economic factors today favor this prescription, but the scientific justification is so complex and in such a transitional stage that the position remains a hypothesis. Some facts, however, are provocative.

Foucault points out that society has always had its groups to exclude; his concern is what happens to the insane of the 16th to 18th centuries, the "classical age," the "age of reason." Prior to this period, in medieval times, the scapegoat was the leper, who began to disappear, probably through the effects of segregation, in the 14th century. At that time there were about 19,000 leprosariums throughout Christendom. What happened to these structures when leprosy disappeared? Some were to be used for the other extrusions from society, the poor, the vagabonds, the insane and the criminals. Before the use of confinement another device was portrayed in the early Renaissance, a dream fleet with imaginary crews, modeled on the Argonaut cycle, which embarked on great symbolic voyages: the "Ship of Princes and Battles of Nobility" in 1502, the "Ship of Virtuous Ladies," a "Ship of Health," Brant's "Narrenschiff" (1494) and those which Bosch depicted. But the Ship of Fools was the only one which had real existence, boats which conveyed the madmen from town to town along the rivers and canals. A city got rid of its insane this way; they were often lost, though sometimes they were taken back to land to a place for cure. Foucault writes this little chapter of exclusion with poetic skill, ascribing significance to the symbolism of the navigational journey, the water and the polarity of the confinement and the freedom of movement. But he deals at greatest length with a more important theme; the preclassical preoccupation with death, pestilence and war changed to a concern with madness. The anxiety was the same, but the Renaissance began to deal with insanity as a fascinating part of existence, to be endured, to be criticized and feared, to be felt akin to wisdom and dreams.

The "liberation" of the insane, the compassionate hospitality to madness in the early 17th century (King Lear, Don Quixote) was short-lived and was overwhelmed by the era of the "great confinement." In 1656, a decree established the Hôpital Général, an administrative reorganization of many establishments in Paris, which now had to lodge and feed the poor. One out of every hundred inhabitants of Paris found himself confined to l'Hôpital Général for at least several months. No medical concept was involved; the phenomenon occurred all over Europe; confinement was a "police" matter. "Mendicancy and idleness as sources of all disorders" for a hundred years plagued the parliament of Paris; whippings, exile, enforced labors in the sewers had not worked. Now confinement was to be tried; it offered a source of cheap manpower in periods of full employment, reabsorption of the idle and social protection against uprisings in periods of unemployment. The experiment, either as "work therapy" or as an economic measure, failed with the first phases of the rise of industrialism.

Gradually the criminals and the mad inherited the domains of the lepers of old. Naturally, in the age of reason one of the initial reforms freed the criminal, so often just a debtor or a petty thief, from the torture of his enforced association with the madman whose crime of unreason was greater. In 1790, the Declaration of the Rights of Man definitely reserved confinements for certain categories of convicted criminals ar for the insane. Finally, in 1794, tl liberation of the chained inmates Bicêtre took place.

Out of this new division of tl extrusions from society, arose tl asylum as the unique Lebensraum the insane. Foucault sees Tuke ar Pinel, not as the philanthropic sa iors of the insane as traditional hi tory has interpreted them, but creators of a new type of segregatio more humane to be sure, but still segregation with a moral and re gious atmosphere. Tuke enforc promises of self-restraint from p tients, and "substituted for the fr terror of madness the stifling anguis of responsibility. . . ." Why Foucau is so sarcastic about such therapeut interventions—and sees them only a rationalization for restraint—is u clear unless he, too, like the cla sicists he writes about, has becon fascinated by the so-called unrestrai ed freedom of madness.

Pinel's asylum was religious wit out religion, an imposition of soci morality. The values of work an family reigned. Foucault compar Tuke's and Pinel's systems admirabl showing that both required the phys cian to become the important figu in the asylum. However, to Foucau neither Tuke nor Pinel is a medic scientist. To him they represente moral and social forces. "What w call psychiatric practice is a certai moral tactic, contemporary with th end of the eighteenth century, pr served in the rites of asylum life, an overlaid by the myths of positivism

About half of this book is historical report with strong and e cellent psychologizing about the hi tory of the age of reason. Foucault psychological treatment of the perio is a curious paradox, for he hardl veils his contempt for the psycholog cal approach to mental illness. A best his ambivalence is couched wit mixed praise: "Freud went back t madness at the level of its languag reconstituted one of the essential el ments of an experience reduced t silence by positivism; he did n make a major addition to the lis of psychological treatments for ma ness; he restored, in medical though the possibility of a dialogue with u reason." This statement, only partl true, demeans the contributions c

---

Norman Reider is the senior chief of psychiatry at Mount Zion Hospital in San Francisco, and an instructor at the San Francisco Psychoanalytic Institute.

reud and others. But it's neatly put, n'est-ce pas?

I take further issue with Foucault partly out of annoyance that such a brilliant piece of work should be marred by a chauvinistic narrowness which at times borders on arrogance. He quotes almost exclusively from original sources, a sign of fine scholarship. Although there were other historians of madness in that era, he does not refer to a single one, not even Zilboorg. The references are almost entirely French. Only passing and brief quotations from Tuke, John Howard and a few other Englishmen alter the impression that France was the center of all events. Foucault fails to mention the Italians, who played an important role in the history of psychiatry in those days. He does mention that the first houses of confinement were in England, at Bristol, Norwich and Worcester, but he gives Colbert, who followed the English, more credit, if one can call it that, than the English.

But the excellence of the work is not marred by such traits. In the larger portion, where Foucault deals with the nature of insanity, its relation to passion, its nosology, and how the physicians of the era thought about it and dealt with it, this rigid adherence to original sources and his analysis of the main motifs result in superb scholarship rendered with artistry. The artistry has its limitations in that it avoids the textbook manner of dealing with a systematized presentation, but Foucault's flowing, easy style is a remarkable instrument for getting a point across. For example: "Before Descartes, and long after his influence as philosopher and physiologist had diminished, passion continued to be the meeting ground of body and soul; the point where the latter's activity makes contact with the former's passivity, each being a limit imposed upon the other and the locus of their communication." Foucault effectively extracts the wealth of intuitive knowledge and understanding of the classicists, as if to say, "all that you moderns write about was known two hundred years ago." This is merely implied, for he gets across his point more subtly than by direct statement. He simply points out what Sauvages, for example, wrote about passion and its setting for the possibility of madness. This is more effective than demonstrating how closely related these ideas are to what has been so recently elaborated into a metapsychology of psychosis. If Foucault ever had any temptation to belabor the modernity of the old ideas or the antiquity of present-day psychoanalytic concepts, he restrained himself well.

In dealing with madness as a human phenomenon, it is likewise tempting to show similarities between what Zacchias and Sauvages wrote two and three centuries ago and certain concepts of contemporary existential psychiatry. I am sure that Foucault knows these analogies and parallelisms, but he refuses to be tempted by that type of cleverness. He prefers to deal with ideas and historical and psychological forces. He seems to me to be particularly selective of dialectical presentations, equations of opposites and bipolar formulations. But he makes no pitch for any modern dialectics as an approach to mental illness. He never mentions unconscious vs. conscious, id vs. ego or primary process vs. secondary process. This is admirable, scholarly and stubborn.

Today we can say we have made progress in the fight against exclusion of the mentally ill and offenders. Arguments for protecting the excluded ones from themselves or protecting society from them have at least been called into question. At least an atmosphere of greater acceptance of the mentally ill has been accomplished, so much under medical aegis. Forces are at work to place the problem of the criminal offender also under psychiatric control, a trend opposed by some political and psychiatric groups, possibly for different reasons. Fear of the passions wears many faces, most of which are no different from what Foucault describes.

Programing the Protestant Computer

THE POSITIVE THINKERS: A Study of the American Quest for Health, Wealth and Personal Power from Mary Baker Eddy to Norman Vincent Peale. By Donald Meyer. Doubleday & Company. 360 pp. $4.95.

Ralph Caplan

The title of this remarkable book suggests just another exercise in sensational sociology, the profitable indignation of a Vance Packard roused once more to market. Actually it is nothing of the sort. A delightful, scholarly investigation of American mind-cure movements, it exposes the failures of Gospel that have nourished the gospel of success.

That mind-cure is more than a harmless recurring fad is clear. Norman Vincent Peale may have emptied religion, but he has filled churches and now heads the Protestant Council of New York. Bruce Barton, a sort of unfrocked Peale, first offered his vision of the Christ in the gray flannel suit in 1925: The Man Nobody Knows. Reader's Digest this year printed a condensation of the work, calling it "a classic of its kind," which it surely is. The bookstores of America are loaded with manuals that will instruct a reader in how to unleash the Power, human and divine, within him. Now it is possible for everyone to be more powerful than everyone else.

One of the most intriguing questions about mind-cure technique has always been: Why does it work? Oh, not why does it work for the patients:

Ralph Caplan is the author of a novel about the gospel of success, Say Yes, to be published by Doubleday in October.

Rodale's

QUINTO LINGO

The Learn-A-Language Magazine

Now you can learn or maintain your skill in French, Spanish, German or Italian a new way. Quinto Lingo, Rodale's new magazine, presents the same fascinating articles, anecdotes, stories and jokes in all four foreign languages, plus English, in 5 side-by-side columns. Read something from Quinto Lingo each day and watch your skill in a foreign language grow. You learn the reading way, not the grammar-rule way. Subscribe today!

Rodale Press, publisher of Quinto Lingo, is one of the leading producers of reference texts, magazines and books, such as the widely-hailed Word Finder, Synonym Finder and Phrase Finder series for over 25 years.

Quinto Lingo Rodale Press, Inc.
Dept. NA-6 — Emmaus, Pa.

Please enter my subscription for Quinto Lingo, the new Rodale language magazine.
☐ 1 year (12 issues) at $5.00

Name ______
Address ______
City ______ State ______
☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

there are various reasons why it does, doesn't, seems to; and various ways in which "work" can be defined for the purpose. But why does it work for the faith healers themselves, and for their movements?

The customary answer is that positive thinking offers a cheap and easy solution to life's problems; but men have always looked for such solutions, and anyway that line of attack is itself a bit too cheap and easy. Sure, positive thinking is the greasy kid stuff of contemporary Christian thought. But if Dr. Peale's critics are so smart, how come he's rich?

Meyer finds answers varying with the personality of the practitioner, the social and intellectual climate of the times, and the adequacy of established religious and medical institutions. He thinks it is no coincidence that the first grandly organized mind-cure enterprise, Christian Science, should have been founded by a woman. "Mind cure gave jobs to women by hundreds and thousands. The clear majority of Christian Science practitioners were women. The majority of preachers in the proliferating Unity churches were to be women. Mind cure had higher proportions of women in its congregations than the old churches. Women bought its books heavily. Was there something wrong with women?"

Plenty. Particularly with the middle-class women who made up the ranks of mind-cure in the 19th century. The world seemed to be leaving them, but it wouldn't say where. No established agency dealt with their problem effectively; most did not deal with it at all. The doctor was no help, nor was the pastor and priest. But if the problem was seen as internal, a woman might help herself by thinking, praying, willing or imagining it away.

Mind-cure, then, gave her what the gospel of success later gave her husband: a purchase on self that neither church nor medicine was helping her attain. Since it could do this only by assuming both affliction and relief to be on the inside, it had to ignore society. Yet it had no quarrel with society, since positive thinking sought to reform nothing but the psychological pitch of the patient-disciple. One thinks of Christian Science's antagonism toward medicine, but Meyer regards this as example rather than paradox. "When," he asks, "might people most safely prefer mental techniques to reasonably reliable medical techniques?" Why, when medical techniques and concomitant standards of sanitation have made mind-cure, or no cure for that matter, a fairly good risk? "In its very core," Meyer says, "mind cure manifested an unavowed social dependency," and had to live in harmony with the world as it was, however it was. (Meyer suggests that this is expressed aesthetically in the tendency for Christian Science churches to look like banks.)

Professor of American history at UCLA, Dr. Meyer writes with particular authority (and with only an occasional academic mannerism) on the history of medicine and the history of Protestantism. His patent erudition makes his mastery of the present subject all the more impressive. How did so learned a man find time to read so much vacuous literature? In any case, he has not only read it, he has read it without—well, almost without—patronizing the authors. As a result, he is able to make highly original distinctions. Meyer can not only distinguish a book by Peale from a book by one of Peale's competitors; he can even distinguish Peale's books from one another!

Meyer examines the ideas in these works closely—more closely than I should have thought possible. This I suppose is the scholar's fairness at work, but there is something unfair about it too. As no one knows better than Meyer, Norman Peale is not, after all, Reinhold Niebuhr; to keep chiding the likes of Peale, Dale Carnegie and Napoleon Hill about inconsistencies and gaps in logic is to implicitly apply the standards of a world they never made and never inhabited.

(Square in Savannah)

The morning answers. In its open palm a lily eats.

Pigeons alight on rocks over the dark worms. Bobbing in hunger, in ritual. Twigs return to the sun dry, brittle. The dew descends.

At the top of trees soil is transplanted in blue fruit.

And the cricket's shadow lengthens in a voice under the tree. Listen!

The grasses are bending. Foam-green extending their tips. Like shoreless waves. A step articulating.

Uncrashing. In the wind. A blade slaps a bird's feet. Blade and feather lying on a note in the tower.

Jason Miller

Yet this serious reading of men w do not normally invite or get serio readers does turn up some amusi situations: the fact, for example, th
Peale and his house psychiatr
Smiley Blanton, are at odds even collaborators. Blanton, a peculiarly serving victim of guilt by associatio strains to accommodate Peale, but t latter seems unaware of the effort
the reason for it.

Positive Thinkers is not co fined to the positive thinkers. Some the minor characters who illumina
the major ones in this drama are ma of stronger stuff: Harry Emerson F dick, the liberal Protestant pastor, ging adventure but unable to concei of its political component; Rabbi Li man, who, cutting out the middlema was his own Smiley Blanton. A Meyer shows how William James w misunderstood to an extent that h won him ubiquity in mind-cure lit ature.

This engaging book reveals the ch
acter of positive thinking much mo sharply than the vituperative attac of the early fifties did. "Spiritual au mation" is one term Meyer uses to scribe the positive thinker's formu for shutting out human adventu
The term is apt (one of the ma post-Peale scriptures is called "Au cybernetics") and the formula esse tial. For the computer that is ones operates on whatever data one pr grams into it; if the data had to c respond to the real world, the proc would be pointless.

Meyer blames Protestant culture self for distrusting the political m dle term between theology and p chology. But one can distrust politi solutions, yet long for them. Ev
Peale acknowledges that a hum being is not entirely an automat
—after all, man was born imp fect. Nevertheless, though the posit thinker deplores the same things th Barry Goldwater does, the rules of game do not permit his trying to ma society better or different.

That explains Dr. Peale's quick treats from the right-wing movemen to which he is naturally drawn. T affinity is ironic in view of one of right wing's favorite anxiety cries, if ever a psychology was designed undermine the moral resistance of people, positive thinking is it. T
"thought conditioners" so zealou prescribed by Dr. Peale reflect mirably modern mind-cure's ba premise: the unconditioned life is worth living.

LSD: 'The Contact High'

Howard Junker

hough LSD was first synthesized ıore than twenty years ago, national lumination as to the effects of psyıedelics did not occur until the Harard scandal of 1962-63. University uthorities objected to the "use" of ndergraduates in experiments begun ı 1960 by Professors Timothy Leary nd Richard Alpert. Forced to leave ambridge, Leary and Alpert, with esearch fellow Ralph Metzner, began hegira, first attempting to found sychedelic communities in Newton, lass., then in Mexico, then on a aribbean island, finally at the astalia Foundation in Millbrook,
. Y., where Leary lives and works ith a small group devoted to the exloration of the consciousness-expand-ıg drugs. On the way, a great deal of raight-out evangelism has been gen-
'ated for the experience in scores of ctures and discussions, as well as in scholarly journal, The Psychedelic eview, and a book, The Psychedelic xperience (University Books, 1964), hich is a manual based on The ibetan Book of the Dead. (Further anuals—on scientific, therapeutic ıd aesthetic models—are promised.)

The double-edged promise of psyıedelic exstasis — psychosis/enlight-ıment—is sufficiently fearsome to eep many potential voyagers from king a trip. The danger of flipping ıt—permanently losing touch with ality—is quite real, although casu-ty rates on psychedelic experiences e hard to come by, and perhaps wer than one in 10,000 experiences sults in lasting mental damage.

LSD has been used with varying egrees of success, in psychotherapy, well as in the training of psychiaists ("this is what psychotics feel ke . . ."), the treatment of alcohol-s, and the reduction of anxiety in rminal cancer patients. Further, as ldous Huxley put it, today's "aspi-ng mystic" would be foolish to try lf-flagellation and prolonged fast-
g. He should, Huxley advised, ıowing "the chemical conditions of anscendental experience . . . turn for chnical help to the specialists. . . ."

So far LSD, psilocybin, mescaline, al., are legally available only to ofessional investigators, who have led their research programs with e Food and Drug Administration sychedelics, which are not addicve, do not come under narcotic codes), but the drugs are not hard to obtain from local connections. And now that marijuana, which is a mild psychedelic, is acknowledged kid stuff, the use of wonder drugs can be expected to increase dramatically.

For all the talk, testimonials and debate, however, there have as yet been no public sessions—after all, the drugs are illegal, and who wants gawkers anyway. But how to translate the experience into terms the uninitiated can understand: by subjective reports? scientific analyses? how-to lessons? humble question-and-answer sessions? None of these stratagems do the job, since, ultimately, either you have or haven't taken a trip yourself.

Luckily, art imitates life, and lectures-cum-demonstrations were introduced this spring at the Village Vanguard in New York. A series of Monday night sessions opened June 14 at the New Theatre, 154 East 54th St. The lean, tanned, Giotto-saintlike Leary calmly announced on the first night that in the past six months the psychedelic revolution had been won. There are now available (1) the accounts of explorers, spokesmen and publicists; (2) manuals and maps for the trip; and (3) materials to go up on.

"And tonight," Leary continued, "we are going to run a session for you. We are going to try to turn you on."

But short of a real drug-dole, how, if the experience really is Something Else, can the ordinary audio-visual techniques produce a trip? The key to the possibility of a psychedelic theatre is the notion of the "contact high"—an experience attained solely by being with—tuning into—someone who is up on the drug. Further, it seems to be possible, even though chemical traces of LSD do not linger in the brain, to lapse into or recapture psychedelic intoxication long after the actual experience.

William S. Burroughs, today's De Quincey, who attributes many scenes in Naked Lunch to psychedelics, tells of a Proustian reactivation of the experience when "the precise array of stimuli — music, pictures, odors, tastes" encountered during the experience are duplicated. "Anything that can be done chemically," says Burroughs, perhaps presaging a neo-Freudianism, "can be done in other ways, given sufficient knowledge of the mechanisms involved."

The psychedelic theatre attempts to stimulate multiple levels of consciousness by audio-visual bombardment. Its creators, a Woodstock, N.Y., trio publicly known as USCO, comprised of former Playboy correspondent and poet Gerd Stern, ex-Pop artist Steve Durkee, and electronic technician Michael Callahan, call their barrage of films, slides, kinetic sculpture, strobe lights, tapes and live actors a "multi-channel media mix."

These fancy terms are partly a tribute to the University of Toronto's communications commentator Marshall McLuhan, who takes a prominent place in the philosophical background of the psychedelic theatre, supplying contemporary technical insights to balance the Oriental mysticism of such figures as Meher Baba, who "in ancient times was called Jesus the Christ, Gotama the Buddha, Khrishna the Lover and Rama the King."

McLuhan argues that media study should concentrate on the effects of the technology on the environment, on social organization and thought, not on the programmatic content the media transmit. "The medium is the message," says McLuhan, who recalls how the invention of movable type provided universal access to the word and led to secular learning, individualism, nationalism and the assembly line. These forms, for McLuhan, are based on the model of the line-of-type, which is linear, sequential and bi-

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 7-5-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

dimensional. In the electronic age, however, the model is circuitry, which offers multiple, simultaneous connections, as in the analog computer, Telstar and world government.

In other words, explains the USCO group, while the old-fashioned, single-screen movie with its sequential, frame-after-frame progression, worked once, we now need simultaneous, multiple images. More than that, we need a new theatre that will provide a total art, a grand combination of media.

At the New Theatre the media are: a half dozen film and slide projectors which wander and blend images over a huge screen which fills the proscenium arch; two "analog projectors" which are forms of lumia or color-organs developed by Richard Aldcroft, four diffraction hexes which are boxes in which revolve hexagonal figures studded with diffraction gratings (they break up the light like a prism) two NO-NOW-OW boxes which flash those combinations of letters with much clicking, as in an electronic brain; one presentation oscilloscope the size of a TV set; a strobe light which danced behind the screen; several sound channels ranging from the Beatles to erotic breathing; as well as a live drummer and, for the opening moments of the session, sitting on mattresses amid the media, a live "voyager" and two "guides," one of whom would—if it were for real — go up, while the other remained down, to serve as ground control.

Enumerating the equipment does not indicate its effect. The experience, like a real one, was ineffable. The oscilloscope gave out wave forms, the analog projectors oozed phantasmagorias, the film and slide projectors beamed out Buddhas, traffic signs, trampoline leaps in slow motion, rocket launchings, living cells, a woman's body. At times you could look at everything all at once. At times nothing. Horror, boredom, ecstasy, mild amusement. Though for want of time, skill and money the presentation is amateurish, especially when compared with those masterpieces of multi-screen film at the Johnson's Wax and IBM World's Fair pavilions, the psychedelic theatre is tremendously ambitious, whether it turns you on or not.

"One reason artists experiment with psychedelics," says Dr. Melvin Roman, sculptor and assistant professor at Albert Einstein College of Medicine, "involves the kinds of pressures society puts on the artist to do what the ordinary human being can't do. Many artists are panicky. They are searching for some perhaps magical way to remain in touch with themselves and still comply with the irrational demands of society."

At the first of two discussions held recently at the Coda Gallery, currently showing an exhibit of psychedelic art, Dr. Roman joined several other mind doctors to evaluate the ways an artist might profit or suffer from psychedelics. Many of the doctors had not had the experience themselves and may perhaps have been too easily tempted to dismiss it as a crutch or short cut, to reject the art as (simply) sim to that produced by psychotic tients in a mental hospital. But next week at the Coda, the dis sion involved the artists themsel They insisted that art remains h work, that during the experience self they usually had no interest painting, that the experience ope up whole new realms, led to tot new self-conceptions, gave much spiration and material for work. artist who found great pleasure painting while high, said he tried to incorporate into his work pain of coming down or losing effects of the experience. Anot artist, dissenting from the general thusiasm, said he was probably better craftsman without psyc delics, inasmuch as the experie made him too anxious to mak statement.

On the first program, Dr. Ra Metzner of the Castalia Foundat complained about the traditio Western concept of the artist as individual engrossed in trying to press his own personality. Accord to Metzner, psychedelics might h the effect of renewing a more tr tional view of artistic work, in wh the artist remained anonymous, of a group whose major effort directed to turning on the viewer

At the New Theatre, Leary ad another slant to the possibilities psychedelics: "The problem in past has been how to achieve rele [from normal banality] but n visionary experience is available everybody. And the problem is h to come back, how to incorpor what you see on the trip into ev day life."

So far the art produced as a re or under the influence of drugs not seem of great importance. (Burroughs of modern painting Henri Michaux, who showed at Cordier and Ekstrom Gallery spring.) But something new is h pening, and it may be wise to pend judgment for the moment. ride with the Castalian rhetoric:

". . . the human race has come the juncture where it must dec whether to be content with the s jugation of the material world, or strive after the conquest of the s itual world, by subjugating self desires and transcending self-impo limitations."

Howard Junker is a documentary f maker who frequently contributes film magazines.

The Bouquet

I have been arranging a bouquet in the bus.
Certain basic ferns were already seated when I dreamed to look.

At bus stops, I choose my flowers one by one as they wander into my bouquet.

Each adds.
Here one flips her ticket rudely in the aisle and at once I am aware of whisky mixing with the hanging sweat, cologne and after-shave.

Each brings.
There a youth with blackened hands and muddy, unlaced boots — his whole face wilted in a sleep that snaps on a broken stem.

And when their streets bounce towards them they drop away, taking all that they have brought.

The bus moves on, carving itself brightly in and out of the night.

Phyllis Brooks

LOVESTONE

(Continued from page 16)

ind staffed by sixty-seven Ameri- ans and thirty locals, allocates arge sums for such projects as ousing, credit unions, cooperatives, nedical clinics, rural development, ven union halls. Safe unions south f the border can apply for money ither directly from AID's coffers r from AFL-CIO pension funds, uaranteed by AID. Fully one- ourth of AID's housing program of 250 million will be funneled hrough Doherty to unionists in atin America. The most impressive roject finished so far is in Mexico ity, where a $10 million loan elped build 3,104 units for mem- ers of the Graphic Arts Workers nion. In Honduras, work is being ompleted on a more modest venture f 185 apartments. Four other proj- cts are on the drawing boards.

According to Doherty's assistant, Villiam A. Douglas: "Until March, 964, we had only a small program n Brazil. We had no people to work vith there. But quite unexpectedly he revolution overthrew Goulart nd this changed." The projects de- artment was equipped to act uickly. It cajoled out of AID, mong other things, $150,000 to uild five peasant service centers n and near Recife, a focus of peas- nt hostility.

Someone who worked with AIFLD n Bolivia explained its operations o me this way: "By the definition f AIFLD anyone who wanted a aise was a Communist. Its whole urpose was to make the 120 or o men it trained into government upporters. It was willing to do omething for union men only if hey would kick the Communists ut of their union." By way of ex- mple, there existed a good legiti- nate union in the Bolivian railroad ndustry. But after AIFLD had rained a small group of railroad vorkers, the government decided o recognize this new force, led by ajines Ovando, as the official nion. By contrast, the tin miners, olivia's largest and most militant nion, could expect no help unless ney showed an inclination to re- uce the work force in the mines nd support the now defunct Paz stenssoro regime.

With AIFLD as its anchor, Mc- lellan running the Inter-American ection of the AFL-CIO, and friends n the foreign service who accept the Lovestone doctrine, the AFL-CIO is an instrument for intervention throughout the hemisphere. A dramatic example of unofficial diplomacy at work occurred in the Dominican Republic, where last April Donald Reid Cabral, then head of the ruling junta, conferred the Order of Duarte, Sanchez y Mella on Serafino Romualdi. The AFL-CIO group in the Dominican Republic is an organization called CONATRAL. A few weeks before the first democratically elected President in the country's history was overthrown, CONATRAL ran an ad in the newspapers calling on the people to put their faith in the "armed forces" to defend them against communism. While Ambassador John Bartlow Martin was fervidly supporting Bosch, the U.S. labor attaché, the late Fred A. Somerford, was guiding CONATRAL in anti-Communist diatribes which could only undermine Bosch, who was already accused of "softness on communism." It was an open secret that Somerford, once with the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, disagreed with official policy. An obituary on Somerford states that a year after Bosch's downfall "George Meany wrote a personal letter of commendation to the deceased for his outstanding contribution to the Democratic Labor Movement of the Dominican Republic." That is the Meany-Lovestone line — to combat any force that is considered "soft"— and the tragedy is that labor movements are so pivotal in revolts and counter-revolts that AFL-CIO strategy can sometimes be enough to tip the scales. It is no accident that Christian trade union forces in Latin America are so hostile to the AFL-CIO and to ORIT. This movement, increasingly revolutionary and independent, suspects anything that smacks of Yankee control. In July, 1964, the Trade Union Bureau of the Christian Democratic Party in Chile ordered its members to quit ORIT and avoid any collaboration with the AIFLD.

Wherever the Meany-Lovestone influence has injected itself, it has left behind a debris of schism and hostility. Now its attention is turning to Africa. With the recent formation of the African-American Labor Center (AALC) by Irving Brown, a stepped-up campaign on the model of AIFLD is in the making. The object of Brown's attention here is not so much the Communists, who are weak, as it is the neutralists. Since Lovestone considers neutralism an "aide-de-camp" of communism, it is understandable that he should want to contain it and roll it back.

The African labor organizations have therefore been unreceptive to AFL-CIO blandishments. "The Western trade unions," says John K. Tettegah, president of the Ghana Trade Union Congress, "have been treating us patronizingly, attempting to impose on us the way they run their own unions, even forgetting the bloody battles they had to fight to establish their rights. What do the Western trade union bureaucrats know about our struggles for freedom from colonial rule? We resent their condescending attitude." The Africans tend to be revolutionary, Socialist, neutralist in the cold war, and anti-capitalist. They consider the Europeans who control the ICFTU too phlegmatic in fighting colonialism and neo-colonialism. They consider the AFL-CIO leadership an apologist for American intervention in the Congo.

In 1957, Brown and William Schnitzler, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO, could report, after a trip to Africa, that African unionists were "looking to the democratic world" for guidance and support. About that time the ICFTU claimed twenty-one affiliates in African territories, with about 25 per cent of organized laborers on the continent. But a year later the number had fallen, according to Ghanaian sources, to 7 per cent. ICFTU secretary general, Omer Becu, admits that Western efforts have "not been as successful as we had hoped."

By contrast, Tettegah's All-African Trade Union Federation, formed in 1961, claims adherents in forty-five countries, with about 3 million members. It refuses to affiliate with either ICFTU or the left-wing World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). Admittedly, AATUF is not particularly active; many of its affiliates are appendages to one-party governments and perform only a minimum of collective bargaining. But the fact is that they want to go their own way, with "guidance" from neither Europe nor America. An article in a Ghana paper charges that the AFL-CIO and the ICFTU "tell African trade unionists to keep their noses out of politics and stick to sound book-keeping and bread-and-butter is-

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

A NEW JOURNAL

Are you tired of the old
"Left"-"Right" categories?
Do you seek scholarly, hard-hitting articles favoring liberty and peace?

Read LEFT AND RIGHT
85¢ a copy, $2.50 a year
BOX 395, CATHEDRAL STATION
New York, N. Y. 10025

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. A book by Bin Dir Woor, self-designated Symbolical World President. Claims: "unique, entrancing, epochal." Next to The Bible it should become a Holy Book for all mankind. Price $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 Seventh Avenue, N.Y.C.

Advertise Your Resorts
in* The Nation

FUN TO READ!

THE IDLER is a lively, individualistic liberal monthly that entertains as it informs. Warm humor and cold facts mixed into a pleasant, personal and personable journalistic pot.

Send $3.00 today for a year's subscription. Money back if not satisfied.

Discover THE IDLER and you will have made a new friend.

THE IDLER
125 Fifth St., N.E.
Washington 2, D. C.

Please send me a one year's subscription to THE IDLER. Enclosed is $3.00.

Name ....

Address ....

.................................Zip.........

sues. The fact is that the era of comparative class peace and conciliation in the metropolitan countries has been bought at the expense of grinding exploitation and bloody repression in the colonies." Americans and Europeans — the article says—are trying to train Africans in the rudiments of collective bargaining and grievance handling, as if they were living in a stable, industrial milieu. But the problems of Africa require national and social revolution, bold changes in social institutions, a spirit of radicalism rather than "class peace."

In this radical, anti-Western setting, Brown's AALC hopes to stimulate workers' education, vocational training, cooperatives, health clinics, housing—much in the style of AIFLD, except that there will be somewhat more emphasis on vocational training (a tailoring institution is now operating in Kenya and there is a school for motor drivers in Nigeria). There are no businessmen on the board of this foundation. The money will come, according to an AALC brochure, from "private and public institutions"; in other words, some from the AFL-CIO, most from AID and the United States Government.

The joint United States Government-labor beneficence, operating on the rigid Lovestone thesis, can result only in divisions within African labor along the same lines as the world itself is divided. The outlines are already visible. Here is an excerpt from the letter of a European unionist who works in the international field: "It is a well-known fact that Brown supported a man called Reuben Jamela in Southern Rhodesia who mounted an artificial national center with Brown's money."

And—who knows?—perhaps the AIFLD and AALC model will next be applied to Asia. Lovestone certainly is concerned about developments there. Last year Brown visited Vietnam to cement relations with Tran-Quoc Buu, president of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor. Buu, a moderate Christian unionist who fled from the Vietminh in the North, was also entertained in the United States under AFL-CIO auspices. The trip by Meany and Lovestone to Japan, for the founding conference of the conservative Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei) earlier this year, was an obvious attempt to counter the neutralist and leftist tendencies of the predominant labor feder tion, Sohyo.

American labor leaders ce
tainly have a right to express preference between foreign unio controlled by Communists or ne tralists and those with pro-Ame can sentiments And it is certain legitimate for them to offer gifts cars or mimeograph machines help the work of those they fav
But there is a line beyond whi such aid becomes interventio
What is intolerable is not that Lov
stone and company are anti-Co munist — virtually all unionists the United States, including the a thor, are philosophically opposed communism. What is intolerable the combative, deliberate attempt set off one type of foreign unioni against another in order to enhan the United States position in t cold war. What is intolerable is t deliberate attempt to mold a forei union in a barren "anti-Communis image.

Senator Morse said in a rece criticism of the United States ro in international affairs that our go ernment believes "that because military power its dictates arou
the world will have to be obeyed
Meany, Lovestone and their adhe ents believe that because of the dollars—now openly flowing fro the U.S. Treasury—unionists abro can also be made to line up.

Back in 1951, in a brash speec
George Meany listed A.F. of L. a complishments on the internation front. "Primarily due to our effort
he said, "there has been establishe
. . . the Force Ouvrière." In Ge many it "was the AFL which bro the Communist stranglehold on t trade unions." "Our European re resentative, Irving Brown, partic pated in cleaning the port of Ma seilles of Communist control." "W have established numerous contac with resistance movements" behi the iron curtain. "On the Chi mainland, we are aiding the unde ground democratic forces." (Em phasis added in all cases.)

Is it consistent with the principl of a democratic society for a sma clique of self-appointed men to i ject themselves into the affairs other nations? Would it be permi sible for the U.S. Chamber of Com merce to contribute to a Conserv
tive force in England to depose th
Labour Party? What gives the AF
CIO a prerogative that other instit tions don't—and shouldn't—have

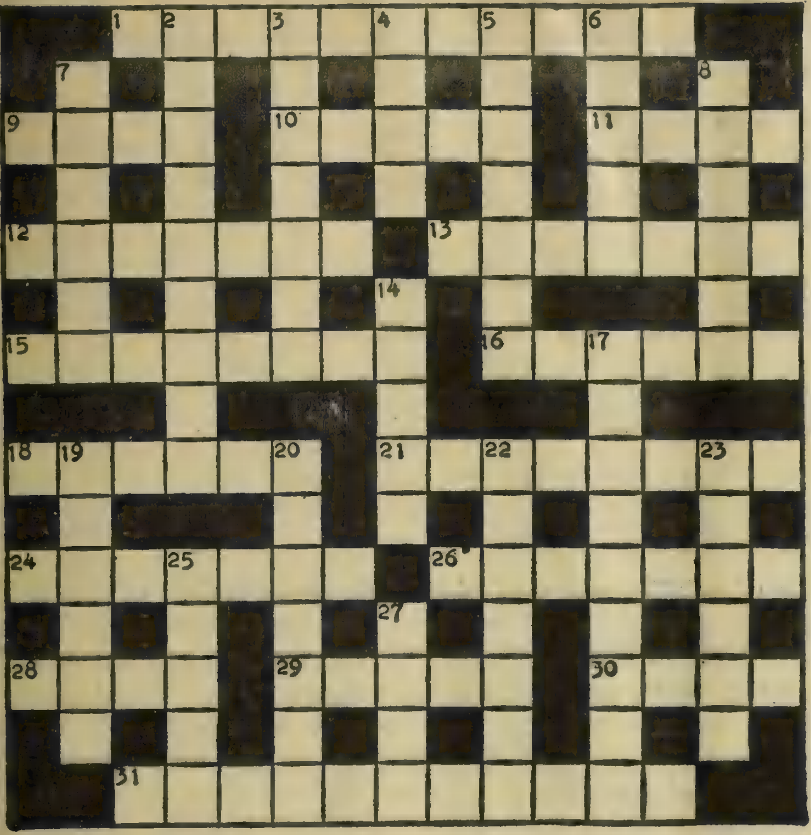
Crossword Puzzle No. 1113

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Get rid of the check—the gunnery officer and the forest ranger are each concerned with it. (4, 7)

9 See 10

0, 9 and 30 Calls on an old date and dines at the best spots for observation of the exhibition, perhaps. (8, 5)

1 Willingly change your way of life? (4)

2 Doctrine in time is appalling. (7)

3 Fowler, perhaps in the romantic role of an old aviator. (7)

5 Flower that makes the irregular army go in? (8)

6 Might be dangerous to shoot them in a grand place possibly connected with a suite. (6)

8 Just takes a second, and remembers the face. (6)

1 Your wife might ask you why you got this, and the answer might be to expose something to the sun's rays. (8)

4 Might be taken to be like a long-suffering audience. (7)

6 and 28 Starts 10 to 1, perhaps, and finishes in the miscellaneous category. (4, 3, 4)

9 Poe's type of rhyme? (5)

0 See 10 across

1 See 3 down

DOWN:

2 The rest isn't easy for one, so he might as well be 31. (9)

3 8 down and 31 across How is this supposed to make one? Well, well-off for another attribute, and aware. (5, 2, 3, 3, 5, 2, 4)

4 Has what is irregularly sown. (4)

5 Sat up to row, making it in one sense more pleasant. (7)

6 Made a slipper out of a sticky thing? (5)

7 Barely getting in front of the border? (6)

8 See 3 down

14 A follower of Antisthenes, recognizable in his more fancy nickname. (5)

17 Should maintain a base below the capital, and supports the utmost inside. (9)

19 How one gets to know a king at the poles. (6)

20 Not too many cut the one with the scar. (7)

22 Where a racing driver's companion might hang out for a drink. (7)

23 Net returns, broken out and held.

25 An electrician would be least disturbed by it. (5)

27 One perhaps finding it inferior to international organization? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1112

ACROSS: 1 Carrying on; 6 Stud; 10 Navarre; 11 Errands; 12 Ears; 13 Blasphemer; 15 Bretons; 16 Perturb; 17 Rhubarb; 20 Ocarina; 22 Butternuts; 23 Peri; 25 Lamella; 26 Elegiac; 27 Soda; 28 Rifle range. DOWN: 1 Canterbury bells; 2 and 24 Reverse gear; 3 Yard; 4 Needles; 5 Opens up; 7 Tinamou; 8 Describe a circle; 9 Arthurian 14 Donatello; 18 Untamed; 19 Bengali; 20 Outsell; 21 Iberian.

EDUCATIONAL

JEWISH YOUTH AGES 18-26!
Hechalutz Farm in Hightstown, N. J. — the only training farm for kibbutz life in Israel is offering resident scholarships. Successful candidates will receive help with their passage to Israel. Apply: Hechalutz Scholarship Program, Hechalutz Farm, Hightstown, N. J., or 112 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. ■ Tel.: GR 3-2420.

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE
A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, books. Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES

EXCLUSIVE FRANCHISE

Amazing new liquid plastic coating used on all types of surfaces interior or exterior. Eliminates waxing when applied on Asphalt Tile, Vinyl, Linoleum, Vinyl Asbestos, Hard Wood, and Furniture. Completely eliminates painting when applied to Wood, Metal, or Concrete surfaces. This finish is also recommended for boats and automobiles.

NO COMPETITION

As these are exclusive formulas in demand by all businesses, industry and homes. No franchise fee. Minimum investment—$300. Maximum investment — $7,000. Investment is secured by inventory. Factory trained personnel will help set up your business.

For complete details and descriptive literature write:

CHEM-PLASTICS & PAINT CORP.
1828 Locust St. Louis 3, Mo.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

FIGHT the tyranny of the vending machines. Send one dollar for fifty "out of order" stickers to: R. Cenedella, P.O. Box 287, Planetarium Station, N. Y. City 10024.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

FREE!

With every new subscription to

THE NATION

PAINTING IN OUR TIME

by Maurice Grosser

Maurice Grosser is a painter, critic of painting and unrivaled guide to the society of artists. His book, thus, is a stimulating mixture of aesthetic propositions, technical instructions, insights into the museums and market places and anecdotes about colleagues and masters. Painting in public, the snares of water color, the problems of subject matter, a painter's training, the desirability of a messy pallette, patrons and parasites — these are only a few of the subjects that have attracted the attention of a man surveying his art and his contemporaries. Mr. Grosser is a commentator with the strength of mind to hold firm convictions and the grace to express them in terms that are both generous and witty.

> "This book shines and sparkles because it has been cut, faceted, polished and composed of the hardest materials. It is one of the few books on painting by a painter practicing his craft today which is neither prejudiced nor spiteful."
> —Lincoln Kirstein, New York Herald Tribune
>
> "A highly literate, intelligent, and frequently funny account of one painter's reactions to such artistic problems as patrons, museums, people who sit for portraits and so on."
> —The New Yorker
>
> "The opinionated, good-natured monologue that you might expect from an intelligent, articulate artist. . . . Mr. Grosser has gleefully injected into the debate on modern art a score of controversial subjects, including how to frame a picture, why the academic tradition is sterile, or whether the world would not be better if it were run by artists."
> —William Germain Dooley, The New York Times

For your FREE copy of PAINTING IN OUR TIME, fill out subscription coupon below, and start receiving THE NATION, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of PAINTING IN OUR TIME.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

7-5-65

THE
NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

JULY 19, 1965 . . 35c

BERKELEY PUBLIC LIBRARY
1965

THE PENTAGON'S DILEMMA

GOLIATH and the GUERRILLA

Eric Hobsbawm

'65 SCHWERING

Global Tremors from Algeria

Alexander Werth

The Question of SNCC

Jack Newfield

STRATFORD ACCEPTS SHAKESPEARE

Julius Novick

LETTERS

Birthday

Washington, D.C.
Dear Sirs: The Nation's 100th birthday is an event of national and even international importance and properly an occasion for rejoicing. . . . That a publication militantly independent, courageous and free can endure through the critical eras of world wars and economic disaster and maintain its fearless role of dissent and high quality of expression is a triumph of hopefulness for attainment of the goals to which mankind must continually aspire. . . . I consider myself fortunate indeed to have been one of its editors on two occasions. . . . May The Nation's spirit and high purpose continue unflagging for the next century. Sen. Ernest Gruening

Two Rivers, Wis.
Dear Sirs: The birthday greetings you printed in your July 5 number remind me of a statement most appropriate, made by Edmund Burke:

> All that is necessary for the forces of evil to win the world is for enough good men to do nothing.

The good men and women who expose the forces of evil in your admirable magazine are one of the safeguards of our liberties and decency. May you prosper and grow even more effective in the next 100 years!

Lee H. Gregory
Joseph Mann Library

World bore

Palo Alto, Calif.
Dear Sirs: Some will thank you for dedicating your June 28 issue to the UN on its 20th Anniversary. Yet this issue was a bore because the UN is a bore, a fact I first realized when I dropped in on the funereal proceedings at the Opera House. (The counter-commemoration on the sidewalks across the street by those opposing the Vietnam war was much more lively and better attended.)

Here we heard President Johnson call upon the UN diplomats to "use their influence . . . to bring to the tables those who seem determined to make war" (as though he himself were not the most determined of all!). . . . Yet this fantastically cynical and hypocritical speech was applauded! On the other hand, the Russian delegate Federenko was booed when he made a quietly reasonable reply, and Adlai Stevenson's flippant dismissal of Federenko was applauded. Apparently the jackals know who butters their bread. Why would anyone advocate the strengthening of such a group? . . .

I would hate to be such a pessimist as to think this organization as it exists today is our only hope for peace. Indeed, those of us who want peace with justice must cease hovering over this defunct dream, waiting for it to play Lazarus, and should seek some more hopeful solution to the world's problems. At the very least, we must call for the relocation of the UN headquarters to remove the intimidating influence of a partisan U.S. audience.

V. Hanly

Private test

New York City
Dear Sirs: Robert Hatch writes [The Nation, June 21] that his "private test for the validity of the Lincoln Center Repertory under its new management is how soon it schedules Sergeant Musgrave's Dance." It would be a boon if all standards prove so congenial.

Actually Sergeant Musgrave needs neither a Broadway stage nor, as Mr. Hatch suggests, the resources of Lincoln Center, but merely the right will at the right time. We would like another crack at the play on our new stage but we passed Mr. Hatch's test several years ago in San Francisco —when we introduced John Arden to America.

As soon as we came to New York we tried to secure the rights again, but no sooner did we show interest than a dormant production announced itself in the press. On the off-chance that the producer changes his mind, let it be known we are ready and available.

Herbert Blau
Jules Irving
The Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center

Origin of violence

Long Beach, Calif.
Dear Sirs: What a pertinent coincidence! John Paul Scott writes in "The Anatomy of Violence" [The Nation, June 21]: "In short, the major cause of outbreaks of destructive violence in animals is acute social disorganization." In the very next article, "Teach-Ins: New Force for the Times," Arnold S. Kaufman quotes Walter Lippmann as follows: "The essential fact about these disorders is that they are at bottom indigenous to the countries where the social order is broken down, not originally, not essentially, conspiracies engineered from the centers of Communist power." Samuel Whitman

Catching up

Godfrey, Ill.
Dear Sirs: Please, another correction concerning The Young Guard. It is not, as you erroneously reported in your editorial, "The Smell of Bond" (April 12), an organ of Young Americans for Freedom. It is also not, as you were corrected by Hashomer Hatzair, a publication issued by YAF with the same name as one published by the Zionist-Socialist group. For fact, Young Americans for Freedom's magazine is called The New Guard.

I swear it! I read The New Guard because I believe its political philosophy. I also read The Nation because I believe it is one of the best written publications on the market. Thanks to American freedom we are allowed to read either or both sides of any issue. John Boland

THE
NATION

Monday, July 19, 1965
Volume 201, No. 2

In this issue

EDITORIALS
29

ARTICLES
31 Global Tremors from Algeria
Alexander Werth
33 The Pentagon's Dilemma: Goliath and the Guerrilla
Eric Hobsbawm
38 The Question of SNCC
Jack Newfield
41 North Dakota Runs Down
Albert Stern

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
42 The American View of Life
Alan Trachtenberg
45 Theatre
Julius Novick
46 Listen Galaxea (poem)
Alvaro Cardona-Hine
47 Music
Benjamin Boretz
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 48)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, July 19, 1965. Vol. 201, No. 2

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

EDITORIALS

Goliath's Peril

Eric Hobsbawm's article on guerrilla warfare (p. 33) should be required reading in the White House and in the Pentagon. In the Pentagon population especially there are a certain number of military men and civilian advisers who are not hidebound by profession. At some juncture, as the Vietnamese horror drags on, and American casualties mount with no end in sight, misgivings might be reinforced by something Hobsbawn said.

What is to be noted is that all the belligerents in Southeast Asia, and their supporters near and far, are endangered, and the United States not least. At the end of his article Hobsbawm warns that the United States will either come to terms with reality in that corner of the world (and if it can do it there it can do it elsewhere) or "sooner or later it will blast off those missiles." The missiles are not nuclear now, nor need they be for some time, but the nuclear denouement is in plain sight. The Strategic Air Command is already bombing in South Vietnam, partly because it wanted to get into the act, but also as a matter of military policy consonant with Lyndon B. Johnson's character and mode of operation. At first it seemed absurd to send B-52s to bomb jungle areas in which the population density of Vietcong could only be small, and in which there were no targets that could be detected visually or by radar. But this was to mistake the purpose of SAC's participation. Any damage to the Vietcong that resulted would be incidental—the real target was and is Red China. The Chinese probably were not under the impression that the B-52s could carry only nuclear bombs, as Joseph Alsop has suggested; aircraft of this load capacity can be adapted for any type of explosive, or drop rocks if desired. But Alsop is right when he argues that in assigning priority to nuclear development, the Chinese have given hostages to fortune, hostages, moreover, which must be well-nigh irresistible to the American military elite and their political colleagues. The precise coordinates of the Chinese nuclear installations are known, and the chances are that the plants are not sufficiently hardened to survive conventional bombing, which can be applied on a scale much larger than in World War II. In this respect the Chinese have more to lose than in the Korean War, and that danger probably accounts, at least in part, for their failure to suit the action to the word. For its part, the Pentagon strategists would like nothing better than for the Chinese to give them grounds for a series of strikes against the nuclear plants.

That would not be the end, but the beginning. The Chinese would have lost their gamble in going nuclear, but they would still have enough military strength to threaten all of Southeast Asia, India, Hong Kong, etc. Millions of American ground troops would be required to contain these hordes (the favorite Pentagon term), and nuclear weapons would be the only way of doing the job cheaply. And that would be the slide into nuclear war, for the Soviet Union and the United States, and for those allies who were not quick enough and fortunate enough to extricate themselves.

Ring Loud the Tocsin!

A substantial section of the journalistic trade continues to improvise on the theme that the United States stands in mortal danger of being subverted by domestic Communists. Apparently there is no protection, however diligently the writers seek out the hidden foe and rally alarmed citizens to the country's defense. The greatest present peril, it seems, comes from an unexpected quarter. The Old Bolsheviks are passing from the scene, but their offspring carry on with redoubled virulence. Read all about it in a series of articles by Vera Glaser, syndicated by the North American Newspaper Alliance and inserted in the Congressional Record — Senate, June 14, by the Hon. Roman L. Hruska (Goldwater R., Neb.).

Mrs. Glaser describes how "Moscow-inspired agitators have fastened like evil parasites on the civil rights and Vietnam controversies." These young demons carry the torch but no party cards, and usually call themselves progressives, Socialists or Marxists. Under such labels they dupe their contemporaries, largely at the colleges, and at the same time avoid prosecution under the Smith and McCarran Acts. Mrs. Glaser names names, and it seems evident that the parents have been more successful with their children than with the American working class.

So the virus spreads. It is enough to sicken one with higher education. Indeed, if Louis Harris' recent poll on the motivation behind the campus teach-ins is an indication, a split is opening up between the college-bred and the less schooled. Asked, "Do you think the disagreement of college professors and students with U.S. policies in Vietnam is mainly the result of honest disagreement, or do you think it is mainly the result of organized radical activity in colleges today?" 81 per cent of college students thought honest differences were involved, and only 19 per cent blamed radicals. (There were no "not-sures," which is unusual in public-opinion polls.) Among college graduates the split was 58/30, with 12 per cent uncertain. But those with only a high school education voted almost exactly the opposite (27/57/16), along with grade school graduates and dropouts (29/54/17). Non-collegians tended to be sure the radicals were at the bottom of it all. There was also a sharp split between age groups: citizens younger than 34 responded 56/31/13 in favor of honest disagreement, while those over 50 perceived the cloven hoof of radicalism in the ratio of 25/64/11.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated Aug. 2, Aug. 16 and Aug. 30.

Mr. Harris concludes that "chasms and splits are beginning to take place along political and intellectual lines," triggering "a profoundly new division in American society whose final consequences are yet to emerge." If the spawn of the Old Bolsheviks have so shaken American society, one might suspect that it was shaky to begin with, but the oracles of doom may decide that all is not yet lost. They can pin their hopes on those other young people, largely college students, who rioted over the Fourth of July weekend. These exuberant if destructive youngsters have resisted the virus and just want to fight the cops, which Mrs. Glaser and Senator Hruska can welcome as good preparation for the holocaust in Asia that the teenage leftists, and some of their professors, are so traitorously resisting.

Relevancies and Irrelevancies

The real or rumored vices and virtues of every American President are a favorite topic of conversation in latrines, living rooms and board rooms—and in editorial offices. The topic is one naturally favored by political writers, since it will always find readers, but the result usually has no more significance than fan-magazine psychologizing about the latest adulteries among movie stars. One of the President's roles is, in fact, to be the country's leading entertainer. A certain percentage of voters view him from no other standpoint. Another, probably smaller, segment doesn't care much one way or the other about the Presidential personality, but judges him by his policies and actions. There is, nevertheless, some interplay between the personal and political images; applied to the current tenant of the White House, this means that how he looks to a particular viewer on television may depend on how that viewer feels about U.S. policy in Vietnam. Any other hot topic will have the same effect.

After the death of President Kennedy, Mr. Johnson rode a wave of popularity compounded of sympathy for a human being catapulted without warning into an office which calls rather for divine attributes, and a feeling of relief that government proceeded as before. A subsequent wave of relief followed the defeat of Senator Goldwater. But, as Tom Wicker points out in The New York Times, no political honeymoon can last. Disillusionment is setting in, and since politics is not only the art of the possible but also the art of the extravagant, Mr. Johnson's faults will no doubt be overemphasized, as they were underemphasized earlier. His sensitivity to criticism, the public sweetness which conceals a private rudeness verging o brutality, the evangelism which alternates with tot reliance on force, are now being played up by som of the commentators. But these qualities were we known long before John F. Kennedy chose Mr. John son as his running mate in 1960. It is only that fiercer light beats upon the man in the Presidenc than the man in the Senate, and of course the ma himself is enlarged, for better or worse, by the offic

What harms Mr. Johnson's image most, in th eyes of the intellectual community, or that part o it which inclines toward social criticism and dissent is simply the war in Vietnam. Mr. Johnson's over reaction in the Dominican Republic tends to the sam effect, but not to the same degree. The bombings i North and South Vietnam, against only token opposition so far, the spectacle of the greatest military powe in the world self-righteously destroying a small country, belie the traditional picture of a benevolent Uncl Sam—and Mr. Johnson is Uncle Sam personified This is not the age of chivalry, but one does not nee to be a pacifist or a bleeding heart to find our rol in Vietnam utterly revolting. No one really cares how Mr. Johnson behaves toward the White House staff except the members of the staff, and if Mr. Johnson can devise a way to end the slaughter in Vietnam he will find that the problem of his public image will solve itself—and without recourse to flattering endorsements by friendly journalists.

A Kind of Charity

Ed Ball, the roly-poly dictator of the du Pont's billion-dollar empire in Florida [see "Florida's Railroad War: A Few Sticks of Dynamite" by Robert G. Sherrill, The Nation, March 9, 1964], has finally been pinned down on one of the tax maneuvers for which he is famous. His St. Joe Paper Co., hub of a million acres of du Pont timberland, has admitted undervaluing its stocks and bonds for tax purposes by $90 million from 1962 through 1964.

The testimony given before Rep. Wright Patman's banking committee last year to this effect was correct and should have been pursued more enthusiastically by Congress. Miami Mayor Robert King High testified that the paper company was welching on its taxes. Ball denied it. Florida Comptroller Ray Green sided with Ball. Now, after a lapse of a year and after continued prodding by a couple of Florida newspapers, Green (who, by the way, is in partnership with Ball in an insurance company) admits that further study of the du Pont books shows that, sure enough, they were shortchanging the tax collector. This, by Green's admission, was the first time in thirty years that the state has looked into the du Pont books. The shortage was termed "an honest mistake." Thus, the first lesson to be learned from this turn of events is that if Ball is to be held in check, it must be done at the federal level; Florida officials are either afraid of him or in league with him.

The second thing it teaches is that Representative

Patman, whose committee is once again considering ways for bringing the du Pont estate under the Bank Holding Act, from which it was curiously excluded in 1956, cannot put full faith in anything Ball tells him until he has it checked. The du Pont estate claims to be a charitable venture; those thirty banks, those two railroads, that telephone company, that paper company — all operated fundamentally for charity? Last year Ball's sister, Mrs. Jessie du Pont, earned $9 million from the estate and only $1 million was marked for charity. This imbalance, this mere tithing, is alone enough to discredit all claims for special treatment. But considering what was disclosed when just a little investigation was made into the du Pont estate's handling of its taxes, there seems very good reason to study the details of its "charity."

An Old Myth Fades

The end of the Mexican bracero (imported farm labor) program last December triggered the usual spate of stories about how California's perishable produce crops would "rot in the fields" for lack of workers to harvest them. Sen. George Murphy — a one-time excellent soft-shoe dancer and now the state's junior Senator—estimated crop losses of perhaps $1 billion. The season is not over, but it now seems clear that the effect on the state's $3.6 billion farm economy has been slight. "The state's growers in general," reports Harry Bernstein in the Los Angeles Times, "have weathered the bracero program's end without the predicted disastrous results."

Financially they have fared very well indeed. Rumors of the threatened—and widely publicized—labor shortage had the effect of advancing prices for some crops. Farm wage rates have shown a substantial increase, but this increase, coupled with improvements in working conditions, brought some 20,000 more workers into the fields than had been expected. Lettuce prices have advanced, but the increase cannot be attributed to the shortage of farm labor; the higher wages represent no more than one-half of 1 per cent for each head of lettuce. Actually, the lettuce crop was up substantially over last year and the shipper-growers declared a "shipping holiday" to prevent a glut on the market. For a time they were harvesting only four days a week and the effect was to force prices up. Later in the season, there may be some labor shortages but thus far the transition has been effected with at the most mild inconvenience and minimum losses. Asparagus growers, who suffered some crop losses because of labor shortages, will actually gross about $2.5 million more this year than last and net about $1 million more. And the economy of the state, due to the increase in farm wage rates, should be stimulated. Social myths like old soldiers never die; but this year's experience in California indicates that one of the hoariest of myths—"the-crops-will-rot-in-the-fields-unless-we-get-cheap-imported-labor"—is fading away.

Global Tremors from Algeria . . .

Alexander Werth

Paris

On July 3, exactly a fortnight after the sudden overthrow of Ben Bella, Mr. Rheda Malek, the new Algerian Ambassador to France, presented his credentials to General de Gaulle. Malek had been appointed while Ben Bella was still in power. The meeting was cold and very formal. There were many reasons, said de Gaulle, why France felt an interest in and sympathy for Algeria. It understood the various difficulties with which the newly independent Algeria was faced and, whatever the ups and downs, would continue to help. Malek said in reply that the last three years had shown that France and Algeria "needed each other," and that their cooperation was "possible, desirable and highly promising." Leaving the Elysée, he declared that the meeting with de Gaulle had been "most cordial." It was nothing of the sort.

Of course, France "needs" Algeria, insofar as it owns a large part of that country's oil; but Algeria "needs" France even more: French subsidies are what have kept Algeria going, and the "co-operation" (which is the Gaullist euphemism for this aid) has been very much a one-way affair.

De Gaulle, who had a soft spot for Ben Bella, expected the Afro-Asian conference to provide a sort of apotheosis for the Algerian President, displaying him as one of the most prominent figures, perhaps even the most prominent of the "Third World." It was known that Ben Bella had at one stage played with the idea of inviting as honorary guests to this Second Bandung only three non-Afro-Asian leaders: Castro, Tito — and de Gaulle. The Chinese apparently objected, and the idea was dropped. Nevertheless, de Gaulle continued to regard Ben Bella as his chief contact man with the underdeveloped countries, and his coming triumph well suited the General. But it did not suit Colonel Boumedienne and countless other Algerian politicians. After Ben Bella's domination of the Second Bandung, after the immense popularity he would have acquired from the international Youth Festival in Algiers planned for this month, after the prestige of his meeting with de Gaulle, scheduled for a little later in the year, it would have been extremely difficult to get rid of him. Ben Bella's overthrow, only a few days before the Second Bandung, was a now-or-never project.

Algeria is, as one French economist put it, an "increasingly underdeveloped country," with appalling unemployment and poverty. And yet, paradoxically, Ben Bella continued to be popular with the common people. To them he was a hero—one of the organizers of the revolt against the French in 1954, a man who had spent six years in French jails, and who had, since then, "imposed" himself on the outside world. Ben Bella had made an effective appearance before the UN, he enjoyed the friendship of the Russians and of Nasser, was a Hero of the Soviet Union, had won for Algeria a special place among the Third World countries and from Gaullist France the most friendly and generous "cooperation." At home, he behaved like a dictator, but not like a bloodthirsty one; many had been fired or arrested, but almost no one had been executed under the Ben Bella regime.

But he had failed to build up a coherent party; rather like de Gaulle, he thought he was deriving sufficient strength from his "communion" with the people. He had contempt for his fellow politicians, treating them as pawns in his political game. Although, two days before his fall, he still declared in a speech at Oran that "our Socialist regime is more united than ever," those in the know were aware that something was brewing below the surface. Boumedienne, head of the army, had helped to defeat Ben Khedda and to install Ben Bella in 1962; but for the last two years, the colonel had been building up his political strength, winning over more and more of those men who seemed to be Ben Bella's friends and supporters. In reality, as Le Monde put it, Ben Bella was, toward the end, surrounded by men who were "enemies and courtiers" — usually both — and his downfall was a kind of Shakespearean drama of treason and cowardice. Ben Bella suspected treachery; he intended to sack two of Boumedienne's stooges in his immediate entourage — Bouteflika, his foreign minister, and Cherif Belkacem, his minister of education—and, later, to get rid of Boumedienne himself. But he was not unduly worried about the army, for the people were anti-militarist, judging the army to be both reactionary and economically overprivileged, and he thought he had friends there, above all, the chief of staff, Tahar Zbiri. However, it was Zbiri who personally arrested Ben Bella in the night of June 18-19.

With the departure of Ben Bella, Algeria was no longer the "pilot nation" of the Third World. There were no major riots against Boumedienne's coup d'état (for Boumedienne, though hated by the people, was also feared); but there were just enough disorders and demonstrations to make the meeting of the Second Bandung in Algiers impossible. The students protested, and so did the irrepressible street kids of Algiers. Somebody—the Egyptians, Boumedienne's people say—even caused an explosion in the building where the Second Bandung Conference was to take place. For several days there was complete international chaos. The Chinese, determined that the Afro-Asian conference should take place, hastened to recognize the Boumedienne regime; students in Algiers thereupon publicly burned the Chinese flag. The Chinese were in bad company: Syria was the only Arab country that hastened to recognize Boumedienne; among the few other "Bandung" powers to do so were South Vietnam, Indonesia and Ethiopia. To this day the nine African states of the Commonwealth have not acknowledged the new regime. Boumedienne's relations with Egypt are particularly strained, since Nasser was alleged to have surrounded Ben Bella by countless "advisers." Nasser's plea for Ben Bella's life met with stony silence from Algeria's new rulers, and no one on the outside knows whether he is alive or not. If Nasser is angry, the Russians are at least much perturbed. Boumedienne has made it clear that he intends to pursue an "Islamic form of socialism from above," an approach which has nothing in common with Marxism; he has expelled the correspondent of the Communist L'Humanité and closed down the Algiers office of the Cuban news agency.

The Chinese realized belatedly that they had made a mistake in recognizing Boumedienne; they had been willing to pay almost any price to save the Afro-Asian conference—where they hoped to show up Russia's "dishonest" policy in Vietnam. But by eliminating Ben Bella and by provoking demonstrations which made it impossible to hold the Afro-Asian conference in Algiers, Boumedienne has struck what may be a fatal blow to "Second Bandung." It has now been "postponed" until November 5, but it seems extremely doubtful that if it is held at all, the conference will convene at Algiers. Ben Bella had successfully groomed himself as the spokesman of "the whole of Africa." Boumedienne appears to have no international ambitions. He is a hard, fanatical Mosle hostile, as one French paper put "to all Western ideologies, a above all, to Marxism." Alrea there are signs that the emanci tion of women, which Ben Be wholeheartedly supported, is s fering a setback. (Thousands women vociferously protested t coup d'état.)

The new Algerian leader dislik Ben Bella's "self-managemen technique, closely modeled on th of Yugoslavia, and stands for more rigid kind of "state soci ism"; one of his few assets is t relative economic success of t state farms run by the army. F all his fanatical dedication Islam, he wants to ingratiate hi self with the West by pursuing sharply anti-Communist policy. Ben Bella appeared to be pro-Ru sian (and pro-Nasser), rather th pro-Chinese, Boumedienne is ne ther. In one of his rare statemen he stressed the need for still clos "cooperation" with France, despi de Gaulle's obvious distaste for th changes in Algeria. The American it seems, think they can cash in o this very curious situation. As Jea Daniel writes in Le Nouvel Obse vateur, they are already "tactlessl trying to exploit the anti-commu nism of the Boumedienne grou and in a way that "can only com promise them"; American diplomat are in close contact with Boumed enne and much has been made c the 12,000 tons of American whea which was refused to Egypt bu has now been sent to Algeria.

Algeria will be interesting t watch in the next few months. I seems to be finished as the pivota nation of the Third World. Wil it in fact abandon "socialism" Some are already saying that Be Bella (like Peron in the Argentine will remain (whether dead o alive) the hero of the underdog— of whom there are millions in Al geria. Will Boumedienne be mor successful than Ben Bella in th economic field? Finally, will Al geria, like so many other places i Africa, become the scene of more or less discreet competitio between France and the Unite States? Meantime, as a result primarily of internal Algerian rivalries, a conference of perhaps the most far-reaching consequences in Vietnam and elsewhere has been "postponed," and the Third World itself has entered a period of acute crisis.

The Pentagon's Dilemma

GOLIATH AND THE GUERRILLA

Eric Hobsbawn

London

Three things have won conventional wars in this century: greater reerves of manpower, greater indusrial potential, and a reasonably unctioning system of civilian administration. The strategy of the United States in the past two decades has been based on the hope hat the second of these (in which it is supreme) would offset the first, n which the USSR was believed to have the edge. This theory was based on faulty arithmetic in the days when the only war envisaged was one against Russia, for the Warsaw Pact powers have no greater population than NATO. The West was merely more reluctant to mobilize its manpower in conventional ways. However, at present the argument is probably more valid, for some of the Western states (like France) will almost certainly stay neutral in any world war that is likely, and China alone has more men than all the Western powers likely to fight in concert. At all events, whether the arguments were right or wrong, the United States has since 1945 put its money entirely on the superiority of its industrial power, on its capacity to throw into a war more machinery and more explosives than anyone else.

Consequently, it has been badly shaken to discover that a new method of winning wars has been developed in our time, and that it more than offsets the organization and industrial power of conventional military operations. That is guerrilla war, and the number of Goliaths who have been felled by Davids with slingshots is now very impressive: the Japanese in China, the Germans in wartime Yugoslavia, the British in Israel, the French in Indo-China and Algeria. At present the United States itself is undergoing the same treatment in South Vietnam. Hence the anguished attempts to pit bombs against small men behind trees, or to discover the gimmick (for surely there must be one?) which allows a few thousand ill-armed peasants to hold at bay the greatest military power on earth. Hence also the simple refusal to believe that it can be so. If the United States is baffled it must be due to some other—measurable and bombable—reason: to the aggressive North Vietnamese, who actually sympathize with their Southern brothers and smuggle trickles of supplies to them; to the terrible Chinese who have the nerve to possess a common border with North Vietnam; and no doubt eventually to the Russians. Before common sense flies completely out of the window, it is therefore worth taking a look at the nature of modern guerrilla war.

There is nothing new about operations of a guerrilla type. Every peasant society is familiar with the "noble" bandit or Robin Hood who "takes from the rich to give to the poor" and escapes the clumsy traps of soldiers and policemen until he is betrayed. For as long as no peasant will give him away and as long as plenty will tell him about the movements of his enemies, he really is as immune to hostile weapons and as invisible to hostile eyes as the legends and songs about such bandits invariably claim.

Both the reality and the legend are to be found in our age, literally from China to Peru. Like the military resources of the bandit, those of the guerrilla are the obvious ones: elementary armaments reinforced by a detailed knowledge of difficult and inaccessible terrain, mobility, physical endurance superior to that of the pursuers, but above all a refusal to fight on the enemy's terms, in concentrated force, and face to face. But the guerrilla's major asset is nonmilitary and without it he is helpless: he must have the sympathy and support, active and passive, of the local population. Any Robin Hood who loses it is dead, and so is any guerrilla. Every textbook of guerrilla warfare begins by pointing this out, and it is the one thing that military instruction in "counterinsurgency" cannot teach.

The main difference between the ancient, and in most peasant societies endemic, form of band operation and the modern guerrilla is that the Robin Hood type of social bandit has extremely modest and limited military objectives (and usually only a very small and localized force). The test of a guerrilla group comes when it sets itself such ambitious tasks as the overthrow of a political regime or the expulsion of a regular force of occupiers, and especially when it sets out to do this not in some remote corner of a country (the "liberated area") but over an entire national territory. Until the early 20th century hardly any guerrilla movements faced this test: they operated in extremely inaccessible and marginal regions — mountain country is the commonest example — or opposed relatively primitive and inefficient governments, native or foreign. Guerrilla actions have sometimes played an important part in major modern wars, either alone in exceptionally favorable conditions, as with the Tyrolese against the French in 1809, or more usually, as ancillaries to regular forces—during the Napoleonic Wars, for example, or in our century in Spain and Russia. However, by themselves and for any length of time, they almost certainly had little more than nuisance value, as in Southern Italy, where Napoleon's French were never seriously inconvenienced by them. That may be one reason why they did not much preoccupy military thinkers until the 20th century. Another reason, which may explain why even revolutionary soldiers did not think much about them, was that practically all effective guerrillas were ideologically conservative, even if socially rebellious. Few peasants had been converted to left-wing political views or followed left-wing political leaders.

---

Eric Hobsbawm, a Reader in History at the University of London, is the author of Age of Revolution: 1789-1848 (World) and Social Bandits and Primitive Rebels (Free Press).

The novelty of modern guerrilla war, therefore, is not so much military. The guerrillas of today may have at their disposal much better equipment than did their predecessors, but they are still invariably much worse armed than their opponents (they derive a large part of their armament — in the early stages, probably most of it—from what they can capture, buy or steal from the other side, and not, as Pentagon folklore holds, from foreign supplies). Until the ultimate phase of guerrilla war, when the guerrilla force becomes an army, and may actually face and defeat its adversaries in open battle, as at Dienbienphu, there is nothing in the purely military pages of Mao, Vo Nguyen Giap, Che Guevara or other manuals of guerrilla warfare, which a traditional guerrillero or band leader would regard as other than simple common sense.

The novelty is political, and it is of two kinds. First, situations are now more common when the guerrilla force can rely on mass support in widely different areas of its country. It does so in part by appealing to the common interest of the poor against the rich, the oppressed against the government; and in part by exploiting nationalism or the hatred of foreign occupiers (often of another color). It is, once again, only the folklore of military experts that "peasants want only to be left alone." They don't. When they have no food, they want food; when they have no land, they want land; when they are cheated by the officials of a remote capital, they want to get rid of them. But above all they want rights as men and, when ruled by foreigners, to get rid of the foreigners. One ought to add that an effective guerrilla war is possible only in countries in which such appeals can be successfully made to a high percentage of the rural population in a high proportion of the country's territory. One of the major reasons for the defeat of guerrilla war in Malaya and Kenya was that these conditions did not obtain: the guerrillas were drawn almost entirely from among the Chinese or Kikuyu, whereas the Malays (the rural majority) and the rest of Kenya remained largely outside the movement.

The second political novelty is the nationalization not only of support for the guerrillas but of the guerrilla force itself, by means of parties and movements of national and sometimes international scope. The partisan unit is no longer a purely local growth; it is a body of permanent and mobile cadres around whom the local force is formed. They link it with other units into a "guerrilla army" capable of nation-wide strategy and of being transformed into a "real" army. They also link it with the noncombatant national movement in general, and the politically decisive cities in particular. This implies a fundamental change in the character of such forces; it does not mean that guerrilla armies are now composed of hard-core revolutionaries infiltrated from outside. However numerous and enthusiastic the volunteers, the outside recruitment of guerrillas is limited partly by technical considerations, partly because many potential recruits, especially from among city intellectuals and workers, are simply not qualified; they lack the sort of experience which only guerrilla action or peasant life can give. Guerrillas may be started by a nucleus of cadres, but even a totally infiltrated force such as the Communist units which maintained themselves for some years after 1945 in Aragon (Spain) soon had to begin systematically recruiting among the local population. The bulk of any successful guerrilla force is always likely to consist of local men, or of professional fighters who were once recruited as local men, and the military advantages of this are immense, as Che Guevara has pointed out, for the local man "has his friends, to whom he can make a personal appeal for help; he knows the terrain and all the things that are likely to happen in the region; and he will also have the extra enthusiasm of the man who is defending his own home."

But if the guerrilla force is amalgam of outside cadres and cal recruits, it will neverthele have been entirely transformed. will not only have unprecedent cohesion, discipline and morale, c veloped by systematic education (literacy as well as military tec niques) and political training b unprecedented long-range mobilit The "Long March" transferred Ma Red army from one end of Chi to the other, and Tito's partisa achieved similar migrations aft similar defeats. And wherever th guerrilla army goes, it will app the essential principles of guerril war which are, almost by definitio inapplicable by orthodox force (1) To pay for everything supplie by the local population; (2) not rape the local women; (3) to brin land, justice and schools wherev they go; and (4) never to live be ter than, or otherwise than, the l cal inhabitants.

Such forces, operating part of a nation-wide political mov ment and under conditions of popu lar support, have proved themselve extraordinarily formidable. At the best they simply cannot be defeate by orthodox military operation Even when less successful, the can be defeated, according to th calculations of British counterinsu gency experts in Malaya and else where, only by a minimum of te men on the ground for every singl guerrilla; that is to say, in Sout Vietnam by a minimum of some thing like a million Americans an puppet Vietnamese. (In fact, th 8,000 Malayan guerrillas immob lized 140,000 soldiers and police men.) As the United States is no discovering, orthodox military meth ods are quite beside the point bombs don't work unless there i something other than paddies t make craters in. The "official" o foreign forces soon realize that th only way to fight guerrillas is by at tacking their base, i.e., the civilia population. Various ways of doin this have been proposed, from th old-fashioned Nazi method of treat ing all civilians as potential guer rillas, through more selective mas sacre and torture, to the presentl popular device of kidnaping entir populations and concentrating them in fortified village compounds, i the hope of depriving the guerrilla of their indispensable source of sup plies and intelligence. The U.S forces, with their usual taste fo olving social problems by technological means, appear to have a preference for destroying everything over large areas, presumably in the hope either that all guerrillas in the area will be killed along with the rest of the human, animal and vegetable life, or that somehow all those trees and underbrush will be vaporized, leaving the guerrillas standing up and visible, where they can be bombed like real soldiers. Barry Goldwater's plan to defoliate the Vietnamese forests by nuclear bombs was no more grotesque than what is actually being attempted along these lines.

The difficulty with such methods is that they merely confirm the local population in their support of the guerrillas, and provide the latter with a constant supply of recruits. Hence the anti-guerrillas devise plans to cut the ground from under the enemy's feet by improving the economic and social conditions of the local population, rather in the manner of King Frederick William I of Prussia who is reported to have run after his subjects in Berlin, beating them with his stick and shouting: "I want you to love me." But it is not easy to convince people that their conditions are being improved while their wives and children are being drenched in burning oil, especially when the people doing the drenching live (by Vietnamese standards) like princes.

Anti-guerrilla governments are more likely to talk about, say, giving peasants the land, than actually doing it, but even when they carry out a series of such reforms they do not necessarily gain the gratitude of the peasants. Oppressed peoples do not want economic improvement alone. The most formidable insurrectionary movements (including very notably the Vietnamese) are those that combine national and social elements. A people who want bread and also independence cannot be conciliated merely by a more generous distribution of bread. The British met the revolutionary agitation of the Irish under Parnell and Davitt in the 1880s by a combination of coercion and economic reform, and not without success—but this did not forestall the Irish revolutionary movement which threw them out in 1916-22.

Nevertheless, there are limitations to a guerrilla army's ability to win a war, though it usually has effective means to avoid losing one.

In the first place, guerrilla strategy is by no means applicable everywhere on a national scale, and that is why it has failed, or partly failed, in a number of countries, e.g., Malaya and Burma. Internal divisions and hostilities — racial, religious, etc.—within a country or a region may limit the guerrilla base to one part of the people, while automatically providing a potential base for anti-guerrilla action in another. To take an obvious case: the Irish Revolution of 1916-22, essentially a guerrilla operation, succeeded in the twenty-six counties but not in Northern Ireland, despite a common frontier and active or passive help from the south. (The British Government, by the way, never made this sympathy an excuse to drop bombs on the Shannon barrage in order to force the Dublin government to cease its aggression against the free world.)

Again, there may be peoples so inexperienced or so lacking in effective cadres as to allow large-scale and wide-based guerrilla insurrections to be suppressed, at least for some time. That is perhaps the case in Angola. Or the geography of a country may facilitate local guerrilla action, but make coordinated general guerrilla warfare remarkably difficult (as perhaps in some Latin American countries). Or a people may be simply too small to win independence by direct action without major outside aid against a combination of occupying countries determined to suppress them. This may be the case with the Kurds, superb and persistent guerrilla fighters of the traditional kind, but who have never achieved their independence.

Beyond these obstacles which vary from country to country, there is the problem of cities. However great the support for the movement in the cities, however urban the origin of its leaders, cities and especially capital cities are the last places a guerrilla army will capture or, unless very badly advised, tackle. The Chinese Communists' road to Shanghai and Canton ran via Yenan. The Italian and French resistance movements timed their urban insurrections (Paris, 1944; Milan and Turin, 1945) for the very last moments before the arrival of Allied armies, and the Poles who did not (Warsaw, 1943) were wiped out. The power of modern industry, transport and administration can be neutralized for a significant length of time only where it lies thin on the ground. Small-scale harassment, such as the cutting of one or two roads and rail tracks, can disrupt military movement and administration in difficult rural terrain, but not in the big city. Guerrilla action or its equivalent is entirely possible in the city — after all, how many bank robbers are ever caught in London? — and there have been some recent examples of it, for instance in Barcelona in the late 1940s, and various cities in Latin America. But it has little more than nuisance value, and merely serves to create a general atmosphere of lack of confidence in the efficiency of the regime, or to tie down armed forces and police which might be better used elsewhere.

Finally, the most crucial limitation of guerrilla warfare is that it cannot win until it becomes regular warfare, in which case it must meet its enemies on their strongest ground. It is comparatively easy for a widely backed guerrilla movement to eliminate official power from the countryside, except for the strong points actually physically occupied by armed forces, and to leave in government or occupation control no more than the isolated cities and garrisons, linked by a few main roads or railroads (and that only by daylight), and by air or radio. The real problem is to get beyond that point. Textbooks devote a good deal of attention to this ultimate phase of guerrilla war, which the Chinese and Vietnamese handled with brilliant success against Chiang Kai-shek and the French. However, those successes should not induce mistaken generalizations. The real strength of guerrilla armies lies not in their ability to turn themselves into regular armies capable of expelling other conventional forces but in their political strength. The total withdrawal of popular support may produce the collapse of local governments, often—as in China and Vietnam — heralded by mass desertions to the guerrillas; a crucial military success by the guerrillas may bring this collapse into the open. Fidel Castro's rebel army did not win Havana: when it had demonstrated that it could not only hold the Sierra Maestra but also take the provincial capital of Santiago, the government apparatus of Batista collapsed.

Foreign occupying forces are likely to be less vulnerable and less inefficient. However, even they may be convinced that they are in a war they cannot win, that even their tenuous hold can be maintained only at quite disproportionate cost. The decision to call off the wasting game is naturally humiliating, and there are always good reasons for postponing it, because it will rarely happen that the foreign forces have been decisively defeated, even in local actions like Dienbienphu. The Americans are still in Saigon, apparently drinking their bourbon peacefully, except perhaps for an occasional bomb in a café. Their columns still crisscross the country apparently at will, and their losses are not much greater than those from traffic accidents at home. Their aircraft are dropping bombs wherever they like, and there is still somebody who can be called the prime minister of "free" Vietnam, though it may be hard to forecast from one day to the next who he will be.

Thus, it can always be argued that just one more effort will tip the balance: more troops, more bombs, more massacres and torture, more "social missions." The history of the Algerian War anticipates the one in Vietnam in this respect. By the time it was over, half a million Frenchmen were in uniform there (against a total Moslem population of 9 million, or one soldier to every eighteen inhabitants, not counting the pro-French local white population), and the army was still asking for more, including the destruction of the French Republic.

It is hard, in such circumstances, to cut one's losses, but there are occasions when no other decision makes sense. Some governments may take it earlier than others. The British evacuated Ireland and Israel well before their military position had become untenable. The French hung on for nine years in Vietnam and for seven years in Algeria, but went in the end. For what is the alternative? The old style of local or marginal guerrilla actions, like border raiding by tribesmen, could be isolated or contained by various relatively cheap devices which did not interfere with the ordinary life of a country or its occupiers. A few squadrons of aircraft could occasionally bomb villages (a favorite British device in the Middle East between the wars), a military frontier zone could be established (as on the old northwest frontier of India), and in extreme cases governments tacitly left some remote and disturbed region to its own devices for a while, merely seeing to it that the trouble did not spread. In a situation like that of Vietnam today or of Algeria in the later 1950s, this will simply not work. If a people does not want to be ruled in the old way any more, there is nothing much that can be done. Of course, if elections had been held in South Vietnam in 1956, as was provided by the Geneva agreements, the views of its people might have been discovered at considerably less cost.

Where does this leave the anti-insurrectionaries? It would be foolish to pretend that guerrilla war is an invariable recipe for successful revolution or that its hopes, as of now, are realistic in more than a limited number of relatively undeveloped countries. The theorists of "counterinsurgency" can therefore take comfort in the thought that they need not always lose. But that is not the point. When, for one reason or another, a guerrilla war has become genuinely national and nation-wide, and has expelled the official administration from wide stretches of the countryside, the chances of defeating it are zero. That the Mau Mau were defeated in Kenya is no help to the Americans in Vietnam; all the less help when we remember that Kenya is now independent, and the Mau Mau regarded as pioneers and heroes of the national struggle. That the Burmese Government has never been overthrown by guerrillas was no help to the French in Algeria. The problem of President Johnson is Vietnam, not the Philippines, and the situation in Vietnam is lost.

What remain in such a situation are illusions and terror. The rationalizations of today's Washington policy were all anticipated in Algeria. We were told by French official spokesmen that the ordinary Algerian was on the side of France, or if not actually pro-French, that he wanted only peace and quiet but was terrorized by the FLN. We were told, practically once a week, that the situation had improved, that it was now stabilized, that another month should see the forces of order regain the initiative, that all they needed was another few thousand soldiers and another few million francs. We were told that the rebellion would soon die down, once it was deprived of its foreign sanctuary and source of supplies. That sanctuary (Tunisia) was bombed and the border hermetically sealed. We were told that if only the great center of Moslem subversion in Cairo could be eliminated, everything would be all right. The French therefore made war on Egypt. In the last stages we were told that there might just conceivably be some people who really wanted to get rid of the French, but since the FLN obviously did not represent the Algerian people, but only a gang of ideological infiltrators, it would be grossly unfair to the Algerians to negotiate with them. We were told about the minorities which had to be protected against terror. The only thing we were not told was that France would if necessary use nuclear weapons, because the French didn't then have any. What was the result? Algeria is today governed by the FLN.

The means by which the illusions are to come true is terror, mostly — in the nature of things — against noncombatants. There is the old-fashioned terror against civilians by frightened soldiers, demoralized by the fact that in this kind of war any civilian may be an enemy fighter, and culminating in the infamous mass reprisals — the razing of villages, such as the Nazis' Lidice and Oradour. Intelligent anti-guerrillas will discourage this, since it is apt to make the local population totally hostile. Still, such terror and reprisals will happen. Furthermore, there will be the more selective torturing of prisoners for information. In the past there may have been some moral limitation on such torture, but not, alas, in our time. In fact, we have so far forgotten the elementary reflexes of humanity that in Vietnam we photograph torturers and victims and release the pictures to the press.

A second kind of terror is that which is at the base of all modern warfare, whose targets nowadays are essentially the civilians rather than the combatants. (Nobody would ever have developed nuclear weapons for any other purpose.) In orthodox warfare the purpose of indiscriminate mass destruction is to break the morale of population and government, and to destroy the industrial and administrative base on which any orthodox war effort must rest. Neither task is as easy in guerrilla war, because there are hardly any cities, factories, communications or other installations to destroy, and nothing like the vulnerable central administration machine of an advanced state. On the other hand, more modest success may pay off. If terror convinces even a single area to withhold support from the guerrillas, and thus to drive them elsewhere, this is a net gain for the anti-guerrillas. So the temptation to go on bombing and burning at random is irresistible, especially for countries like the United States which could strip the entire surface of South Vietnam of life without dipping too deeply into its supply of armaments or money.

Lastly, there is that most hopeless and desperate form of terror, which the United States is at present applying: the threat to extend the war to other nations unless they can somehow get the guerrillas to stop. This has no rational justificaton at all. If the Vietnamese war were really what the State Department pretends, namely an "indirect" foreign aggression without "a spontaneous and local rebellion," then no bombing of North Vietnam would be necessary. The Vietcong would be of no more importance in history than the attempts to set up guerrilla warfare in Spain after 1945, which faded away, leaving few traces except some local newspaper stories and a few publications by Spanish policemen. Conversely, if the people of South Vietnam really were on the side of whatever general at present claims to be their government, or merely wanted to be left in peace, there would be no more trouble in that country than in neighboring Cambodia or Burma, both of which had or still have guerrilla movements.

But it is clear by now, and should always have been clear, that the Vietcong will not go away quietly, and no miracle will transform South Vietnam into a stable anti-Communist republic within the foreseeable future. As most governments in the world know (though one or two, like the British, are too dependent on Washington to say so) there can be no military solution in Vietnam without at least a major conventional land war in the Far East, which would probably escalate into a world war when, sooner or later, the United States discovered that it could not win such a conventional war either. And it would be fought by several hundreds of thousands of American troops, because the allies of the United States, though doubtless willing to send a token battalion or ambulance unit, are not fools enough to involve themselves seriously in a conflict of this kind. The pressure to escalate a little further will mount, and so will the Pentagon belief in the most suicidal of all the many Vietnamese illusions — that in the last showdown the North Vietnamese and Chinese can be terrorized by the prospect of nuclear war into defeat or withdrawal.

They cannot, for three reasons. First, because (whatever the computers say) nobody believes that a United States Government, which is genuinely interested in a stable and peaceful world, will actually start a nuclear war over Vietnam. South Vietnam is a question of vital importance for Hanoi and Peking, just as Soviet missiles off Florida were regarded as a vital issue in Washington; whereas the Vietcong are merely a matter of saving face for the United States as Cuban missile bases were of marginal urgency for Khrushchev. The Russians backed down over Cuba because to them it was not worth any kind of world war, nuclear or conventional. For the same reason the United States can be expected to back down in South Vietnam, provided it is interested in world peace, and provided, presumably, some sort of face-saving formula can be found.

Drawings by Schwering

Second, and on the supposition that the United States really is not prepared for any realistic settlement in South Vietnam, its nuclear threat will not work in the long run because North Vietnam, China (and quite a few other countries) will conclude that nothing is to be expected from concession except further United States demands. There is so much talk about "Munich" in Washington these days that it is often forgotten how much like Munich the situation must look to the other side. A government which regards itself as free to bomb a country with which it is not at war can hardly be surprised if China and North Vietnam refuse to believe that this is the last concession they will be asked to make. There are, as the U.S. Government is aware, situations today in which countries are willing to face the risks of world war, even nuclear war. For China and North Vietnam, South Vietnam is one such situation and the Chinese have already made that clear. It is dangerous daydreaming to think otherwise.

Third and last, the threat of nuclear war against China and North Vietnam is relatively ineffective, because it is more appropriately a threat made against industrialized belligerents. It assumes that in modern warfare there comes a moment when a country or a people must give up because its back is broken. That is a certain outcome of nuclear war for small and medium-sized industrial states and a probable one for large ones (including the United States), but it is not the necessary outcome for a relatively undeveloped state, especially one as gigantic as China. It is certainly true that China (without the USSR) has no chance of defeating the United States. The strength of its position is that neither can it be defeated in any realistic sense. Its token nuclear bombs can be destroyed, and so can its industries, cities and many millions of its 700 million citizens. But all that would merely put the country back to where it was at the time of the Korean War. There are simply not enough Americans to conquer and occupy the country.

It is important for American generals (and for anyone else calculating war on assumptions derived from industrial societies) to realize that a nuclear threat will be regarded by the Chinese either as incredible, or as inevitable but not decisive. It will therefore not work as a threat, though doubtless the Chinese will not rush lightly into a major war, especially a nuclear one, even when they believe it cannot be avoided. As in Korea, they are not likely to enter it until directly attacked or threatened. The dilemma of American policy therefor remains. Having three times a many nuclear bombs as the rest o the world is very impressive, but i will not stop people from making revolutions of which Mr. McGeorge Bundy disapproves. Nuclear bomb cannot win guerrilla wars such a the Vietnamese are now fighting and without such weapons it is improbable that even conventional wars can be won in that region (The Korean War was at best a draw.) Nuclear bombs cannot be used as a threat to win a little war that is lost, or even a medium-sized war, for though the populace can be massacred, the enemy cannot be brought to surrender. If the United States can come to terms with the realities of Southeast Asia it will find itself very much where it was before — the most formidable power in the world, whose position and influence nobody wants to challenge, if only because nobody can, but which, like all other powers, past and present, must live in a world it does not altogether like. If it cannot come to such terms, sooner or later it will blast off those missiles. The risk is that the United States, suffering from the well-known disease of infant great powers — a touch of omnipotence — will slide into nuclear war rather than face reality.

The Question of SNCC . . . .

Jack Newfield

The real and exact job of a cop: STOP STOP

that is also true
of executive committees and every government and organization in the whole world except small quick ones

and plain people who love.

— Jane Stembridge
SNCC staff

More than five years have now passed since the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) was formed during an Easter weekend conference on the campus of Shaw University in Raleigh, N.C. Since then, this battered brotherhood of organizers, poets, hipsters and visionaries has grown up to have a staff of 200 full-time paid workers in the field, plus 250 full-time volunteers; an annual budget of $800,000, and an evolving philosophy unburdened by obsolete blueprints for utopia from other generations or other countries. SNCC is simply the sum of its experiences inside the eye of the American Dilemma.

SNCC is more a chaotic movement than a conventional civil rights organization; the best image for it is that of an amoeba with pseudopods reaching out in many directions. Compared to the well-organized and disciplined Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), SNCC is a happening.

Recoiling from the "cult of personality" that surrounds Martin Luther King, the young anti-heroes of SNCC have adopted a rotating or egalitarian style of leadership that baffles the rest of the movement. Whenever there is a summit conference of the civil rights leadership, Dr. King, James Farmer, Roy Wilkins and Whitney Young never know which of a dozen possible representatives of SNCC will show up. Ask a SNCC worker, "Who is the head of SNCC?" and he'll reply, "Man, we don't have any leaders" or "The people lead SNCC because they tell us what to do. We don't tell them."

The two most visible personalities in SNCC are Chairman John Lewis; introverted, the veteran of thirty-nine arrests and an ordained minister; and 37-year-old Executive Secretary James Forman. While Lewis' title is largely ceremonial,

---

Jack Newfield is an assistant editor of The Village Voice, New York.

Forman, with great organizational skills and the instincts of a Marine sergeant, has become the most powerful individual in SNCC. But his troops' passion for spontaneity, individualism and freedom is so marked that he is still far from being a "leader" in the conventional sense.

Although he has relinquished all formal titles, 30-year-old Robert Parris is SNCC's other center of gravity. He seems to combine the qualities of the saintly revolutionist Kropotkin with the existentialist philosopher Camus. Parris, who was the first SNCC field secretary to penetrate Mississippi in 1961, has now, despite his flight from leadership, become the ideologue for a major current of thinking within the whole student activist movement; it is the group whose values seem rooted in the humanist and anarchist tradition, rather than in Marxist dogma; those who put the emphasis on freedom rather than movement.

Among the staff of more than 200, there flourishes a staggering diversity that is probably SNCC's greatest resource. There are field workers with masters' degrees and those with only public school education; there are blacks and whites (about sixty), boys and girls; Northerners and Southerners; there are rambunctious teen-agers and stooped adults in their 60s; there are gifted poets like Jane Stembridge, complex Negro intellectuals like Stokley Carmichael, white Southerners like Robert Zellner and former sharecroppers like Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer.

Some of the whites are trying to act black—"clappin' to Ray Charles records on the wrong beat," says Stokley Carmichael; some of the blacks are trying to atone for once acting white. Embryonic black nationalists find a few white masochists to prey on, and the West Indian Negroes feel guilty because their grandfathers weren't plantation slaves.

Because of this pluralism within a framework of individualism, only a few generalizations fit all of the animal called SNCC. It is nonviolent and profoundly democratic. Its strength derives from grass-roots involvement with the very poor. Strongly anarchic in spirit (but not in program), SNCC instills in its workers skepticism of all bureaucracy and all centralized authority—including its own. And SNCC preaches and practices participatory democracy—the concept that everyone should take part in all the decisions that affect his life. With this goes an almost mystical faith in the ability of "the little people"—the lumpen proletariat—to change their condition and govern themselves democratically; a vision which seems to be the antithesis of Communist elitism and authoritarianism.

To watch a SNCC worker function in the rural South is to see democracy in its purest and rawest form. He doesn't manipulate, control or direct discussions at mass meetings. Instead, he devotes his attention to encouraging the least articulate sympathizers with the movement to express themselves without embarrassment. The best of the SNCC workers sound more like teachers or therapists than like organizers or agitators.

SNCC's mood—as its troops depart from Washington after the lobby for the Freedom Democratic Party's (FDP) Congressional challenge—is dominated by memories of wounds recently inflicted by liberal friends. A year ago, before the Democratic convention fight over seating the FDP delegation, the consensus image of SNCC among middle-class liberals was one of idealized sacrifice and purity. But after the convention there began a venomous flow of redbaiting, beatnik-baiting attacks from syndicated columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novack (there have been eighteen so far). This hostility has been extended by similarly acid criticisms from liberals with solid civil rights credentials—Joseph Rauh of the ADA, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP and others. And last May, during a public debate in New York City, Socialist Irving Howe described SNCC as "bureaucratically deformed, manipulative and undemocratic," which must rank as the least informed and most condescending description since Tony Galento called Joe Louis a bum.

These attacks are now beginning to take cumulative effect. Foundations are starting to withhold funds, as are most international unions. A HUAC investigation of SNCC is being talked of for this fall. Such portents have led a sizable segment of SNCC to predict "a new wave of McCarthyism," aimed not only against them but also against the professors, students and clergy who have energized opposition to the war in Vietnam.

It is in this newly embittered frame of mind that SNCC is now ending a period of introspection and consolidation to begin the simultaneous exploration of three new areas: the urban centers of the South, Democratic Party politics, and an attempt to build a national protest movement that would "use morality" to synthesize civil rights with peace, civil liberties and anti-poverty movements.

Throughout its history, SNCC has worked almost exclusively in rural counties — the Mississippi delta, southwest Georgia and the black belt of Arkansas and Alabama. But during the last two months, projects have been opened up in Montgomery, Birmingham and Atlanta. Last May, Fred Meely, a 23-year-old veteran of the Mississippi campaigns, sat in the deserted SNCC store-front headquarters in Montgomery and talked about the difficulties of urban organizing:

> All summer we just might sit here and build a base in the community. It doesn't mean anything that we don't have an active program going yet. We're not concerned with time. We're just going to let the people in the community know we're here, become involved in their daily lives, and find out what it is they want us to do.
>
> The cities are a whole new experience for us. Size is something new to us. So is the problem of dealing with an existing Negro leader- > ship that is conservative and corrupt like the ministers and lawyers here in Montgomery. This middle class doesn't exist in places like Greenwood or Holly Springs. Another reason the cities are so hard to crack is that Negroes here are much less open to the idea of nonviolence. And they are more apathetic. They have a whole different set of values from rural farmers. There is a hard core of hate and violence in every black man in this city. Dozens of Negroes get cut up in fights every Saturday night. Even those people who come into the office looking for help are filled with hostility and looking for a fight.

In exploring the cities, SNCC's strategy has been to give priority to organizing "those people most damaged by the society" — junkies, winoes, prostitutes, dropouts, petty criminals and the mentally disturbed: a tactic that is based more on Genet's existential conception of the under class than on the economic one of Marx. Right now, SNCC in Montgomery seems to be beating its head bloody trying to organize the most brutalized proletariat in America. Some day it will have to start organizing the middle-class Negroes, despite their Johnny Mathis albums and green stamps, as well as the white liberals.

In Atlanta, a SNCC pseudopod is exploring a different road into the urban dilemma. Julian Bond, communications director, poet and one of SNCC's founders, last May entered the Democratic primary for the Georgia state legislature in an all-Negro district created as a result of the recent Supreme Court decision on reapportionment. Bond's candidacy ignited a fierce debate within the SNCC staff. He was attacked by those visionary staff members who oppose electoral action and by those who prefer third-party movements patterned after the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party. Bond campaigned —in a shirt and tie—for a $2 minimum wage law, abolition of the death penalty, and the removal of all voting requirements except age and residence. On May 5, he defeated Negro minister William Creacy by a 3-to-1 margin, and won the general election on June 16 against a Republican by a 4-to-1 plurality.

SNCC Field Secretary Charley Cobb, Bond's campaign manager, said in Washington recently: "Julian will function as a SNCC legislator. He will organize people's conferences throughout his district and ask people what they want him to do. He will get people in the community talking to one another directly, rather than to him. He will seek to develop indigenous leadership that can replace him in the legislature. And he will use his salary to finance organizers all over the state of Georgia." He added:

> We don't know what it means to function as a Democrat in the Georgia House. But we think it is vital that we explore this area to see if you really have to get co-opted and sell out, or whether it is possible to use that position to organize people and release energy.
>
> I think that with the passage of the voting rights bill and future reapportionment decisions, the rest of the South will begin to resemble Atlanta. And we have to be ready to exploit that environment the best we can. Julian's campaign was an experiment, that's all.

SNCC is also looking in a third direction—foreign policy. Although plans are still tentative, several of SNCC's veterans, including Bob Parris, Courtland Cox and Stokley Carmichael, along with Yale history professor Staughton Lynd, and pacifists Dave Dellinger and Eric Weinberger, have opened up an office in Washington to organize "students, poor people and intellectuals" around the war in Vietnam.

This mobilization is not conceived as the traditional and mechanical coalition of peace and civil rights "leaders." Rather, as Cox explains it: "We have to convince the country that civil rights workers get killed in the South because the government has a certain attitude toward killing in Vietnam. The concept that it is all right to kill an 'enemy' affects the morality of the country so that people can be murdered here."

Parris adds: "Most liberals think of Mississippi as a cancer, as a distortion of America. But we think Mississippi is an accurate reflection of America's values and morality. Why else can't the people who killed Andrew, James and Mickey be brought to justice, unless a majority of the community condones murder. Sheriff Rainey is not a freak; he reflects the majority. And what he did is related to the napalm bombings of 'objects' in Vietnam."

This group of SNCC workers and pacifists plans "continuous activity in Washington through the summer to end the war in Vietnam." Massive civil disobedience is planned for Hiroshima Day, August 6, and a march of "unrepresented poor people" on Nagasaki Day, August 9.

SNCC is not perfect. It is a chaotic movement of people, and it reflects the small frailties of people. For a few in the movement, there seems no vision of a reconciliation beyond the present conflict. And for some others, pointless antagonism to Martin Luther King's SCLC has become a posture of easily purchased militancy. Drinking and pot smoking have turned a couple of Freedom Houses into replicas of East Village bars. Nevertheless, SNCC remains the cutting edge of history; it contains the prophets and pioneers who give a whole movement the urgency that William James once called "the moral equivalent of war."

North Dakota Runs Down . . . . Albert Stern

Grand Forks, N.D.

Some states export cotton; others, manufactured goods, oil, timber or coal. North Dakota exports people —young, talented, energetic people; thousands every year. With a population of about 600,000, it lost 120,000 people by migration in the years 1940 to 1950, 103,000 in the following decade.

People leave North Dakota because they can live better somewhere else. It is a state in which wages are low and jobs scarce; a few are wealthy and the many poor. While the picture today is bleak, a sensible politics could change it. It could raise wages in the state, create job opportunities that would keep many of the young, the energetic and the able at home. North Dakota has the opportunity to become a fine place to live rather than a fine place to leave.

At present, per capita income lags well behind national averages —about $1,500 compared to a national average of about $2,200 in 1961. Farm and service workers average about $2,000 a year. Retail employees make a little less than $50 a week, while factory workers —the economic aristocrats of the North Dakota poor—earn about $4,000 annually.

To make the situation still tougher, the state's tax structure is regressive. A substantial sales tax brings in about 25 per cent of the state's tax revenues. State income taxes account for only 10 per cent of tax receipts (the national average is 15 per cent), and corporate taxes bring in only 3 per cent of revenues (the national average is 7 per cent).

Jobs not only pay badly; they are hard to find. The number of North Dakota's farms has been steadily shrinking—from 74,000 in 1940 to about 50,000 today. What farms remain are larger and more mechanized and thousands of farmers and farm workers have been driven off the land. They flock to North Dakota towns, most of which were never more than market places for the countryside. In the little places —two grain elevators, half a dozen stores, four streets and a deserted railroad station—there are no jobs at all. Machines don't need groceries or haircuts. In the bigger towns there are few jobs at low wages.

What can a sensible politics do in North Dakota? First, it can help raise wages by repealing the state's right-to-work law. Manufacturing workers in the state, largely organized, make about twice as much annually as most other North Dakota workers. Unorganized farm workers, retail help and service workers lag badly. The example of one large North Dakota town is instructive here. Driver members of a Teamster local are guaranteed $125 a week as a minimum wage; unorganized waitresses make $30 and $45 a week in the town's better restaurants.

Yet it is hard for unions to function properly under the state's right-to-work law. Men unwilling to pay union dues enjoy union benefits under this law. Men reared in farm communities resist organization and allow themselves to be exploited.

A sensible politics would change the state's tax structure to increase the purchasing power of wages. The sales tax would be reduced and a larger share of state revenues would come from income and corporate taxes. One possibility here is to put the state income tax on a withholding basis. Other states have found that this increases revenues and makes tax evasion more difficult.

North Dakota also needs to distinguish between the homesteader and the business farmer. Approximately 4,000 farms in the state earn more than $20,000 a year—some substantially more. Such farms are in fact corporations and should be subject to corporate taxes.

On the other side of the problem, a sensible politics must create new jobs in North Dakota. Irrigation, tourism and the development of light industry need to be encouraged. The Garrison Division Project, a major irrigation canal system, will make possible the diversified farming of thousands of now arid acres in central North Dakota. Leaving one-crop farming behind, these farmers will be able to raise alfalfa, hay, potatoes and sugar beets, among other crops.

Tourism has become North Dakota's third largest industry. The state has great natural beauty, expanding recreational areas and historical sites. There is a need, however, for more state parks and for completion of the state highway system now under construction.

The development of light industry is perhaps the most exciting possibility in the state at the moment. Cheap power and water are becoming available. The largest thermo-generating plant in the world is now operating in North Dakota. A second such plant is under construction and seventeen to eighteen more thermo-generating plants will be built on top of the state's lignite coal reserves. Apart from increased use at home, this power will be sold through a national grid system as far west as California and Oregon.

An aluminum industry is a possibility; the manufacture of farm implements and small boats is already a reality. Starch plants and sugar refineries — farm-products processing in general—exist and can grow. Dakota flour, frozen potatoes and Dakota vodka would provide jobs for many workers. While work needs to be done on reducing rail rates, the availability of water and power makes North Dakota manufactures presently competitive, especially in the West. Finally the state's large potash reserves are the basis for a substantial fertilizer industry. The use of these fertilizers on newly irrigated soil can lead to expanded production for such specialty crops as sunflower, safflower, flax and durum wheat.

The state's present Democratic administration is moving in many of the directions suggested here. Some Democrats are working to repeal the right-to-work law. Governor Guy has recommended placing the state's income tax on a withholding basis, and Lt. Governor Tighe has outlined to me the job possibilities he sees for the state.

Yet economic progress is ultimately not enough. Cultural progress too must be achieved. People leave North Dakota because it is too dull. There is little music and less art; the higher educational system is narrow in outlook and primitive in methodology—a haven for mediocrity. The mass media are on the whole models of babbittry. Beyond a better living, a sensible politics must achieve a better life.

Albert Stern is developing a program in social psychiatry in North Dakota.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The American View of Life

THE MACHINE IN THE GARDEN: Technology and the Pastoral Ideal in America. By Leo Marx. Oxford University Press. 392 pp. $6.75.

Alan Trachtenberg

The effect of the War of 1812, wrote Thomas Jefferson, was like Satan's destruction of Paradise: "from a peaceable and agricultural nation, he makes us a military and manufacturing one." Leo Marx fixes on this and many similar dark images in the American cultural record. The swift change from the simple rural society of the early Republic to the industrial and warfare state of today, he argues, is the central fact of American life. But The Machine in the Garden is far from the usual historical account. It is a study of what Americans have believed and felt during the process of social change. The subject of the book is "the American view of life," and while Marx relates that view to major changes within society, his chief concern is with consciousness.

Professor Marx is one of several scholars whose work has converged recently upon the American mind. In a real sense his work, along with that of Henry Nash Smith, R. W. B. Lewis and Charles Sanford (to name a few), traces back to Emerson's search for a national identity in thought and art. These scholars have extended the range of American self-knowledge by finding in our thought a tendency to conceive the world through myth, that is, through a deeply felt "mode of belief" derived from religion, or in Marx's case, from literature. Jefferson's lament, for example, is couched in the imagery of the myth of Eden, a myth which pervades our culture. The "American Adam" (the idea of prelapsarian innocence regained) and the "Virgin Land" (the idea of the West as a new Garden of the World) are powerful even if irrational determinants of how Americans see themselves. Drawn from Christian tradition, these images were reshaped and reinforced by American conditions: a vast wilderness to settle, with no "past" to overcome. The discovery of myth at the heart of American experience has been an immeasurable stimulus to American Studies. It encourages students to search out those conjunctions in our culture where ideas, works of art and political realities intersect. Myth provides a way to shape unities out of the diversities of American life, and it can lead to a comprehensive interpretation of the whole of our experience.

But myth criticism has severe limitations. Culture is a dynamic process, a dialectic among conflicting ideas and claims. Myths themselves are static. They cannot tell the full story of what a culture believes. Moreover, they have a function somewhat like dreams: they project deep-lying wishes. But unless they are translated into ideologies, into programs for action, they do not affect the direction of events. Americans dreamed of innocence and gardens all throughout the process which turned their collective lives in the opposite direction, toward cities, machines, violence and war. Myth and history, then, are fundamentally at odds, and it is the tension between them which gives a culture its special tone and quality.

American Studies has produced over the past few years a number of works, particularly on literature, which have described the contradictory or dialectical nature of American thought and art—its movement between innocence and experience, between pragmatic realism and high-flown idealism. These tensions within consciousness, however, are symptoms of less visible causes, causes usually evaded by critics. Shortly before his untimely death a few years ago, the literary scholar Richard Chase wrote that dialectical adroitness had probably gone as far as possible toward defining the "American-ness of our literature." What is needed now is a "genuinely historical criticism." Leo Marx takes a major step toward correcting that deficiency. His book's distinction is that it does not merely describe yet another myth, yet another set of contradictions. It goes much further, into historical causes. Marx undertakes to formulate the precise relations between literature and the general culture, and to probe the origins of culture itself in the mind's response to historical circumstance.

The book's argument, as I have said, is that the core experience of our society has been the sudden change from a rural to an industrial world. This plain (though hardly simple) social and economic fact had an entire range of effects upon consciousness, which Marx examines with extraordinary subtlety and exactness. Beginning in the 17th century, Americans attached themselves to an image of their land as a potential garden, a "middle landscape" between the evils of civilization (Europe) and of wild, untamed nature. This attachment was derived, Marx shows, from a long European tradition of pastoral aspirations. The ideal was embodied in the conventional literary mode, called "pastoral," in which shepherds tend their fleecy flocks and pipe their tunes within a perfectly happy and tranquil landscape. This form was invented, mainly by Virgil, out of a kind of resentment against an urban, power-based society such as Rome. The Virgilian mode, with its fictional Arcadia and conventional shepherds, flourished in Elizabethan England, on the eve of American settlement. But the Age of Discovery lent a new vitality to the old form, and made it possible, as Marx shows in a brilliant treatment of The Tempest, for Shakespeare to dispense with the stock properties, the bucolic diction, the shepherds—even the sheep. Arcadia lay in the past, but in America the Golden Age now seemed a bright new possibility.

But the possibility, Shakespeare saw, was ambiguous. In his analysis of the play, and of Virgil's first Ecologue, Marx makes a crucial distinction between the "ideal" or hope which pastoral contains — the hope for harmony and fulfillment — and the larger, encompassing form or "design" of the poem. The ideal is simple, beautiful and utopian. The design, on the other hand, is complex. For it involves a drama in which the ideal is threatened by a "counterforce" from the outside. In Virgil it is Rome; in Shakespeare, Milan on one side, Caliban on the other. In each case the resolution is strongly qualified by this intrusion of history and raw, blind nature. The poet, in short, while affirming his myth, does not close his eyes to reality. "We are reminded," writes Marx on the ending of The Tempest, "that history cannot be stopped."

---

Alan Trachtenberg is the author of Brooklyn Bridge: Fact and Symbol (Oxford University Press).

This distinction between ideal and design prepares for the real work of the book—the emergence of a uniquely American version of literary pastoral, in which the counterforce will be the emblem of industrialism, a machine. And the distinction also sheds light upon Marx's own method. The complex pastoral design is essentially a model of a dialectic; the mind achieves a balance by reconciling opposites. In Marx's approach, culture itself is a process of interplay between mind and actuality, between literary mode and social circumstance. He brings into focus a specific convention — the pastoral ideal — and re-creates the movements and phases of the transaction. To do this, Marx dispenses with the mechanical chapter arrangement of many scholarly works; the book's pattern is a controlled unfolding of theme and countertheme. As a result, it has an exciting dramatic quality missing from most academic books. It is, as it were, a scholarly version of complex pastoral.

To re-create the emergence of American literary pastoral, Marx gives his book a form taken from the contradiction which is the book's subject. The basic dialectic is contained in three long sections: "The Garden," "The Machine" and "Two Kingdoms of Force" (thesis, antithesis and synthesis — something other than a simple resolution). Each section has its own pattern of claim and counterclaim, or what might be called ambivalence. "The Garden" picks up themes from the two introductory chapters dealing with Virgil, Shakespeare and the nature of pastoral, and shows that early American accounts of the new world revive the pastoral ideal at the very time it was dying as a literary mode in England (where it subsequently reappeared, in the 18th century, under the influence of Lockean epistemology and ethical theory, as the new nature poetry). But these accounts swing between opposite views of the American landscape: the view that it is a paradise where men will effortlessly realize their ancient dreams, and the view that it is a howling and threatening wilderness, to be subdued only by ruthless energy.

Jefferson plays a key role in achieving some balance. He is America's first great pastoralist; through him the old literary mode is transformed into a political vision. His famous description of the "noble husbandman" is really a new version of the good shepherd, located in what now is an American "middle landscape." As soon as Jefferson created the image, however, he backed off from it. The image, Marx shows, was fundamentally poetic, and the statesman's political sense recognized its inadequacy as a national program. He had seized upon the figure in a passage in Notes on Virginia arguing against the development of native manufacturing. Economic arguments suddenly give way to poetic metaphor: the husbandman, close to nature, represented health; factories were disease and dysfunction, all the evils of Europe's steaming cities. Jefferson never repudiated the metaphor, but somewhat like Prospero (who renounces his powers at the end of The Tempest, acknowledging that the work of the imagination is no substitute for historical action), was able to suspend it on behalf of political and economic necessity. He accepted the necessity of power and industry, but always kept the pastoral ideal in view as a cherished and half-articulate alternative.

The ideal spread, however, without the check of Jefferson's countervailing qualifications, and became virtually an American theory of society. Moreover it became, Marx shows in "The Machine," an argument for "improvements," for clearing the wilderness, laying roads and rails, and eventually, founding a continental industrial empire. So far as the pastoral ideal stood for the mixture of "art" with nature, it actually gave support to technological change. In the American mind the machine was admitted into the garden as a means of more swiftly realizing the ideal. Before long, in the pre-Civil War period, many Americans came to ignore "that delicate point of equilibrium" between nature and art, and the pastoral ideal was itself encompassed by the ideology of progress.

Marx assembles an impressive array of evidence to show that two sets of values, one belonging to a rural way of life, the other to an industrial, were fused without any overt sense of contradiction. Dazzled by the new rhetoric of "technological sublime," many Americans (including Emerson and Whitman) displayed

Aerial view of the great march in Selma, Alabama in April

ROBERT W.
SPIKE

—integration leader, shows the churches the "why" and "how" of the larger Civil Rights role they must take in North and South . . .

The FREEDOM REVOLUTION and the CHURCHES

. . . by the Executive Director, Commission on Religion and Race, National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

This long awaited manual was delayed by Dr. Spike's leadership participation in the March on Washington, the drive for the Civil Rights Bill, the training of student volunteers last summer in Mississippi, the Selma, Birmingham and other integrationist actions.

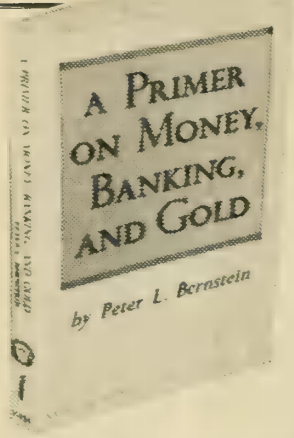
Dr. Spike's handbook shows the "why" and "how" and the urgency of involvement . . . explains the great opportunity to witness . . . describes the unique powers of the churches for Civil Rights action in the days ahead. At bookstores. $2.95

ASSOCIATION PRESS
291 Broadway/New York 10007

what Karl Polyani has called a "mystic readiness" to accept the machine and disregard the social costs. Increasingly, the pastoral ideal lost its relevance as a social ideal and became a "rhetorical formula," a "sentimental guise" which "enabled the nation to continue defining its purpose as the pursuit of rural happiness while devoting itself to productivity, wealth, and power." Although Marx does not spell them out in detail, the political consequences of this passage are clear enough; they amount to what John Dewey called "our great abdication"—the surrender of political control to the instrumentalities of our technology "instead of seriously asking how we are to employ the means at our disposal so as to form an equitable and stable society." By blandly accommodating the machine to the garden, Americans lost the chance to project the usable values of pastoralism upon history. In service to industrialism the values become the "infantile wish-fulfillment dreams" of popular culture and much political rhetoric.

In the last section of the book Marx turns to literature "to discover the meaning inherent in the contradiction." "Two Kingdoms of Force" traces the recurrence in American works of a basic motif: a machine invading a garden. The invasion changes what was a totally engaging mood of peace and tranquillity into a more complex state of mind, a tension between dream and reality. The literary evidence for the pervasiveness of the motif is overwhelming, but Marx restricts himself to a study of several major uses by Thoreau, Hawthorne, Melville and Mark Twain. He is nowhere more persuasive than in his deft, incisive exposition of this motif and his location of it at the center of works like Walden, Moby Dick and Huck Finn.

NEW VINTAGE
PAPERBACK



A PRIMER ON MONEY,
BANKING AND GOLD
By PETER L. BERNSTEIN
$1.95, now at your bookstore
VINTAGE BOOKS are published by ALFRED • A • KNOPF and RANDOM HOUSE

Marx does not argue that these works are "about" industrialization; nor is he concerned with the writer's "attitude" toward the new society. Instead he demonstrates that literary artists drew their images from their perception of what was occurring in society in order to enlarge the meanings of their fables. Needless to say this procedure is far different from the usual manner of social critics who seek to find mirror reflections of society in literature. Marx is an extremely sensitive reader of literary texts—of images, symbols and tone. It is impossible to paraphrase his line-by-line argument, but what results from his analyses is the inescapable impression that the deeper our writers plunged below the surface of our culture, the less able were they to invent satisfactory resolutions to their plots. Our classic authors responded to the rapid beginnings of industrialization through their profound attachment to the native American landscape as the source of pastoral values. The machine enters the landscape as a token of history. Unlike the easy fusion in popular culture, here the intrusion causes a dislocation of mind and feeling, and the "middle landscape" cannot cope with it. Hence the ambiguous and sometimes fraudulent endings of so many American pastoral fables: Thoreau lets us know that "Walden" is not a realizable society but a state of mind; Ishmael floats, miraculously, at the edge of disaster; Huck and Jim become unbelievable clowns.

Marx explains the failure in this way: "The resolutions of our pastoral fables are unsatisfactory because the old symbol of resolution is obsolete." Our writers, in short, were able to create a "powerful metaphor of contradiction" in response to contradictions within the general culture. But they were unable, in their imaginations, to resolve the conflict because society itself had not. "The machine's sudden entrance into the garden," Marx concludes, "presents a problem that ultimately belongs not to art but to politics."

This is an extremely persuasive argument, but it falls short, I think, of a complete explanation. Society, Marx is saying, was unable to reconcile garden and machine, or myth and history. It was unable to do so because its dominant image of reconciliation, the "middle landscape," was no longer relevant to industrial conditions. But there is another problem: the conception of history embodied in the image of the machine. For our writers this image is one of unrelieved doom and disaster: look what the steamboat did to Huck's raft, or Ahab, a mechanism-ridden character, to the Pequod. On the other hand, in the general culture, the machine was an image of happy promise, of mindless material bliss. Both meanings are historically inadequate. Both hypostatize one set of possibilities and treat them as the full reality. Both assume that history is an uncontrollable, an automatic process. Neither therefore is a genuine historical emblem. As an image, the machine is as static, as ahistorical as the garden itself.

The fact is that American literature has had no historical consciousness in the manner of Tolstoy or Balzac, and Marx contributes a great deal to our understanding of that fact. But it is, then, inaccurate for him to say that "complex pastoralism . . . acknowledges the reality of history." The sentence needs to be amended to say "a one-sided conception of the reality of history." Moreover, in his own method, Marx encounters a parallel difficulty. He too accepts, or at least uses, the machine as an adequate image of historical process. He tends to oversimplify what was occurring outside of consciousness, "out there" in society. For example, he accepts the rather broad generalization of W. W. Rostow regarding a "take-off" between 1840 and 1860, and lets it go at that. Thus "the controlling facts of life in nineteenth century America" come down to "rapid industrialization," which in turn amounts to little more than the visual transformation of "a rustic and in large part wild landscape" into "the site of the world's most productive industrial machine." But industrial capitalism had other effects beyond its scars upon the landscape and its mechanization of values. It transformed an entire social structure, the relations among people. It led to a national market economy. It created a working class, "that class," as Thoreau puts it in Walden, "by whose labor the works which distinguish this generation are accomplished." Certainly these changes had their subliminal effects upon pastoral, if only by influencing the writer's conception of himself in relation to an audience.

What I am saying is that Marx's treatment of the dialectic within history is not as strong nor as convincing as his treatment of the contradictions within consciousness. But this is only to say that he does not exhaust all problems in this book. Marx has opened up a very troublesome area for investigation, and there are no ready-made solutions for the literary scholar who wishes to forge a "genuinely historical criticism." Moreover, the questions I raise indicate the wider reaches of meaning in the book. American culture today, more than ever, is dominated by antihistorical modes of thought and expression. Pop art, Beat writing, naked functional architecture — these are all, it is true, forms of protest against the puffery and false values of official culture. But they take their forms by dispensing altogether with articulated frames of meaning; they celebrate immediacy, spontaneity, the violent dissociation of the mind from the past, indeed from any future. They abstract the present as an autonomous moment of time. They are the equivalent, as Lewis Mumford told us long ago, to the violence in our politics and foreign policy.

One function of the cultural historian is to bring the network of ties between past and present, between mind and history, to complete consciousness. He contributes to the life of society in an essential way. The need for his special work was never more urgent than now, when the machine-in-the-garden fantasy is being acted out in dead earnest by our mechanized troops in the green jungles of Vietnam. In this book Leo Marx battles against a powerful and perhaps fatal current: the American tendency to deal with the modern world as if it does not exist. If the book has the effect it deserves, it will help restore a lively sense of history and of contemporary political realities to the study of literature and culture.

THEATRE

Julius Novick

FINDING SHAKESPEARE

The American Shakespeare Festival in Stratford, Conn., began—like the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center —as a gesture toward High Culture on the part of the theatrical Establishment. The festival, however, was the product of the generation previous to that of the original Lincoln Center duumvirate; it was the child of the old age of Lawrence Langner, who, nearly forty years earlier, had been a founder of the Theatre Guild. We may conjecture that it owed its inception to a desire, conscious or unconscious, on Langner's part to atone for the increasing commercialism of the Theatre Guild's work on Broadway.

Again like the Lincoln Center Repertory, the Shakespeare Festival was not an immediate success. Its first season, ten years ago, was a universally acknowledged disaster, and things did not get much better very quickly. Stratford-upon-Housatonic became known for serving up what a folk philosopher of my acquaintance calls "Shakespeare with sour cream on the side": miscast movie stars, chic production gimmicks ("Wouldn't it be fun if . . ?") and irrelevant prettiness.

About four years ago, however, Joseph Verner Reed took over as executive producer of the festival, and brought in Allen Fletcher and Douglas Seale as artistic directors to get rid of the sour cream. Mr. Seale left before the beginning of the 1964 season, since when Mr. Fletcher has reigned alone under Mr. Reed. Under this new order, the festival has been engaged—for a change—in an honest attempt to give a fair account of Shakespeare's plays (assisted by a half-million-dollar grant from the Ford Foundation to set up a training program for the actors). There have been failures during this time, but they have at least been honorable failures: failures of skill only, not of will as well.

In four seasons at Stratford, Mr. Fletcher's directorial style has become recognizable. His stage, redesigned by Will Steven Armstrong, projects through the proscenium into the audience, in an attempt to gain some of the advantages of the open, neo-

---

Harold Clurman, who has been abroad since early spring, will shortly contribute articles on the theatre in Tokyo and London.

"Wholly extraordinary! A classic thriller!"
—Post

COLUMBIA PICTURES presents

WILLIAM WYLER'S the collector

TECHNICOLOR®

DOUBLE AWARD WINNER! Cannes Film Festival

THE Paris
5th Ave. & 58th St.
MU 8-2013

THE Coronet
[illegible]th St. at 3rd Ave.
EL 5-1663

Elizabethan stage. Mr. Fletcher's stagecraft is a compromise between proscenium and open-stage technique. He uses scenery (usually designed by Mr. Armstrong) but sparingly: one or two large, emblematic, mood-evoking pieces at the rear of the stage, backed in turn by a sky drop or black drapes. The main acting area is essentially a bare platform, and there is no curtain. It is a stage well adapted to the swift, fluid, uncluttered, no-nonsense work that Mr. Fletcher provides.

He is the most self-effacing of Shakespearean directors. His ideas for individual characters, individual scenes, are often original—and sometimes unfortunate — but it is usually hard to tell what he thinks about a play as a whole. He never seems tempted to sacrifice Shakespeare to his own virtuosity. His productions are almost never frivolous or perverse, but often they are uneven—varying widely in quality from moment to moment—and sometimes merely commonplace.

Two years ago, however, he directed for the festival an admirable production of King Lear, which raised hopes that have been largely justified this season. The training program has assured that even the smallest roles are nearly always played with professional competence. Leading actors who have been with the company for several years — Morris Carnovsky, Patrick Hines, Philip Bosco — are well cast and in good form; so are many of the new members and guest performers, notably Aline MacMahon and Ruby Dee. Mr. Fletcher has directed three out of the season's four productions, and his hand is surer than it has usually been. This is almost certainly the best season in Stratford's history.

As if to show that the festival now feels it has a past it can be proud of, Mr. Fletcher has revived his production of King Lear, and Morris Carnovsky has returned to play Lear once again. In the 1963 production, however, not only was Mr. Carnovsky magnificent but half a dozen of the supporting actors created faithful but fresh characterizations. Of these actors, only Patrick Hines remains in the cast, and his fat, benevolent, easy-mark Gloucester is at least as good as ever. The new actors are mostly satisfactory but stock. Goneril and Regan, for example, were played two years ago from their own points of view: they did not think themselves monsters but ordinary, put-upon women, saddled with an old father who gave them a lot of trouble. The current evil daughters, however, are just that: Evil Daughters, as grim as Grimm, and almost interchangeable.

Even Morris Carnovsky's Lear seems somewhat diminished, although that may be merely the effect of my having seen it several times. It is not, at any rate, a reticent, off-hand, dry performance like Paul Scofield's; Mr. Carnovsky goes for the climaxes with everything he has, which is still a great deal. He has not yet solved the storm scene, and so there is only a plateau where the peak should be, but for the most part he is able to combine a consistent and detailed old-age characterization with a passionate strength of eloquence. His performance alone would justify this revival.

Mr. Fletcher's Romeo and Juliet could use some such justification; it is the weakest of this season's productions. And yet it is not bad, only uneven and uninspired. Will Steven Armstrong has provided another of his simple, handsome unit sets; such sets, however, serve better for large outdoor scenes than for intimate indoor ones, and of all Shakespeare's plays, Romeo is the one in which intimacy is most important.

Maria Tucci, the Juliet, seems always to be upon the point of tears. She plays the entire first half of her role on one note of tremulous ardor, with little playfulness and no exultation. This ardor of hers, moreover, is curiously un-physical; one might wish, for the sake of this interesting actress, that the play was about a girl who wanted to become a nun. On the other hand, Terence Scammell is an excellent Romeo: passionate, lyrical and boyish, with a beautiful tenor voice that he uses without self-indulgence. On the other hand again, John Cunningham's

Listen Galaxea

Galaxea
be kind to Galileo Galilei
who is thrust upon you in the extremity of his need grant him permission to poke around he imagines he investigates and I love him dearly dearly
he is almost blind
but who needs eyes
when they have you Galaxea in whose embrace webs of eternity rock gently to and fro take this man Galaxea
to be your lawful wedded mite and see that you nurture him and provide for his sustenance guarding him from the violence of your real lovers the gods in whose arms you burst like a bubble of joy
ah Galaxea Galaxea
to think that it was your own little whim to invent him this man
what was it?
that you couldn't look with your own eyes
at your armpit?
you couldn't see your own beautiful back graceful as a beach and you wanted someone to walk its lovely loneliness a while?
a while only?
listen Galaxea
let me
let him caress you let our lives fall upon your skin like a prolongued caress
Galaxea Galaxea
this is a man with a day's beard behind him talking
let him caress you
while someone awakens
the sleeping horses
Galaxea
I have used one of your days to comb the beach
for the hymen of doors
it is dark now
I know that Galileo will stumble across marvelous things in that same dark which is the milk of Galaxea
Galaxea
if it is within your reach protect him now that you've made him pollen man
dandelion man is among you
he is little people
in the eyelash of oblivion
oh Galaxea
see to it that he lives that he doesn't lapse into chair that he doesn't sink into stone that he doesn't faint into thin air because Galaxea
Galaxea are you listening?
you have no one else smaller than you to love you
and there is no one else
at the dark beach of your back running like the wild surf with his lungs and his now awakened horses

Alvaro Cardona-Hine

nervously chuckling Mercutio tries too hard to be likable and funny. But then, Patrick Hines makes a benevolent, bewildered, charming old friar (first cousin to Mr. Hines's Gloucester, and why not?); Lillian Gish (yes, Lillian Gish) works cleverly and pleasantly to get around the fact that she lacks the broad-beamed earthiness of Juliet's nurse; and Richard Mathews is a good little-boy Tybalt.

Even this weakest of the four productions, then, is a respectable effort; in the next issue I shall write about two more that surpass it: a likable Taming of the Shrew, and an impressive Coriolanus.

MUSIC

Benjamin Boretz

NEW MUSIC, BIG MONEY

The emergence of major foundation activity at the center of "advanced" musical life during the season just past is a development of the greatest moment for America's musical future which none of the New York journalists' seasonal wrap-ups has mentioned. Although this has not been principally a local phenomenon, its significance as a direct result of, as well as a potentially powerful influence on, the new-music performance activities that began here would seem to make it a matter of special interest and concern to members of the New York musical community. Attention should be the greater because, as in any unleashing of massive foundation resources upon an economically marginal profession, the destructive potential of the new situation is as unlimited as its potential for good.

Indeed, only someone who is aware of New York musical activity over the past few seasons is in a position to evaluate these new projects in the light of their backgrounds and origins. The major foundations have until recently taken the attitude that only music projects directly involving public performance are sufficiently "public" to warrant their participation. Such support as they have given in the domain of composition has reflected this preoccupation. Ford, for example, has never commissioned a composer directly; for its opera project, it permitted established companies to choose composers to write works for them, and in the Concert Soloists project individual performers designate the composers to be commissioned. The results, given the prevailing attitudes of opera companies and recitalists, have for the most part been predictably routine. And since no established performance activity was linked to "advanced" music, its complete neglect was guaranteed without even a deliberate policy decision.

But, as readers of this column know, the creation of such a link between "advanced" new music and performance has been one of the striking musical developments in recent years in New York. And not only has this link been unmistakably established but an administrative machinery has been thoroughly tested and validated within the universities, and the identification of certain halls with these activities has demonstrated a continuity of public support for "advanced" music. All of these are preconditions of paramount concern to foundation management.

The job has been done, moreover, outside the luxurious auspices of any large foundation project, and entirely by the efforts of a few dedicated composers who were determined to create a functioning musical environment on their own terms. In fact, the origin and execution of the new concepts and standards for contemporary music making has been accomplished almost exclusively by just two composer-directed series: Gunther Schuller's Twentieth Century Innovations at Carnegie Recital Hall, and the concerts of the Group for Contemporary Music at Columbia University, directed by Charles Wuorinen and Harvey Sollberger, at McMillin Theatre.

The excitement and attention which these two groups have generated by demonstrating the spectacular possibilities inherent in superior performances of contemporary music had predictable consequences. Series specializing in new music have proliferated to the saturation point in New York, most of them capitalizing on the enthusiasm evoked by the new virtuoso accuracy without attempting

The American Federation of Teachers Invites You . . .

Help Teach Democracy
In The Deep South

This summer, union teachers will instruct Negro children through two vital projects:

- Mississippi Freedom Schools (initiated by the Council of Federated Organizations)
- SCOPE Registration Drive (sponsored by Martin Luther King's SCLC)

Here's How You Can Help . . . Send Your Donation Today!

GIVE WHATEVER YOU CAN AFFORD

- Every $10 you contribute means one more Negro child will receive 6 to 8 weeks of equal education.
- Every $100 buys a bus ticket for a Northern teacher, and pays her entire summer expenses.
- Every $1000 opens and sustains a Freedom School

(Make checks payable to AFT Freedom School Project)

Send your checks to:
AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, AFL-CIO
Freedom School Project,
716 N. Rush, Chicago, Illinois 60611

to reproduce it. Much more significantly, the principles established by the Schuller-Columbia activities were made the basis for an impressive series of quarter-million-dollar (more or less) grants by the Rockefeller Foundation to university music departments for composer-performer group-in-residence projects. These began with the Creative Associates at the University of Buffalo under Lukas Foss and Allen Sapp, and the New Music Ensemble at the University of Chicago directed by Ralph Shapey; more recently, the Committee for International Composers' Concerts has been established at Rutgers University under Arthur Weisberg. All of these ventures not only embrace the university orientation of the Columbia group but recruit players from among those involved in the Schuller and Columbia groups, and give concerts in Carnegie Recital Hall (last season the Buffalo group gave four, the Chicago group three; the Rutgers group is scheduled to give four next season). The Rockefellers' discovery of the central role now being played by universities in professional musical life also stimulated during the past season its "orchestra-in-residence" program, in which professional small-city orchestras were made available to university music departments for a period of weeks to play new scores chosen by the departments themselves.

For its recognition on such an "official" level of the developing university leadership and the importance of "advanced" American music, this Rockefeller activity is of great importance. And the scale on which it is being done—creating, in effect, entire new-music performance departments within existing music departments, establishing a self-contained new-music activity on a campus, as well as groups of players with fully rehearsed repertories available for tours to other universities, all under subsidy (thus eliminating most expenses for any prospective sponsor) —seems an almost fantastic super-realization of the implications of the Columbia and Schuller projects.

But such "total benevolence" is, of course, the foundation way; and its realizations sometimes tend to be disappointing by comparison with the structure prepared for them. The first results of the Buffalo and Chicago projects that were displayed in their Carnegie Hall concerts last season were inconclusive. The performances were generally competent, if hardly spectacular (except in the case of Easley Blackwood's extraordinary piano recital in the Chicago series), and the programs were either duplicative (Chicago) or diffuse (Buffalo). Still, such a judgment hardly seems fair, because of the invidious comparison it implies with the polished, well-established New York groups. And the primary value of such campus groups is their ability to offer their communities, at a high professional level, a range of musical experience that has been totally inaccessible and even largely unsuspected. Given the manifest sophistication of their current directors, they seem admirably equipped to make this contribution.

However, other serious questions seem quite generally to have been overlooked in the formulation of these projects. Of these, the most troubling involve the possible effects of such subsidized projects on nonsubsidized activities of the same nature, especially those already in existence. Thus the Rutgers project seems, in many ways, the grandest of all, especially in the quality of its personnel, its strategic location in the New York area and the enormous scope of its planned activities. But its player are, for the most part, to be draw from the same pool on which th Columbia and Schuller series depen —and which, in fact, they developed When one considers the superior financial capacities of the subsidize Rutgers project (which also offer performers faculty rank), as well a the extensive schedules it propose (about twenty-five concerts per season), it is difficult to see how th older series can hope to continue o the minimum-scale basis which the must maintain in order to survive Moreover, having virtually create the cachet of Carnegie Recital Hal as a center for contemporary music Schuller must now share the premise with three other groups of quit similar appearance, all operating under the same auspices. On an equa footing, such competition would b welcome; but the expenses of all th visiting groups are guaranteed, whil Schuller must continue to convinc his sponsors that it is important t continue raising the money he need for every rehearsal and piece o equipment.

Moreover, groups like Schuller' and Columbia's must be able to offer their players the incentive of repeat performances if the tremendou effort of preparation is to seem worth while. But again, when subsidized touring groups whose members are on yearly salary offer simila programs at considerably lower costs the demonstrated professional superiority and commitment of the Schulle and Columbia groups are hardly likely to tip the competitive scale.

Surely the Rockefeller Foundation does not really fancy an image of itself as the sponsor of huge new-music supermarkets devoted to underselling dedicated, high-quality individual enterprises into bankruptcy.

Why, then, did it decide to project a totally new activity onto the New York scene when the two groups responsible for the development, now functioning at the peak of their professional vitality, had never received significant foundation support, and depended for survival on their own desperate fund-raising efforts? The Rutgers project deserved support and sponsorship, but it should have been given them after the remarkable contribution of two groups that are motivated only by professional responsibility and concern had been adequately recognized, and their continuation assured.

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 7-19-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

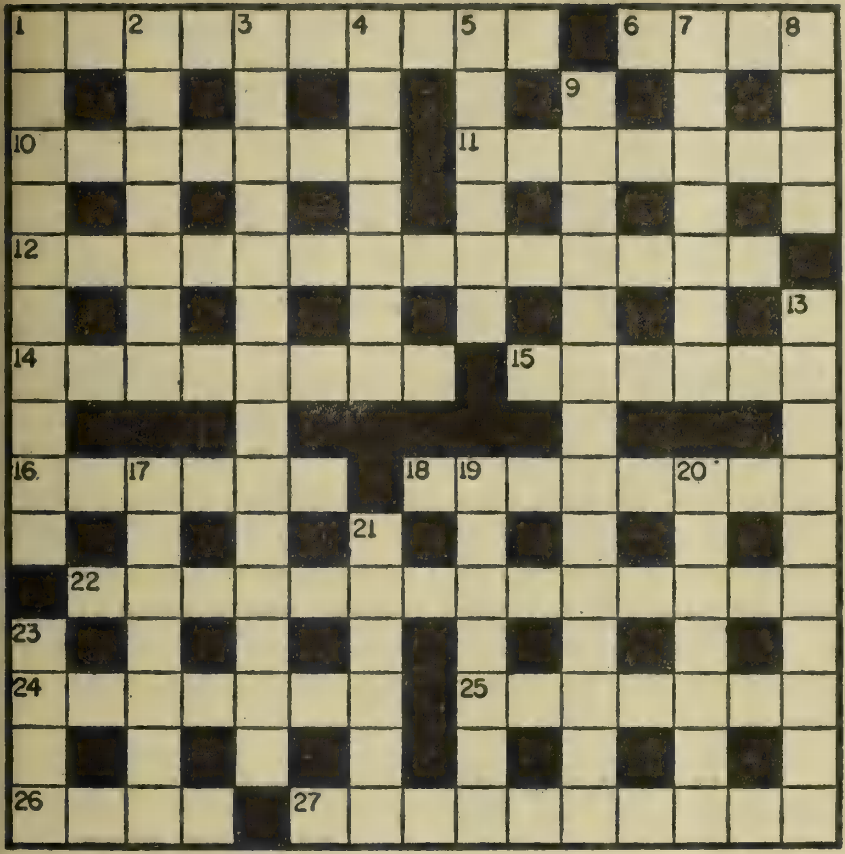
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Crossword Puzzle No. 1114

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 That which could make the game go, used to be leaders, if unprincipled. (10)
6 See 26 across
10 Falsifies otherwise professional men. (7)
11 Turn out where one might expect to see a few yards in the shade. (7)
12 Sounds as though the visitor is an office worker as a matter of habit, which may seem backward. (8, 6)
14 An outgrowth of Easter, it could be an exposition. (8)
15 But the poorest seamen didn't come from this old part of Germany! (6)
16 The wise man knows his could cause a tear or so. (6)
18 and 23 down Survives the journey, as one might do to avoid the draft. (12)
22 Red metal screen? (3, 4, 7)
24 Gives out? On the contrary. (7)
25 A vehicle I have that might be knocking. (7)
26 and 6 Long ago, not written to be descriptive of a Beethoven symphony. (8)
27 Evidently big shots aren't busy in a certain type of train. (4, 6)

DOWN:

1 Many have served with it near the front of the book, possibly. (10)
2 The acme of tool and weapon! (7)
3 Not bad for exertions of the mind on the road going down, as they say. (4, 10)
4 One might say they're filled with hot air! (3, 4)
5 Look for with reason. (6)
7 One might find it in a dish or near the plate. (7)
8 Stretches out, but not in truth. (4)
9 Completes the motion for what thick and thin sometimes does. (7, 7)
13 Twain suggested punch in the presence of one of them. (10)
17 Draws in, as the line has broken. (7)
19 Entirely surrounded by land, but someone else's. (7)
20 Dodger tactics might be. (7)
21 Studded with what many henpecked husbands are. (6)
23 See 18 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1113

ACROSS: 1 Fire control; 10, 9 and 30 Ringside seats; 11 Lief; 12 Dismays; 13 Birdman; 15 Agrimony; 16 Rapids; 18 Places; 21 Insolate; 24 Captive; 26 and 28 Odds and ends; 29 Runic. DOWN: 2 Insomniac; 3, 8 and 31 across Early to bed and early to rise; 4 Owns; 5 Tastier; 6 Oiled; 7 Edging; 14 Cynic; 17 Pilasters; 19 Learns; 20 Several; 22 Sidecar; 23 Tenuto; 25 Tesla; 27 Unit.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

For Indispensable Understanding of today's world and what's to be done

READ

THE WESTERN SOCIALIST

$1 for [illegible] issues — $2 for 18 issues

Recent issues featured:

The Dominican Crisis, Vietnam, Selma, The Dollar Crisis, "The Great Society," Guaranteed Income?, Poverty, An Appeal to Youth.

Sample copy on request; if desired, specify any title above.

Write: THE WESTERN SOCIALIST
11 Faneuil Hall Sq., Boston, Mass. 02109

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE

A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing [illegible] Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books. Summer Theatre. Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

EDUCATIONAL

JEWISH YOUTH AGES 18-26!

Hechalutz Farm in Hightstown, N. J. — the only training farm for kibbutz life in Israel is offering resident scholarships. Successful candidates will receive help with their passage to Israel. Apply: Hechalutz Scholarship Program, Hechalutz Farm, Hightstown, N. J., or 112 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. 3 Tel.: GR 3-2420.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

PERSONALS

INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION YEAR

ICY Postals, Correspondance Cards.
40 for $1.00; 300 for $5.00
THE FRIENDLY WORLD
GPO Box 1004, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11202

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

BOOK STORES: ATTENTION. Experienced bookstore (international) manager. Previous bookshop owner with large clientele seeks similar affiliation in publishing field or bookstore. New York City preferred. Box 578, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014, CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication [illegible] Corp., N. Y. C.

FREE! With every new subscription to THE NATION

THE FERVENT YEARS

by Harold Clurman, 302 pages; list price, $1.75

In this book, a classic in its field, The Nation's drama critic recalls the ideals, personalities, triumphs and errors behind the Group Theatre. That brilliant experiment in the American theatre brought together such then little-known talents as Lee Strasberg, Cheryl Crawford, Clifford Odets, Franchot Tone, Elia Kazan, John Garfield, Irwin Shaw; it produced such memorable and influential plays as Men in White, Johnny Johnson, Awake and Sing, My Heart's in the Highlands and Golden Boy. But beyond recapturing the excitement of those people and events, Mr. Clurman, himself a founder and director of the Group, has written one of the best social and intellectual histories of the 1930s—those tumultuous, tormented and fervent years that a new generation has just begun to discover with mounting pleasure and excitement.

> "Has the fascination of a novel. . . . Mr. Clurman's 'characters' . . . wander in and out of his pages as undraped as if, spiritually at least, they were at a nudist colony."
> —John Mason Brown
>
> "A tale of almost heroic struggle, of clashing vanities, of successes and mistakes, which will always have a place in the history of our stage."
> —Walter Pritchard Eaton, New York Herald Tribune
>
> "Light on the forces in the theatre and in the surrounding social and economic climate of the thirties that drew this wildly assorted collection of actors, directors, writers and eager aspirants into a vociferous effort to create a unity in which they could work and through which they might also live."
> —Theatre Arts

For your FREE copy of THE FERVENT YEARS, fill out subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

7-19-65

AUG 2 1965
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif

THE
NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

AUGUST 2, 1965 . . 35c

THE WAR ON POVERTY

Are the Poor Left Out?

Richard A. Cloward

SCOREBOARD on CUBA

A Revolution Revisited

Leo Huberman

Draper on Castroism

A Review by Samuel Shapiro

EDITORIAL

White & Schlesinger

LETTERS

Voting requirements

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: In your editorial on the disenfranchising effect of state length-of-residence requirements ["Obstacles to Voting," July 5] you failed to note that there are seventeen states with laws similar to that in Wisconsin which permit new residents to vote in Presidential elections on the basis of a period of residence shorter than that required of voters in other elections. Further, there are seven states with laws like the one in Connecticut which permit absentee voting for President by former residents who have not met residence requirements in their new states.

In the fall of 1964, a case was brought in federal court under the sponsorship of the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of a Maryland couple, alleging that as new residents they were about to lose their franchise in the Presidential election. . . . Although we lost Drueding v. Devlin in the district court and the Supreme Court affirmed . . . the litigation did reap an indirect benefit. As a result of the ACLU's prodding, the Maryland legislature has just enacted and the Governor has just signed a new law granting the right to vote in Presidential elections to new residents who have lived in the state for at least forty-five days.

Allison W. Brown, Jr.

Paul Y. Anderson

Knoxville, Tenn.

Dear Sirs: Lillian Elkin has mailed me a copy of the May 31 issue of The Nation, carrying her article based on some of the events in the reportorial career of my late brother, Paul Y. Anderson, whom you call "The Nation's Angry Man." May I say I appreciate the accuracy and fidelity to detail with which Miss Elkin has presented her subject. . . .

The freedom accorded Paul in choosing his subjects and presenting his convictions and evaluations during the years he was writing for The Nation was a source of deep gratification to him; particularly in his condemnation of "wickedness in high places" the feeling of confidence and assurance that The Nation was squarely behind him. . . . Myrtle M. Anderson

Survival in Alabama

Madison, Wis.

Dear Sirs: Grandin Conover, reviewing Letters From Mississippi [The Nation, June 21], states: "If even an hour's orientation on the facts of life in Alabama had been provided for the Selma marchers organized by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Mrs. Liuzzo might not have been riding with a Negro in the front seat. In Lowndes County that's for professionals."

As anyone who went to Selma knows, an hour-plus orientation session was provided and made available to all newcomers. . . . The essential rules of survival were more than adequately stressed. . . . Mr. Conover . . . suggests through implication that a professional would have "survived" the brutal murder. This is absurd and reeks of the "in-group" jealousy of many "professionals." Professionals are not bulletproof. . . .

Patrick M. Quinn

Lincoln on Vietnam

Mays Landing, N.J.

Dear Sirs: In the era of Vietnam, the following Lincoln story (that I think Sandburg dug up) needs no comment:

Lincoln told of a Congressman who had opposed the War of 1812, and when asked to oppose the Mexican War (as Lincoln did) answered: "I opposed one war; that was enough for me. I am now perpetually in favor of war, pestilence, and famine."

Walter Lowenfels

Touring the South

New Orleans, La.

Dear Sirs: Imagine, if you can, a Negro church in a Mississippi town on a hot August evening, jammed to the doors with men, women and children attentively watching a live performance of Samuel Beckett's disturbing and powerful Waiting for Godot. Imagination boggles.

Yet this improbable scene was enacted no less than twenty-three times last summer, during the second Mississippi tour of Free Southern Theater, an integrated professional company based in New Orleans and committed to "bringing theatre to those who have no theatre." ("Theatre of the Meaningful," by Elizabeth Sutherland, The Nation, Oct. 19, 1964). . . .

FST's 1965 tour, starting in Jackson, Aug. 1, will reach twenty-one communities, offering Duberman's In White America, Brecht's Rifles of Senora Carrar and Sean O'Casey's Shadow of a Gunman, presented under the dynamic and imaginative direction of Robert Cordier. By the end of 1965, FST will have brought a vivid, exciting encounter with live theatre to 50,000 to 60,000 people who, until two years ago, had never seen a play.

As FST begins its third Southern tour, contributions are urgently needed. Bare-bone operating expenses total more than $800 a week. The company still needs to acquire such basic capital necessities as a car and a truck to transport actors and props, a portable stage, a mimeograph machine. Money is desperately short. . . .

Contributions are tax deductible. They should be sent to Free Southern Theater, Inc., Box 2374, New Orleans, La. Robert S. Lehman, Minister Unitarian Church of Los Alamos, N.M.

THE
NATION

Monday, August 2, 1965
Volume No. 201, No. 3

In this issue

EDITORIALS
49

ARTICLES
51 Cuba: A Revolution Revisited
Leo Huberman
55 The War On Poverty: Are the Poor Left Out?
Richard A. Cloward
60 Sen. Dirksen vs. The Court
Reo M. Christenson

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
62 Scoring the Revolution
Samuel Shapiro
64 The Trojan Men
Daniel Ford
65 Theatre
Julius Novick
66 Titles of Interest to Nation Readers
67 Riddles: (poem)
Robert Dana
68 Films
Robert Hatch
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 68)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Aug. 2, 1965. Vol. 201, No. 3

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well [illegible] the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest and the Public Affairs Information Service

JAN 1
JUN 7

EDITORIALS

Proconsuls and Ambassadors

If the replacement in Saigon of Maxwell Taylor by Henry Cabot Lodge came as a surprise, Arthur J. Goldberg's appointment as United States Representative to the United Nations was a bolt out of the blue. The more unexpected the event, the more eagerly the press will search for hidden motives—a job difficult at best and downright perilous when the Presidential psyche is Mr. Johnson's. It seems clear, however, that one explanation of Mr. Lodge's return to Saigon—that it is a bid for a return to bipartisanship—is off the mark. Whatever popularity Mr. Lodge may have had at one time with the Goldwater faction of the Republican Party he lost when he came back to the States with the avowed purpose of blocking Goldwater's nomination. He cannot deflect Republican lightnings from Mr. Johnson's head; he may actually attract them, since even the appearance of moderation is anathema to those critics of the Administration who are calling for all-out war against North Vietnam, and are ready to take on the Soviet Union and China as well. It is much more probable that the President fell back on Mr. Lodge because General Taylor was getting nowhere and wanted to be relieved. Knowing the ground, Mr. Lodge has as good a chance as anyone of not making things worse.

To call either General Taylor or Mr. Lodge an ambassador is a misuse of the term. Essentially our man in Saigon is the governor of a turbulent province in the American sphere of influence around China. As Pilate had to mediate among the Jewish factions in Palestine, our ambassador, so-called, must take into account the differences between Catholics and Buddhists and the various factions among the South Vietnamese generals, and try to convince the people that the bombing and slaughter are for their own good. It is unlikely that Mr. Lodge will be more successful in this endeavor now than he was in the past.

The appointment of Justice Goldberg is a far more important Presidential move and affords at least a glimmer of hope that a way out of the Vietnam morass can be found. After Adlai Stevenson's death, the fact emerged that the role of trial lawyer for his country, even before such an august tribunal as the UN, had become less and less to his liking: it was, in fact, an outrageous misuse of an outstanding talent. Probably the President today realizes as much—the dead often have power which is denied to the living. Mr. Johnson's decision to ask Mr. Goldberg to leave the Court simultaneously upgrades the position of U.S. Representative to the UN, puts Mr. Johnson in Mr. Goldberg's debt, and ensures against a repetition of the humiliation to which Mr. Stevenson was subjected, and to which he unhappily submitted.

For Mr. Goldberg the title of ambassador will not be an empty one. Although he is not well known abroad, and has little experience in foreign affairs, he is admirably suited for the post. He is a tough, resourceful negotiator, with a record of getting to the core of a dispute, trimming off the peripheral animosities and finding a solution acceptable to the contestants. Getting sovereign states to agree may be more difficult than reconciling labor and management in the steel industry, but it cannot be much more difficult. Mr. Goldberg does not come to his task without preparation.

That the Goldberg appointment may have a bearing on the Vietnam impasse is not mere surmise. Mr. Johnson presumably is not going into a full-scale war in Southeast Asia with a light heart. He has finally taken note of Senator Morse's oft-repeated argument that the war should be referred to the UN. Mr. Goldberg's presence there may relieve the pressure for a military "solution" (which is inherently impossible) and facilitate a beginning of negotiations.

The Taste of Memory

The almost simultaneous appearance of The Making of the President 1964 by Theodore H. White and (in Life serialization) A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., is further evidence that the United States has entered its late Roman age, when the citizen views government as popular entertainment and political leaders as glamorous stars with whom he can vicariously taste the intoxication of power. Both books could justifiably be subtitled "What the Valet Saw," in the sense that their appeal derives less from their analysis of public affairs than from their revelations of private behavior.

Whatever one may think of this trend, it is clear that Mr. White is a brilliant purveyor to the taste of his times. Having turned the trick initially in 1960, he repeated triumphantly in 1964 with much less interesting material and despite the fact that his principal character, Lyndon Johnson, refused the reporter all access to his person. Mr. White is a technician, a professional journalist; no one is ever in doubt as to what he is up to—he is making an excellent living by the exercise of a well-trained talent.

With Dr. Schlesinger the situation is rather different. He came first into national prominence as one of the most formidable of the younger American historians, a highly publicized member of Harvard's outstanding faculty. John F. Kennedy lifted him from that academic community and made him a personal adviser, in which post he served—we have no doubt most effectively—during the life of the late President. He worked and lived on terms of great intimacy with the nation's leader, was privy to his most intimate thoughts and moods, received him in his home and was received in turn. Though he was not present in the White House as a journalist, Professor Schlesinger no doubt made clear to the President that, as a historian, he would some day set down on paper a record of his first-hand participation in the affairs of state. However, one wonders if Mr. Kennedy anticipated the tone of what was to be published.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated Aug. 16 and Aug. 30.

As a work of history, Schlesinger's book may prove to be unique for the fact that his references to himself are second in number only to his references to his main character. Beyond that, he has an extraordinary memory for what people eat and drink, what they wear on informal occasions, how they address members of their family. He permits himself to compliment the late President's wife on her beauty and charm; he describes the couple's actions and quotes their conversation when they were in their bedroom and must have thought themselves alone.

The second Life installment of A Thousand Days covers the period of the Bay of Pigs. The main points made in Schlesinger's recollection of the behind-scenes events which culminated in this tragic adventure are an assurance to his readers that he opposed it almost from the start and a public expression of regret that he, a very junior member of the conferences, did not rise up and somehow stop the dreadful error. The chapter ends with a tableau (again in the bedroom) of the President almost sobbing as he takes his wife into his arms.

According to Schlesinger's first Life installment, Mr. Kennedy considered Richard Nixon to be a man without taste. Reading these two installments, one is forced to ask how the late President would have characterized this memoir by his confidant. It strikes us that the unfortunate effects of the book may long outlast its predictable popularity. Scholars by their intelligence and special knowledge can contribute immeasurably to government, but a future President who had read A Thousand Days might well think twice before inviting any potential Boswell into his administrative family.

Escalation & Counter-Escalation

The air war against North Vietnam has now been in progress for more than five months, yet the North Vietnamese have not learned, in Secretary Rusk's immortal phrase, to let their neighbors alone. For the same length of time the Russians have been vowing to punish the United States for its punishment of the Vietnamese. This repetitious fuming can hardly go on much longer without the Russians losing such face as they have left. When they come to the end of the verbal rope, what form will action take? Exercises in exploratory Washington journalism have brought the suggestion that the surface-to-air sites being prepared near Hanoi may be used for medium-range ballistic attacks on South Vietnam, with conventional warheads. Another published speculation is that Russian IL-28 bombers, believed to be based in the Hanoi area, escorted by MIG-21 fighters, might attack U.S. aircraft carriers steaming off Vietnam.

Nothing can be ruled out in war, but neither of these ideas seems at all plausible. Fixed-site MRBMs could be disposed of by low-flying American fighter-bombers. As for an attack on the carriers, it might possibly be launched by the Chinese, if they had the means and felt their own security to be at stake, but the present Soviet regime has shown the utmost reluctance to provoke the United States. If a carrier were sunk, or even damaged, such restraint as the Administration has imposed on itself would vanish. Short of a reversion to Stalinism, the Russians appear to have no stomach for such a drastic confrontation.

This does not mean, however, that the Russians are impotent and will not react at some point with means of their choice and with the consent of the Ho Chi Minh regime. The distances in Vietnam are not great. From the farthest north of the Vietnam-China border to the southernmost tip of the Indo-Chinese peninsula is less than 1,200 nautical miles. On VE Day, in Moscow, the Soviets displayed vehicle-mounted mobile medium range missiles (MMRBM) probably capable of covering that distance with a warhead of considerable weight. But weapons of this size might not be necessary. From Hanoi, Danang is about 350 nm, Pleiku about 475 nm; from points close to the 17th Parallel, Danang could be brought under missile fire at a range of 100 nm. Battlefield-support weapons, similar to the U.S. Army's Pershing, with a range of about 400 nm, solid fuel propulsion, inertial guidance, and transport on tracked vehicles, would suffice. The Russians have such weapons in quantity.

Congestion at the principal American air bases in South Vietnam is such that the aircraft cannot be dispersed to minimize the effect of local Vietcong mortar attacks. Under these conditions, missile attacks with conventional warheads might be successful. The missiles would have quick-launch capability and would present a poor target for reconnaissance and bombing. At the same time, direct combat between Soviet and U.S. airmen would be avoided.

But not necessarily for long. From the standpoint of efficiency, conventional warheads leave much to be desired. Pound for pound, the nuclear weapon affords a multiplication factor of tens or hundreds of thousands. When the belligerents begin using missile delivery systems, the temptation to resort to these high yields will become almost irresistible. The missile people will be eager to get into the act, as the Strategic Air Command has already managed to engage itself in the Vietnam rain forests. A vast arsenal of nuclear warheads of all sizes has been accumulated. It takes a good deal of optimism to visualize reciprocal escalation without ultimate resort to the ultimate weapons.

Mars and Motor Cars

Whatever the Mariner 4 photography and scientific measurements of the planet Mars may reveal, the process for recording and transmitting the data is one of the marvels of modern technology. If only the same ingenuity and lavish expenditure were devoted to mundane problems, Americans would be a happier race. One such application would be an all-out effort to reduce the toll of fatalities and injuries on the nation's highways.

The exploration of the cosmos is more difficult than making motor cars less lethal, but it is an activity naturally favored by the federal government. It provides a perpetual show for the public, program material for the networks, news for the newspapers. Its expenditures help to sustain the economy and the profits of the aerospace corporations. It has military aspects—at least the Air Force keeps telling us so. All these are reasons for the federal government's passion for space, in contrast with only a slight and belated quickening of interest in motoring safety.

A few Senators, however, are able to see things in better proportion. Abraham A. Ribicoff, during his two terms as Governor of Connecticut, cracked down on speeders and gave the state the lowest traffic fatality rate in the nation. Mr. Ribicoff is aware that the car manufacturers will give safety little more attention than they must, and now he is working on them. As chairman of a Government Operations subcommittee he accuses them of running their business on the premise that "safety doesn't sell." The record of the past thirty years can lead to no other conclusion. Even to induce the manufacturers to install safety belts required decades of crusading on the part of Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory, Consumers Union and other public-spirited bodies.

Sen. Gaylord Nelson has called attention to the chaotic situation in tire equipment, especially for station wagons, status symbol of the recently arrived middle class. A Goodyear spokesman testified before the Federal Trade Commission that a fully loaded 1965 station wagon should be equipped with 8-ply tires for safe operation. Senator Nelson checked dealers in Washington and found not a single station wagon equipped with the recommended tires. Four-ply was the best that was offered with the cars. Senator Nelson also voiced the complaint of many motorists and dealers, that in the welter of advertising claims it has become impossible for the buyer to know what he is getting in a tire. The size may not be as labeled, and the quality descriptions—first-line, second-line, third-line, premium, super, etc., cannot be referred to any meaningful standard. Tires, says Senator Nelson, "are . . . intentionally mislabeled. As a consequence, thousands of motorists are traveling on tires that are a threat to their lives and the lives of other motorists. . . ."

Senator Nelson has introduced a bill, S. 1643, to establish minimum safety and performance standards for tires and a uniform system of grading and labeling. The passage of this legislation would seem to be in the interest not only of motorists but ultimately in that of the tire and automobile industries as well. The considerations involved are surely as important as whether there are microbes on Mars.

Cuba

A Revolution Revisited . . . .

Leo Huberman

Havana

One of the many jokes circulating in Cuba comes from the excellent Czechoslovakian motion picture, The Accused, recently shown here. Question: "What are the first two phases of socialism?" Answer: "First, the difficulties of development; second, the development of difficulties."

The "development of difficulties" is widely recognized here. Some were inevitable, others resulted from mistakes in planning. The transition from capitalism to socialism in any country, at any time, is not easy; the adjustment from an economy that was formerly an outpost of Florida, 90 miles away, to one that must fit in with the economies of countries 10,000 miles away, is bound to present problems. When, as formerly, goods could flow in a matter of days from supplier to consumer, no storage space or long-term planning was needed; now, port facilities must be enlarged, storage space built both at the port and at the final destination, and the handling and planning of what must come in at what particular moment is essential. To keep the economy functioning smoothly without previous experience with these changed conditions becomes an achievement.

The difficulties are compounded in a place like Cuba where there are so few trained hands to do the work. Good revolutionists are a dime a dozen in Havana, but good engineers, good administrators, good planners are still in short supply. With the intensive educational program in full swing the problem will be solved in time, but right now knowing what to do is not sufficient—you must then find people competent to do it.

The old problem of parts for broken-down machines and replacements for worn-out equipment remains, though it has been alleviated by imports from the Socialist countries. Increased trade with the countries of Western Europe makes possible a satisfactory solution to this nuisance—but capitalist equipment and spare parts must be paid for with dollars or other convertible currency, and the only way to get such funds is through increased exports.

---

Leo Huberman is co-editor with Paul M. Sweezy of the magazine Monthly Review. He has recently returned from his fourth trip to Cuba since the revolution.

If the men, materials and money now allocated to defense could be invested in productive enterprise the dollar supply would increase enormously, but everyone is convinced that the well-trained, magnificently equipped Cuban defense army is a necessity as long as the United States persists in its refusal to leave Cuba alone.

Along with the highly centralized planning that is characteristic of Socialist countries in the first stages of replacing private enterprise by public ownership comes the strangling growth of bureaucracy. Red tape, irritating delays, endless confusion continue to plague the Cuban economy as they have those of the Socialist countries in Europe. "If only I didn't have to make so many decisions which could and should have been made in lower echelons," a vice minister of one of the agencies told me, "I would have time to think about the really important problems of my department."

Contrary to general belief, the problem of centralization vs. decentralization is not peculiar to Socialist economies—it is familiar to the largest corporations in capitalist societies. But the older Socialist societies are still struggling with it, along with the accompanying question of moral or material incentives; and so is Cuba. On my visits here in 1960 and 1961, I was shown more "realistic" plans for increasing the economy's growth, and today the plans of yesteryear are again being discarded and newer, still more "realistic," plans are again being formulated. To conclude from this that there has been a breakdown, or that Cuban planners are incompetent, would be totally wrong: There has been no breakdown; on the contrary, the economy is definitely on the upgrade. And the key planners here are extremely competent; they are merely becoming more and more aware of the many complexities involved in running an economy, and of the fact that the planning experiences of other countries are not necessarily applicable to their own. One of my friends, a brilliant economist who has won wide respect for his outstanding work with the Ministries of Planning, Industries, and Finance, is now an adviser to a top government official. His thoughtful answer when I asked him what were the most important things he had learned in the five years since I last saw him, throws light on this question: "I thought that creating a Socialist society would be a lot easier than I have found it to be. Even more important, I thought then that there were concrete principles and laws that would light the path to a good society. There are no such laws. There is no political economy of socialism." Having come to this conclusion, the next step in a country headed by young, undogmatic, creative people is to discard the old formulas and come up with a new model of a plan better suited to their own needs. Such a plan — a complete break with the models previously borrowed from the Socialist countries—is now in preparation.

As was to be expected, the purely emotional enthusiasm of the early years has gone and a matter-of-fact routine application to the day-to-day job has replaced it. Less talk and more work help the inquiring journalist as well as the economy: the days of long waiting in anterooms or last-minute cancellation of appointments seem to be over. Today one can go to an appointment with a reasonable expectation of getting in fairly close to the hour set.

It must certainly be the case that after a time one learns to live with shortages that were infuriating when first encountered. That probably explains why I found little grumbling about the inconveniences of daily living. It is generally agreed that things are better now than in earlier years and that they continue to improve. One 72-year-old housewife put it this way: "We don't get all we want, but we get all we need."

It will be a long time before Cubans get all they want. Increased production in factory, farm and office is the basic prerequisite and many more stupendous victories, like the 6-million-ton harvest of sugar this year, will have to be won. Credit for that notable success is rightly given to Fidel Castro. "We thought that with a great push perhaps 5 million tons might be possible," a vice minister at Juceplan told me, "but Fidel said 6 million and the attainment of that goal was entirely due to his spectacular success with the masses."

Our press accounts of the cane cutting gave so much space to the voluntary brigades of cane cutters—in an effort to hint that they were not "voluntary" at all—that too little attention was paid to the fact that by far the largest amount of cane was cut by the professional cane cutters to whom substantial material incentives were given. Wage scales were raised beyond those prevailing in other, much easier, agricultural work to which the cane cutters, who are not fools, had flocked in earlier years; many more consumer goods were sent to the cane-cutting areas—the shops in Camaguey were much better stocked than those in Havana; and 5,000 prizes, including trips abroad, refrigerators and motorcycles, were awarded to those who cut the most cane.

It is difficult to say how much of the extremely widespread participation in the cane cutting was, in truth, "voluntary"—and it is not important, except to partisans on both sides. What is important is the political effect of the participation of so many people in the arduous task, with ministers, vice ministers and department heads living and working side by side in brigades with elevator operators, clerks and guards. There is little doubt that some went off to the fields unwillingly because they are not yet fired with revolutionary zeal, and others went hesitantly because cutting cane is very hard work. There is little doubt, too, that most of them returned not only physically more fit but also mentally relaxed and, more important, with the glow of satisfaction that comes from the successful completion of a job, as well as with a feeling of closer kinship with the revolution.

Of greatest significance were the economic effects of the bumper sugar harvest. One million tons can now be sold for urgently needed convertible currency. Agriculture, not industry, is the key to Cuba's development—this has been Fidel's argument with Cuba's planners since 1963, and he has maintained this view even more strongly after a period of concentrated study of agricultural and cattle-breeding problems. To his triumph in sugar must be added a success in cattle raising—Cuba is now exporting cattle. The egg shortage, too, is a thing of the past: Cuba has become one of the world's big egg-producing countries, and with an average of more than 70 million eggs entering the market every month the consumption of eggs here begins to approach the European level.

With much more cane-cutting machinery already on order, with the nation's attention focused on the importance of agriculture, the talk now is of producing 10 million metric tons of sugar by 1970. In addition to sugar (and its by-products, alcohol and molasses), tobacco and minerals (nickel, copper, chromium, manganese) are Cuba's big export commodities. Long-term agreements at fixed prices with the Socialist countries—Russia, China, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Poland—and with a few capitalist countries (e.g., Spain, Japan) ease foreign-trade headaches. Every effort is made to buy what's needed from the Socialist camp; what cannot be obtained there is sought from the capitalist countries. Cuba's imports are mainly oil, rice, wheat, edible oil, beans, fertilizer, jute bags, textiles, spare parts, tractors, trucks, locomotives, buses, machinery. With enough convertible currency, they can all be bought in England, France and other capitalist countries of Western Europe. The United States blockade with its blacklist of shipping is a nuisance, but one way or another Cuba has never failed to import what it needed. Because freight charges in convertible currency are a sizable item, a big shipbuilding program is now under way; in two years, it is hoped, tonnage will be more than doubled.

Cuba, like all other Socialist countries, is proud of its before-and-after-the-revolution statistics. Of most interest to me as a former teacher are those in education. (Educational growth is also the special concern of the leaders of the revolution because, in addition to their devotion to raising the general cultural standard of the people, they understand that in a modern economy high yields in factory and farm go hand in hand with a higher level of technical education; and, as I pointed out earlier, technical cadres are still in short supply.) I was last in Cuba during the Bay of Pigs invasion of 1961. That was called the Year of Education, and it was then that the big program to wipe out illiteracy was launched. In that incomparable campaign, some 258,000 teachers (35,000 professionals, 121,000 adults, 89,000 adolescents, and 13,000 brigadistas who signed up for the final push from October through December) went into every village of Cuba to enroll those of all ages who could not read or write. In one year illiteracy in Cuba was reduced from 23.6 per cent to 3.9 per cent—only the Haitians whose native language is French, the physically and mentally handicapped, the senile, and those who absolutely refused to join classes were not reached.

It is even more impressive that the educational campaign was not just allowed to die, but has been pursued with equal intensity in "follow-up" and "improvement" courses. Today, Cuba is a nation at school.

Drawing by Berger

Shortly after supper at a friend's house, my hostess excused herself because "I have to go to class," and an hour later, the maid ran off because she was "late for school." In every family I met, the story was the same—husband, wife, children, the help, all attending classes at every level of education. There is justifiable criticism of the quality of instruction in the Cuban educational system—professional educators decry the low standards—but of its extent there can be no doubt. In adult education, for the school year 1964-65, the Ministry of Education reports an enrollment of 839,325—this from a total population of 7 million people! Bookstores everywhere, stocked with serious works in economics, politics, history, science, biography and fiction, are crowded with buyers, and it is fairly common for an edition of 50,000 copies to be sold out in a few months. Bajo Palabra by Marta A. González is, understandably, the current bestseller; it is the story of a Cuban who fled to Miami, became disillusioned with the life of the refugees in the United States, and made her way back to Cuba. The first edition of 10,000 copies went in a few hours; the second 100,000 lasted not much longer. In the first years of the revolution, at the old Imprenta Nacional, grandiose publishing schemes were talked about which never materialized; today, Editorial Nacional de Cuba, headed by the famous Cuban writer, Alejo Carpentier, has an excellent list of titles and the whole operation is run on a businesslike basis. Last year it distributed 18 million books.

Perhaps the Cubans read so many books because their press is so bad. Many of the magazines, and all of the newspapers, are of scandalously poor quality. Here again, the difficulty arises primarily from lack of skilled people, plus the fact that there has never been a tradition of good journalism in Cuba. (My listening Spanish is inadequate for a personal judgment on the quality of radio and TV, but I am advised by competent friends that radio and TV are no better than the press.) Though the press in Socialist countries plays a role different from its function under capitalism (for example, as mobilizer in a campaign like that of cutting the cane), and though it is understandable that it should concentrate on domestic affairs, nevertheless one hopes that it will some day be possible to read a Cuban newspaper and learn at least something of what's going on in the outside world. Right now, that's not possible.

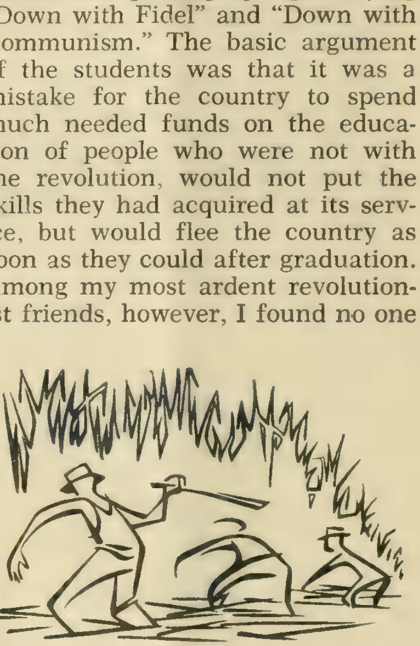
Intellectual Cubans despair of the press, but rejoice in the before-and-after figures in the field of health. Before the revolution the best medical care was to be found in the private insurance schemes which were introduced in Cuba by the Spaniards as early as 1880; now that is changed and the government hospitals have a much higher standard. About 1 million Cubans still cling to private insurance schemes, but the whole population is covered by state socialized medicine. Cuba now has good medical service and it is free to everybody.

By far the greatest achievement of the government health service has been the extension of good medical care to people and places where formerly it was either lacking or too distant. Thus, in the Sierre Maestra, where there were only ten hospital beds, and those within 10 miles of Bayamo, today there are 1,200 beds in the most remote areas, served by doctors who go there on a rotating internship and who get special teaching in minor surgery and pediatric emergencies.

Medical students complete their studies after one year of internship. They are now pledged on graduation to serve in the rural areas for two years. Cuba has 7,000 doctors; it needs another 3,000. Formerly, only Havana had a medical school; in 1962, a second was opened in Santiago. Where there was formerly only one 300-bed hospital for children, there are now three hospitals with a total of 1,100 beds. Health education, better hygiene and prompt attention, previously unavailable in many rural areas, have brought about a significant decrease in gastroenteritis, probably the biggest killer of children in all underdeveloped countries. In a ten-day period a few years ago, polio oral vaccine was given to 2.5 million children up to 15 years of age. Today, there is no polio in Cuba. Psychiatric care is free, and the mental hospital, formerly a real hell hole, is today a beautifully run, first-rate institution.

In 1958, the budget of the Ministry of Health was $21 million; today it is $140 million.

As there are criteria for appraising a country's physical health, so are there criteria for judging its social health. Do the people speak freely? Do they dare to criticize openly? Do they go to jail only for counterrevolutionary activity, or is there also a penalty for counterrevolutionary talk? Some bitter critics of the Castro government whispered to me that one had to "be careful lest we be overheard," but in the main I was satisfied both from conversation (even with them, since they promptly forgot their own injunction!) and from observation that what might be considered counterrevolutionary talk in other Socialist regimes was still freely permitted in Cuba. Nevertheless, there are enough indications of a trend in the opposite direction to worry thinking people. A recent "purge" of some fifty students in the Faculty of Technology and in the Medical School of the University of Havana, and a threatened purge of homosexuals in the university, are cited as cases in point. I asked the leaders of the Federation of University Students (FEU) about it and they stated that the expulsion had been carried out by the student body in general assembly and that there had been no expulsions for talk alone; those expelled had a history of counterrevolutionary ideology and some were guilty of such acts as breaking tables in the School of Architecture and putting up signs saying "Down with Fidel" and "Down with Communism." The basic argument of the students was that it was a mistake for the country to spend much needed funds on the education of people who were not with the revolution, would not put the skills they had acquired at its service, but would flee the country as soon as they could after graduation. Among my most ardent revolutionist friends, however, I found no one who approved of the "purge"—all agreed that it was stupid, unjust and self-defeating in that it would create more enemies of the revolution. Some attributed it to the immaturity and "left-wing infantilism" of the FEU leadership; others were less tolerant—and quite fearful.



Another event which has occasioned much interest was the disappearance some weeks ago of Che Guevara, with no statement as of this writing on his whereabouts. People jokingly substituted the greeting, "Where's Che?" for the usual "hello," and in conversations which ensued, the latest bolas (rumors) were exchanged. But though there is intense interest in the subject, there has been little apprehension—Fidel's answer to a French journalist that Che would always be found where the revolution most needed him reassured most people. The general feeling was that though there might have been some disagreement on policy between Che and Fidel, it certainly did not betoken danger for Che's personal safety. Che is held in such esteem in Cuba as a man of the highest integrity and profundity, his service to the revolution are so universall appreciated, that the only concern was whether his program was in jeopardy (not Che personally bu Che's policies), whether his unexplained absence forecast a departure from his line on this or tha question.

In reflecting on the future of the revolution in Cuba, I was reminded of the observation made by Frantz Fanon in his famous book The Damned of the Earth.

> A struggle which mobilizes all classes of the people and which expresses their aims and their impatience, which is not afraid to count almost exclusively on the people's support, will of necessity triumph.

Such a struggle is being carried on in Cuba today, and the grea mobilizer of the people is still Fidel Castro. No leader in history has ever been so close to the masses; they have followed him now for six year and he has never failed them. They respect and love some of the other leaders, too, but for Fidel there is a special kind of respect and love plus a warmth that comes from the feeling that he is one of them—he "expresses their aims and their impatience." Cubans have a tradition of opposition to government and they love Fidel because he is the guardian of the people's interests—in opposition to his own government! When things go wrong, as they frequently do, Fidel becomes the prosecuting attorney for the people against the bureaucracy; he shouts the questions the people are asking: Who is responsible for this failure? Why is this situation allowed to continue? Will the bureaucrats never learn to do things correctly?

Far from being afraid "to count almost exclusively on the people's support," he seeks it, and wins i because he tells them the truth, and they trust him.

Many of Cuba's old problems persist and new ones arise each day Inefficiency, stupidity, lack of necessary skills, mismanagement and blunders will continue to plague the Cuban economy; but a society tha was prepared to die for a principle as this one was in the crisis of October, 1962, is a good society and will, I believe, "of necessity triumph."

The War on Poverty

Are the Poor Left Out? . . . . .

Richard A. Cloward

The chief concern of the federal anti-poverty program is the victim of poverty, not the sources of his disability. Among the first-aid programs to be established across the country, for example, not the least is the plan to provide out-of-school, unemployed youth with subsidized work, especially in the ghettos where last summer riots broke out. It is all very well to provide subsidized employment for unemployed youth, but where will they work once the brief period of subsidization is over? Since the anti-poverty program does not deal with basic economic problems, such as the lack of full employment or low minimum wages, it cannot expect to shut off the flow of future casualties.

Or take the programs being established in some cities to deal with the current crisis over welfare costs. Some municipalities are proposing to train welfare mothers to become dietary aides and nurses' aides, thereby enabling them to leave the welfare rolls. This may be an advance over their previous status, but it must also be said that such measures reinforce the female as the breadwinner in an already female-headed household. Men for whom there are no jobs will nevertheless mate like other men, but they are not so likely to marry. Our society has preferred to deal with the resulting female-headed families not by putting men to work but by placing the unwed mothers and dependent children on public welfare—substituting check-writing machines for male wage earners. By this means, we have robbed men of manhood, women of husbands, and children of fathers. To create a stable monogamous family, we need to provide men (especially Negro men) with the opportunity to be men, and that involves enabling them to perform occupationally. Over the long term, women will then leave the welfare rolls, not to work but to marry.

Nothing said above should be taken to mean that casualty programs are not needed. No humane society can abandon those who have already experienced the ravages of prolonged deprivation. The point is, however, that low-income people as a class cannot expect to benefit from the anti-poverty program as it is currently conceived. To convert it from a strategy to aid casualties into an attack upon basic economic inequalities will require a good deal of political pressure — especially from low-income groups. That pressure has yet to be organized, but the vague mandate in the anti-poverty program to "involve the poor" could help to bring it into being. Indeed, the concept of involving the poor themselves may yet turn out to be the most significant — and the most controversial — aspect of the entire anti-poverty effort.

It is true that a consensus favoring the anti-poverty program exists and that it includes business and labor, Republicans and Democrats, rich and poor. But that is hardly proof of a national determination to wipe out economic deprivation. Indeed, the very breadth of the consensus exposes the fact that no vital institutional interests are threatened by the program. For this reason, it is relatively easy to develop support among groups whose political and economic interests in other areas are fundamentally divergent.

The anti-poverty program, precisely because of its mandate to "involve the poor," can help to bring about the political preconditions for major economic changes. But this can happen only if the forms of involvement lead to new bases of organized power for low-income people. Economic deprivation is fundamentally a political problem, and power will be required to solve it. Indeed, competition for the power to be derived from the control of vast poverty funds is at the heart of the current controversy over the involvement of the poor.

The President's Task Force Against Poverty, which drafted the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, did not spell out what it meant by "involvement," nor did Congress subsequently clarify this potentially important dictum by amendment. During recent hearings in the House Committee on Education and Labor, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell has castigated one city after another — chiefly Chicago, Washington, Cleveland and New York— for failing to seat poor people on the top municipal anti-poverty councils, where policy will be formulated and funds allocated for programs.

Generally speaking, two arguments are put forward by advocates of placing the poor on these influential bodies. They say that long-term users of public and private agencies (whether as clients of public welfare or of private family-service agencies) can provide a unique insight into the effectiveness of social services — a perspective free of bias stemming from considerations of career, political interests and the public relations needs of agency representatives. It is further argued that the poor can best define their own needs and suggest appropriate uses of federal funds to meet them. Inclusion of the poor, it is said, will help to overcome a long-standing colonialism in the social welfare field (both public and private).

As a result of Congressman Powell's intervention and of pressure from slum communities, a number of municipalities delayed filing applications to the federal government for anti-poverty funds until the question of involving the poor had been debated and resolved. New York City recently announced, for example, that the number of seats available to poor people on its Council Against Poverty would be increased from six to thirty. Other cities have been doing the same. The chief questions under discussion have been how to define a "genuine, certified poor person," and how to establish procedures to appoint or elect such persons. Philadelphia held a much-publicized election in low-income areas. Other cities are contemplating similar steps, while some propose to call conventions of grass-roots organizations to put forward representatives. On the typical city-wide board, it might be added, the poor will join and be outnumbered by powerful leaders of civic, religious, labor, business and private-welfare organizations as well as representatives of municipal government itself. New York's overall committee, for example, now numbers 100. By and large, federal officials have seemed to accept this concept of involvement, and the funds are starting to pour into the cities.

---

Richard A. Cloward, a professor at the Columbia School of Social Work, was a chief architect of Mobilization for Youth, and continues as its director of research. The present article, commissioned by The Nation, was also presented by Dr. Cloward as a statement to the Senate Select Committee on Poverty. It was thus made public before publication and excerpts have appeared in the press.

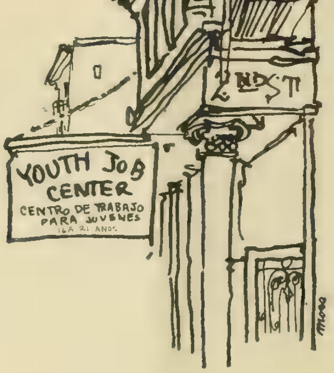
Another form of involvement is the hiring of poor people by local anti-poverty projects to engage in a variety of tasks, from janitorial duties to interpreting poverty programs to the residents in their communities. The Office of Economic Opportunity has specified as the target for next year the employment of some 50,000 such persons, with progressively larger numbers to be employed in succeeding years. In this way, it is suggested, the poor may help one another.

But is the principle of involvement satisfied by representation on municipal poverty councils and employment in anti-poverty programs, or is something more at stake? While the employment of a few thousand (or a few hundred thousand) persons is not to be depreciated, even in an economy where millions are unemployed, a program of public works would have a much more far-reaching impact. Membership on policy-making bodies may confer a little prestige on the poor persons who participate, but it will do little more than that when they are outnumbered by the representatives of powerful organizational interests. Indeed, some of the local groups in cities like New York and Chicago, having been granted representation on city-wide anti-poverty councils, now seem vaguely uneasy about their victory. They begin to sense that they have been victorious on the wrong battlefield, or at least on a relatively non-strategic one. And that, I shall argue, is precisely what has happened. The bitterness of the controversy regarding involvement, and the feeling of local groups that they have won without winning, are persuasive evidence that a deeper meaning of involvement is at stake—a meaning as yet only dimly perceived, and thus not fully articulated, in the current poverty debate.

The possibility that the anti-poverty program can contribute to the growth of low-income power lies in delivering to the poor and their leaders control over the programs and the funds to be funneled into their slum and ghetto communities. In the coming years, billions of dollars will be assigned to depressed neighborhoods. This money is to be used for a wide range of services—subsidized work for out-of-school unemployed youth, remedial education programs, counseling, recreation, etc. To manage these programs, huge social-welfare organizations will have to be created, or existing ones vastly expanded. Thousands of jobs will be created, and whether these are filled by professionals or by the poor, the new workers will owe allegiance to those who manage the operation. In short, the organizations to be created or expanded will constitute a new and potentially important source of power.



Who will derive that power? That issue has so far failed to emerge clearly in the present controversy. But to say that the issue has not yet been fully grasped by the public does not mean that it is unrecognized privately. Many groups — notably public officials and private social-welfare agencies —are acutely aware that they have vital interests at stake, and they are quietly moving to secure their positions by obtaining firm control of the anti-poverty programs.

The poverty structures being projected in New York and Chicago are examples of attempts by government officials to dominate the forthcoming programs. Under conditions of great secrecy, both cities put forward some months ago plans for establishing decentralized, multi-function public agencies in designated slum neighborhoods. New York calls them "Community Progress Centers"; in Chicago they are "Urban Progress Centers." Most of the municipal anti-poverty programs are to be operated from these centers. In both cities, the centers are to be responsible to a city-wide corporation dominated by public officials or persons directly appointed by public officials. The director of each Chicago center is to be appointed by the central agency, and policies will be generated there as well. Community committees of low-income people and institutional representatives will also be created in each neighborhood of both cities. Their functions were originally intended to be purely advisory, and still are so in Chicago. In New York, however, local community groups have brought sufficient pressure upon city hall to gain somewhat greater powers for the neighborhood committees; nevertheless, they still lack the full powers of a legally constituted board of trustees. With the funds to hire thousands of people and to serve many thousands more, these decentralized agencies, it seems clear, will greatly expand the influence of city hall in the slum, not the slum's influence in city hall. Indeed, it is tempting to suppose that they are intended to do just that.

Community groups are beginning to realize that their stake in the present controversy is the right to mount autonomous, self-directed anti-poverty programs in their own slums and ghettos. In New York, such organizations have slowly been developing: Central Harlem's HARYOU-ACT, East Harlem's MEND, Bedford-Stuyvesant's Youth in Action, South Bronx's SEBU, and the new city-wide organs of the Puerto Rican community (the Puerto Rican Forum and the Puerto Rican Community Development Corporation). Still others are in the making. Potentially, at least, these organizations represent a new base of power, a new institutional framework in the slum through which pressure can be exerted against the oppressive institutions of the larger society. Because public officials have perceived the meaning of this trend, much anti-poverty planning in New York and Chicago has gone on behind closed doors.

If local community-action groups could be relied on merely to carry out politically neutral social-service programs for the casualties in their midst, the current dispute would generate somewhat less heat. But the trend toward neighborhood control is also coupled with the idea of organizing poor people to work for social change, and that is a major threat. One of the early signs of profound distress among municipal officials regarding the stirrings in slums and ghettos was their response to the riots last summer. In New York, which was not atypical, the outcry was that the riots had been inspired by subversive forces (although the FBI later denied this allegation and suggested, ironically, that out-of-school unemployed youth had had much to do with them). That, at least, was the explanation offered to the public by Paul R. Screvane, President of the City Council, as well as of the Anti-Poverty Operations Board. Indeed, it was only a few weeks after the New York riots that Mr. Screvane lent the great prestige of his office to a massive — and unfounded — attack upon Mobilization for Youth, a forerunner of the anti-poverty program on Manhattan's Lower East Side; he repeated his charges of a Communist take-over, with reference to MFY's policy of encouraging rent strikes, civil rights protests and other collective actions by local residents.

This failure to acknowledge the new forces in the slums marks city halls everywhere. The Conference of Mayors, meeting recently in St. Louis, very nearly issued an official statement condemning the federal anti-poverty program because some funds had reached local groups "whose activities were undermining the integrity of local government." Several of the mayors spoke bitterly of the "subversion of the federal program," forecast nothing less than "class welfare" unless something were done, and otherwise expressed deep concern that involvement of the poor might result in the city hall's being defined as "the enemy."

The fact is, however, that today's slum and ghetto lack a radical tradition of any kind. The controversy over the involvement of the poor has its roots in relatively moderate ideologies—self-help, local autonomy, democratic collective action, and the importance of ethnic separatism. The struggle, in short, is in the tradition of urban politics and nothing more. Local groups, composed largely of today's ethnic poor, are merely beginning to articulate their interests as blocs, and to demand that they be aided in building institutions to give those interests form and coherence. It may be asking too much of established power groups to recognize the value of this development, but it must be made clear that they are not being confronted with anything resembling a revolutionary movement.

In this conflict, municipal officials are finding many allies among leaders of the private social-welfare establishment. In a recent report, to cite one case, United Neighborhood Houses in New York (the city-wide coordinating body for all settlement houses) describes local slum groups which are seeking to operate their own programs as "grasping at the chance to get control"; these groups and others as well are downgrading "every social agency that has its roots in the past, even though its current ideas and programs are forward-looking and ahead of the times," and are "demanding new projects and rejecting the undergirding of proven ongoing programs." In other words, the aspiration of these groups to build new organizations under their own control is regarded by some private agencies as a threatened disruption of the orderly patterns of giving and receiving in which they and the poor have traditionally been engaged. "In the long run," the statement of United Neighborhood Houses continues, "it is the experienced, neighborhood-based agencies such as the settlements that can best provide the knowledge and the skills to nourish the new anti-poverty programs and help them to be effective. . . . We are determined that the victors in this war shall be the poor—not the self-seeking spokesmen who claim to represent them. . . ."

On the strength of such arguments, and buttressed by their considerable power in many municipalities, voluntary agencies are making considerable progress in penetrating anti-poverty councils and influencing on their own behalf the distribution of federal funds. Without doubt, they will come in for a sizable piece of the pie. United Neighborhood Houses, to quote again from its statement, suggests the extent to which it will probably benefit from New York's anti-poverty program:

SAGSOORIAN

> Through its president, executive and several of its staff, UNH has been closely involved in almost all of the Poverty operations. . . . From the beginning, we . . . helped develop procedures for . . . the Neighborhood Youth Corps. We are active on the Ad Hoc Committee for Head Start. . . . We . . . now administer the settlements' part in the City's Neighborhood Youth Corps. To supervise this we have, with Youth Corps funds, added fifteen people to our staff and enlarged our offices.
>
> The score at the moment is: 31 settlements [are involved in Neighborhood Youth Corps]; 20 settlements have requested Head Start programs . . . 13 settlements are working on plans for community action programs . . . at least a dozen houses expect approval for special projects in a variety of services from pre-school programs to work with unwed teenage girls to employment programs for the elderly and new expanded neighborhood services.

Existing agencies, obeying an understandable urge to maintain if not to expand themselves, will seek to enlarge their funds through the anti-poverty program, and they can thus be expected to resist the formation of competing agencies under new sponsorship.

And it may well appear to the agencies which now possess power that other groups wanting a share of it are "grasping," for indeed they are. The controversy over the involvement of the poor is precisely one of power and its redistribution,

The Man Who 'Saved' MFY

The first indication that Mobilization for Youth would be an issue in the current political campaign for the mayoralty of New York came on June 21. On that date, Paul Screvane, President of the City Council and chairman of the Anti-Poverty Operations Board, appeared before the nominating committee of the Liberal Party to seek their endorsement (later given to John Lindsay). Following the meeting, Mr. Screvane announced to the press that he had not participated in the witch hunt against MFY, and claimed that "were it not for me, there would be no MFY." In view of his public record on MFY, it was a surprising statement.

When the Daily News first attacked MFY on Aug. 16, 1964, it quoted Mr. Screvane as follows: "We have heard reports of subversive infiltration of MFY. That is why we have been investigating. We have contacted the FBI. Everybody is concerned over these reports of alleged Communist infiltration." On August 21, he reiterated the concern of the Anti-Poverty Operations Board regarding the suspected infiltration of MFY, not alone by "political subversives," but by what he called "sociological subversives" as well (The News).

It was also Mr. Screvane who, in those first days of the attack, introduced into the press (The New York Times, Aug. 17) the charge that MFY had printed the infamous "Wanted For Murder—Gilligan the Cop" poster—a document which is widely credited with having precipitated the Harlem riots. Within twenty-four hours, The Times denied this charge, on information received through its sources in the police department. The FBI was also to deny it in a subsequent report to President Johnson. Mr. Screvane, however, has never withdrawn his charge.

On September 1, Mr. Screvane released the first of his three reports to Mayor Wagner on his investigation into MFY. Among other things, he asserted that "MFY, financed with taxpayers' public funds, must not be a base of activities and a safe haven for subversives, to be given free rein, and public financing, for their disruptive activities." He went on to observe that MFY personnel "seem to be more deeply involved in agitation than in education." That the issue of subversive infiltration was of very much concern to him is revealed by his account of actions being taken in connection with the investigation: "Information on personnel which was supplied to me at my request by the FBI (which consists entirely of fragmentary nonclassified material) is being reviewed and related to the fuller information in the files of the Police Department Bureau of Special Services and of our own Department of Investigation."

About a dozen MFY staff members were subsequently subpoenaed. With thousands of dollars for legal costs raised by MFY's 300 staff members, these employees chose to make a court challenge of the city's right to interrogate private citizens about their political beliefs and associations. To avoid the adverse publicity associated with protracted litigation, the city chose not to pursue these court actions, and the employees thus eventually succeeded in resisting interrogation. Although the subpoenas are still in force, the matter is now likely to be dropped.

On Jan. 15, 1965, Mr. Screvane released his final report, in which he asserted that "the most delicate, troublesome and yet demanding of all the subjects of inquiry was the allegation of infiltration by subversives." There was nothing delicate about his conclusions:

> With regard to alleged subversives on the staff of MFY, it is clear that there had been hired a considerable number of individuals . . . who certainly would not have been hired if they had been subjected by the City Government to routine personnel screening. . . .

Who this "considerable number of subversives" were, what they had done to be defined as subversives, whether any of them had misused their positions as employees at MFY — none of these matters is discussed by Mr. Screvane.

After an investigation lasting more than six months, then, we are left merely with Mr. Screvane's personal opinion that MFY had been infiltrated by subversives — and this is the same Mr. Screvane who now puts himself forward as the savior of MFY.

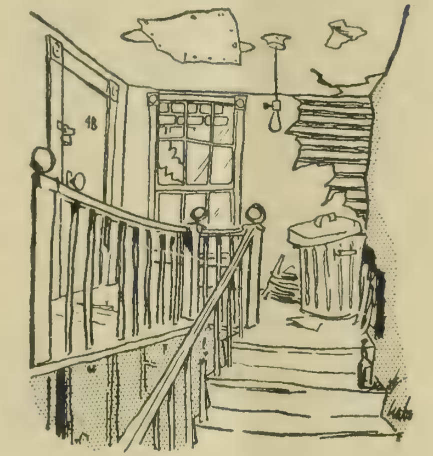
The Editors

not alone in the broader society but also in the more specific but still vast field of social welfare. The issue concerns not merely administrative efficiency and experience but justice. If spokesmen for slum communities permit what are chiefly questions of class and ethnic politics to be converted into technical, professional and administrative matters, they will have conceded the battle over involvement of the poor before it can be fully joined.

To employ a phrase like "ethnic politics" is to face another —and perhaps the most important —element in the current situation. The issue is not only one of developing new institutions in the slum, but of developing institutions under expressly ethnic control (e.g., Central Harlem's HARYOU-ACT). Observers who are troubled by the thought that "separatist" programs will be created under the slogan of a war against poverty should bear in mind that while poverty is a reflection of class differentials in power, those differentials are produced and maintained in part by inequities in the power possessed by various ethnic groups. Powerlessness and poverty are disproportionately concentrated among minority groups — Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Mexicans and the like. America has faced the problem of assimilating such groups into its economic blood stream many times in the past, and religio-ethnic institutions of various kinds have played an important part in that process.

One way by which poverty-stricken groups effect their rise from deprivation is to develop communal associations—ranging from fraternal and religious bodies to political machines. These communal associations provide a base from which to convert ethnic solidarity into the political force required to overcome class inequality. Communal associations, in brief, are an important device by which the legitimate interests of particular groups are put forward to compete with those of other groups.

There is, it should be stressed, considerable precedent both for ethnically based social-welfare institutions and for public funding of them. Indeed, the voluntary social agency has been one instrument of ethnic power in urban areas, and its power has not been diminished by the vast public subsidies it has attracted. Huge networks of agencies have been formed by Jews (in New York, the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies) and by white Catholics (in New York, Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York). Even Protestants, under the impact of a pluralism which has made them a minority as well, have formed essentially white ethnic institutions (in New York, the Federation of Protestant Welfare Agencies). Across the country, these voluntary welfare systems raise huge amounts of money from private individuals and organizations. What is more, by virtue of their considerable power, they command enormous amounts of tax money as well. (Religio-ethnic welfare institutions, ranging from hospitals to child-care facilities, are now routinely paid upward of $100 million annually from New York City's municipal budget alone.)



The chief point to be made about private agencies is that they are as much political as social-welfare institutions. They symbolize the highest values of self-help, to be sure, and their services have ordinarily been directed to the less fortunate citizens among us. But none of this makes them any the less sensitive to their organizational interests or to the broader interests of their controlling constituencies.

Exerting pressure for various forms of public subsidy does not exhaust the range of political objectives held by private agencies. They also maintain a deep interest in many forms of governmental policy and actively seek to influence the shaping of policy in ways consistent with their interests. This critical point is often overlooked because private agencies exert power chiefly at the municipal level, not at the more visible level of national politics. But it is primarily at the municipal level that public services are organized and delivered to their intended consumers. The quality of programs—public welfare, education, urban renewal, housing-code enforcement, fair employment, law enforcement and correctional practices — all of these are crucially shaped by the character of municipal government.

When private agencies take positions on this expanding range of governmental programs, they are solicitous for their own interests—even when, as sometimes happens, their interests run counter to those of the most depressed minority poor. If minority groups expect to influence the proliferating arenas of governmental activity, they will need their own organizational apparatus to help. Such an apparatus will provide a stable cadre of technical and professional personnel who can examine the merits of alternative public policies, survey the practices of governmental agencies, and activate their own low-income constituencies in behalf of needed changes.

In these terms, then, ethnically based social-welfare structures facilitate the assertion of expressly ethnic interests, and provide a vehicle by which to influence important spheres of public policy. For lack of private money, an insufficient sense of community and other reasons as well, the contemporary minority slum does not contain many such institutions. There is no Negro Federation of Philanthropy in New York or anywhere else, although some of the ethnic organizations now developing may be the beginnings. But these organizations are meeting intense opposition from city officials who have no wish to accelerate the growing cohesion of minority groups by supporting the development of organizations specifically addressed to their needs. Other forces also oppose them, as witness the unrelenting fury with which the press in New York has attacked HARYOU-ACT and its executive director, Livingston Wingate. Settlement-house leaders, deploring the idea of permitting ethnic or class segments to build separate organizations, argue that the true goal of community development is to bring everyone together in the same structure. The logic of this position is that community problems are common ones and can best be solved through cooperation and communication. All things considered, however, it is difficult to see how the interests of the Puerto Rican slum dweller are congruent with those of the Jewish landlord or the aspirations of the unregistered Negro with those of the Italian political-machine leader.

That powerful and divergent ethnic, as well as class, interests are at stake in this controversy over the involvement of the poor is thus becoming obvious. Those who are appalled by the possibility that such conflicts might be exacerbated, especially as a result of governmental policies, fail to understand that strategies of conciliation and coalition will not bring the poor into the mainstream of American life. What the poor need are a heightened awareness of conflicting interests and the means to organize separately. For within coalitions of unequals, it is not typically the case that the least organized have much success in advancing their interests. Judging from the history of ethnic groups who in the past have struggled to gain a foothold in our pluralistic society, it seems clear that the growth of ethnic separatism is a precondition for eventual penetration of ruling circles and full economic integration. Minority groups will win acceptance by the majority through developing their own bases of power, not by submerging their unorganized numbers in coalitions dominated by other and better organized groups.

No one should suppose that single system of new institution can produce the collective force t overcome the deeper inequalities i our society. The building of ethni identity, solidarity and power is ordinarily accomplished through series of organized communal experiences. While some may be mor important than others, all contribute to the overall impact. Thes are the terms, then, in which th pressure for a "new social-welfar voluntarism" must be understood The question is whether this movement will be allowed to develop i one city after another, or whethe powerful coalitions of governmental and traditional voluntar leaders will succeed in blocking it

Sen. Dirksen vs. The Court . . Reo M. Christenson

The civil rights movement, which has done so much to arouse America to the need for both racial equality and a major anti-poverty program, may perform a third notable service. It may be the decisive influence in beating back the proposed amendment to nullify the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" reapportionment ruling.

At one point Sen. Everett Dirksen's proposed constitutional amendment, which would permit one house of the state legislature to be apportioned "on a basis other than population" if a majority of the state's voters approved, looked to be a more formidable threat than it does today. Twenty-five state legislatures had petitioned for a constitutional convention to draw up an amendment overthrowing the Court's decision (thirty-four states are required to call the convention into being). A potent array of right-wing organizations and periodicals were mobilizing behind the Dirksen amendment. The American Civil Liberties Union reported that at least 250 members of the House favored a Dirksen-type amendment, and about sixty members of the Senate were sympathetic to it, with many others undecided. Even Sen. Jacob Javits of New York went on record favoring an amendment substantially similar to Dirksen's.

Then the opposition zeroed in. The purpose of the amendment is to maintain, at least in part, the advantage that rural sections have traditionally enjoyed in state legislatures. But as former Asst. Attorney General Burke Marshall and others have charged, this amendment would in effect invite Southern states to apportion one house on a racial basis, thus largely canceling the gains Senator Dirksen was trying to confer upon Southern Negroes when he strengthened the 1965 voting rights bill. Passage of the amendment would also weaken the political influence of Negro and other minority voters in non-Southern legislatures, since the perpetuation of rural overrepresentation would work against the achievement of Negro goals in general. The Negro's problems are largely urban problems, and it is the rural legislator's indifference to these problems that lies behind much of the dissatisfaction with current apportionment practices.

Could the Dirksen amendment be revised to prevent apportionment from reflecting racial considerations? If this were done, it would indirectly defeat the purpose of the nullifiers, since Negroes are heavily concentrated in Northern cities. Besides, it would be embarrassing to favor Negro over other minority groups. How could Congress explicitly defend Negro voting right against abridgment by malapportionment, while ignoring the possible threat to the political equalit of other minority groups? The ne political result of such a move moreover, might be to add Souther legislators to the liberal bloc tha opposes any effort to overturn th Court's decision.

There has been some talk therefore, that Senator Dirkse might be receptive to other modifications of his amendment. Perhap any concrete application of "othe than population" should be subjec to court review. Perhaps apportionment policies should be subject t periodic reappraisal by voters in th various states, to prevent a give plan from being frozen into institutional form despite population an opinion shifts.

Sen. Birch Bayh, chairman of subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which is handling the Dirksen amendment, has suggested tha no reapportionment plan should g into effect in a given state until it legislature has first been elected o a "one man, one vote" basis, so tha such a plan could grow out of truly representative, rather than stacked, body. The Dirksen force could never accept this, of course since a representative legislatur would be most unlikely to creat

---

Reo M. Christenson teaches in the Department of Government at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

n unrepresentative successor that would threaten the jobs of some of its members.

Senator Bayh has further suggested that legislatures be required to submit a specific plan to the voters, rather than merely request permission to reapportion as their fancy dictated. This, too, will be resisted. It is much easier to arouse opposition to a specific malapportionment plan than to an innocent-sounding statement about "other than population."

If the Dirksen amendment is not amended to impotence, a number of Senate liberals are prepared to conduct "protracted debate" in an effort to kill it or to force major revisions. If this tactic should appear inadequate, there is always the chance that Lyndon Johnson will lend a hand. The President is congenitally allergic to carrying the flag on hotly controversial questions, and his instincts will dictate steering clear of this one, especially if his help seems unnecessary. But if the opposition seems unable to thwart the nullifiers, he may use his influence behind the scenes to block Senator Dirksen. It is generally believed that Mr. Johnson can win this fight if he chooses to do so.

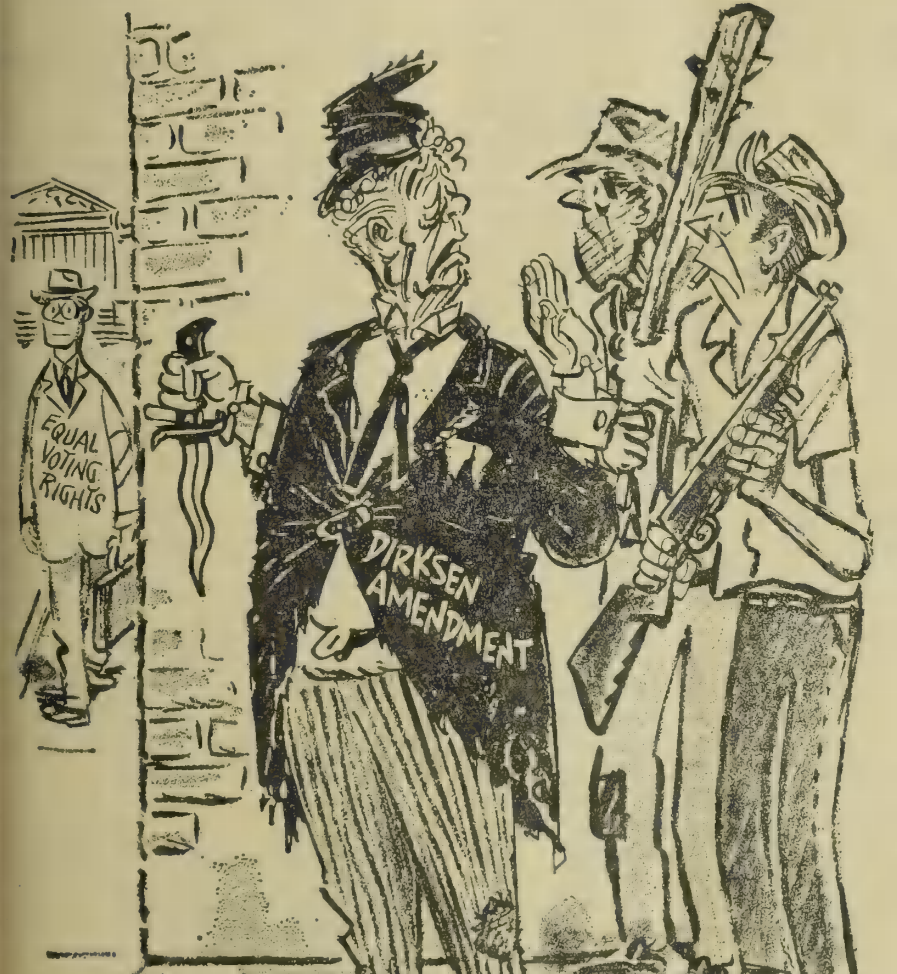
A final factor has weighed heavily against the Dirksen forces from the outset: the nullifiers have a pathetically weak case. Rural folk are a minority, but so are the aged, Catholics, Christian Scientists, small businessmen, engineers and dry-goods salesmen. Why single out country people, among all the minorities in the land for special electoral protection?

Contrary to the oft-repeated claim that "machine bosses" in the big cities would dominate the political affairs of the states, these "machine bosses" are incapable of manipulating and controlling urban voters these days. At most, they help people register and reach the polls. Nor do urbanites hold common political views that would encourage the formation of political juggernauts to steam-roller the non-metropolitan areas. The cities, and their representatives in the state houses, are as diverse in their interests and outlooks as one might reasonably expect them to be. Within metropolitan areas, Republicans oppose Democrats, liberals oppose conservatives, businessmen oppose unions, small businessmen oppose big businesmen, churches oppose liquor interests, Negroes oppose whites, etc.

Political parties would not ignore rural-small town interests even if most of the effective voting power were shifted to the cities. Parties seek majorities in the state legislature, and since neither party could normally sweep the metropolitan area tickets, they would have to look for additional support throughout the state. Even when a majority is in sight, parties covet every possible seat—and the way to win is to offer an attractive program to voters in every district. While the "one man, one vote" principle will undoubtedly lead to a greater focus on urban problems, even a small minority may hold the balance of power in a close election. That is how American politics operate, and that is why rural people can be properly represented even if they are not overrepresented.

To the charge that a bicameral legislature is superfluous if both houses are based on a similar representative principle, Walter Lippmann has proposed that the bicameral tradition might be usefully preserved if one house were considerably smaller than the other, with each member representing a larger number of persons and holding office for a longer term.

In summary, it would be hard to conceive of an amendment more destitute of rational support. But, alas, logic does not always or even usually, prevail in Congress. Thus an aroused awareness of the Negro's stake in opposing the Dirksen amendment is a useful weapon. If those who speak for the Negro put up a fight, they can doubtless derail one of the most mischievous proposals of our time.



"My Dear Chaps, Have You No Refinement, No Finesse?"

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Scoring the Revolution

CASTROISM: Theory and Practice. By Theodore Draper. Frederick A. Praeger. 263 pp. $5.95. $1.95 paper.

Samuel Shapiro

Theodore Draper continues to provide the most thoroughly researched and thoughtfully written statement of the American case against Fidel Castro. In the four articles (two of them reprinted and two of them new) that make up his latest book he refines and brings up to date his analysis of the Cuban Revolution. Although he admits one or two past errors, this newest appraisal is generally consistent with what he has written during the past five years. As he puts it, "I feel fortunate in that I have not needed to change my basic view of Castroism."

In his first and most convincing chapter, wading through a mass of speeches, interviews, party programs and letters, Draper traces the curious and complicated relations of Castro and the Communists. From their original distrust of Fidel as a "bourgeois . . . putschist" in 1953, Cuba's old-line Communists entered into an uneasy alliance with him in 1958 and seemed to arrive at ideological and political dominance in 1961, only to be ousted again, one after another, between 1962 and 1965. The only constant factor in the revolution's constantly changing course has been the power, egoism, personal appeal and caudillo-like qualities of Fidel Castro:

> Castroism today (Draper sensibly concludes) represents a tendency within the world Communist movement . . . a particular case of cross-fertilization . . . of a Latin American revolutionary tradition and the European Communist tradition, just as Leninism represented a cross-fertilization of the Russian revolutionary tradition and the European Marxist tradition.

The special features of Castro-style communism, then, in addition to the charismatic leadership of el lider máximo, are that it came to world communism voluntarily, from without, that it advocates immediate revolutionary violence everywhere in the Western Hemisphere, and that it "has made the first Marxist-Leninist revolution in the Spanish language," i.e., it claims Communist leadership throughout Latin America. Both friends and foes of fidelismo, everyone except the die-hards who believe that Castro was a Communist practically from the cradle, can accept Draper's perceptive analysis of Castro's origins and goals, especially since almost all of it is based on public statements by the Cuban leaders themselves.

Draper's description of the economic policies of the Cuban Revolution is more open to question. What he says about the blunders of the regime, the plowing under of sugar cane, the overemphasis on industrialism, the agricultural mistakes of 1961-63 is true enough and thoroughly documented. Not enemies of the regime but Castro himself and his supporters spoke of "bureaucratized anarchy," of "revolutionary infantilism," of "economic cretinism"; the Vice Minister of Industry, a loyal revolutionary whom I interviewed in 1962, said that the proper title of his office should be "Ministry of Chaos."

But the economic policy of the revolutionary government, especially when looked at from a longer-term point of view, has not been the simple record of blunders and brutality set down by Draper. In the first place, pre-Castro Cuba was far worse off than he is willing to admit. He quotes the by now familiar statistics: per capita income of $356 in 1958, 24 per cent illiteracy, 20 per cent unemployment during the slack season "even in 1956-57, a period of economic upturn," a per capita decline in output between 1950 and 1958. By comparing Cuba to Ghana and to Mexico he tries to make these figures look relatively good; actually, considering Cuba's natural wealth, intelligent and enterprising people, absence of population pressure, and proximity to the United States, they are appalling. If this kind of economy, plus the Batista dictatorship, was all that Cuba could achieve after sixty years of American domination, perhaps we can understand why Castro and Guevara thought they would be better off as members of the Soviet bloc. For good or evil, at any rate, the Cuban economy is now being run from Havana, and not from Washington or Wall Street, a circumstance which gives a great many Cubans a considerable amount of psychological satisfaction.

Nor is the economic and social situation in Cuba as bleak as Draper, who has not visited the island since 1960, would have us believe. Reports from American newspaper men in Cuba in 1964, which Draper chooses to ignore, do not confirm his picture of a terrorized, suffering population.

Ernst Halperin in Encounter, February, 1964:

> My own feeling on returning to Havana after an absence of two years is one of astonishment that things should still be going on as they are, that there are still buses and private cars in the streets, that the streets are still being cleaned, that the people in them still look reasonably well-fed and clothed, and that the whole city still gives one the impression of being on a higher level of economic development and general well-being than most cities in Latin-America.

Juan de Onis, The New York Times, March 31, 1964, on the draft which Draper calls a scheme to get cheap forced labor:

> There are . . . youths who see a tour of duty as a way of improving their vocational training and job prospects. This is especially true in rural areas. (One farm boy lied about his age to get taken earlier): "I know all about cutting cane and yoking oxen. What I want to learn is a trade, and they will teach me that in the army."

Richard Eder, The New York Times, May 24, 1964:

> (The regime has an) apparently solid hold on youth. The fact that it is providing wide educational opportunities and after that, jobs, even if poorly paid, the fact that its leaders are young, and that there is a spirited sense of movement about the whole thing. All this attracts most of Cuba's young people.

Bob Considine, Hearst Headline Service, July, 1964:

> This revolution is unlike anything else in the Soviet sphere. Everybody is permitted to have a gun, all (church) denominations > are again wide open and well attended. Ordinary people interrupt Castro in the middle of a speech and question him.

Samuel Shapiro teaches history at the University of Notre Dame (South Bend). His latest book is Invisible Latin America (Beacon Press).

Philip Geyelin, The Wall Street Journal, August, 1964:

> (There are) a host of . . . Cubans whose addiction or indebtedness to Fidel makes them a bulwark to his regime and a sizable obstacle to any policy the U.S. might devise for removing Castro. Thousands of students are pouring through Cuba's universities and technical schools. . . . Not only is their education and their brainwashing paid for by the government, but those who need it get free lodging and a spending allowance. Already they number over 100,000 and comprise perhaps the revolution's loudest advocates. . . . Perhaps 35%—and conceivably as much as half—of Cuba's 7 million population look favorably upon the revolution to greater or lesser degree; perhaps one-third is passive, either by indifference or intimidation; and maybe one-quarter is opposed. There is precious little evidence of disaffection where it would count the most—among top military men—and not much evidence ef meaningful dissension anywhere else.

Wally Porterfield, Milwaukee Journal, August 5, 1964:

> Castro and his Communists have . . .
>
> Given the poor of the island full stomachs.
>
> Built many schools in an attempt to end what had been wide illiteracy, although what people may read, particularly newspapers, is blatant propaganda.
>
> Established a law that no one pays more than 10% of his income for rent.
>
> Given the Cubans free medical care.
>
> Made certain that all young children get adequate milk. . . .
>
> We concluded that the majority of Cuba's peasants and workers—the bulk of the island's population—supported Castro.

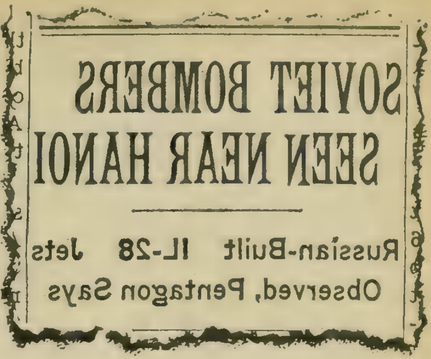
Max Lerner, after a visit to last year's 26th of July celebrations, concluded that "Castro's Cuba is not all evil or all good, and it is one of the hardest revolutions in my experience to strike a balance sheet for." But Draper, evidently, is not interested in striking a balance, but in acting as a prosecuting attorney. His account of Cuba is just as true, and just as short of the full truth, as those recurrent stories in Cuban papers which present the United States as nothing more than a seething cauldron of poverty, racial prejudice and violence.

When the evidence does not help Draper's case, he ignores it, a practice more praiseworthy in an attorney than in a journalist-historian. Cuba's massive investment in education, for example, is one of the most impressive programs in the underdeveloped world. Draper might well want to criticize it for ideological rigidity or to argue that its effectiveness has been exaggerated; instead he ignores it. He tells us that there were still so many illiterates left in 1964 that Guevara had to prohibit their employment in his Ministry of Industry, and that the evaluation of education "poses special problems"—and that is all he tells us. It seems strange that a man who can look into the minds of Cuba's revolutionary leaders ("Short of utter capitulation, I cannot conceive of any U.S. policy that would have satisfied the souls of Fidel, Raul, and 'El Che' "—Castro's Revolution, 1962) is unable to find anything to say about a program that has doubled primary school enrollment, tripled secondary school enrollment, and involved 700,000 illiterate adults (Dudley Seers, et al., Cuba: The Economic and Social Revolution, 1964, an important study which Draper ignores).

In his last, and weakest chapter, Draper makes his policy recommendations in the form of a reply to Senator Fulbright's Old Myths and New Realities (1964). The Senator's cautious call for a reappraisal of our policy of absolute hostility to Castro is called "a euphemism for capitulation." Basing his suggestions on his analysis of Cuba's economic situation, Draper insists that the Communist revolution in Cuba is "reversible," that the regime is "brittle," and that Castro can be brought down by "the young, the disillusioned, the 'revolutionary' " within Cuba. We will not need to send in another force of Cuban exiles, or the "minimum of three to six U.S. divisions (that) would be required to invade and occupy" the island. We should instead continue our present policies of embargo and sabotage, "let Castro make more mistakes," and offer discreet assistance to revolutionary movements inside Cuba; "like the phoenix, such movements rise out of the fire and ashes, eternally old and eternally young."

That was Draper's policy after the Bay of Pigs, four years ago: "there will be an underground, and despite the present setback, it will revive and grow." It seems even more unreal and naive now than it did then. Elsewhere in his work Draper carefully



IF YOU WANT TO GO BEHIND THE HEADLINES

READ

WAR/PEACE REPORT

WAR/PEACE REPORT went behind the headlines—it dug deeper and got there sooner—with these stories:

MOSCOW—A first-hand report from the Soviet capital on Kremlin attitudes toward participation in the Vietnam war.

VIETNAM—An expert analysis of the revolutionary movement—and the relations between the Viet Cong, Hanoi, Peking and Moscow.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC—Ousted President Juan Bosch's personal explanation of why his democratic regime was overthrown.

UNITED NATIONS—Inside reports on the world body's political, financial and peacekeeping problems; special analyses on disarmament.

Now in its fifth year, WAR/PEACE REPORT is an independent monthly magazine dealing with significant developments affecting war and peace. Presenting a wide spectrum of views, it has inaugurated an exclusive series of direct dialogue between spokesmen of East and West.

Among the long list of important figures who have aired their views in WAR/PEACE REPORT:
Hubert Humphrey, J. William Fulbright, Henry Luce, Valerian Zorin, Adlai Stevenson, Elmo Roper, Norman Cousins, William Buckley, Steve Allen, John J. McCloy. Drawings by Ben Shahn, Osborn and Feiffer.

Go behind the headlines with WAR/PEACE REPORT. Special introductory offer—only $2.97 for 9 months (a $4.50 value at newsstand price).

WAR/PEACE REPORT N
8 E. 36th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

Please open my subscription to War/Peace Report immediately at the special introductory rate of $2.97 for nine months. (An extra month free if check enclosed.

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me

Address..........

Name..........

City.......... Zip .... State ....

cites names, quotes speeches and gives production figures. But his faith in the anti-Castro underground is merely faith. If communism is as intolerable and as unable to reform itself and correct its mistakes as Draper believes, and if the growth of an anti-Communist underground is therefore inevitable, it is hard to see why resistance movements, phoenix-like, have not yet arisen in the Soviet Union, China and the rest of the Communist nations of the world. Until there is real evidence of an organized resistance to Castro inside Cuba, we will have to regard this as one of Draper's fancies, a piece of wishful thinking. Juanita Castro, Fidel's disaffected sister, knows better: "these groups (inside Cuba) are not able to carry out the overthrow of the Communist government."

There is, finally, something to be said about the hemispheric significance of the Cuban Revolution, and its implications for our Latin American policy as a whole. In all his books and articles about Cuba, as in his recent excellent analysis of our intervention in the Dominican Republic (in The New Leader, May 24, 1965), Draper assumes that the United States really does support democracy and social reform in Latin America, and that contrary decisions are the result of misunderstanding, poor intelligence work, incompetent diplomats or honest mistakes. But by now, after four years of the Alliance for Progress and more than a dozen U.S.-approved, supported or instigated assassinations, golpes, cuartelazos and other illegal transfers of power to military regimes, it ought to be clear that something more than chance or error is involved. The truth is that American diplomats (like Ambassador William Tapley Bennett in Santo Domingo and his chief Thomas Mann in Washington) prefer military men who will cooperate with the United States and use our weapons to keep "order," in place of democratic social reformers like Juan Bosch, who might rock the boat and let in the Communists. Draper scornfully quotes Guevara's remark to an Italian correspondent last year that:

> . . . the war of liberation will necessarily assume a violent form in almost every one of these (Latin American) countries—in almost all, I say. Violence is the only form in which their political will can manifest itself.

I share Draper's commitment to democratic reform—where it is possible. But how else except by revolution can reform be brought to Caribbean neighbors of Cuba like Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Honduras? Elections in those countries, and in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Ecuador and Peru (to name only the countries that have experienced recent military take-overs) are exactly what Castro called them—"electoral farces." Draper, whatever his shortcomings and partiality with regard to Cuba, understands the urgency of rapid social, political and economic change elsewhere in the hemisphere; but the State Department officials whose Dominican policy he so stingingly criticizes evidently do not.

The Trojan Men

THE GREEN BERETS. By Robin Moore. Crown Publishers. 341 pp. $4.95.

Daniel Ford

The men of Special Forces were this country's best hope for winning the Vietnamese conflict under the old ground rules. While Mr. Moore's book was being published, unfortunately, we changed the rules. Special Forces has slipped into the background (where, it should be said, such organizations function best), while conventional U.S. troops are bearing a larger share of combat. Not that The Green Berets is invalidated thereby. The book might still have been a valuable account of a type of warfare which came into its own in this decade, and which may become increasingly common in decades to come.

The Special Warfare Center at Fort Bragg, N.C., takes three kinds of soldiers and turns them into three kinds of experts — propagandists, counterinsurgency specialists and guerrillas (or anti-guerrillas). The last are the wearers of the green berets, the men of Special Forces. At one time they sported a replica of the Trojan horse on their berets; the emblem has since been abandoned but it is still the best description of their technique. The basic organization is a twelve-man team, trained to create and to command a full battalion of irregulars behind enemy lines. In Vietnam, Special Forces teams are working with ethnic minorities in the Central Highlands and the western reaches of the Mekong Delta; they also operate covertly in Laos and, if Mr. Moore is to be believed, have infiltrated into North Vietnam as well.

Unfortunately, Mr. Moore cannot always be believed. Army pilots will be astonished to learn that the U-10 Courier, a light plane, can take off in "less than forty feet." The manufacturer recommends 500 feet for this operation. The Green Berets is full of such howlers, many of them no doubt due to the speed with which it was rushed into print.

More significantly, the author is under the illusion that Vietcong is synonymous with North Vietnamese and that there is some basic difference between Northerners and Southerners in that divided land. Thus, he refers to Ho Chi Minh's troops as Vietcong wherever they are found, declares that Vietnamese (meaning Southerners) will not fight at night while the Vietcong will, and dismisses all Southern-born Communists as "sympathizers," as opposed to the "hard-core North Vietnamese" who do most of the fighting. One can only hope that the men of Special Forces have a more realistic understanding of revolutionary warfare in South Vietnam.

Perhaps it is unfair to fault Mr. Moore as a historian when his book is labeled "fiction stranger than fact!" on a band which was added after publication. (The band was an attempt to mollify the Pentagon, which apparently feels that Mr. Moore has jeopardized national security with his book.) But The Green Berets is not especially good fiction, either, except in parts. The characters seldom come alive, the prose reminds one of true-life adventure magazines, and the heroics of the narrator are tiresome indeed.

Still, there are gold nuggets among the corn. There is the cruel Vietnamese interrogator who watches a polygraph lie detector and cries: "This is truly a fine machine. Now we don't waste time. We know exactly who to torture." That sounds true,

---

Daniel Ford's background includes a hitch at the Special Warfare Center and a two months' assignment in Vietnam last year for this magazine. His novel Now Comes Theodora, has been recently published by Doubleday.

rather than factual. So does the Syrian-American intelligence sergeant named Ossidian—a tired, crafty man who might have walked off the pages of a John Le Carré novel. Sergeant Ossidian appears twice in The Green Berets. He has a chapter pretty much to himself, and a walk-on role in the book's concluding and most clearly fictional episode—a breath-taking account of a Special Forces operation behind the lines in North Vietnam.

The Green Berets is most effective when it is least literal. Mr. Moore should have ignored history altogether. He might have turned his material into an unforgettable novel, and he would have spared the nation's librarians a bit of trouble in cataloguing his book.

THEATRE

Julius Novick

STRATFORD II

In the course of his successful efforts to create an artistic personality for the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Conn., Allen Fletcher, the festival's artistic director, has personally staged all of this season's four productions except The Taming of the Shrew. There is some question as to who did direct that one. The program reads: "Original production concept by Don Driver, Directed by Joseph Anthony." Rumor has it that Mr. Driver went too far with his "production concept," which involved a troupe of strolling players, whose wagon becomes the setting for their play, and a lot of Spanishy accouterments. Mr. Anthony, it is said, was brought in to replace him and tone things down.

At any rate, the strolling players, the wagon, and some Spanishy costumes and props, though still in evidence, are used somewhat sparingly, as if someone had recoiled at the last minute from the dangers of "Bright Idea" Shakespeare. But these dangers are at a minimum with The Taming of the Shrew, which is a farce. Farce differs from comedy most fundamentally in that a comedy is a literary work, which needs only to be translated into stage terms with its values intact (not that that's such an only), whereas a farce is a scenario for actors and directors to have fun with.

In this case, it is reasonably good fun. The direction is tentative and inconsistent, quite undistinguished for farcical inventiveness. But the performance is easily, breezily good-natured, fast but not loud; nothing is forced, nobody works too hard, there are no lapses of taste; and the performers are ingratiating and deft. John Cunningham is a conventionally swashbuckling, glossy Petruchio; Ruby Dee as Katherina is less bold, more subtle. The entire production—like the play itself—is easier to like than to admire.

Mr. Fletcher's production of Coriolanus provides a good balance for this amiable, trifling Shrew: it vindicates an unpopular play that is traditionally easier to admire than to like. Hegel said that tragedy is the conflict of two rights; Coriolanus is the conflict of two wrongs. It suggests that neither democracy nor fascism is a viable form of government. The Roman populace is represented as ignorant, gullible, fickle, turbulent and ungrateful; the martial hero whom they exile is "vengeance proud"—also foul-mouthed, unstable and rash, true neither to his country nor himself. He is strong only in battle; otherwise he is abjectly at the disposal of his pride, of his anger and of his formidable mother. He is not evil, but—far worse, for dramatic purposes—he runs the risk of being merely disagreeable.

It is the triumph of Philip Bosco's performance that in his hands Coriolanus is never disagreeable. Mr. Bosco simply cannot be unlikable on stage, which means, among other things, that he need never cheapen himself or the character in order to be liked. In this performance, moreover, the actor's innate charm is yoked to a splendid sense of Roman dignity.

To some people, of course, it will sound like an accusation to say that any artistic creation is less disagreeable than it might be. Many modern intellectuals—and many more intellectual hangers-on—overreacting against the insipidity of popular culture, demand that the artist be a full-time rebel, forever hacking away at the roots of the social order. They more than half believe that the first obligation of Art is to be nasty. (At least one professor at Harvard quite explicitly maintains that unless a play is "disturbing" it can't really be any good. He at least is more clear-minded than many who make similar assumptions but will not avow them.) Such people take it for granted that any artist who does not fulfill these demands must have sold out, or at best have become an unwitting tool of the Establishment. And the connections between the American Shakespeare Festival and the Establishment—both the theatrical and the general Establishment—are easy to document.

But Mr. Bosco's work, though pleasing, is legitimate and cogent—and far from insipid. It is true that the

VIET-REPORT

JULY: Fall Millet
Lynd Chaffard

AUGUST: Geneva Accords • Origins of American Involvement in Viet Nam •

Single 50c 6 mos. $2.50 1 yr. $5.00
133 West 72nd St. New York 10023

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 8-2-65
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

actor, with his dignity and his urbane, stinging irony, does miss the character's sick intensity, the abandoned fury of his ragings. But to emphasize this side of Coriolanus would be to risk forfeiting what is equally important: the element of greatness in the character, of which Mr. Bosco keeps us always aware.

If the director does not try to expose and demean Coriolanus, does not make the play a tract against the Man on Horseback, he does not make it an anti-democratic pamphlet either. The mob might easily have been shown as not only turbulent but vicious. But Shakespeare's plebeians are not malicious, only misled, as this production's crisp and well-staged crowd scenes make clear. Mr. Fletcher even declines to nastify the popular leaders, the Tribunes; one of them—as played strongly, finely, and without whitewash by Frederic Warriner—emerges as a worthy opponent of Coriolanus. On the patrician side again, Patrick Hines gives a funny,

Current Titles of Interest to 'Nation' Readers

THE NEW AMERICAN ARTS. Edited by Richard Kostelanetz. Horizon. $6.50.

A collection of essays by young American critics which surveys contemporary art and explores its relationship to politics, culture and tradition. The essay on painting is by The Nation's art critic, Max Kozloff.

SIGMUND FREUD. Giovanni Costigan. Macmillan. $4.95.

A biography for the general reader, it provides a history of Freud's personal life as well as an outline of the development of his psychoanalytic theories. In addition, the author discusses the significance of Freud's principal books.

THE ELEPHANTS AND THE GRASS: A Study of Nonalignment. Cecil V. Crabb, Jr. Praeger. $5.50. $1.95 paper.

An examination of the diplomatic philosophy of Afro-Arab-Asian nonalignment.

LIQUOR: The Servant of Man. Morris E. Chafetz. Little, Brown. $4.95.

The author discusses the positive aspects of liquor, even when it comes to teen-age drinking, the role of alcohol in sex, drinking and driving, liquor and crime.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD: Pacifist at War. Michael Wreszin. Indiana University Press. $6.95.

A study which pays particular attention to Villard's work as editor of The Nation and his influence on liberal movements during the period between the two World Wars.

THE TROUBLED CALLING: Crisis in the Medical Establishment. Selig Greenberg. Macmillan. $6.95.

A discussion of the state of American medicine which covers the growing alienation of doctor and patient, the incomes of practitioners and organized medicine's opposition to a national health program. The book also describes the professional hierarchy that rules medicine, as well as clarifies the relationship between doctors and the multibillion-dollar drug industry.

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES. J. Bronowski. Harper & Row. $3.

In a revised and enlarged edition of his now classic book, Dr. Bronowski continues his analysis of the role of science and the scientist in a modern society. Portions of this book originally appeared in The Nation.

A HANDFUL OF CLIENTS. Elmer Gertz. Follett. $5.95.

An attorney, the author tells of the clients, cases and causes that he has defended. The book deals with the Nathan Leopold parole hearings; the Otto Eisenschiml case, which explored the nature of the copyright laws; the obscenity trial of Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer, and a narcotics conspiracy trial. Mr. Gertz has written recently for The Nation (July 5) on censorship.

JOURNEY TO THE JADE SEA. John Hillaby. Simon & Schuster. $5.50.

The remarkable and humorous tale of a journey through Africa.

SECOND GENERATION. Raymond Williams. Horizon. $4.95.

A novel which examines the problems of modern life by way of academic intrigues and labor struggles.

BEHOLD THE FIRE. Michael Blankfort. New American Library. $5.95.

The story of a Jewish underground espionage and spy cell which helped the British drive the Ottomans from Palestine.

THE MAYOR OF NEW YORK. Laurence Barrett. Doubleday. $4.95.

The machinations of City Hall politics provide the underpinnings for this novel about a mayoralty nomination.

NOTHING FOR TIGERS. Hayden Carruth. Macmillan. $3.95.

Hayden Carruth's first full collection of poems since The Crow and the Heart, in 1959. Some of these poems were first published in The Nation.

CRIMES WITHOUT VICTIMS. Edwin M. Schur. Prentice-Hall. $4.95. $1.95 paper.

The author urges wider public understanding of the problems of abortion, drug addiction and homosexuality.

THE BOOK OF DANIEL DREW. Bouck White. American Research Council. $5.

Semi-fiction, semi-autobiography, The Book of Daniel Drew presents the inside story of one of the first great Wall Street speculators.

JOHN JAY CHAPMAN. Melvin H. Bernstein. College & University Press. $1.95 paper.

An examination of John Jay Chapman, turn-of-the-century essayist and poet.

THE DIPLOMATIC SMUGGLER. Sir John Lomax. Arthur Barker, Ltd. $5.25.

The memoirs of the diplomat who, as Commercial Counsellor in Madrid, Berne and Ankara during the last war, fought a battle of wits against the Axis blockade to insure that vital supplies reached England and the United States.

NOW COMES THEODORA. Daniel Ford. Doubleday. $4.95.

A novel of the morals, manners and ideals of today's bomb-scared younger generation.

harming, touching performance—a ubtle and lucid performance—as old Ienenius. Mr. Fletcher, as is his ustom, holds the balance with scruulous fairness. He shows us the best f all parties—not the only possible pproach, but in this case the results ıstify it.

And then, of course, there is hat remarkable creation, Coriolanus' nother Volumnia, in a deftly moduated performance by Aline MacMahon. This is the Age of Freud, nd the evils and excesses of motheriood—from the Silver Cord, through Iomism, to the formidable image of he Jewish Mother—are very much n the popular mind. We are thereore apt to see Volumnia somewhat lifferently from the way Mrs. Siddons played her, and of this Miss IacMahon is well aware. She is alvays believable as a Roman matron, ıever guilty of anachronism in speech r gesture, but she is not the oldashioned with-your-shield-or-on-it ort of classical battle-ax either. As he tames her son with a mother's ltimate weapon—guilt—she is remiiscent of all the Feiffer cartoons on he subject.

And she is legitimately so. Because vhen Volumnia, in the famous and limactic scene in which she says o her son, ". . . thou shalt no sooner narch to assault thy country than o tread . . . on thy mother's womb. . . Thou hast never in thy life show'd hy dear mother any courtesy," she ecomes a precursor of the mother n Bye Bye Birdie who, when crossed, hreatens to go home and stick her ıead in the oven. In Volumnia's cenes, as Miss MacMahon plays hem, we see a little of why Shaw called Coriolanus Shakespeare's greatest comedy.

There is, then, a standard of acting at Stratford, and a style of production. What with its regular ummer season, its winter training program for the younger actors in the company, and its spring season for students (which attracts 160,000 people a year from twelve surrounding states), the festival is now a year-round operation. With its young and competent company, augmented by a few modestly cast guest performers; with its policy of sternly subordinatng visual display to the purposes of he plays; with sometimes lusterless out generally creditable direction, the American Shakespeare Festival seems, n its eleventh year, to have finally ound itself.

Riddles: Robert Dana

1.

What is,
happened,
simply;
in no
one hour,
one weather;
no one willing.

It was,
is, shall be, there,
in that single season where, no matter,

selves and weathers leap into one shape:
a new place, new way of breathing.

2.

I sense an end
though there is none (neither places,
nor gift of dark
are, nor losses,
last words)
and am not ready, nor ever can be.

Nothing we say or do can bear on it, more than on the flower
perishing in its color; nor we bear it,
but do.

Both beginnings,
endings fail us.
No time is enough.
We are not enough.

3.

We have it, not having it:

(as this ground holds forever the impress of its first blossoms where they fell)

our one moment, silent,
in this delicate,
small spray of bones.

4.

Scents. Traces.
Only.

Easily, as trees walk into their own shadows,
another silence turns through this empty room:

one sound,
one voice, breaking me now.

5.

It is,
whatever it is;
binding us like time into time.
Mattering.
This room,
our universe.
Its darkness,
our single star.

APPROACH PRIZE POEMS

Winners of $100 each by Robert Wallace and Philip Murray now appear in the Summer Issue, 75c

APPROACH

114 Petrie Avenue Rosemont, Pa.

Something Different! . . .

Send $1 for the first issue of The Appalachian South. Native Southern mountaineers tell about themselves—folklore, song, history, how greed erodes mountain beauty and human dignity leaving widespread poverty—in 62 pages 9x12. Yearly subscription, 4 issues, $5.00.

The Appalachian South

ANN WILLIAMS, Editor

P.O. Box 4104-N, Charleston, W. Va.

Don't Die Without a Will

TWO WILL FORMS AND EASY-READING WILL BOOK $1.00

Nat'l Institute for Family Research
1800 N. Argyle, Los Angeles, Cal. 90028

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

FUN TO READ!

THE IDLER is a lively, individualistic liberal monthly that entertains as it informs. Warm humor and cold facts mixed into a pleasant, personal and personable journalistic pot.

Send $3.00 today for a year's subscription. Money back if not satisfied.

Discover THE IDLER and you will have made a new friend.

THE IDLER
125 Fifth St., N.E.
Washington 2, D. C.

Please send me a one year's subscription to THE IDLER. Enclosed is $3.00.

Name ....

Address ....

........................Zip........

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE KNACK
CAT BALLOU
WHAT'S NEW PUSSYCAT?

The summer comedies are getting audiences the easy way — dressing up old ideas with new faces and lively direction. They succeed, in part, and when they don't they are background for the blissful air conditioning.

The best of the current laugh leaders is The Knack, screen version of Ann Jellicoe's play; it is directed by Richard Lester, whose quick hand with the camera was seen here last year in the Beatles' A Hard Day's Night. A boy (Ray Brooks) with dark clothes, dark glasses, black gloves, "Mod" haircut and motorcycle has a way with girls that sharply reminded me of an undertaker's way with a corpse. But for the purposes of the story it is a wildly effective knack, and his two fresh-faced friends (Michael Crawford and Donal Donnelly) are avid to learn it. The opportunity comes when a country girl (Rita Tushingham) blunders into their company while seeking the YWCA. I fear that the reader is now ahead of me, having guessed that untutored young manhood will be favored by Miss Tushingham over the mortuary approach.

But the point of The Knack is not the plot, but what can be done with it. Mr. Lester flings it through the bystreets of London and up and down the narrow staircase of the boys' lodgings like a dance of amorous shepherds (an intermittent chorus of sour-faced oldsters spices the revels with envious maledictions). The foursome is witty, inventive, stupendously energetic; Miss Tushingham is a plain girl whose allure resides in the fact that she behaves exactly as though she were a great beauty (she is gat-toothed — a sign, according to Chaucer, of passion in women). The camera matches these four caper for caper and the editing is syncopated to a rollicking background score. It goes to show what bright and agile performers and an uninhibited director can do with standard delicatessen.

After The Knack, What's New Pussycat?, set in Paris and the countryside, but also on the theme of exigent sex, seems labored, physically exhausted, a little grimy. Part of the trouble is with the so-called script by Woody Allen, a television hysteric who also plays second clown to Peter Sellers. He has tried to offset a basi lack of situation invention by proliferating old gags, and he lacks an accurate sense of the dividing lin between wackiness and neurosis. A second trouble is Peter O'Toole in th central role of a young man wh wants to marry but cannot bring himself to forsake the implausible availability and confectionary beauty o the young ladies who excite his day and fill his dreams. This requires a sense of frivolity and a degree of self-mockery — qualities in which Mr O'Toole is notably lacking. For a man of his surname, he has a surprisingly Germanic view of himself.

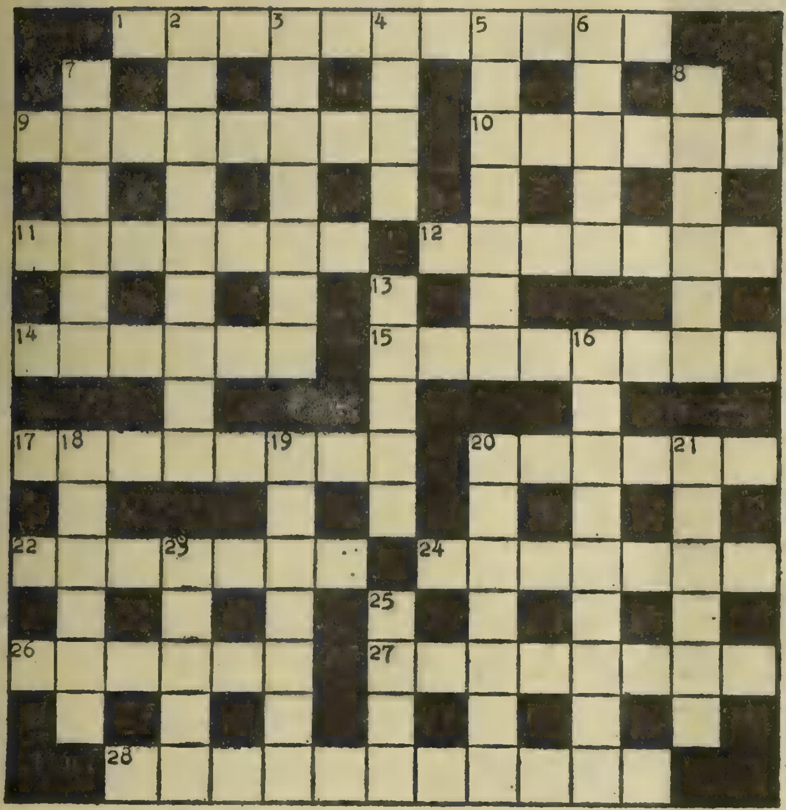
Given that weight to push, Seller (as a sex-mad Viennese psychiatris in a Renaissance haircut) turns strident, and the extravagantly endowe and motivated girls become sweaty What's New Pussycat? runs into tha deadly theatrical situation wherein th performers appear to be entertainin themselves and the audience foots th bill.

Cat Ballou (name of the heroine, played by Jane Fonda) is television on the big screen. It is billed a a satire on the Western—an old idea but a useful one—and the core ide of trying to blow up a cow-countr storm with gunfighters whom ag and booze have turned tremulous an bleary-eyed is worth exploiting. Bu Elliot Silverstein, who directed thi lampoon, does not understand tha the recipe for satire calls for irony understatement and perfect solemnity He keeps slapping his thighs over the generally witless japes of a suds horse opera.

His star, Lee Marvin, has the righ idea. He plays the sodden and derelict Kid Shellen — fastest draw i Deadwood (twenty years ago) with utter absorption in his own legend But Marvin seems to be engaged i a private tour de force of bitterswee characterization while around him the cast is romping through a watered-down Oklahoma (Stubby Kaye an the late Nat King Cole are the banjo-strumming minstrels of the production). It is impossible to satirize a corpse, and I found in Cat Ballo the melancholy conviction that the Western has finally died.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1115

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Past habits might cover slips. (11)
9 In the opinion of most people, is he likely to be knowledgeable? (8)
10 See 13 down
11 When overseas, a little money is, for a reputedly good man. (7)
12 I'd raise no question about their remarks being personal. (7)
14 What some British use privet for? (We use smaller stuff.) (6)
15 To make a mistake in the shape of things at breakfast might be to consider the subject too important. (8)
17 Is one rightfully so by Declaration? (8)
20 How to be disagreeable about blend? (6)
22 The small Scottish out-building is wrecked. (7)
24 Strange men in a foreign clime? It doesn't enable one to bring things back easily. (7)
26 How many chess games end, if patient, possibly. (6)
27 Proving it can, for a change, for at least a little bit. (7)
28 Tiny vegetables and English horns are such childish toys! (11)

DOWN:

2 What some consider a time for giving up in the plant was funny in song. (9)
3 A happening in the 23 of Denmark? (7)
4 Does it break the rule to have a decoy? (4)
5 Will better mitering contain such a woodwork problem? (7)
6 Compound obtained from trees. (5)
7 Bad-tempered and bitter having been possibly awakened. (6)
8 The pictures around the study should be glowing with feeling. (6)
13, 25 and 10 The Rubicon, as the basic idea of a one-way ticket? (5, 2, 2, 6)
16 In short, an arbiter to the scripture reader might throw things back at you. (9)
18 If a person's in the pink, the official implication is "try someplace else". (6)
19 They might be even better than jacks for lifting the top. (7)
20 Just a trace at the end of the bolt. (7)
21 and 23 The "Arizona," or just any government vessel? (4, 2, 5)
25 See 13 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1114

ACROSS: 1 Demagogues; 10 Doctors; 11 Produce; 12 Clerical collar; 14 Treatise; 15 Swabia; 16 Onions; 18 and 23 Weatherstrip; 22 The Iron Curtain; 24 Relents; 25 Abusive; 26 and 6 Pastoral; 27 Idle wheels. DOWN: 1 Dedication; 2 Machete; 3 Good intentions; 4 Gas bags; 5 Expect; 7 Rhubarb; 8 Lies; 9 Follows through; 13 Passengers; 17 Inhales; 19 Enclave; 20 Evasive; 21 Bossed.

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE

A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books, Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

LAKE LOUANNE, Westbrook, Conn. Over 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming, boating, golf. Summer Theaters, excellent restaurants. Long Island Sound nearby. Rooms with private baths. Charming house. Breakfast only. Telephone: Cudroff, MOntrose 9-2465.

EDUCATIONAL

JEWISH YOUTH AGES 18-26!

Hechalutz Farm in Hightstown, N. J. — the only training farm for kibbutz life in Israel is offering resident scholarships. Successful candidates will receive help with their passage to Israel. Apply: Hechalutz Scholarship Program, Hechalutz Farm, Hightstown, N. J., or 112 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. 3 Tel.: GR 3-2420.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSO 709.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

Has automation robbed you of your cash as well as your dignity? Vengeance is sweet with "out of order" stickers. Warning: Place stickers only on delinquent machines. Fifty for one dollar. R. Cenedella, P.O. Box 287, Planetarium Station, New York, 10024.

INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION YEAR

ICY Postals, Correspondance Cards.
40 for $1.00; 300 for $5.00
THE FRIENDLY WORLD
GPO Box 1004, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11202

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. A book by Bin Dir Woor, self-designated Symbolical World President. Claims: "unique, entrancing, epochal." Next to The Bible it should become a Holy Book for all mankind. Price: $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 Seventh Avenue, N.Y.C.

Advertise Your Resorts
in The Nation

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCB Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

"From Grant to the Great Society . . .
a brocade of ideas
and a trumpet of protest . . ."

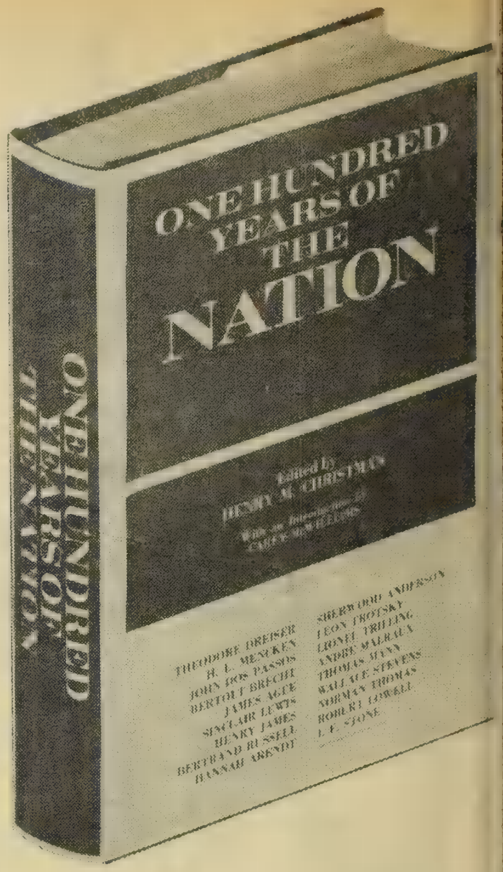
Malcolm Moos



ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF THE NATION
Edited by HENRY M. CHRISTMAN
With an Introduction by CAREY McWILLIAMS
THEODORE DREISER
H. L. MENCKEN
JOHN DOS PASSOS
BERTOLT BRECHT
JAMES AGEE
SINCLAIR LEWIS
HENRY JAMES
BERTRAND RUSSELL
HANNAH ARENDT
SHERWOOD ANDERSON
LEON TROTSKY
LIONEL TRILLING
ANDRE MALRAUX
THOMAS MANN
WALLACE STEVENS
NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT LOWELL
I. F. STONE
ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF THE NATION

100 Years of The NATION

Edited by Henry M. Christman

Introduction by CAREY McWILLIAMS

On the occasion of The Nation's 100th Anniversary, The Macmillan Company is publishing this generous selection of memorable prose and poetry. By arrangement with the publishers, we can offer the book to Nation readers, in advance of public sale, at the Special Price of $6.95.

Order today a book containing the finest pages from a magazine which, in the words of Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, leaves "no vital issues untouched."

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me (   ) copies of 100 Years of The Nation at $6.95 per copy (list price, $7.95). I enclose check for $......

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip No. ....

Partial list of contributors:

Theodore Dreiser
H. L. Mencken
John Dos Passos
Bertolt Brecht
James Agee
Henry James
Bertrand Russell
Sherwood Anderson
Leon Trotsky
André Malraux
Thomas Mann
Wallace Stevens
Norman Thomas
Robert Lowell
I. F. Stone
William Butler Yeats
William Carlos Williams
William James
Ezra Pound
G. D. H. Cole
Fred J. Cook
Edmund Wilson
Oswald Garrison Villard
William Dean Howells
Francis Parkman
Robert C. Benchley
Benedetto Croce
William O. Douglas
Heywood Broun
Harold J. Laski
Robert Frost

AUG 16 1965
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

THE NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

AUGUST 16, 1965 . . 35c

Our Stake in Apartheid

Stanley Meisler

THE ABYSS OF POLICY

The Unthinkable Target

Christopher Lasch & Alan B. Spitzer

A Touch of Tyranny

Richard F. Hamilton

'DOG YEARS' by Günter Grass

Paul West

LETTERS

Freedom from censors

Miami, Fla.

Dear Sirs: I enjoyed very much the article, "An End To All Censors," by attorney Elmer Gertz [The Nation, July 5]. . . . The opinions he expresses can be verified by visiting both Copenhagen and London as I did last year. In London there is censorship and prior restraint with exceptions, with the result that newsstands are glutted with near-pornography. In Denmark freedom of the press is interpreted to permit full portrayal of the human anatomy and its functions. There was an assortment of inexpensive nudist magazines and also an illustrated book entitled The History of Erotic Art illustrated with graphic representations of human coitus in the different cultures of the world back through each century of history. . . . Denmark has only a trickle of "men's magazines" and similar offerings as contrasted with the flood we have in this country and in Britain.

Scandinavia is living proof that liberty does well to make its errors in the direction of license and not in censorship and prior restraint.

T. B. Caldwell

Collection of losers

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your publication of Henry Popkin's thoughtful and provocative review of America's Lost Plays [The Nation, June 14] contains one great irony—this is not, nor was it originally intended to be, a collection of the best of 19th-century American drama. It is an assemblage of rejects, plays which were not deemed worthy of publication at the time. . . .

There are no masterpieces in 19th-century American drama, but it does deserve to be judged by its best efforts. Thus, while most of Mr. Popkin's insights are almost painfully acute, they are just a bit unfair to the best works of Tyler, Bird, Barker and Boker—to name but four.

The villain of the piece (if villain is the word) is the haphazard system of American publishing under which this collection of mediocrity seems destined to become enthroned as the representative of 19th-century American drama. Robert O'Brien

To end the war

New York City

Dear Sirs: Many of us are trying to organize anti-Vietnam war activities at the community level. One of the groups which is trying to do this is The New York Committee to End the War in Vietnam. Those of your readers who live in New York City and would like to either join this committee or find out more about its activities should write to: The New York Committee to End the War in Vietnam, 1165 Broadway, New York, N.Y., or call 889-5793. We desperately need new members.

Robert Feinstein

Editor's Note

Jack Newfield in "The Question of SNCC" (The Nation, July 19) reported that Irving Howe, at a public meeting, described the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee as "bureaucratically deformed, manipulative and undemcratic." Howe denies having made such a statement; Newfield maintains that the words are in his notes on the meeting. A tape of the meeting was played back and proved inconclusive. The words attributed to Howe are not there. The first five minutes of Howe's fifteen-minute speech were not recorded, however, because a reel was being changed.

What can be heard on the tape are the following remarks by Howe regarding liberal, labor and civil rights organizations:

> Can they become bureaucratic? Yes, in part, they have become bureaucratic. Do you think that any social movement, including the civil rights organizations, if they succeed, can avoid the risk — it is a risk — of becoming bureaucratic?

What is important, in any case, is what Howe thinks about the substantive issue. He denies holding the view attributed to him by Newfield and Newfield recognizes that Howe does not adhere to the characterization of SNCC ascribed to him.

Dangerous corner

Schenectady, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: Given today's weaponry, the No. 1 rule for international conduct generally agreed upon is: don't back a major nation into a corner, leaving it only one honorable choice.

Alarmingly enough, we are doing just that in Vietnam. Can Russia and China permit much longer the incessant bombing, the devastating of a fellow nation, and the posing of an ever-growing ground threat around its borders? Not with honor—nor politically (the Communist states would be weakened as a group; faith would be lost in communism as a creed). And when, in all honor, they respond, can we, considering our commitment thus far, in all honor, etc., etc.?

And so it goes. Is there no way to stop this deadly sequence before it is too late? . . . Can't we, somehow or other, turn aside the beast as he lumbers slowly, seemingly inexorably ever closer to Bethlehem?

Thomas Broderick

THE NATION

Monday, August 16, 1965
Volume 201, No. 4

In this issue

EDITORIALS
69

ARTICLES
71 Our Stake in Apartheid
Stanley Meisler
The Abyss of Policy:
74 The Unthinkable Target
Christopher Lasch and Alan B. Spitzer
75 A Touch of Tyranny
Richard F. Hamilton
78 The Free University: Academy for Mavericks
Howard Junker

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
81 The Grotesque Purgation
Paul West
82 In The Egg (poem)
Günter Grass
84 Notes From Afar: I
Harold Clurman
86 Architecture
Walter McQuade
87 Theatre
Julius Novick
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 88)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Aug. 16, 1965. Vol. 201, No. 4

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest and the Public Affairs Information Service.

OCT 23

EDITORIALS

Vietnam at the UN

Having called on the members of the United Nations, "individually and collectively," to help the United States convince the Vietnamese Communists that they should come to the conference table, President Johnson has now addressed a direct appeal to the Security Council "in the hope that the members of the Council will somehow find the means to respond effectively to the challenge raised by the present state of affairs in Southeast Asia." Does this latest move, coinciding with the installation of Justice Arthur Goldberg as the new United States delegate to the UN, represent an "escalation" in the President's search for a negotiated settlement of the Vietnam conflict? The general opinion at the UN, while favorable to Washington's pronouncements, is skeptical about its motivations and results.

Although Secretary Rusk has pledged U.S. cooperation if the Vietnam question should come formally before the Security Council or the General Assembly, Washington has taken no initiative to place the issue on the Security Council's agenda. Questioned on this point after he had presented his credentials to the Secretary-General, Ambassador Goldberg answered that the United States preferred to word its concern "in the form of the letter presented" to U Thant, a document which contains only vague hopes and appeals.

A prima-facie argument against formal discussions in the Security Council on the Vietnam question is that North Vietnam, which is not a member of the UN, has categorically refused to participate in such discussions, and has rejected in advance any recommendation which may be adopted. However, an equally important consideration is that the natural course of affairs for the Security Council, if seized of the Vietnam problem, would be to call for an immediate cease-fire, as is its duty under the Charter. Washington cannot agree to an unconditional cease-fire at this time, since the whole basis of American policy is to use military pressure, actual and potential, to force the Vietnamese Communists into a diplomatic corner. It can also be argued that Hanoi or Peking or the Vietcong, separately or together, are equally opposed to a cease-fire, since they, like the Americans, think that time is working in their favor in the Vietnamese jungles.

In tossing the Vietnam conflict in the unofficial lap of the Security Council, Washington was also counting on a hands-off attitude from the USSR. The Soviet Union held the presidency of the Council during the whole month of July and could have called a meeting at any time, had it wanted to. However, both Hanoi and Peking have warned Moscow against any intervention by the United Nations, which they identify as a tool of the United States. The small countries which are members of the Security Council, such as Malaysia and Jordan, might be tempted to take a bold initiative, but have been discouraged by the uselessness of any attempt to call for a Council meeting on Vietnam in these circumstances.

In fact, the whole concept of a negotiated settlement, as offered by President Johnson, is playing with words. One does not set up a conference table in a vacuum, but only when some concessions are in the offing — usually from both sides. And neither side shows any such disposition at present.

Nor is President Johnson's appeal to the United Nations "unconditional," in the sense of asking the UN to find a solution to an inextricable problem, as the British did in the case of Palestine. His message to the members of the Security Council, to the Secretary-General and to all "diplomats of good will" aims at trying once again to convince the Vietnamese Communists that they had better consent peacefully to the continuous existence of a non-Communist South Vietnam rather than be crushed by American military power, with the same final result. The acceleration of military commitments by Washington, and the long-range plans for the war, show that President Johnson does not believe in the possibility of negotiations on those terms for a long time to come.

This is not to say that the UN is being used by Washington only as a smoke screen, or for propaganda purposes. Gone are the early scorns of the President for U Thant's initiatives. The Secretary-General is being encouraged to "keep channels open" and the diplomatic world has been invited to wave its antennae in Southeast Asia. The United States is trying to hold the UN in reserve for the time when it may be allowed to play a useful role as a result of an acknowledged military stalemate or any unforeseen development.

Our Way of Life

"It is a strange, almost passionless war that the U.S. fights in Vietnam," observes Newsweek (August 9). Hence it is the more imperative that the war should be skillfully stage-managed, as was President Johnson's appearance before the TV cameras after his week of conferences on what to do next. It is also imperative that the nation should be eased smoothly into what may become a major conflict of indefinite duration. Thus the President spoke only of sending 50,000 more troops to Vietnam, bringing U.S.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During August, The Nation is appearing on alternate weeks: the next issue will be dated August 30.

strength there to 125,000 men, and mentioned possible future increases only in general terms. But he, and the ever-smiling Secretary of Defense, had already decided on an augmentation of the armed forces by 330,000 men over the next year or so—and this could be accelerated if deemed necessary. The Pentagon is working on equipment to feed, house and clothe these men in the style to which American soldiers and sailors are accustomed, and to supply them with weapons incorporating the latest technological advances. When it comes to this accouterment, though the war may be passionless (at least in its present phase), a bit of passion does enter.

Not so long ago it seemed we had hit a plateau in military spending. This in itself would have been a remarkable achievement, and Mr. McNamara was credited with bringing it about, or nearly so. It will soon be only a wistful memory. Such controls as Mr. McNamara had imposed are going fast, together with the hopeful vistas of tax cuts and substantial spending on social programs.

To the defense industries, however, this is a far from gloomy prognostication. Even the modest curtailments Mr. McNamara had imposed were a matter of serious concern to them, and hence to business generally. At first, when the war cloud darkened, the stock market wavered—the lightning of price controls might follow. But then the spirits of Wall Street rose as it became clear that the Johnson-McNamara-Bundy war would not be so large as to require curbs on free enterprise, but large enough to avert the predicted recession of 1966 and start the boom anew. Men, women and children would be killed (but the women and children only Asians), a small country would be ravaged, but in America there would be something in it for nearly everyone. Even now, the Pentagon procurement officers are telephoning (the usual letter notification is too slow) their orders for steel helmets, helicopters, airplanes, rifles, ammunition, uniforms and hundreds of other items. Plants are preparing to go on a three-shift basis, and a new excitement is sweeping through the ranks of management. That is where the passion comes in.

And how does the public feel about it all? On the whole, not too badly. Some young men, and their parents and girl friends, do not relish the prospect of death in Vietnam, and some groups will resent a further postponement of social betterment (everything Johnson's Great Society promised was promised by Franklin D. Roosevelt thirty years ago), but the general mood is that since it must be, one might as well get what one can out of it. Thus labor will be looking for its cut, and those localities which have been living in fear of McNamara's plan to close a local military facility will see that he was not such a menace after all.

This adaptability—and the moral insensibility that comes with it—is not strange or remarkable. It is not as if this way of life were entirely new. The truth is that since FDR's time we have been living in a war economy, with intervals of peace which were only a variant of war. Accustomed to this cycle of war-in-peace and peace-in-war, many of us hardly know that there was once a different mode of life. As for the prospect that this other, more constructive, way might recur, it seems a fancy so remote that practical men will not waste their time on it.

Sowing Future Trouble

Berkeley Municipal Judge Rupert Crittenden has been passing sentence on the students involved in the F.S.M. (Free Speech Movement) demonstrations of last December 2-3 at the University of California. Gene Marine's report ("No Fair: The Students Strike at California," The Nation, Dec. 21, 1964) leaves one with the conviction that many of the demonstrators had been sufficiently punished by the club- and fist-swinging police. But Judge Crittenden seems never to have heard that there were two sides to this melancholy affair, much less that larger issues are involved than disorder on one campus. He cracked down on the F.S.M. leaders, apparently on the theory that harsh punishment would prevent a repetition. He sentenced Mario Savio to 120 days in jail, Savio's wife to forty-five days, on charges of trespassing and resisting arrest; in both cases two convictions were involved, with the sentences to run concurrently. Other sentences were of equal severity. Defendants in cases arising from civil rights demonstrations in the same area have been treated leniently—in most instances they were either placed on probation or given light sentences. Prof. Thomas Parkinson voiced the sentiments of many faculty members and students when he said that the judge "simply caved in under outside pressure." Parkinson cannot be accused of bias; at the time of the demonstrations, he called the students "moral spastics" for flaunting four-letter words at some of the rallies.

But a worse feature of the court's attitude toward the 750 defendants was the proffered bait of shorter jail terms for those who would accept conditional probation. Savio, for instance, could have got off with ninety days if he had been willing to accept two years' probation, with the stipulation that he would not engage during that period in any "illegal" demonstrations. He refused, and so did his wife and some thirty-odd other defendants. Who is to say at the outset of a demonstration whether it will be legal or illegal at its close? It may be perfectly orderly until somebody throws a punch. A sit-in, such as occurred at Sproul Hall, may or may not be illegal, though it is more dangerous on its face than a picket line which, as in Negro demonstrations in the South, may be rendered illegal at the whim of the police and the courts. Judge Crittenden's offer was not only a legal booby trap but amounted to political castration.

This magistrate—and he is certainly not unique—seems to be completely oblivious to the social aspects of the Berkeley episode. He seems never to have read the Byrne report to the regents of the University of California, nor enlightened analyses like Mervin B. Freedman's “Roots of Student Discontent” (The Nation, June 14). “We conclude,” the Byrne report observed, (“that the basic cause of unrest on the Berkeley campus was the dissatisfaction of a large number of students with many features of the society they were about to enter.”)This is not a situation peculiar to the University of California, nor are the issues peculiar to college students. (With the country on the brink of a greater war in Asia, its enlightened young people have little cause for satisfaction with the society their elders have prepared for them.)Treating them like children on the one hand, and like criminals on the other, will only feed the flames of revolt. Judge Crittenden is preparing other Berkeleys, and not only within his own jurisdiction.

Summer Delay

The new voting rights bill, finally passed after a summer of inconsequential debate, stands as a major accomplishment of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, who turned the bitter violence of Selma into a conscience cry for the nation and, not incidentally, into an irresistible pressure on Administration and Congress.

But the bill's opponents gained far more than a few weeks' delay by stalling passage of the bill into August. Overlooked in the chorus of editorial praise is the fact that Negro voter registration in the South has been seriously set back for an entire year. In the flush of the Selma-to-Montgomery march and the obvious legislative victory that was to follow, the SCLC set up its summer project—SCOPE—and recruited more than 1,000 students and others, primarily for voter-registration work in several states. By mid-June these summer volunteers were deployed, mainly in literacy-test states, awaiting the new tool promised them by the Congress.

For all practical purposes they never got it. By the end of August, the SCOPE program will be over, the students will return to their campuses, the other volunteers to their homes. The local Negroes left in the civil rights movement are young, enthusiastic, determined and courageous—but they are neither educated nor trained in voter-registration work, nor politically sophisticated. They cannot make the effective use of the new legislation that the outside volunteers could have made, nor as effectively rally other Negroes out of their ground-in apathy.

The delay is particularly important in Alabama, where Sen. John Sparkman must be a candidate for re-election next year. No outstanding civil rights advocate himself, Sparkman is nevertheless the Administration's—and the Negroes'—only hope for staving off Governor George Wallace, who has long had his eye on the Senate. The extensive registration of Negro voters in Alabama, as a move to insure Sparkman's re-election and Wallace's defeat, was a major part of the Martin Luther King-Lyndon Johnson strategy.

The voting rights bill is long overdue, and we welcome its passage. The job now is to find ways to implement it, this fall and winter, without waiting for a new infusion of summer volunteers in 1966.

Our Stake in Apartheid . . . .

Stanley Meisler

In 1963, during a Security Council debate on apartheid, Adlai Stevenson announced dramatically that the United States had banned all sale of arms to the Republic of South Africa. The step had been taken, he said, to show America's deep concern that South Africa refused to abandon its racist policies. In March of this year, a reactor went critical at a research center near Pretoria, and South Africa joined the nuclear age. The feat was made possible by the firm that designed and built the equipment: Allis-Chalmers of Milwaukee.

Juxtaposed, the two events drive home some little-known truths about America and apartheid. The United States, while mouthing its disdain for the Afrikaan regime, is an accelerator of the economic boom that insures the Verwoerd government's confidence and self-righteousness. As an investor in South Africa and as a trading partner, the United States is outranked only by Great Britain. The investments and the volume of trade rise month by month. Seeing this growing American entanglement, South Africa takes with a grain of salt any rude comments that may come from official American sources. Why worry, for example, about an embargo on arms that are easy to manufacture, as long as America licenses the export of nuclear machinery that South Africa cannot produce itself? The Republic's ability to bear up under official U.S. scolding is further bolstered by American economic interests which are coalescing into a South Africa lobby designed to make certain that the remarks are not, after all, too rude.

The latest Department of Commerce figures show that U.S. direct investment in South Africa reached $415 million by the end of 1963. These official figures, however, understate the case: they are computed at book value rather than actual value and do not include such indirect investments as purchase of South African stocks and bonds, and American bank loans to South African companies. Various South African official and business sources offer figures that are anywhere from $250 million to $500 million higher than those of the Department of Commerce. It is safe to assume that total American investment has now reached between $750 million and $1 billion.

This total is little more than 1 per cent of American investment overseas, but it accounts for 11 per cent of foreign investment in South Africa (Britain is the leader, with 60 per cent). More important, the figures show that American investment has accelerated during a period when world opinion has hardened toward South Africa. Direct American investment has tripled since 1950; since Sharpeville (1960) it has increased 45 per cent.

---

Stanley Meisler is a Washington newsman.

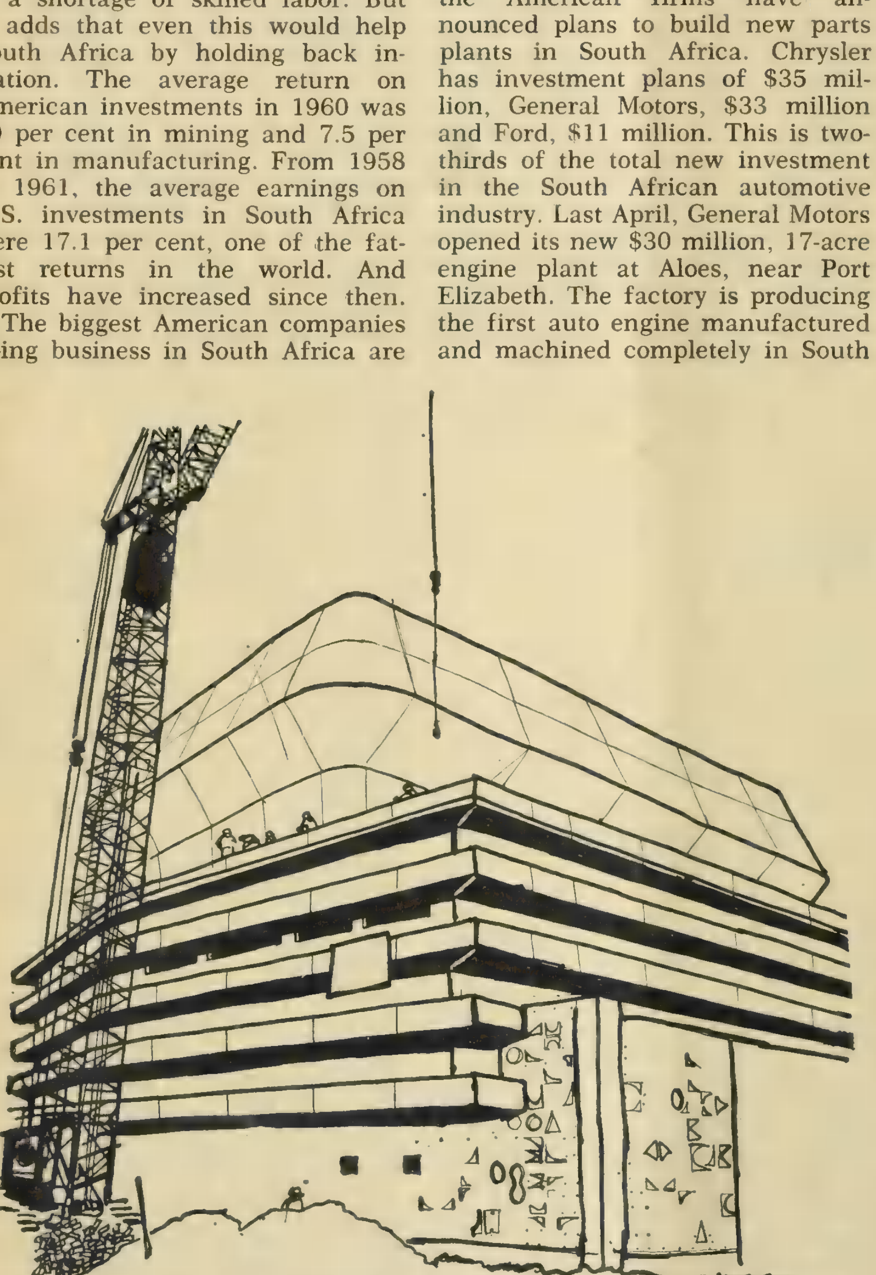
Profits, not politics, have drawn American capital to this neo-Fascist state. South Africans live in heady, booming times. Gross National Product increased 11 per cent last year, and the University of Stellenbosch's Bureau of Economic Research says that the only possible future brake on this boom is a shortage of skilled labor. But it adds that even this would help South Africa by holding back inflation. The average return on American investments in 1960 was 29 per cent in mining and 7.5 per cent in manufacturing. From 1958 to 1961, the average earnings on U.S. investments in South Africa were 17.1 per cent, one of the fattest returns in the world. And profits have increased since then.

The biggest American companies doing business in South Africa are automotive manufacturers. Ford and General Motors sold more than half of the 143,000 cars bought in South Africa last year. The cars were assembled in South Africa from parts made both in the United States and in South Africa. The Afrikaan Government is trying to make sure that more and more of these parts are manufactured at home. Under new regulations, South Africa will restrict imports to an assembler of autos unless he can show that 55 per cent of his output will be built from South African parts by 1967.

Faced by these regulations and by the competition of cheaper British, German and Japanese cars, the American firms have announced plans to build new parts plants in South Africa. Chrysler has investment plans of $35 million, General Motors, $33 million and Ford, $11 million. This is two-thirds of the total new investment in the South African automotive industry. Last April, General Motors opened its new $30 million, 17-acre engine plant at Aloes, near Port Elizabeth. The factory is producing the first auto engine manufactured and machined completely in South Africa. Ford is completing a similar plant nearby.



Atomic Plant: "Safari I"; Pelindaba

Besides insuring a market to American auto manufacturers these plants comprise part of South Africa's strategic defense. The regime can face economic sanctions or even a rebellion with that much more confidence when it does not have to depend on imported auto engines. Once again the American ban on arms shipments to South Africa sounds hollow.

But it would be unfair to harp on the activities of Detroit's Big Three — 230 American firms are doing business in South Africa. Kimberley-Clark, operating with a South African company, is about to set up a new plant near Johannesburg to manufacture facial and toilet tissues, paper towels, napkins and other paper products. The list of American companies with plants or subsidiaries in the country reads like a U.S. Chamber of Commerce honor roll: Allied Chemical, American Cyanamid, Gillette, IBM, International Harvester, National Cash Register, Olin Mathieson, Procter & Gamble, Revlon and Upjohn, to tick off a few.

The United States is also South Africa's second largest trading partner (again next to Great Britain). In the first nine months of last year, the United States was selling goods to South Africa at a rate of $371 million a year, and imports from South Africa were at a rate of $236 million.

The United States buys mostly uranium, diamonds, copper, wool and rock-tail lobsters from South Africa—in all, 17 per cent of South Africa's exports. Trade from South Africa to America has remained fairly constant in the last few years (there was a small dip last year) but American exports to South Africa have grown markedly (in 1964, they were up 36 per cent). American sales to South Africa rise because of the country's need for heavy machinery, its increased consumer purchasing power, and its ability to redress any unfavorable balance of payments with gold—it produces 70 per cent of the world's supply.

The aid and comfort that American dollars give South Africa are probably less significant in the long run than the effect these dollars will have on American public opinion. It is vital to American financial interests that South African policy receive a sympathetic hearing in the United States. Part of this necessity derives from guilt: it sometimes seems that no American businessman can invest a cent in South Africa without making a public pronouncement to justify his deed. But a more important part comes from greed. Profits could be jeopardized by sanctions or rebellion; as long as no harm comes to Verwoerd and his kind, the money rolls in.

Last March, Gen. Lauris Norstad, retired NATO Supreme Commander and now president of the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., flew to Johannesburg to discuss plans for a multimillion-dollar expansion of a fiberglas plant in South Africa. With Harold Boeschenstein, chairman of Owens-Corning, at his side, General Norstad said: "We have full confidence in South Africa—not only we as individuals but the United States and the American people as well." Asked about the UN discussions of sanctions, Norstad replied: "We hope that nobody will take any step that may cause more trouble than it will avoid." Boeschenstein added: "Any boycott moves do not reflect the general opinion of the people of the United States nor of its businessmen." Such remarks nourish the self-righteousness and blindness of South African whites. They also confuse the issue back home. The public, after all, sees General Norstad as a renowned diplomat and military strategist, not as an Owens-Corning executive. It counts for something when the former NATO Supreme Commander offers his learned views on South Africa. The Information Service of South Africa lost no time in distributing the cheery comments of Norstad and Boeschenstein to American news media.

Although much of the lobbying for South Africa is in this form of statements from individual American businessmen who profit by the status quo, there is some organization behind it. Businessmen in South Africa have created the South Africa Foundation to present a gilded picture of their land to the rest of the world. The foundation has organized committees of foreign businessmen in seventeen countries, and recently announced plans to open a foundation office in New York. The most prominent American member is Charles W. Englehard of Newark, N.J., who was elected a vice chairman when the foundation was organized in 1959.

Englehard is chairman of a host of South African mining and industrial firms, including Rand Mines, Minerals and Chemicals Philipp Corp., and the American-South African Investment Co. Colin Legum, in his book, South Africa: Crisis for the West, estimated Englehard's personal stake in South Africa at $33.6 million. Although Englehard some time ago lectured South Africa on the need for better racial policies, his latest statements brim with confidence in the existing state of affairs. In May, when he dedicated the new $3.6 million, 19-story Rand Mines building in Johannesburg, he announced: "With this structure we are expressing our confidence not only in the future of our mining group but also in the future of South Africa." A few months earlier, in an annual report that showed record profits for the American-South African Investment Co., Englehard said that South African "progress in my opinion will be advanced if the rest of the world shows understanding of the problems which exist. Inaccurate reports, whether emanating from well-meaning sources or otherwise, only aggravate the difficulties and play into the hands of Communist supporters — more interested in furthering their own cause than in helping the people of this and other African countries." Englehard's remarks should not be dismissed as the talk of some eccentric rich man whose influence on American policy is negligible. He has been on the New Jersey delegation to several Democratic National Conventions, and is known as a generous contributor to the party.

The South African Foundation often takes American businessmen on tours of South Africa to see investment opportunities and the "positive" side of the country's racial policies. These tours have made converts, including former Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder who, according to the foundation, now believes that "South Africa is worthy of our closest association in building up a strong world economy, and also in the protection of the world against the encroachment of communism."

The South African lobby also has a recruit in the old China lobby. The American-Asia Education Exchange and its executive secretary, Marvin Liebman, have added South Africa to their stable of right-wing causes. In fact, the exchange is now known as the American-Afro-Asian Educational Exchange.

Any survey of American financial involvement in South Africa must raise some pointed questions about the relation of morality to money. The reply of American finance sometimes is that investments are amoral: dollars go where the profits are. Chase Manhattan, criticized for its loans to South Africa, wrote Students for a Democratic Society: "If we consider the receiver of a loan to be financially responsible, we do business with him, regardless of his nationality, religion, or political views. . . . We feel it would be unwise and unfair if we, as a bank, made judgments that were not based on economics."

But morality does not sit well on the conscience of American investors in South Africa. They feel compelled to fabricate an image that accords with their greed. The goal of their lobby is to show how moral it is to uphold stable, capitalist, misunderstood South Africa, the only Western anchor on a continent of Communist chaos.

In one sense, this pretense of ethics exposes the vulnerability of the lobby. Unlike the China lobby, which simply had to drum into America what it was ready to believe, the South Africa lobby must counter prevailing opinion. Enough news has come from South Africa in the last decade to convince many Americans that Verwoerd and his regime are evil; the lobby must now prove that evil is good.

The voice of the lobby is growing louder, keeping pace with American financial interests in South Africa and the disorder on the rest of the continent. The lobby may not convince America that Verwoerd is good, but it may persuade America that he at least is better than chaos and communism. Can the United States allow economic sanctions that might create turmoil in South Africa and expose it for "Communist" pickings? Should the United States support the South African Government in case a "Communist" rebellion erupts? The lobby could be decisive in pulling the noses of U.S. policy makers toward loaded questions inspired by booming profits.

THE ABYSS OF POLICY

1. The Unthinkable Target

Christopher Lasch & Alan B. Spitze

A very simple and urgent task for those who condemn our policy in Vietnam is to support the Administration in its present inhibitions about the saturation bombing of large cities. It can be argued that so many atrocities have already been committed in Vietnam that it is pointless to make further distinctions about methods of warfare. But even our present methods, deplorable as they may be, are morally distinguishable from the systematic bombing of civilian populations. It can also be argued that the issue is not whether our methods are morally defensible but whether they are politically effective—whether social revolution can be indefinitely "contained." But no policy which contributes to the normalization of terror can be said to be an effective instrument of democracy.

Public discussion, such as it is, tends to focus on the practicality of our objectives in Vietnam, on the probable consequences of our withdrawal, and on the endlessly debated question of whether the war in South Vietnam is a civil war or an act of aggression from the north. These are inescapable questions and it is important to have raised them. Meanwhile, however, the war grinds on, and it becomes more and more difficult for the Administration, since it is losing the war, to resist the demand for bigger and bigger bombs. It is important for critics of the Administration to spell out all the implications of this demand and, for once, to try to forestall a disaster.

If some of the Administration's liberal supporters meant what they said, they themselves would have raised the issue. One of the arguments in favor of the Johnson policy is that, whatever the mistakes of previous administrations, we are too deeply involved in South Vietnam to get out now; that, on the other hand, the effort to eradicate the Vietcong would involve us in an indefinite effort to prop up ineffectual and undemocratic regimes in the south, while a stepped-up aerial war against the north would lead logically to war with Communist China; and that the proper course of action, therefore, is to send more ground troops to South Vietnam in order to convince the Vietcong that they will have to settle for a negotiated peace. On several occasions, people who take this line — Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., for example — have assured critics of the war in Vietnam that this was the policy actually being followed by the government. Yet these people have made no effective public protest against the accelerating aerial assault on North Vietnam, which is so clearly not a part of the policy they recommend—is, in fact, directly contrary to it, since it rests on the premise, explicitly repudiated by men like Schlesinger, that the war in the south is controlled and directed from the north.

Thus, it remains for the critics of the Administration, for those who have argued all along that our war in South Vietnam was as hopeless as that of the French ten years before, to take up the narrower issue as well as the broader one, and to make it clear that whatever alternatives may be considered in the future, the one immediate alternative that must not be considered is the saturation bombing of civilian targets in North Vietnam.

To take such a position may seem like straining at gnats after swallowing napalm—or systematic crop destruction, or the bombing of hundreds of square miles in which there had possibly been Vietcong soldiers and certainly were Vietnamese civilians. The normalization of atrocities which was the richest legacy of World War I (only temporarily discredited by the Nazi exaggeration of its uses) has dea ened our vocabulary of protest t
the point where savageries can b criticized only in the context debates about larger goals of polic
John Roche of ADA, a spokesma for hard-boiled liberalism, recentl argued in The New Leader (Ap 26, 1965) that only an absolut pacifist could cogently raise mor objections to our specific tactics i Vietnam (he happened to hav fairly complicated pragmatic crit cisms). But the simple clarity this line is rarely taken up by th official apologists for our dail counterinsurgency, who need satisfy a general thirst for piec meal moral distinctions. Thus w bomb bridges and barracks but n people, we use gas that induce nausea instead of death, and w avoid high-level bombing becaus of the danger to innocent civilian —at least we did until strategic an political considerations reverse that policy. In short, the need justify policy in moral terms su vives; and all who are not com pletely captivated by the "pra matic" position might do well take that fact as a source of sligh comfort and as an impulse to a tion.

Those who reject all of our goa and all of our tactics may reje all such distinctions as well. B the distinctions are real enough f a thousand, or several hundre thousand, North Vietnamese wome and children who may or may n be incinerated in the course of th year. And it is no small thing th this has not yet happened, th
our leaders have rejected, so fa
the alternatives of Representati
Ford or General Clark; and wha ever we think about their oth decisions we had better be gratef for as much restraint as they ha shown. It may be that Preside
Johnson and Secretary McNama reject the murder of a couple hundred thousand people on a solute moral grounds, or it may that they merely find it inexpedien at any rate they haven't done it.
far as we can tell, there are peop

Christopher Lasch and Alan B. Spitzer are members of the History Department, the University of Iowa. Mr. Lasch is the author of The New Radicalism in America (Knopf); Mr. Spitzer, of The Revolutionary Theories of Louis-Auguste Boanqui (Columbia University Press).

Macpherson, Toronto Star

The Four Horsemen

of great weight now advocating that solution, and it is well for the rest of us to hold out, as emphatically as we can, against it.

We shall, of course, continue to fight the other consequences of the dirty war in Vietnam—so predictable and now so unpleasant as to suggest to some of our leaders the tempting possibility of cleaner alternatives executed from higher altitudes. What we must also work very hard to do is to make one particular alternative — the bombing of Hanoi and other North Vietnamese cities—inconceivable. The ease with which many Americans have been taught to tolerate the intolerable shows that this is no simple task. We can ask Representative Ford how many thousands of lives he would spend to bring Ho Chi Minh to the conference table, whether the alternatives he envisions to a large ground war are fire storms like Dresden or "conventional" atomic demonstrations on a slightly larger scale than Hiroshima. But the nature of "escalation" usually makes it difficult to pose the question in precisely these terms. A first bomb would not be dropped on the most populous center of Hanoi where cameras of a French news service happened to be trained, but on a peripheral target already defined as acceptable by previous assumptions—and this explosion would then become the previous assumption for the next and deadlier drop. The principle of escalation is simultaneously tactical and moral; and it has its real effect, though most critics and admirers of Herman Kahn have missed the point, not so much on the enemy as on ourselves. The enemy cannot always be depended on to respond rationally to our finely calibrated increments of force; he might even be goaded by our restrained dialogue into blowing out the circuits of our implicit communications. But what escalation surely does is to prepare the American public itself for the next step away from humanity; and that requires a persistent iteration of the impossibility of an American policy that moves toward the mass murder of the civilian population of North Vietnam.

It can be said in reply, of course,

(Continued on page 88)

2. A Touch of Tyranny . . . . .

Richard F. Hamilton

The nationally heralded lucubrations of President Eisenhower's Commission on National Goals were published in Goals for Americans: Programs for Aciton in the Sixties (Prentice-Hall, 1960), which contained a final chapter—"A Look Further Ahead" — written by William P. Bundy. Mr. Bundy was then the Commission's Staff Director, on leave from the CIA; he has since become the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs. In this brief chapter, Mr. Bundy made some predictions about the future state of human affairs and offered some guidelines for United States policy with respect to these anticipated events.

His basic analysis is Malthusian. The central problem is one of population growth outstripping economic growth. Perhaps we should call it neo-Malthusian, since the problem is not merely one of meeting minimal needs but is aggravated by the growth of wants beyond those dictated by subsistence. His basic solution to the problem is, like Malthus', a repressive one.

As Bundy puts it, the required innovations "often cannot be undertaken fully in a free society." Despite the qualifying "often," the subsequent argument leaves no room for free methods. In the following paragraph he stresses the contrast between developed nations and the "less developed." The former began industrialization without substantial demographic pressures and could use "free methods"; but for the less developed there is an apparent need for "methods of compulsion" which "at least for a time" are able

---

Richard F. Hamilton, a political sociologist now teaching at Princeton University, is at work on two books: one on affluence and the French worker, the other on American politics.

to deny the desires for increased living standards, and are able to command payment of the "human costs." In essence, the "goals" he suggests we Americans adopt for the underdeveloped nations involve short-run authoritarian regimes.

Mr. Bundy's point involves more than a "suggestion." As presented, it amounts to an argument that there is a "realistic" need for authoritarianism; there are, apparently, no other ways, and more specifically, there is no short-term democratic way.

If this conclusion is in fact inescapable, it should not be sloughed off as casually as is done in Bundy's article, since after all it puts us in a position markedly at variance with our official statement of aims. If, as seems to be the case, short-run authoritarianism is to emerge as our official policy for the underdeveloped countries, a number of implications need consideration:

(1) Such a policy is likely to be less attractive to most Americans than the democratic policies they thought they were supporting.

(2) Such a policy, when recognized, is likely to be especially unattractive to the underdeveloped countries. It means that our distinctive appeal in competition with the USSR and China for the affections of the new nations disappears. Rather than offering a choice of "freedom" or totalitarianism, both sides, it now appears, support authoritarianism. Moreover, both sides claim that their prescription calls for only "short-term" authoritarianism. A differentiation so minimal may explain why the underdeveloped countries have difficulty making up their minds and why there is no rush for the "free world's" offering. The problem for the "beneficiary nation" becomes one of deciding which is the better of the two authoritarianisms; in great measure, it becomes a purely technical question (i.e., of the relative efficiency of two authoritarian mechanisms) rather than a choice of alternative goals.

(3) A related problem concerns the duplicity involved in the sales pitch. Whereas our sales team has been advertising freedom and democracy, the actual package contains short-term authoritarianism. This discrepancy might help many people in the underdeveloped nations to make up their minds — against us. In addition to the dishonesty involved, it plays directly into our competitor's advertising line. They have been saying that our democratic goods are phony, that in reality ours is an authoritarian package. In the light of Bundy's words and our performance, the charge becomes increasingly difficult to dispute.

Given the commitment to authoritarianism as a policy for underdeveloped nations, and the difficulty of merchandising an unattractive (not to say unsavory) product, we arrive at a position where misrepresentation becomes an "acceptable" policy. In fact, to engage in fraudulent advertising of our product becomes "realistic," therefore "necessary." Dictators become democrats. Our ambassador in South Vietnam reproaches our reporters for being "so hard" on Diem. Hans Morgenthau, writing of our recent Vietnam White Paper (a William Bundy production, incidentally) says: "This document . . . provides a particularly glaring tendency to conduct foreign and military policy not on their own merits, but as exercises in public relations. The Government fashions an imaginary world that pleases it, and then comes to believe in the reality of that world and acts as though it were real." The misrepresentation, it is to be noted, as in the case of "rebel" pilots bombing Cuban airfields, is for both foreign and domestic consumption.

If it is argued that our product is different because the men proffering it are specially benevolent (in contrast to the malevolence of the Moscow leadership), then two further considerations need explication. First, if "our men" are specially benevolent, is not the use of authoritarian means likely to corrupt them? Will not long years spent in the "care and training" of dictators, plus the years spent in fabricating public relations documents, leave these specialists totally unfitted for conducting any other kind of policy? Won't the "democratic experts" be shoved aside in favor of the more adept and ruthless authoritarians? And then, won't the difference between benevolent and malevolent intent become entirely a matter of indifference?

Second, if the authoritarianism is genuinely intended to be temporary, then there should be some specification in these "goals for Americans" as to how the authoritarian regime is to be transformed in a democratic direction. If we belittle Communist claims abou the dictatorship of the proletaria which is to "wither away," we mus have something more substantia to offer in support of our counter claim. That the Diems wither away in favor of the Khanhs, or that the Arbenzes wither away in favor of the CIA's Castillo Armas is not a very encouraging prospect.

There are also some difficulties with William Bundy's underlying assumptions about the sources of conflict in the underdeveloped nations. He sees a "revolution of rising expectations" in these nations; he sees the restive masses envying the wealth and living standards of the advanced nations. Is this a "realistic" view? Are the masses of the peasantry in this world, who are undergoing a reduction in living standards, at the same time raising their expectations? Does the poor farmer really seethe with envy about living standards halfway around the world, pausing at the hoe to dream momentarily about a new Buick, the while his wife looks up from the fire to dream of an Electrolux vacuum cleaner and their son has turned Communist because he can't afford studs for his motorcycle jacket? A much more likely alternative possibility here is that the elites in the underdeveloped nations are the groups that are increasing their expectations and to the extent that the peasantry is aware of distant events at all, its reaction may well be envy, resentment and hostility toward its leaders. These leaders, if all went according to plan, would be members of the authoritarian governments which we are sponsoring.

If Bundy is correct, that authoritarianism is necessary for underdeveloped countries, a basic question is authoritarianism for whom? If the problem is envy and rapidly rising expectations, the solutions must be appropriate to the cause. If the cause is an increase in middle-class wants, restraints on the peasantry are not at all appropriate. If the problem is corrupt and irresponsible governments which are sapping the development process, again restraints for the peasantry are not in order. Following Bundy's own argument, if the problem has its roots in envy of American living standards, then at minimum the solution is not to broadcast the news so widely, not to dramatize the extraordinary and humiliating economic gap. If the root of the problem lies in the behavior of national elites, then at minimum the solution would involve the request that they refrain from excessive consumption, and that if they cannot, they should consume in the least flamboyant manner possible.

There is still another causal consideration of paramount importance. The Malthusian dilemma is twofold: it stems from a relative underproduction of goods, and a relative oversupply of people. This would ordinarily suggest the possibility for a twofold attack on the problem. But at this point, quite inexplicably, Mr. Bundy hesitates. "What we clearly must not do in our aid program," he says, "is to make any aspect of it conditional on a nation's handling of its population problem. Under no conditions should the U.S. Government interfere in or attempt to influence local policy or desires regarding population. Birth rates are the result of choices that lie at the heart of human freedom and often of religious belief." There is a very simple policy move open here: make the knowledge and the devices available so that people may freely choose them if they so wish. It is difficult to believe that the peasants in the upper reaches of the Ganges can somehow see the living standards half way around the world and yet cannot see the connection between the size of their families, the productivity of their fields and the resulting shares per person.

My comments to this point have not challenged the assumption that authoritarianism is somehow desirable. To assess this claim we must consider the relative costs of the alternatives. While experience with successful cases of development in the face of massive population pressures is rare (so that we cannot judge the long-term effects of alternative governmental forms), experience with authoritarian regimes and their accomplishments exists in great quantity. What are the findings?

Authoritarianism reduces the available leadership resources. Many potential leaders get neither school training nor practical training. There are substantial leadership losses—some are forced into inactivity ("internal emigration"), some are jailed or killed and some are driven into exile. Promising youths, sent abroad to be educated at great expense, find themselves reluctant to return home, and instead offer their services to the developed countries. The authoritarian society becomes polarized for and against the government; a revolutionary situation is created.

Lacking the restraints that are found in pluralistic contexts (that is, where the opposition has not been made ineffective), those in power are "free" to loot and plunder to their heart's content. This corruption in turn systematically drains off resources which would ordinarily go for development. Being rational investors and able to compare the domestic with the foreign investment opportunities, those in power will choose to invest the earnings from corruption in the already well-developed countries. The authoritarian context is not hospitable to the kinds of idealism that might ordinarily serve to counter the inducements to corruption. And the spectacle of an elite so enthusiastically revolutionizing its own expectations is also likely to corrupt the underlying population. At least, it will not induce them to strive for greater diligence and honesty in their own work.

This suggests that, contrary to the conventional assumption, the costs of authoritarianism are too high to pay. Similarly, it suggests that, while authoritarianism may contribute to the development of Swiss bank accounts, its use as a device for the development of the new nations is very limited. The supposed "efficiencies" of centralized regimes were long ago exposed by Tocqueville. They can coordinate people and resources, he said, and can make an impressive showing in the short run. But then, he said, they come upon difficulties. Since they do not train leaders "in depth," he said, such settings "enervate"; they create apathy and passivity among the mass of men. That is, the authoritarian regime fosters just the opposite of those traits that are most needed. The point is also made by John Stuart Mill in Our Representative Government.

There are a number of other difficulties with Mr. Bundy's analysis. Aside from the problems already detailed, which may be put under the heading of "imperfectly explored implications," there remains one of oversimplification. The major oversimplification involves the childlike categorizing of the world into a so-called free portion and a remainder which is unfree. Objection may be made both to the value of such intellectual "economy" and to the policy implications which are likely to follow, specifically from the "we-they" struggle which is posed. Obviously, there are going to be many questionable cases which do not fit easily into either category. Even if we were to accept his approach, Bundy's practice involves an inaccurate use of his own dichotomy. He appears to think, for example, that everything outside the Communist world is free. Under the heading "Less Advanced Free Nations," he includes with no further comment the subheadings, Africa and Latin America. He explicitly includes the United Arab Republic on the free side. The "Rest of Western Europe" falls under the heading of "Advanced Free Nations," apparently including Spain and Portugal as free. Parallel to this careless categorizing of the non-Communist states is an unwillingness to see differences in the "Sino-Soviet Bloc." Bundy notes the Soviet economic potential for 1970 and its capability for conducting foreign-aid programs. The so-called satellite countries will be able to do the same, he says, and, moreover, they "must be considered instruments of Soviet policy." Must they really? This assertion will undoubtedly come as a surprise to Tito. It might be questioned in Albania, and neither Rumania nor Poland would appear to fit this description.

All this amounts to an immature demand for simplicity. The world must divide up into the good guys and the bad guys, and apparently, regardless of the evidence, they are to be forced into one or another of these camps. A performance of this sort would ordinarily be called "rigid" or "inflexible." In any other sphere, such thinking would cast doubts on one's abilities. We would say that you must recognize the differences—at a minimum you must recognize a free-unfree continuum and devise a wider range of policies. The peculiarity in this case is that this is the thinking that has dominated American life for nearly two decades.

In the current controversy over

Vietnam, we are in essence being told that we must back the President, the State Department, etc., because these are the experts, and the critics are inexpert. But if they are experts, then we must account for their inexpert performance. In this instance, in the work of this leading policy maker, we are given oversimplified terms for analysis; we note inaccurate use even of those terms; we receive imperfectly thought through theories about the underdeveloped world; we are asked to accept policy which undercuts and opposes our most attractive "selling point"; and to swallow transparent fabrications presented to justify our policy. Where then is the expertise?

A final range of questions remains. Why should expertise call for docile consent? Why should those with knowledge about affairs and competence to make policy be so hesitant to explain what they are doing? Isn't it rather the case that at critical points in history we should want "policy" tested and assessed and able to meet all objections? Doesn't another difficulty go with uncritical consent, namely that the experts will have their own expertise diminished by all too easy acceptance of their views, by an absence of challenge? Isn't this just the kind of occasio where we need critical dissent Wouldn't it have been a good thin to have had dissent in Central Europe in 1914? Maybe if there ha been some, the Schlieffen Planners—the 1914 equivalents of th First Strike and Counter Strik strategists of our own age—migh have been stopped. As it was, million men later, the word was "Sorry, we didn't intend it tha way." Does an official call fo "consent" have any place in a democracy? Isn't the appropriate "response" to criticism in a democrac an argument rather than a call fo silence?

The Free University

Academy for Mavericks . . . . Howard Junker

In Carmel, Calif., Joan Baez opens a school to teach the techniques of nonviolence. In London, novelist Alexander Trocchi coordinates Project Sigma, an international effort to set up revolutionary study groups. In Gainesville, Fla., a Free University with a full-scale constitution awaits financial backing. The Society and Guild of Independent Students is organizing in Swarthmore, Pa. The Students for a Democratic Society are considering a program of independent study.

All this comes in the wake of Mississippi Freedom Schools, the Free Speech Movement/Free University at Berkeley and the teach-ins. No more swallowing goldfish and eating humble pie; no more yearning after a genteel utopia like Sarah Lawrence. To the question of how to correct abuses in American higher education, some students and teachers are now answering that reform is neither possible nor sufficient: We've got to get out on our own, establish our own anti-Establishment.

In New York, on July 6, in the main room of a labyrinthine loft at 20 East 14th St., half a block from Union Square, Staughton Lynd, one-time member of cooperative communities, director of last summer's Freedom Schools, severe critic of American policy in Vietnam and assistant professor of history at Yale, offers the first course, The American Radical Tradition to 1900, at the Free University of New York. His students, eager to do something revolutionary, suggest that the seating arrangement be changed from the usual rows to a classroom-in-the-round. Lynd agrees, then wonders if that's going to change anything. The students laugh, and Lynd, for openers, assails the phony traditions of the American Left.

The Free University of New York — 230-plus students, thirty-plus faculty members—is a start from scratch, totally autonomous, neither an after-hours annex nor the training school of a movement. It was set up by academic mavericks to do what can't be done within the Establishment. FUNY can be compared—though it is dangerous to do so while its survival is moot—with the New School for Social Research, which began in 1919 with the highest credentials (Charles Beard, John Dewey and Thorstein Veblen were on the first faculty) and continued to do pioneer work in adult education, social sciences, foreign-policy studies and the arts. The permissive, creative training of now-defunct Black Mountain College, begun in 1923, with nineteen students and eleven teachers, also comes to mind. But FUNY is not an academic smörgasbord like the New School, nor a sylvan atelier like Black Mountain. FUNY's raison d'être is radical politics.

FUNY has no official line, bu its debating-society format lean toward Marx not Chautauqua. Th faculty includes: a handful of recent visitors to Cuba, editors o Studies on the Left, editors of th Viet Report, members of the anti-imperialist May 2nd Movement members of the Trotskyite Spartacist group, an organizer for th Progressive Labor Party, an instructor at the Socialist Workers Part summer school—but no Communists and no Birchers. (An oversight, suggests one instructor.)

Though America has a few right-wing colleges, like Harding an Pepperdine, and although radica students like to accuse all educational institutions of supporting th military-big business Establishment American colleges are overtly apolitical. They may have been founded by affluent laymen with veste interests to promote, but—as Christopher Jencks, at work with Davi Riesman on an analysis of highe education, points out—they canno be positioned by their politics. An now, long after the Red scar purged the "liberal" universitie and shut down such "Marxist training camps" as the Jefferson Schoo in New York, there are no institutions which seem to line up on th Left. Yet some American student have declared themselves radicals and they are beginning to ask fo institutions to match their ideologies.

When Clark Kerr accused hi

Howard Junker is a free-lance writer.

students at Berkeley of using the university "as a fortress from which they can sally forth with impunity to make their attacks on society," he indicated a new kind of student tension. Far from valuing college because it is secluded and cut off from wordly concerns, some students now want to agitate. A decade ago students beginning to chafe at the impotent role of egghead looked with envy at counterparts in Hungary, France and Japan who were threatening or actually toppling governments. Today there is hope backed by experience that direct action in the form of protest can be taken and does matter. (That not even cloister scholars have looked back on the defection of the professors to Kennedy's Washington as a trahison des clercs is another measure of how academic roles are being redefined.)

In the past few years, then, students have increasingly come to see themselves as real (not as intermediates on the way to the real world) and as effective. Last year, beyond countless demonstrations for civil rights and against government foreign policy, more than fifty student demonstrations dealt with on-campus issues. Some, objecting to the administration's role in loco parentis, protested dress, dorm or liquor regulations. Some demanded the right to organize or to take political action. Some objected to the firing of radical or teaching-oriented professors. Now the cold eye of the dissatisfied student has turned on the total university experience. FUNY's catalogue states:

> . . . Students have been systematically dehumanized, deemed incompetent to regulate their own lives, sexually, politically and academically. They are treated like raw material to be processed for the university's clients — business, government and military bureaucracies. Teachers, underpaid and constantly subject to investigation and purge, have been relegated to the position of servant-intellectuals, required, for regular promotion, to propagate points of view in harmony with the military and industrial leadership of our society.
>
> The American university has been emasculated. Its intellectual vigor, exuberance and excitement have been destroyed. What remains is a dispassionate and studied dullness, a façade of scholarly activity concealing an internal emptiness and cynicism, a dusty-dry search for permissible truth which pleases none but the administrator and the ambitious.

If this is the way things are, then the only recourse is to start something new.

FUNY was set up by a small group led by a pair of 30-year-old instructors, Allen Krebs, currently on terminal leave of absence from Adelphi, and James Mellen, instructor in political science at Drew. As befits a university president, Krebs has a Ph.D., from the University of Michigan (1962). He did undergraduate work at Cornell and Northwestern (B.A., 1955), and he has taught at the American University in Beirut. After teaching sociology for a year at Adelphi, Krebs went to Cuba last summer. Upon his return, he found himself in trouble with Adelphi's administration. Charges against him escalated from letting classes out early, to neglecting the syllabus, to teaching a Marxist line. Krebs was relieved of his duties last Christmas. Student protest followed, as well as pressure from the AAUP. The matter of Krebs's reinstatement is now pending before the Board of Trustees.

"It would be groovy to go back," says Krebs, who frequently drops academic precision and comes on like a hip prole. "The controversy has aroused many students; I'd have a good chance of doing what a teacher should—reach students."

Krebs's course at FUNY is titled Marxism and American Decadence. His wife, a graduate student in Slavic languages at Columbia, teaches Revolutionary Russian poetry.

Mellen, as befits a university finance minister, rose via the school of hard knocks. Dropping out of a CPA course during his senior year at UCLA, Mellen went on the road, working as a newspaper circulation organizer and as a traveling photographer, then wandering awhile. He returned to San Francisco State to take his B.A. in 1960. Encouraged by his professors he did a year's graduate work in political science, then went to the University of Iowa. He is currently at work on a doctoral dissertation dealing with the role of organized labor in foreign policy. His course, The Instruments of American Imperialism, began with an analysis of American intervention in the Dominican Republic.

After months of work, planning and preparing FUNY, Krebs and Mellen were shocked when their efforts to involve the students and instructors in the first open meeting aroused suspicion and obstreperousness. Although they had not intended to offer FUNY as a fait accompli, the founders were not prepared to let the "elephantine plenum," as Krebs later called the meeting, destroy FUNY to its own liking. After much parliamentary procedure (which prompted a middle-aged woman from Brooklyn to declare that she had not attended in order to listen to such garbage) and entreaties, and blowing off of steam and statements of good intentions and confidence, the hundred or so students and faculty approved the basic Krebs-Mellen administration of a coordinating committee — five instructors and two students — committed to an open meeting once a week. The "plenum" broke with Krebs-Mellen on finances, agreeing to pay $24 for the first eight-week course, but reducing the cost of additional courses to $8 per. (Instructors are not paid; in fact, many chipped in $30 apiece to help FUNY get started.)

Drawings by Harold Teichberg

The radical tendency toward anarchy simmered down once school had begun. FUNY's curriculum includes classes in film, poetry, drawing and dance, but most of the teaching bears on politics. Course titles include: Revolutionary Egyptology, The Struggle for Vietnamese Independence, Marxist Economics, The Permanent Revolution, Politics of Vision, Origin and Failure of Liberalism, Marxist Existentialism, Ethics and Reality, Leninism, History of the Cold War, Cuba, Magazine Organization, and Radical Afro-American Social Thought. These courses are not offered for credit, lead to no degree, are taught from no syllabus, only occasionally have reading lists, are variously lectures and seminars. Each of the instructors being his own master (thrown potluck with two, five or fifty students), some FUNY courses are college level, others are puerile.

Of the classes I sampled during the first week, my favorites are Calvin Hicks's Community Organization and Paul Krassner's Seminar on the Press and Satire. An anecdote from each may indicate the tenor of FUNY. Hicks, a Negro who is involved in community work in Harlem, commented on the difficulty well-intentioned white workers have in throwing off their deep-down racism. "What are you going to say," asked Hicks, "to the black cat who's watching the Rheingold ethnic ad — he's offered a blues singer as his bit — and this cat says to you: 'They're messing me up with this chick. She's so assimilated she don't even have rhythm. You close your eyes and you hear something white.' What do you tell a cat like this?"

Krassner, who edits The Realist, uses his course to show the many ways of being seriously funny. Turning his class onto the satiric possibilities of puns and the politics of abortion, Krassner also analyzed a New Yorker cartoon: a pianist, before commencing, announces that he wants to make a foreign-policy statement. Krassner sees the laugh in this reaction-to-an-action in its incongruity and in its absolute possibility. Many of the students, although amused by the cartoon, felt the pianist was entirely justified.

Like any institution, FUNY will be defined by its members. As I saw it, the student body seemed intense and eager, composed mainly of middle-class Jewish college students, with a sprinkling of Middle Western note takers, a few middle agers, a handful of Negroes, a couple of graduate students, a boy with an earring.

"What do you mean by 'middle class'?" one student challenged his instructor. Another jotted down: "Stoics — wisdom — great good." Another, a student in Dr. Joseph Berke's The Psychotic Experience As an Archetype of Paradise Lost, remarked to a neighbor that the lady student relating her nightmare seemed to be asking for an eight-week psychotherapy.

FUNY takes all sorts — of instructors as well as students. Initially, its policy was to allow anyone who wanted to teach to do so provided the proposed course was unavailable elsewhere. (Curiously, courses taught by instructors listed as college teachers have been the most heavily enrolled. Academic credentials count even in revolutionary establishments.) At some future time, it may be necessary to screen prospective instructors. But by what standards, asked the second meeting of the coordinating committee. And how, indeed, should FUNY define its image? For a while, the committee decided, it will rely on "organic development." In no event, however, will FUNY seek tie-ins with other groups or movements. The school will remain a thing unto itself. And to this end, Krebs and Mellen insist that FUNY maintain its financial independence, taking no money from trust fund, foundation or private benefactor.

From all this, it should appear that FUNY is far more than a leftist gimmick, an aberration set up by and for undesirables. To have mustered more than 200 paying rebels, on the strength of word-of-mouth, ads in The Village Voice and some handbills, FUNY must have hit a mark. Moreover, if FUNY lasts through its now-planned fall semester, radicals who looked on while the beachhead was won may join the fight. Certain well-known names have already indicated their interest in participating, once FUNY proves its vitality.

Crucial, then, in the evaluation of this experiment—which beyond a bizarre curriculum may not offer much in the way of academic trail blazing — is the simple fact that it has been set up. Some people who wanted their own kind of university now have it. FUNY is proof that rebels need not be put down by the traditional administration taunt: if you don't like it here, leave. FUNY — as a statement of "this is what we want" — is constructive criticism at its best.

And now that American students are beginning to develop a sense of themselves as an oppressed minority with a national identity (Mario Savio may be the first nationally known, nonathletic BMOC), now that students know how to organize themselves, the notion of a Free University will spread. FUNY is an alternative manner and kind of education, capable of being put into practice not by negotiating with the enemy but by independent resolve. Freedom, at least to learn and teach, is sometimes available for the asking.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Grotesque Purgation

DOG YEARS. By Günter Grass. Translated by Ralph Manheim. Harcourt, Brace and World. 570 pp. $6.95.

Paul West

Of all the things Günter Grass has taught us in his ribald, voluminous homily, the one that sticks—sticks perhaps in the throats of hopeful liberals who envision the Great Society—is that nihilism can be virtuous and books expressing it can be fat. Grass, more than any other member of the Group 47, has still not got over the guilt and the awfulness, the turpitude and the tantrum. He is still in deep shock and still, with obsessed acerbity, going over the same ground with the same thoughts in mind, and especially the thought that the German tragedy was the result of each individual's lack of faith in his fellows' readiness to support him in a decent refusal. Grass' is not the non serviam of Stephen Dedalus; it is, rather, the bleakest sequel yet to Thomas Mann's "I do not have much faith in faith, nor do I believe very much in faith, but far more in a goodness capable of existing without faith and which may even be the direct product of doubt."

This much became clear with The Tin Drum. And here now, boldly woven into another iconoclastic tapestry, is the identical theme, writ shambling large again and counterpointed by the presence of dogs, scarecrows and the Vistula River at Danzig. Brawny Walter Matern is a muddled Slavic German, both well meaning and despicable, self-hating and amoral. As a Nazi he helps beat up his maladroit, half-Jewish friend, Eddi Amsel, the scarecrow-maker, who (according to the minor deviltry of boys' rituals) was once his blood brother whom he taught to play a fair game of schlagball; after the war Amsel, mysteriously transformed from fat boy into Brauxel, the thin mine owner, tries to talk Matern out of the self-loathing into which he lapses. Dog Years is a work of dialectic, dialogue and parallels, whereas The Tin Drum is one of heroic monomania.

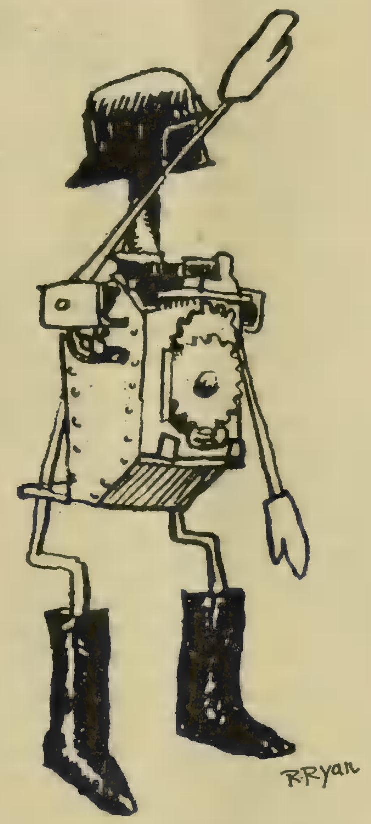
And yet, once the Matern-Amsel friendship has settled down into what is visibly the book's theme, Grass, who has his own perverse way of doing things, begins with beautiful indirection to blur it. Quite early he explains that "it will be necessary to subject the Matern-Amsel friendship to many more trials," and he really puts the pair of them through it. But the main trial they undergo is that of his method, and this has two effects. First, they become less characters than magnificently animated motifs in a swarming, knobbly host of images. And, second, although they grow into men, they seem arrested in boyhood. So what we get is history moving forward from the twenties while Matern and Amsel, alternately meek and infernal Tweedledum and Tweedledee, look back to the ham-fisted autos-da-fé which have not only formed them irrevocably but supply Grass with the most poignant, most farcical version of his anti-Nazi theme.



Setting out to de-demonize the Nazi cult, Grass again chooses to dwarf it: not, as in The Tin Drum, by creating a monster of halted development (which is the arithmetical or plane way of doing it) but by creating two complementary characters whose growth into adulthood turns them only into enlarged boys adrift in a copiously noted landscape. This, I take it, is the algebraic or spherical way of handling the theme; and Dog Years is much the more deliberate, more controlled of the two novels. The Tin Drum is like improvised jazz, whereas Dog Years, for all its cavorting ribaldries and alluvial excursions, is a boldly orchestrated microcosm, amazing in its stylistic variety and yet indefatigably ad rem.

Part One not only deals with Matern and Amsel as boys but also records the beginnings of Harras the dog, who sires Prinz, the Führer's favorite pet. See how Grass puts it, naming the hound who will come from behind and surpass not only his contemporaries, human and canine, but even Amsel's super-scarecrow, "Potrimpos, the forever laughing youth with the ear of wheat between his teeth." "But," we learn, "Amsel never designed a scarecrow in the image of a dog. . . . All the scarecrows in his diary, except for the one with the milk-drinking eels and the other — half grandmother, half three-headed willow — are likenesses of men or gods." In this first part (to borrow Grass' own words) "elements of fantasy mingle with immemorial folk ways; delightful figures, but gruesome ones as well, may be standing in surging fields and in gardens blessed with abundance." The three strands of Matern-Amsel, dogs and Vistula—now seen with a dreaming omniscience, now with shocked incomprehension — conduct us firmly into a humdrum-awful, festively demented world that Grass has made his own. Sometimes the treatment is dead pan, with truckfuls of raw data dumped into the stanzalike paragraphs to thicken the texture or ballast the extravaganza. Sometimes the verbal sounds go running on while the sense—the original drift — remains intact. Sometimes

---

Paul West, English novelist and critic, is a visiting professor at Pennsylvania State. His books include Byron and the Spoiler's Art (St Martin's Press), The Modern Novel and a memoir, I, Said the Sparrow (Hutchinson).

Grass shuffles his feet, but usually in preliminary for a raucous shout; and sometimes the personages fall into slow motion, like Mardi Gras grotesques or, in Grass' phrase, "tin soldiers against magnifying glass." He doesn't waste a rhetorical trick.

Yet it is a sanely purposeful pandemonium he makes, and his narrative survives its garish, baroque burden of data. It survives what amounts to a caustic ecology of his native region, an ecology alive and unnerving with eels that suck the cows' teats; a miller who does a worm-and-beetle census of his flour by auscultating the sacks; headless knights and nuns; the scarecrow called the Great Cuckoo Bird which induces goiter, swivel-eye or miscarriage; Grandma Matern buried with her hairpins still in place; young Walter belting frogs with his schlagball bat; and a whole cacophony of tough chatter by tiny guys who have arrived here by way of Cat and Mouse.

If Dog Years stopped even at page 113, where the first part ends, it would be a dazzling feat of imaginative audacity. Somehow the facts about boyhood float apart and drift lazily sideways like exhaust in the sky until, suddenly, you have the feeling that Grass has managed a total image almost without trying for one. Something happens which gives extra life to, draws extra life from, every particle of the material read to that point. It's nothing to do with epiphany. It's a stunning total articulation of the human maxima and minima, adapted from Danziger folklore and travestied by Amsel's scarecrows. I don't think I have read any other postwar novel in which this diligent sense of life's interrelatedness and unity has been set down in such iron sentences or, through patient assembly of the fruits of exact examination, made so stark. Grass has managed this — and it cannot have been easy for him—by forgoing some of the gratuitous fun which enlivens but sometimes muffles The Tin Drum. This first part is incomparably well done, especially for the sense it gives of humanity blocked when, say, the miller listens to his sacks or Amsel eats newts' tails and then vomits them up (having passed the test). The actions bear on everyone and everything, are endlessly relatable, and gather to themselves layer on layer of significance without ever becoming meaningful. Grass shows us a region every bit as vivid, as tactile, as Yoknapatawpha County or Dylan Thomas' Wales, and reveals the inhabitants stretching after something that isn't merely human, rural or manufactured. They end up with folklore pushed to its limits, but blocked off from God (or whatever), with Amsel's scarecrows uninformative and stillborn against the dunes and the same uncaring Vistula. All overtures to mystery end by being answered by men. So it is safer, perhaps, to order one's life by the shifts at the mine or the schlagball periods in school. And all the time the dogs go about their business, couple and yelp, unscared by scarecrows and little heeded.

The narration of Part Two falls into the hands of the ingenious creep Harry Liebenau, a younger member of the Amsel-Matern generation, and assumes the form of "Love Letters" to his cousin, Tulla (fresh from Cat and Mouse). When Tulla was born, Harras was 14 months old. Grass whips things along, portraying the middle dog years with ferocious honesty but somehow letting his characters become mere representatives. Once the coruscating documentation of boyhood and youth is over, things fall a bit flat. It's not that people become less imaginative as they get older, but that Grass treats his characters in much the same way as Mann treats Hans Castorp: with didactic intent so strong

In The Egg

(Translated by Michael Hamburger)

We live in the egg.
We have covered the inside wall of the shell with dirty drawings and the Christian names of our enemies.
We are being hatched.

Whoever is hatching us
is hatching our pencils as well.
Set free from the egg one day,
at once we shall draw a picture of whoever is hatching us.

We assume that we're being hatched.
We imagine some good-natured fowl and write school essays about the colour and breed of the hen that is hatching us.

When shall we break the shell?
Our prophets inside the egg for a middling salary argue about the period of incubation.
They posit a day called X.

Out of boredom and genuine need
we have invented incubators.
We are much concerned about our offspring inside the egg.
We should be glad to recommend our patent to her who looks after us.

But we have a roof over our heads.
Senile chicks,
polyglot embryos
chatter all day
and even discuss their dreams.

And what if we're not being hatched?
If this shell will never break?
If our horizon is only that of our scribbles, and always will be?
We hope that we're being hatched.

Even if we only talk of hatching there remains the fear that someone outside our shell will feel hungry and crack us into the frying pan with a pinch of salt.—
What shall we do then, my brethren inside the egg?

Günter Grass

as occasionally to deprive him of his own already established identity. It is as if Grass' heart looks back while his mind dutifully gets on with the painful job, alertly on the trail of Amsel (now manufacturing scarecrows that parody goose-stepping S.A. men, of whom Matern is one), the war, and Prinz, who deserts Hitler. The effect is a radiant, bony knottiness, but weakened because the calamities seem to be happening to people almost as arrested as Oskar Matzerath in The Tin Drum. True, Grass may want just that effect of the unspeakable marionette, but surely he could have secured it by giving us the contorted psychology of people sacrificing themselves to the stench of Zeitgeist (I am thinking of how well Hermann Broch does this in The Sleepwalkers).

As it is, the cruelty and turpitude of the boyhood games carry over into the second part only to animate a brilliant diagram in which Amsel and Matern, instead of festering inwardly, fade somewhat and begin to add up to a compound ghost. Grass triggers everything into colliding, dissonant activity which overpowers even the two girls, vicious Tulla and gentle Jenny. The materiality of farce takes over and the psychological point partly vanishes under a landslide of reportorial debris. So you feel sorry for the characters in the way you feel sorry for the sorcerer's apprentice or for children whose pets have got out of hand, and not (as I think Grass wants) sorry for adults who are fellow traveling with Peter Pan. One paragraph beginning: "Who does not rub his eyes when he looks on at transmutations, but is unable to believe either his eyes or the snow miracle?" puts it exactly. I was rubbing my eyes all through the first part, such were the transmutations. But the second part is like Tussaud or Disney; you marvel at the fecundity of the artifice but have no invitation to the interior. If this is the way the world almost ended, then where are the whimpers of conscience, the bangs of anguish on the brainpan? This central part should have been penseroso as well as scherzando. Then the curious round-and-round effect which it creates, with themes and images — rats, bone piles at the camps, raspberry drops, Tulla's miscarriage from jumping off a moving streetcar, Jenny's knitting, Heidegger's jargon, kennels and black shepherds—convecting like rice in boiling water, would have seemed less smart, less a feat of nothing but virtuosity.

Having blamed Grass I unblame him. I have to. Look what happens when a German tries to do interpretive psychology: Doctor Faustus, Steppenwolf, On the Marble Cliffs, The Man Without Qualities. This way is better. It is, in both senses, a tattoo, both ornate and percussive. Grass is right to reduce to bestial puppetry the antihuman antics of a whole generation. I think it might be imprudent fictional technique, but it is a reduction with both poetic and historical justification. One catastrophe-quiet, shame-laden sentence almost at the end of Part Two sets things to rights and reminds us of some of the reasons: "All are eager to start out fresh with living, saving, letter writing, in church pews, at pianos, in card files and homes of their own." The rest is dog yelps from the machine of the economic miracle.

"Materniads" — scabrous semi-philippics — compose the third part. Matern, released from an English anti-Fascist camp, inherits Prinz whom he first thinks of calling "Shit" but finally names Pluto (shades of Cerberus). He embarks on a tour of revenge which involves infecting the wives and daughters of his former comrades in the S.A. with venereal disease. While he does so the novel, like Matern and his lewd hosts, Sawatzki and his Inge, sleeping three to one bed, develops a "yearning for intricate harmony: so many arms and legs!" But things do come together, as when Matern and Sawatzki accidentally touch fingers while exploring Inge-pussy from different sides of the common bed. One touch of Matern's clap makes the whole nation kin, and not until his vengeance is complete does he cure himself by urinating into an electric socket. He swyves on, however, unable to resist the hungry Inges, and five times more has to resort to electricity to rid himself of "his lordship's cold."

He begins to fail while, all over Germany, the meal worms (those born survivors) take over and the novel becomes a bombinating parody of the Wirtschaftswunder through which, on their six legs, Matern and Pluto stumble vengefully, clad in patches of Joycean prose. A radio script partly in verse falls into the narrative like a curbstone, and Matern ends up visiting the infernal region of Brauxel's mine, where countless mechanical scarecrows called rage engines now

Where Africa ends and Europe begins
...a violent, enchanted
land...

Announcing:

Spain:
A Modern History

By RHEA MARSH SMITH

"Oh lovely Spain! renowned, romantic Land!" wrote Lord Byron. Today Spain holds the same fascination for us that she has held in the past. This book presents the history of this land of fierce individualism and breathtaking beauty. Stretching from Gibraltar to the Pyrenees, Spain has wrought such far-reaching changes in the world that today Spanish is the native language of more than 155 million people—five times the population of Spain herself!

When you read this penetrating book you will come to understand that the turmoil which has afflicted Spain for the last 150 years is not dead. It sleeps—like a smoldering volcano—in a country where skyscrapers rise alongside age-old cathedrals, where the past is not forgotten and the future is a dream in the hearts of a people that once held half the globe in its hands.

A new volume in
THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
HISTORY OF THE MODERN WORLD
Edited by Allan Nevins
and Howard M. Ehrmann

552 pages 4 maps $8.75

The University of Michigan Press
Ann Arbor

await the invasion order from above. As Brauxel observes, "A cardinal emotion that promotes the grinding of teeth can't be a passing fad." Sic transit Eddi Amsel.

No two ways about it: the book is a work of genius, no matter how cantankerous, willful, filthy, tedious, brutal, nihilistic, long-winded, importunate, self-conscious or Germany-obsessed you find it. If execution can be lyrical, then Dog Years is that. But the hangman is far from affable and, it is worth pointing out, this is the second time he has formally executed this body. Never has a dunghill been reported with such a consummate sense of its pageantry or the violence of racism smacked dead with so savage a hand. Matern and Amsel are both to blame, both to be felt with, neither to be excused. To be human is not to be excused, but only to make excuses when confronted with a censor as drastic as this. Isn't that, perhaps, why Grass lingers with such terrible infatuation over his childhood years? Then, at least, the brutality is supposed to be partly innocent. Ralph Manheim's translation, an impossible task, brings into being an English that might give pause to English-writing novelists themselves. If, of course, this stupendous, lethal graffito doesn't stop them dead in their tracks in the first place.

Notes From Afar: Part I

Harold Clurman

I left New York on April 17 and returned July 5. The ten weeks were spent at the University of California, Davis; in Tokyo, Kyoto and Nara in Japan; in Paris and London. Ordinarily I return to New York eager to report on the theatre of distant shores, often anticipating the arrival of plays from abroad, especially the British plays, which if they have been hailed in England sooner or later turn up, along with our musicals, on a Broadway that has become a receiving station for London goods. This time, however, I prefer to set down "travel notes" rather than deliver opinions, because I am more concerned at the moment with the sources, the tendencies, the social and psychological environment of drama than with the detail of individual examples.

In California I was encouraged in my belief that the "breakdown" of Broadway—due in large part to economic strangulation — may prove a boon to the American theatre. There is a lively appetite for theatre in and around university towns in many parts of the country. I don't refer simply to shopworn metropolitan hits or even to the respectable routine of modern repertory — Shaw, Chekhov, etc., — but to plays unfamiliar even among the more adventurous producers off-Broadway: for example, such a play as Michel de Ghelderode's epic farce Pantagleize, recently performed by a new company in San Francisco. But it may take ten years before this upsurge of activity outside New York assumes major proportions.

In Tokyo the most interesting theatre is still provided in the traditional framework: the Puppet Theatre, the Noh and the Kabuki. It is truly an exotic theatre, wholly distinct from any Western tradition. It does not seek to imitate nature but to create a reality of its own. Scholars explain that the Kabuki, almost as much as the Noh theatre, does not model its playing on human behavior so much as on the first and favorite actors of the Japanese stage — the puppets.

Very little of the ancient Greek, Elizabethan or neo-Classic French corresponds to the old Japanese theatre. The sounds we hear in the Noh playhouse strike sorrowful notes from a supernal dimension, sounds which at no time echo the actual speech in any of the feudal courts where the plays were originally performed. The masks are marked by serenity, as if the types they indicate had transcended tragedy; pain itself wears a smile, gentle or ever so faintly ironic. The masks for demons display a frozen rictus with eyes rendered cavernous by fury or dismay.

One's sense of time is made to vanish in the Noh play. The very gestures and the progress of the actors across the beautifully burnished cypress stage floor are calculated to create a feeling of timeless immobility. The spectator feels himself lifted to a realm of pure Idea, a heaven above concepts of good and evil, pleasure or pain. If there remains some trace of earthly woe it has been so etherealized that we are induced to contemplate it with godlike imperturbability and yet with the most intimate concern. The weird music of the Noh theatre makes Webern seem like Wagner. In it, a bereaved soul emanates eerily from a remote sphere. To appreciate Noh one must liberate oneself from Western impatience, from the impulse to immediately purposive action.

Most Americans prefer the Kabuki, a form developed to please the emerging middle class of the 17th century. Noh is essentially aristocratic. Kabuki is gayer, grosser, more colorful, more closely related to real life. Still Kabuki is to an Occidental play as Noh is to Kabuki. Genuine performances are permeated with sounds in speech and music as formalized and distinct from normal Japanese speech as is the Noh play.

Nowadays one sees relatively little of what I call "genuine" Kabuki. One finds in the Kabuki repertory (especially during the late spring and summer) too many plays dating from 1868, in which the earlier forms have become adulterated by commonplace influences from the West. The results are often neither flesh, fowl nor good red herring.

Apart from certain Kabuki dances and other exquisitely savage moments (in one case a double love-suicide—always idealized in old Japan) the best Kabuki I saw was not at the accredited Kabuki-za but at the Zenshin-za, a group organized thirty-five years ago. Here I saw a scrupulously organized performance of a play in the classic Kabuki style. Music, movement, costumes and speech were marvelously modulated in alternations of humorous characterizations, irony and violence. But it is interesting to note that the gentleman who served as my interpreter was shocked that in one scene the leading actor made slurping noises when he drank from a bowl of wine—a bit of coarse realism that is abhorrent to Kabuki purists.

Elderly and educated folk attend Noh performances with "librettos" in their hands because the language of the plays is archaic. A less refined but on the whole middle-aged crowd (often accompanied by kids) frequent the Kabuki-za. The younger generation goes to the movies and is even more addicted to television. There are also revues, equivalents of our old burlesque shows, an all-girl musical entertainment and the inflaming rites of the strip tease. The young sophisticates have become enthralled by all the forms of abstraction and Pop art that we know so well.

There has also been for some time a Japanese theatre in the "Western style," playing contemporary Japanese plays (some by the highly gifted novelist Yukio Mishima) and foreign plays, including most recently Giraudoux's Ondine and Albee's Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf. One is constantly questioned about Stanislavsky's system and Brecht's practice. While the mechanics of the camera have been thoroughly mastered in Japan, the Western style in the theatre has not yet matured. One senses the difficulty that Japanese actors experience in changing from the presentational style—of Noh, Kabuki, Brecht and vaudeville—to the representational, that is, the more or less realistic. The Japanese actor tends to relate either directly to the audience or to his own individual virtuosity, rather than to his fellow actor in a closely knit context, every part of which must contribute to the whole.

The Japanese will learn this technique in time, as they have assimilated other things from other lands. At present their civilization is in a state of catapulting transition. Tokyo is New York, Chicago and Pittsburgh in one — with occasionally sharp throwbacks to an age-old past. The 20th century and the 18th seem to have become scrambled. One feels like crying out, "Too fast!"

Industrialization is epidemic. Tokyo, for all its April cherry blossoms, its June wisteria, azaleas and lotus flowers, is not beautiful. It is exciting, a kind of spectacularly mad Wonderland, a wilderness of machinery, heavy traffic, swirling neon. One is reminded of our twenties and one fears a sudden depression. Even now there are signs that a recession is affecting the middle class (most movie companies are bankrupt through overproduction of cheap films) though there is full employment for the workers.

When in 1963 I wrote here about my first Tokyo visit I spoke of asymmetry as a characteristic feature of Japanese art, to be observed in flower arrangements, in gardens, in the dance and in the graphic arts. On this trip I heard a guide in Kyoto—he was something of a poet, painter and sage in the manner of the elite of a past age—say, "Irregularity appeals to the Japanese. But there must be harmony in the irregularity." As he spoke I wondered whether the present irregularity of Japanese civilization, its hectic growth, could be composed into a harmony.

I cannot leave off here without speaking of my work in Japan. Under the auspices of the Office of Cultural Presentations of the U.S. State Department, I staged O'Neill's Long Day's Journey Into Night with an American cast I had brought with me for the benefit, and with the co-operation of a company that is now rehearsing the play in Japanese for a Tokyo production in September. This company called Kumo (which means cloud) is an Institute of Dramatic Art, a training ground as well as a theatre group. It is one of a number of such groups—all of them engaged in an acute rivalry that arose initially over political differences—devoted to Western-style drama. The Kumo group has given productions of Sartre, Ionesco and recently Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet under Michael Benthall, the director emeritus of the Old Vic.

I began from scratch with the reading of O'Neill's play and rehearsed it for four weeks until the American troupe was able to present two run-through rehearsals (no scenery or "effects") for invited audiences, predominantly Japanese. Most of the preparatory rehearsals were attended by actors, directors and students. They came prepared with the Japanese translation of the play and were thus able to follow the action. My comments and instructions to the actors were translated.

Apart from much else I learned from the experience, I began to see the play in a new light. For though I had read and reviewed the play on its publication, saw and reviewed its New York production, I had never understood what for me at present is its most significant aspect. Like A Touch of the Poet, Long Day's Journey Into Night is a tragedy of the American immigrant.

James Tyrone of Long Day's Journey was born in Ireland. In his struggle to establish himself in the new country he is cut off and cuts his family off from his or any other tradition — even Catholicism. All is submerged in the fight waged first for security, then for success. What has wrecked the Tyrone family is a loss of faith, that is, a principle of spiritual coherence. This leads to

The American Federation of Teachers Invites You . . .

Help Teach In The Democracy Deep South

This summer, union teachers are instructing Negro children through two vital projects:

- Mississippi Freedom Schools (initiated by the Council of Federated Organizations)
- SCOPE Registration Drive (sponsored by Martin Luther King's SCLC)

19 Freedom Schools and Centers Are Already Open

GIVE WHATEVER YOU CAN AFFORD

- Every $10 you contribute means enough paper, paste and pencils for one Freedom School.
- Every $100 buys books for an entire Freedom School class and may start the first library ever for these children.
- Every $250 buys typewriters and mimeograph machines so students can publish their own newspaper or reprint their own poetry.

(Make checks payable to AFT Freedom School Project)
Send your checks to:
AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, AFL-CIO
Freedom School Project,
716 N. Rush, Chicago, Illinois 60611

Tyrone's artistic failure. The theatre was the faith which he betrayed by the endless repetition of a huge box-office success. This made him what he supposed he had to be to get ahead in America: a rich man—who remained forever fearful of poverty. His wife, no longer sustained by religion, cut off from the comfort of a permanent home, is shattered by this outer and inner displacement and has taken to drugs. The elder son has become a drunkard in constant conflict with his parents though he loves them. The younger son alone saves himself from the fatal cycle by his realization of how the family misfortune occurred and what it means. The physical and moral homelessness of the American immigrant in the industrial era is what O'Neill struggled to reveal throughout his career. It is a factor crucial to the understanding of our cultural history. Through this perception, which had escaped me in the hasty contact that most of us effect in journalistic criticism, I was able to integrate my work on the play and to make it a sort of metaphorical lesson. This interpretation possessed a special value for those who were rehearsing the play, and I hoped it would also convey something particular to the Japanese as well—for they, in the past twenty years, have been launched on a tortuous path in what is virtually a new land. The challenge for the Japanese today is possibly even more astounding than was that of our country between 1865 and the present.

(To be continued)

ARCHITECTURE

Walter McQuade

MUSEUM HAUTEUR

The older the buildings, the better they seem in the Museum of Modern Art's current architectural exhibition—Sixty-five Years of Modern Architecture in the United States. The show starts with Frank Lloyd Wright's Unity Church in Oak Park, Ill. (built in 1906, when Ernest Hemingway, born in Oak Park, was but 8), meanders around the country watching modern architecture grow belligerently moral, like Clifford Odets, before beginning to mirror Madison Avenue, and finally ends up with an odd couple of still unfinished buildings—one rather good, one not. The good one is back in Chicago, the tall, wide, plain Chicago Civic Center, by architects C. F. Murphy Associates, with the assistance of Skidmore, Owings & Merrill, and of Loebl, Schlossman and Bennett. Beside it is the small, single-story IBM office building in Cranford, N.J., by Victor Lundy.

To find an evident source for both the latter buildings, you have only to keep revolving through the exhibition until you begin again, with Frank Lloyd Wright. Unity Church can provide antecedents for almost anything or everything in modern architecture, without very hard looking. It was plain; its reinforced concrete structure, very advanced for its day, saw to that. In essence it was a glorious shoe box, but the space inside was hardly pedestrian. The volume was (and is; the building survives) noble almost beyond belief. Equally impressive was the oriental architectural caligraphy of the trim and the church furniture, prayerfully severe. The building predicted the best efforts of several architectural movements of our time, and rendered the prediction not at all rawly.

For example, L. Mies van der Rohe's early masonry houses in Europe had something of the expression of Unity Church, although Mies probably derived it through Peter Behrens' industrial work, rather than directly from Wright. Subsequently, of course, Mies manufactured his own modern movement in steel and glass. Today we have the gaunt towering slab of the Chicago Civic edifice, which follows the Mies model with the addition of an icing of rust (used in its exterior wall is the handsome Corten steel which, unpainted, shells itself securely in rust, with a very old, Etruscan expression). It is a truly impressive design, although almost entirely unoriginal for its time.

The latest Victor Lundy original is a unique but irrelevant building. Lundy was just back, it is evident, from South and Central America, from the thin air of Machu Pichu to the dangerous lowlands of Chichen Itza, which impressed Wright too, and built, for IBM of all people, a pre-Columbian postcard of a building. It shows his talent, but it also shows a wild lack of restraint, and a passionate love for all his own ideas or interests. The exterior walls are a clever, jittery composition of panels made of concrete blocks, protruding to various degrees, and, at their bases, curved outward into the ground line. The wall crawls. Indoors, the design dominants are the widely flaring columns with very thin ankles that feel like a combination of Wright's Johnson's Wax mushroom columns and Victorian raffia work. They are cast in concrete.

All in all, this IBM job is fancy rather than forceful, and it says clearly what the show murmurs in other quarters: modern American architecture is dispersing its fervor in flourishes. The period of reaction to the historical nonsense which preceded modern architecture was secure, confidently energetic in its crusading zeal. Today, at worst, we have buildings which are carnivals; at best, buildings which show great craft in their design.

To return to Chicago once more, to Wright and Mies, it is clear that some of the reinforced concrete buildings in this exhibition are very serious work. But none of them approaches Unity Church's elemental force. They are cake; it is bread. Nor do any of the steel frame buildings add anything to the tall Mies 860 and IBM Office Building, Cranford, N.J.

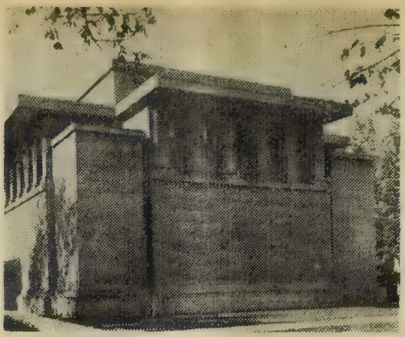
80 Lake Shore Drive apartments of the early 1950s or the lower frames of Mies's work at Illinois Institute of Technology. True, the fancy work continues to become more skillful. But after pausing at the photograph of Edward Stone's house for A. Conger Goodyear (Long Island, 1940) and admiring the way in which this early American International Style essay now wears its ivy, one is not made happier by turning to Yamasaki's weightless arches or Stone's famous screens—industrial ivy.

The show itself suffers in overall seriousness because it does not even include the most hopeful building of the past ten years: Saarinen's Dulles Airport, a structure in which the original questing character of modern architecture was rediscovered. I visited it again a few weeks ago. There it sits, riding its swelling sea of Virginia landscape, rhapsodic in its rigorous functionalism. Another great work out of the late Saarinen's shop, the Deere and Co. administrative building in Moline, Ill. (also clad in a Core-ten rust), is present in this Museum of Modern Art show, although not well photographed. Deere is difficult to photograph, but Dulles is not, and its omission marks this aggregation of architectural photography as a pleasantly wandering essay that declines judgments, and does not care much of a damn—museum hauteur.

Although not driving toward real conclusions, Arthur Drexler's captions do the responsible duty of pointing out how roughly we are treating some of these buildings.



Unity Church, Oak Park, Ill.

About Mies's IIT Minerals and Metals Research Building (Chicago, 1943), he says: "Recent additions and poor maintenance have marred this and other IIT buildings." About Erich Mendelsohn's Maimonides Health Center (San Francisco, 1950), "The balconies were walled in and the building disfigured beyond recognition."

The installation has been criticized severely, but I did not find that so bad. Although some of the hardware is rather golden, the buildings themselves are shown more than adequately in immense back-lighted transparencies, and the color is generally very good. All that Kodachrome sky is bound to give it somewhat the air of The National Geographic, but the Geographic at its best is not bad.

What the design of the exhibition does demonstrate is the high quality of the big new hall in the Museum of Modern Art. A very fine space indeed, it is finally shown to us in its entirety, not cut up by devious display designing.

THEATRE

Julius Novick

TWO CHERRY ORCHARDS

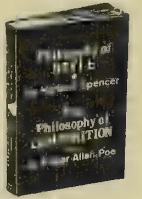
The past few years have seen the rise of an international movement directed at getting Chekhov out from behind the proscenium. David Ross did a cycle of his plays in a small room on Fourth Street in New York; Sir Laurence Olivier mounted Uncle Vanya on a vast thrust stage at Chichester in England; Sir Tyrone Guthrie did The Three Sisters in Minneapolis. And this year The Cherry Orchard, in a new translation by Dr. Guthrie and Leonid Kipnis, is on view at both the Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis and the Shakespearean Festival Theatre at Stratford, Ontario.

The Chichester and Minneapolis stages were inspired by that of the Ontario Stratford, which was designed by Tanya Moiseiwitsch and Dr. Guthrie with Shakespeare primarily in mind. The argument of the open-stage proponents, that Shakespeare ought to be produced on the kind of stage for which he wrote, would if extended to Chekhov provide a further reason for keeping him behind the proscenium. Perhaps, then, these two open-stage Cherry Orchards would have been even better on a proscenium stage, but both of them are very good as they stand. The experience they provide is, essentially, not of the open stage but of Chekhov.

Chekhov thought—or said he thought—that The Cherry Orchard was "a comedy, and in some spots even a farce"; Stanislavsky, on the other hand, said flatly: "This is not a comedy; this is a tragedy." Both of the current productions express an intermediate point of view, striking a nice balance between comedy and pathos. In neither is there any question of tragedy. Madame Ranevskaya and her brother Gaev, who allow their ancestral cherry orchard—and the way of life it represents—to slip through their fingers, are aristocratic spoiled children, too weak and silly for tragic purposes. But though the comic side of their difficulties is acknowledged in both productions, and much is made of the out-and-out absurdity of their friends and servants, in neither production is the seriousness of their plight scanted or burlesqued.

Guthrie's production at Minneapolis seemed to me both funnier and more touching than John Hirsch's at Stratford, though not by a very great margin. As Ranevskaya and Gaev, Jessica Tandy and Robert Pastene in Minneapolis move through twin hazes of dreamy disconnection. William Hutt, the admirable Stratford Gaev, cannot quite compete with Mr. Pastene's exquisitely detailed vaguery. Neither can Miss Tandy—until the climax of the play, when the upstart ex-peasant Lopahin bursts in with the news that the cherry orchard has been sold. Ranevskaya has nothing to say in this scene: in the Guthrie production she simply sits in an armchair, facing front. As Lopahin shouts and carries on behind her, she listens, tries not to cry, and fails. Miss Tandy does this with such grace and such power as to make the scene, and the evening, hers.

At Stratford, Ranevskaya is played



FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

by hearty, dumpy Kate Reid—rather an odd choice for the last of a long line of aristocrats, in spite of the skill and subtlety of her playing. If only she were a man, however, what a Lopahin she would make! As things are, Lopahin is played well at Stratford by stubby Douglas Campbell, and less well by Lee Richardson in Minneapolis; Mr. Richardson shows no sign of ever having been a peasant, and so obscures Lopahin's position in the play.

Minneapolis and Stratford are the two foremost repertory theatres on this continent, and The Cherry Orchard, with its round dozen of rich but difficult roles, shows off the strength in depth of both companies. The two Trofimovs are very different: Ken Ruta at Minneapolis plays this "perennial student" as a drowsy, plaintive, bewildered spaniel puppy, while Hugh Webster at Stratford makes him a dry, wizened insect. The two excellent Varyas, however, are much alike: Nancy Wickwire (Minneapolis) and Frances Hyland (Stratford) are sober, fretful, sharp-tongued, and just about equally touching; incipient spinsterhood hangs like a cloud over both.

The other Minneapolis offerings to date have been justifiably less admired, although Douglas Campbell's production of The Way of the World (this season Campbell has worked at Minneapolis as well as at Stratford) proves how beautifully actable this Restoration masterpiece is. Zoe Caldwell is often exquisitely delectable as the flirtatious Millamant, though her energy level is sometimes dangerously low; Robert Milli as her lover Mirabell, though a little lacking in glamour and sparkle, is in period without being foppish, and makes it clear that Mirabell is the play's standard of value, the only man in it who deserves respect. But one of Congreve's most marvelous feats in this play is to make fashionable wit into a language of love more erotically alive than any endearments; since the two Minneapolis lovers never seem particularly in love, the play's central relationship loses much of its urgency and fascination.

What is left is still quite enough for a good evening's entertainment: a great deal of brilliant dialogue, well rendered, and several funny fools. Few American companies could do even as well as this.

Tyrone Guthrie's production of Richard III, which opened the current Minneapolis season, is of little consequence. Nobody could say of Hume Cronyn's Richard, as Tennyson said of Henry Irving's, "Where did you get that Plantagenet look?" Little Mr. Cronyn is not very kingly, nor very formidable; he does not catch much of Richard's perverse heroism. The production gets by well enough, however, on Mr. Cronyn's good timing and general professionalism, and on Guthrie's gift for theatrical excitement.

It has been a good season so far at the Guthrie Theatre, nor is this all. The Caucasian Chalk Circle joined the repertory after I had left for Stratford (whence I shall report further in my next column), and a revival of the 1963 Minneapolis production of Molière's Miser, with Hume Cronyn again in the title role, will open in September. Good intentions are no substitute for professionalism, but this company appears to have both.

The Unthinkable Target

(Continued from page 75)

that the sins of the other side excuse and outweigh our own. Whatever the merits of such a morality, however, they are more relevant in retrospect than in anticipation of a given decision to step up the war. The decision to bomb Hanoi, once taken, would be officially justified by reference to all the genuine and fictitious evils of communism. But the decision has yet to be taken; and in the meantime the Administration seems to have reservations, of whatever sort, about taking it. There remains a little time in which to give support to these reservations, and to remind ourselves that the issue facing us is not merely resistance to communism, with its evils both genuine and fictitious, but the question of whether we can square the wholesale destruction of civilian populations with our claims to humanity. It is not yet possible, in this particular instance, for Arthur Schlesinger to tell us that it is pointless to rake over old errors and lies, that we have no course but to assess the hard alternatives. At this moment, one of these alternatives remains not to bomb the cities of Vietnam and their inhabitants as a possible solution to our accumulated embarrassments.

We have had two decades to ponder, without resolving, the questions of collective guilt for collective monstrosities. If one does not adhere to an absolute pacifism and to the condemnation of violence under any circumstances, then one must face moral issues as they are posed in specific political-historical contexts. Pacifists and "pragmatists" both miss the interrelatedness of political and moral questions. Moral decisions have inescapable political consequences. Moral decisions which normalize terror are politically disastrous because in normalizing terror they erode the traditional bases of democracy—a respect for life and a certain disrespect for authority, especially when it wields ultimate weapons in the name of ultimate truths. There is still time, in this particular case, to say that no matter what atrocities have been committed in the past, under no matter what provocations, another resort to terror would serve only to hasten our political decline.

EDUCATIONAL

BEE TIME VINE
Friends of Virgil Thomson & Gertrude Stein
A non-profit, educational society devoted to the musical and literary works of Mr. Thomson and Miss Stein. Annual membership, ten dollars. For additional information, write to BEE TIME VINE, P.O. Box 81, Planetarium Station, New York, N.Y. 10024.

JEWISH YOUTH AGES 18-26!
Hechalutz Farm in Hightstown, N. J.—the only training farm for kibbutz life in Israel is offering resident scholarships. Successful candidates will receive help with their passage to Israel. Apply: Hechalutz Scholarship Program, Hechalutz Farm, Hightstown, N. J., [illegible] 112 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. 3 Tel.: GR 3-2420.

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE
A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books. Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

FOR RENT

FOOTHILLS BLUE MT. Furnished Cottage, Private Estate. 2 rooms. Kitchen, hot water, shower; brook, near swimming pool. Write: A. Wunthal, R. D. 1, Danielsville, Pa.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS—Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC). 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 799.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1116

By FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

1 Proving I am, with endless practice, competent but still not suited for the job. (13)
9 Suggests inveiglement in such a family, rather than the sound of music! (5)
10 One who might manipulate the soap to shape it? (9)
11 Hoping to catch the voters moving fast? (7)
12 Getting ready to use the hammer, or just adjusting the head? (7)
13 The things that wreck lives, and reputedly live longer. (5)
14 Blend. (9)
16 What the landlord necessarily does if he makes a flower out of the bowl. (9)
18 Act like a catcher, possibly, or a poet. (5)
19 And acts like a catcher. (7)
21 The place of dead-letters in the wrong sort of work? (7)
22 The position of the upright? (9)
23 Is such a musical direction all in Italian? (5)
24 The refractory action of a cleric disturbed by mental absorption.

DOWN:

1 You can easily make out tree from tree in this, and thereby tell how short the distance is. (14)
2 Expressing a grievance? (9)
3 Has a bearing on what one does in looking for work, possibly. (7)
4 Part of the lashing, although not good if both are short. (5)
5 Where one wouldn't expect those in recess to be quick. (9)
6 Air tubes. (7)
7 Coming from Maine, as a friend of French extraction. (2, 3)
8 What was scheduled after the Great Train Robbery? (Naturally many had to come across.) (3, 5, 6)
14 One couldn't strike with it while the iron is hot! (4, 5)
15 Browning and Mather, possibly, might cause one to reach a new high in carelessness. (9)
17 Like Koko's frown, when not frightful and fearful. (7)
18 It might be swell in painting, but a painful reward for the inexperienced worker. (7)
20 The Irish don't have his sort belonging to them. (5)
21 A singer might be forever making his good-by. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1115

ACROSS: 1 Overclothes; 9 Pollster; 11 Francis; 12 Diaries; 14 Edging; 15 Overrate; 17 Freeborn; 20 Refuse; 22 Smashed; 24 Amnesia; 26 Inmate; 27 Fraction; 28 Peashooters. DOWN: 2 Valentine; 3 Rotting; 4 Lure; 5 Termite; 6 Ester; 7 Soured; 8 Ardent; 13, 25 and 10 Point of no return; 16 Reflector; 18 Remand; 19 Openers; 20 Remnant; 21 and 23 Ship of State.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

JUST ABOUT everybody reads NEXUS, the lively San Francisco literary magazine. In NYC at Gotham Book Mart, 41 W. 47th and 8th St. Bookshop, 17 W. 8th St.

TODAY, STARS & MEMORY: a special presentation of poems by James T. Farrell. In THE SMITH/5, the strongest magazine. $1. $3.50 a year. 15 Park Row, New York City 38.

POETRY WANTED. Enclose stamped envelope. Idlewild Publishing Co., 333 Frederick, San Francisco, Calif.

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

Something Different! . . .

Send $1 for the first issue of The Appalachian South. Native Southern mountaineers tell about themselves—folklore, song, history, how greed erodes mountain beauty and human dignity leaving widespread poverty—in 62 pages 9x12. Yearly subscription, 4 issues, $5.00.

The Appalachian South
ANN WILLIAMS, Editor
P.O. Box 4104-N, Charleston, W. Va.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

BOOK STORES: ATTENTION. Experienced bookstore (international) manager. Previous bookshop owner with large clientele seeks similar affiliation in publishing field or bookstore. New York City preferred. Box 578, c/o The Nation.

ATTENTION LLANO COLONY MEMBERS: The Board of Directors of the Llano Colony at Leesville, Louisiana voted to issue labor stock certificates, redeemable for cash, for all labor performed at the Colony. This is due to all who worked at the Colony as per their labor contracts. Fur further information for filing your claims, write to ALBERT KAPOTSY, Sr., Manager, Llano Del Rio Co., 1206 City Limit Road, Leesville, La. Readers of this ad please call attention of your friends who worked at Llano Colony.

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to: P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

Advertising Rates
Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014,
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

COMING SEPT. 20!

The 330-Page Centennial Issue of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion—which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent as the September 20 issue of The Nation to subscribers of record.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will be entitled to THE NATION's portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my September 20 issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____

ADDRESS______________________________________

CITY____________________STATE______________ZIP No.________

8-16-65

THE NATION

1865 Centennial Year 1965

August 30, 1965 . . . 35c

AUG 31 1965

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

REVOLUTIONARY WARFARE

HOW TO TELL WHEN THE REBELS HAVE WON

Eqbal Ahmad

CONFRONTATION IN CHICAGO

Mayor Daley Meets the Movement

Lois Wille

WATTS: L.A.'s Forgotten Slum

Carey McWilliams

Theodore Dreiser: Leo Marx

LETTERS

Springs of violence

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: The researches John Paul Scott cites in "Anatomy of Violence" [The Nation, June 21] do not disprove the thesis he is trying to disprove: that man's violent behavior springs from man's "animal nature." Nor do they disprove that violence is natural in animals. They show, at best, only that an animal or human raised in an "organized society" (i.e., a society characterized by dominance-subordination and territoriality relationships) (usually) behaves nonviolently. But this consequence is compatible with the view that such a society merely represses or else does away with the infant's natural instincts for violence — the view Mr. Scott opposes. . . . William Crossman

Bar Harbor, Me.

Dear Sirs: In reply to Mr. Crossman's letter, I might point out that all evidence from studies of the physiology of aggression, whether in man or other mammals, indicates that stimulation to fight is initiated from external sources. There is an internal mechanism which can be triggered by outside stimulation, but there is no spontaneously arising internal stimulation independent of external events. In any practical situation it is, of course, impossible to avoid all external stimulation for fighting, and therefore it is necessary to have some form of social control. In many cases the practical remedies may be very little different from those which are indicated by the traditional view that there is an instinctive need for fighting which has to be satisfied. There is, however, an important theoretical difference. These modern discoveries indicate that it is possible in an ideal environment to completely eliminate fighting and feelings of hostility, and that this can be done without doing serious psychological damage or producing unhappiness. Under the older view such a result would be impossible. . . . John Paul Scott

To meet a challenge

Berkeley, Calif.

Dear Sirs: The Berkeley defendants are in serious trouble. The judge, in his attempt to demoralize us and to dissuade us from appealing his decision, has set our bail at $440,000. We must meet this challenge. Between now and Sept. 1, at least 10 per cent must be raised to cover the bondsman's nonrefundable premium. Some students are already in jail, and if we cannot raise at least the $44,000, then most of the remaining 760 defendants will be jailed until the money can be raised. This exorbitant price is being charged us simply for the right to appeal. And if the appeal fails, we will be faced with the problem of raising $200,000 for our fines. . . .

We went into Sproul Hall as a group; we are now being differentiated on the basis of our ability to pay. The admission price to Sproul Hall was not money but conscience, and we must not allow those who cannot pay to be jailed for their commitment.

This country does not yet have laws forbidding political protest. But it is more pernicious to make political protest impossible by taxing it so heavily through fine and excessive bail that those who would protest dare not. The right of political protest must not become a luxury which few can afford. Donations may be addressed to FSM Defense Fund, Box 448, Berkeley, Calif. Susan Stein

Diplomatic pun

Amherst, Mass.

Dear Sirs: In connection with your article, "Latin America: Alliance for Reaction" by Edmundo Flores [The Nation, June 21] it ought to be pointed out that whoever the robot was who officially translated "Alliance for Progress" into Spanish as "La Alianza para el Progreso," certainly missed the pun: the Spanish word "para," in that specific position and context, equally means "for" and "stops." . . .

More significant, perhaps, the whole phrase "La Alianza para el Progreso," because of its awkward construction, sounds like translated English to any sensitive Spanish ear.

José Brain y Suárez

Conference at Rutgers

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Last spring a group of historians at Rutgers University issued a call for the convening of the first of a series of Socialist Scholars Conferences. The intention was to provide an opportunity for the discussion of scholarly matters of interest and importance to Socialists. Response was gratifying, and preliminary arrangements for the first of these conferences has been made for Sept. 11 and 12. Rutgers University has graciously made available to us facilities on its New Brunswick campus for the two-day conference. We have been honored by the acceptances of invitations to Isaac Deutscher and Conor Cruise O'Brien to address our meetings. . . .

In planning this program we have intended to bring together from many disciplines intellectuals who share a broadly Socialist perspective. No one's ideological credentials will be scrutinized; whoever will feel at home or be interested is welcome. But no partisan purposes will be entertained at the Socialist Scholars Conferences, nor will partisan polemics be welcomed at the meeting sessions.

General information about the conference may be obtained by writing to Prof. Eugene D. Genovese, Department of History, Rutgers—The State University, New Brunswick, N. J., or to me, Department of History and Economics, Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, 333 Jay Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. 11201. Marvin E. Gettleman

THE NATION

Monday, August 30, 1965
Volume 201, No. 5

In this issue

EDITORIALS
89

ARTICLES
92 Confrontation in Chicago: Mayor Daley Meets the Movement Lois Wille
95 Revolutionary Warfare: How to Tell When the Rebels Have Won Eqbal Ahmad
100 Soccer: The Rabble Game David Cort

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
102 The Tyranny of the Unplenishable Self Leo Marx
104 A Spruce of Marshall Washer's (poem) Hayden Carruth
105 Notes from Afar: Part II Harold Clurman
107 Theatre Julius Novick
108 Films Robert Hatch
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 108) Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Aug. 30, 1965. Vol. 201, No. 5

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Watts: The Forgotten Slum

Thirty-one dead, over 700 injured, 2,200 under arest, 1,000 fires, property damage of $200 million—uch is the preliminary toll for the long weekend of rioting in the Watts area of Los Angeles. A feverish search for scapegoats is now under way and will no doubt continue through the 1966 gubernatorial campaign. High on the scapegoat list is the self-righteous Chief of Police who dismisses as a "canard" the charge that the Los Angeles police could ever be guilty of brutality; apparently Chief Parker doesn't watch television. Then there is Sam Yorty, the agile Mayor, playng political tricks as always; warned of the possibility of riots, he did nothing. The list is long and includes The Heat—a favorite scapegoat in all race-riot investigations—and Social Conditions. Here Watts qualifies on all counts: dropouts, delinquency, disease and dependency. But none of these social factors alone or in combination necessarily "cause" race riots; actually it is when conditions seem to be improving that the riots usually explode. Predictably the forthcoming investigation ordered by Governor Brown will stress the same tiresome clichés: police brutality, inadequate leadership, The Heat, slum conditions. All the while the truth about Watts is right there in front of people, in plain boldface type, for all to read; so simple that it is incredible. The hatred and violence of race riots is triggered by contempt, and of all forms of contempt the most intolerable is nonrecognition, the general unawareness that a minority is festering in squalor. Until the riots began, Watts had simply been forgotten by the encompassing "white" community.

A sizable Negro community began to develop in Mud Town, as Watts was then called, after 1916; the community later spread along Central Avenue with the influx of Negro migrants from the South which came after World War I. In the 1920s, Watts was a well-known slum—the unfailing butt of bad jokes by comedians on the Orpheum circuit. But it did exist; people knew about it. Arna Bontemps wrote a novel about it (God Sends Sunday, 1931), while Gilmore Millen wrote a novel about the rise of Central Avenue (Sweet Man, 1932). For the new residents of the 1920s and 1930s, Watts was a fact: perceived, studied (a bit) and understood (to some extent). But the big post-World War II migration and boom changed all that.

Today there are thousands of new residents who have never seen Watts. They may have driven through it or over it or around it but never to it, nor have they ever stopped there except to change a tire. Artfully isolated from the disagreeable, the haute bourgeoisie of Brentwood, Bel-Air and Beverly Hills can shop, lunch and play games for years on end without seeing a Negro except as a domestic. The new middle class, living in jerry-built "lily white" subdivisions, each with its own shopping center, can honestly claim to be no more aware of Watts than the nice Germans were of Belsen. For the highly paid technicians at the Jet Propulsion Lab, Watts might well be an unnamed crater on the moon. If the culture-conscious upper middle class, currently preoccupied with new music and art centers, has heard of Watts at all it is probably as the site of the three bizarre and oddly beautiful Watts Towers. This universal unawareness of the squalor and misery that is Watts has fostered the illusion not merely that Los Angeles is without a serious "race problem" but that it is a much better city, in this respect, than Chicago (see p. 92) or New York which, for a time, was true. Arna Bontemps and Jack Conroy found that Negro migrants had made a better adjustment in Los Angeles than in any other American city, a circumstance they explained by suggesting that the Japanese- and Mexican-Americans had drawn off much of the racial hostility which otherwise would have been concentrated against Negroes (They Seek A City, p. 205), but this has long ceased to be the case.

For a time, Negroes flocked into Los Angeles in the post-1945 period at the rate of 2,000 a month, most of them looking for but not finding defense jobs; more recently, the rate dropped to about 1,000 a month. Watts is the ghetto of the migrants; 98 per cent Negro, it has the highest population density in the country. "Ever since World War II," the San Francisco Chronicle notes, "Watts has been a little like a pressure cooker." Of course there is a lack of local leadership; most of the residents are migrants. Following the Los Angeles pattern, middle-class Negroes left Watts years ago and today have little direct contact with it. Moreover, by ignoring the existing middle-class Negro leadership, the larger community has undercut whatever influence this leadership might have exerted among Watts residents.

Two brief camera shots suggest the reality of Watts. In one a large, calm-voiced Negro patiently explained to Governor Brown that the larger community was "always taking from Watts and not putting back"; why, he wanted to know, "do they do us like they do?" In another shot, a Negro told the Governor that the Negroes of Watts "know how other people live"; they watch television. They know, he said, how much the government is spending on "missiles and things like that." They could hardly not know, living in Southern California. Only last fall, shortly before the election, President Johnson reminded the Californians that the government pours more than $2 billion annually into the payrolls of the state's aerospace industries, most of it in Southern California. For a time the general boom provided a measure of upward mobility even for Negro residents and thereby stimulated still further Negro migration. But for the last year or so, new Negro migrants have found themselves increasingly bottled up in Watts with little immediate prospect of escape, while being bombarded day and night with images of affluence, and constantly tempted by the well-stocked shelves of the supermarkets. Even so, matters might have gone along as before, given a measure of insight and recognition and understanding. Neglect can be tolerated; discrimination can be endured; but the contempt of indifference inflames.

Now, at last, Watts has recovered its social identity. Those who say that the riots have set the civil rights movement back—that they have left permanent scars, etc.—simply do not know the history of big-city race riots. The sad fact is that most race riots have brought some relief and improvement in race relations and the Los Angeles riots will not be an exception. The seeming indifference of the larger community is structural. Los Angeles is the city of sprawl. To sprawl is to relax and feel comfortable. For most residents, Los Angeles is a comfortable city, psychologically as well as physically, because the unpleasant can be kept in its place—at a safe distance from most of the people. By accident more than design, Los Angeles has been organized to further the general tendency toward social indifference. The freeways have been carefully designed to skim over and skirt around such eyesores as Watts and portions of East Los Angeles; even the downtown section, a portion of which has become a shopping area for minorities, has been partially bypassed. Now that the community knows once again that Watts exists, it will begin to pay some attention to its problems. Nothing could be more fatuous, therefore, than the suggestion advanced, most surprisingly by Max Lerner among others, that the Los Angeles riots were "without a cause." Hatred never exists in a vacuum, and violence of this sort is never without a cause.

If Watts lives in history it will be as the scene of the riots and the home of the Towers. The three Watts Towers, which have drawn the praise of distinguished art critics, were built by Simon Rodia alone, unaided, at his own expense, over a period of thirty-three years. He built the towers out of "waste" which he had collected: broken tiles, dishes, bottles, over 70,000 sea shells, bottle caps and whatnot. The walled garden from which the towers rise is covered with multicolored mosaics or with imprints of tools, hands, corncobs and baskets. Out of this "waste" he built three structures of great beauty. He built them with no drawing-board designs, machine equipment or scaffolding: they were literally "built in the air." Rodia was born in Rome and came to this country when he was 12. A tile setter and telephone repairman, he settled in Watts and devoted most of his life to building the towers which, when completed in 1954, he gave to the city and his neighbors. "I wanted to do something for the United States," he said, "because there are nice people in this country." Whatever his reasons, the towers—and the towers alone—redeem to some extent the ugliness and hatefulness of Watts, the slum Los Angeles forgot. In 1959 Rodia left Watts, not to return; a man of his quaint old-world social attitudes obviously did not belong in jet-age Los Angeles. He was reluctant to say why. "If your mother dies and you have loved her very much," he said, "maybe you don't speak of her." On July 21 he died in Martinez—in Northern California—at the age of 90. It is fitting that he died away from Watts and before the riots.

Carey McWilliams

Cat out of the Bag

In a Meet the Press program on May 23 (see "Negotiate or Discuss," The Nation, June 7, p. 601), Henry Cabot Lodge made it quite clear that the Administration was willing to "discuss," but not necessarily "negotiate," with the North Vietnamese. Pressed for clarification, he added a further limitation: we would not really be willing to negotiate until a viable regime had firmly established its authority in South Vietnam. The effect of this diplomatic hedging was to make an end of the war even more remote than it had been before. This postponement has now been repeated, with Mr. Lodge once more the spokesman. On July 27, at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on his confirmation, Mr. Lodge was quoted as saying that we would insist on keeping forces in South Vietnam even if a South Vietnamese government requested their withdrawal. This candid reply occasioned the predictable flap, since it contradicted the most sacred premise of our presence in Vietnam—that we were there at the request of the South Vietnamese people, to defend them against the aggression of the North Vietnamese, supported by the Chinese Reds. The President himself had to get into the resulting wrangle over what Mr. Lodge had said. Mr. Lodge and he were agreed, the President said, on the underlying principle "that in Vietnam we are there to help the people and their government to help themselves. . . . The United States would never undertake the sacrifice these efforts require if its help were not wanted and requested."

Mr. Lodge concurred but he did not enlarge on what he had actually said, leaving the suspicion that it had been something tantamount to what had been reported. The Washington Evening Star, which had printed the alleged remark, did not back down. "Competent authority," it said, "confirmed its authenticity to the Star." Then another "high official" sought to clear matters up. What Mr. Lodge almost certainly had in mind, he told Robert B. Semple of The New York Times (August 13) was that the United States would not withdraw if asked to do so by a "left-wing or even neutralist government that, in the United States view, did not reflect the true feelings of the South Vietnamese people or military leaders."

That is clarification of a sort, and it makes nonsense out of the pretense of American altruism and solicitude for the people of Vietnam. What other than a left-wing or neutralist government would request American withdrawal? Who but the United States will decide what are the "true feelings" of the South Vietnamese people? When will South Vietnamese military leaders not be willing and eager to interpret the "true feelings" of the Vietnamese people to American military and political leaders?

One would have to search long in the annals of American diplomacy to find more devious excuses for a war than those we are now being offered to cover up our aims in Asia. The Administration feels it cannot say that we are in South Vietnam to contain the expansion of Chinese power, as Charles J. V. Murphy explains candidly in the August Fortune. That admission on the part of the Administration would give rise to an embarrassing question: by what right do we involve South Vietnamese civilians in what is essentially a power struggle with our real adversary? The truth, as Albert J. Guerard wrote in a letter to the San Francisco Chronicle, is that we are in "(a) a war to contain communism; (b) a war to prevent any shrinkage of American power; (c) a war to prove, again, that might makes right." Mr. Lodge and his apologists have said as much, but served it up under a thick layer of obfuscation and hypocrisy.

Wrong-Way Johnson

As things are going, the President is in a fair way to acquire the appellation of a famous aviator who flew solo across the Atlantic on a clearance to fly west from New York. According to journalistic gossip, some of which apparently leaked from Presidential conferences with members of Congress, the President is now really anxious to find a way out of the trap into which he walked when he began expanding the war in Vietnam far beyond anything contemplated by Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy. (President Eisenhower has since politely disavowed the intentions President Johnson ascribed to him on the basis of a 1954 letter from Eisenhower to Ngo Dinh Diem.) The scuttlebutt now circulating has Mr. Johnson saying, in effect, that the war hawks must deliver the goods by February, 1966, or else. That date is supposed to inaugurate the 1966 Congressional campaign, and Mr. Johnson is probably aware that in another six months the war will either have been won or it will have become exceedingly unpopular, not only abroad but among American voters.

With American air power thrown fully into the scales, a partial suppression of Vietcong activity is not to be ruled out. It might be sufficient to be represented as a victory, at least for the time being. But suppose the stalemate continues or, worse, that the North Vietnamese and the Chinese Reds keep pace with our escalations so effectively that they seem to be getting the better of it? An inkling of what will then develop is contained in the rhetorical question of Chairman L. Mendel Rivers of the House Armed Services Committee: "Should we use our atomic power to wipe out Red China's atomic capability?" To which Mr. Rivers' predictable answer was: "We must get ready to do this very thing if we want to stop Red China. I will insist on victory in Vietnam. Anything short of that would be treasonable."

It is harder for Mr. Johnson to find a way out of his dilemma now than it was six months ago. It will be harder six months hence. In Mr. Rivers' declaration containing the most potent political accusation in the American vocabulary, Mr. Johnson may read the handwriting on the wall.

Water—Too Little and Too Much

It is ironic that old-fashioned water wars of the kind the West has lived with for the last century and a half should now be breaking out in the effete and sophisticated East. Just when the Western states have achieved a degree of amity in sharing water—and even Arizona and California are no longer threatening to call up the troops along the Colorado River—Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York are eyeing one another belligerently over the waters of the Delaware basin. And this absurd, yet deadly serious, situation is developing under three relatively enlightened governors—Rockefeller of New York, Hughes of New Jersey, and Scranton of Pennsylvania, with Secretary of the Interior Stewart L. Udall announcing that the New York metropolitan area, with its 20 million inhabitants, is "walking on the edge of disaster."

The basic reason for all this anxiety and interstate hostility is lack of foresight—and laissez faire, based on the notion that private advantage and the public welfare are one and the same. In New York City the policy has been to get the best water available, which came from relatively small streams like the Croton River, the Esopus and Schoharie in the Catskills, and the upper reaches of the Delaware. This passion for pure upland water was momentarily compromised in a previous drought by the construction of a pumping station on the Hudson below Poughkeepsie, but when that emergency passed the equipment was dismantled and the building razed. Yet there was some basis for this decision—it was only 75 per cent folly. The Hudson is little better than an open sewer for communities and industry. The cheapest way to get rid of waste is to pour it into the nearest stream, and that is what rugged individualists do, whether the stream is the Hudson or the Rhine. Nevertheless, with treatment the water would be potable, and the record shows how shortsighted the engineers and politicians have been.

The same myopic attitude is exhibited when the trouble is an excess of water. During the disastrous spring floods on the Mississippi, an official of the United Auto Workers, Robert Johnston of Chicago, revived the idea of a National Water Resources Commission. He wondered why the Tennessee Valley Authority had not been duplicated in the other great river basins of the nation. Flood-control installations have been made elsewhere, but the full integration of flood control, power generation, navigation and recreation in TVA remains an isolated case. The privately owned power companies are hostile to such ventures; the more successful they are, the more they are likely to be branded as "socialism." Why doesn't the Great Society, admittedly modeled on the New Deal, seek to duplicate, in half a dozen river valleys, the New Deal's greatest social achievement, which was TVA?

Confrontation in Chicago

Mayor Daley Meets the Movement

. . Lois Wille

Chicago

Little girls in Chicago's old and proud Bridgeport neighborhood had a new jump-rope chant last week, and you could hear it all afternoon, over and over, in the playground behind their red brick grammar school:

I'd like to be an Alabama trooper,
That's what I would truly like to be,
'Cause if I were an Alabama
trooper,
I could kill the niggers legally.

Four blocks from their playground is the modest, bungalow-style home of Chicago's Mayor Richard J. Daley, the Venetian blinds in its bay window tightly shut against the hot afternoon sun. At night, the blinds remain shut—but against something far more disturbing to the Mayor than summer sunshine.

About 100 civil demonstrators file silently into the neighborhood around 10 P.M., and an eerie pantomime begins. Hundreds of Bridgeport residents, the sons and daughters of Lithuanian, Polish, Italian and Irish immigrants, gather on their front porches and lawns to stare at the marchers. No one jeers or hoots. No one says a word. They just stare, as if under command not to utter a sound—as, indeed, they are. Precinct workers from the 11th Ward Democratic organization circulate among them, shushing any talkers.

The marchers—ministers, social workers, college students and relief recipients, half of them Negro and half white—slowly walk around the Mayor's block, equally silent. Their cadres, dressed in denim jackets and wide-brimmed straw plantation hats, move up and down the lines whispering commands: "No talking, two-by-two, stay on the sidewalk, men on the outside." Even the Bridgeport babies sitting on their mothers' laps on the front steps of the bungalows are quiet.

The one overwhelming impression you get is this: Here are two teams of superbly disciplined, fiercely determined combatants. Neither is going to yield—ever.

It's like the early black-white confrontations in the South—and that's precisely the point of this dramatic shift in Chicago civil rights demonstrations. By moving the battleground to the Mayor's sidewalk, the marchers hope to mold the city's sporadic and somewhat aimless protests into the first genuine civil rights movement in any Northern city.

"The shock of Negroes walking into Bridgeport must be compared to the shock of the first Southern demonstrations when Negroes walked downtown en masse," says one member of the Chicago civil rights' brain trust. "It's a whole new concept for the North. . . ."

The "new concept" is based on several radical moves that have appalled some of the rights' supporters, including influential clergymen who marched in Selma, Ala. (and newspaper editorial writers who endorsed the Selma marches):

¶Mayor Daley has become the chief target of the demonstrations. To a powerful Democratic chief who prides himself on running a progressive city, this has been most distressing.

¶Last month the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations (CCCO), Chicago's civil rights amalgamation, asked U. S. Commissioner of Education Francis Keppel to withhold federal funds from Chicago's schools, charging de jure segregation and violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. This would mean a loss of more than $16 million a year in badly needed federal assistance. Keppel is still studying the complaint, and has not yet said whether he will send an investigating team to the city. The core of the complaint is that Chicago schools are "separate but unequal," willfully segregated, with Negro schools inferior to those of the whites. As proof, the CCCO cites these figures compiled by the United States Civil Rights Commission, the Urban League of Chicago, and a team of educators headed by University of Chicago sociologist Phillip M. Hauser: Segregation in Chicago schools is increasing. In 1963, 81.6 per cent of all grade schools were virtually all white or all Negro. By 1965, the percentage rose to 82.3. The percentage of high schools that were almost all one race rose from 73. to 74.4.

¶School Superintendent Benjamin C. Willis blames neighborhood segregation, but civil rights groups say Willis has further contained Negroes through such devices as trailer classrooms attached to all-Negro schools and "branch" high schools in all-Negro grade schools.

¶The Hauser committee reported that white grade schools averaged 29.7 children per class, but the Negro classroom average is 34.4. It also said that Negro schools have fewer libraries, social-adjustment classes and auditoriums.

¶The U. S. Civil Rights Commission reported that 12 per cent of the teachers in the average white school are noncertified—for one reason or another, they hadn't passed the school system's qualifying examinations for teachers. In the average Negro school, a whopping 27 per cent of teachers are uncertified.

In the past four years, Chicago civil rights groups succeeded in making the tough and intractable Willis a symbol of inferior, segregated education. Their cry of "Willis Must Go" was picked up by an imposing number of religious groups and social-welfare organizations. And in May it seemed they were finally getting what they wanted.

At an "unofficial meeting" (meaning its actions were not binding) seven of the eleven Board of Education members voted not to renew Willis' contract, which expires August 31. Ten days later the board met again for its official vote, and the outcome stunned the anti-Willis group: three members who had voted "no" changed their minds, and Willis was retained. As a compromise, the board extracted from him a verbal promise to retire on his 65th birthday in December, 1966.

Civil rights groups were enraged. "We felt the slap in the face we got with the reappointment of Willis came directly from the Mayor," says Albert Raby, a thin, intense Negro schoolteacher who heads the CCCO.

The three who changed their minds had all been appointed to the school board by Daley within

---

Lois Wille is a Pulitzer Prize-winning Chicago Daily News reporter who specializes in welfare issues, mental health and civil liberties.

Ward says shut up, you shut up," says one authority on Chicago politics. "What you're seeing is ward discipline. A riot would hurt Daley, and he's told his people there isn't going to be a riot."

As the Bridgeport people stopped hollering, many influential Chicagoans jumped to their support. Picketing a man's home is an outrageous invasion of privacy, they say. The villain who lured all these marchers to Bridgeport, as they see it, is Dick Gregory, the rambunctious Negro comedian who always seems to be at the head of any civil rights march anywhere. "He's the John Brown of the movement," says one admirer.

It's true that Gregory, in his denim jacket and straw "freedom" hat, has led the marches in Bridgeport. But it's also true that the marches have the open or behind-the-scenes support of most of the Chicago civil rights leaders. And they say that among the Negro masses the idea of black men parading through forbidden Bridgeport has immense appeal, more than any complex school issue the rights struggle has raised. "The mayor has lived in the tightest, most closed community of the city for a long, long time," says the Rev. Alvin Pitcher of the University of Chicago Divinity School. "And he cannot duck responsibility for it."

The few Democratic Negro politicians who have been sympathetic with the civil rights movement in the past are clearly embarrassed by its new anti-Daley tone. State Rep. Cecil Partee points out that it was suburban Republicans who defeated his open-occupancy bill in the state legislature, and asks: "Why haven't they been picketed? I say the marches are political. . . ." They are, in the sense that their ultimate goal is to break through the monolithic machine and force politicians to hear, and hopefully to correct, their complaints about urban renewal, slum landlords and inferior schools.

Whether this is possible through nightly marches is another question. "I'd say the net result so far is that they're doing Daley some good in the white wards," says one astute City Hall authority. "He won't lose many Negro votes, unless the civil rights organizations start working a lot harder, out in the precincts."

But attorney Leon Despres, one of the few civil rights minded aldermen in the Chicago City Council, thinks the marches have had a profound effect. "Anybody in politics who has to do organizing himself knows that to produce marchers day after day, from thirty-five to 100, is a mammoth task and requires a tremendous underlying sentiment of support," he says. "Laymen don't always realize that. They think, well, 100, 125 people—that isn't much. But that means you have to draw on a very big body of interested people. Daley knows this. That's why he is very anxious. For ten years he has relied on keeping a balance between Negroes and white reactionaries. Through the political patronage system, through subsidizing Negro ministers, through such things as the poverty program, through the appeal of the Democratic label, he controls enough Negroes directly so that their support is firmly under him. With this support guaranteed, he is able to curry favor with the white segregationists, whose support he also needs. With this equilibrium," Despres adds, "he's been able to avoid any kind of progress, any boldness, in civil rights, without exception. The meaning of the marches is that there is a real crack developing in this coalition."

If that's their meaning, what is their immediate goal? This is the question most often asked by the marchers' critics, who keep telling them to go home and do something "constructive" instead.

John McDermott, director of the Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago, a group that has lost considerable financial support this summer because of its civil rights activities, has given the best answer. "The Democratic Party is for all practical purposes the only party in the city," he says. "If civil rights is our number one issue, and I think it is, we are saying to the Mayor that we want him to have a civil rights program—much as President Johnson has." McDermott agrees with many Chicagoans that in every other area Daley has been an excellent mayor. "But on civil rights the fact is he does not have a program," McDermott adds. "He has a policy of peace first, and justice second."

REVOLUTIONARY WARFARE

How To Tell When the Rebels Have Won

Eqbal Ahmad

Vice President Humphrey expressed the national concern over guerrilla warfare recently when he spoke of this "bold new form of aggression which could rank with the discovery of gunpowder" as constituting the "major challenge to our security." It is viewed as the latest weapon in the Communist arsenal with Vietnam as its testing ground [see "Goliath and the Guerrilla," by Eric Hobsbawm; The Nation, July 19]. "If guerrilla techniques succeed in Vietnam," wrote James Reston in The New York Times, "nobody in Washington dare assume that the same techniques will not be applied in all Communist rimlands from Korea to Iran." This view is based on two assumptions and at least one serious misconception. It assumes that the Vietnamese situation is typical, historically and politically, of other underdeveloped countries, and that American policy toward other nations would be comparable to the one pursued in Vietnam. The misconception concerns the nature of revolutionary warfare.

America's interest in revolutionary warfare began from a defensive

---

Eqbal Ahmad, a Pakistani citizen, is assistant professor at the School of Labor and Industrial Relations, Cornell University. He spent two and a half years in North Africa (1960-63), first as a Rockefeller Fellow and later as associate director of the International Cultural Center. Mr. Ahmad is currently at work on a political biography of Habib Bourguiba.

posture as a result of reverses in China, Korea, Cuba and Laos, and of protracted involvement in Vietnam. It was natural for its officials to be attracted more to the myths and methods of those who have had to defend themselves against guerrillas than to an understanding of the causes and characteristics of such a war. Americans are therefore unable to avoid the psychological and political pitfalls of colonial powers and feudal regimes like France and Nationalist China. A symptom of this negative posture is that while recognizing "a bold new form" of warfare, government publications, including the course books of Fort Bragg, reject the term "revolutionary war" in favor of old terms which do not suggest the vital distinction between revolutionary and other types of guerrilla conflict.

The official American interpretation of revolutionary war can be summarized as follows: (1) It is essentially a technical problem, i.e., a problem of plotting and subversion on the one hand and of intelligence and suppression on the other. As the chief conspiratorial group, the Communists are believed to be the most likely initiators and beneficiaries of revolution. It was this attitude which led to the recent attempt to nip in the bud what was construed as the Dominican Communist conspiracy. A logical extension of this theory is the belief that any revolutionary movement is inspired, directed and controlled from abroad. (2) The active sanctuary—from which guerrillas can smuggle supplies and train their troops—is considered the primary factor in their success. (3) The guerrilla movement is believed to enjoy considerable advantage because in the words of W. W. Rostow, "its task is merely to destroy while the government must build and protect what it is building." (4) The civilian population is considered important for providing information and protection to the guerrillas; it is believed that civilian-guerrilla cooperation is enforced by terror. (Dean Rusk, while complaining of the "gullibility of educated men and their stubborn disregard of plain facts," asserted that the Vietcong "has no significant popular following . . . it relies heavily on terror.") Serious inquiry into other bases of guerrilla support and mass mobilization is therefore deemed of no great importance.

Judging from the failure of Washington's prophecies in Vietnam and from the policies followed to date, it would seem that these assumptions represent the actual official view and cannot be dismissed as myths consciously constructed for public consumption. Wrong premises do not usually produce right policies, and these assumptions are, at best, half truths—credible and misleading. (Oliver Wendell Holmes once remarked that a half truth is like half a brick: it can be thrown a considerable distance.) Studies in the field of revolutionary wars and my personal observation of the Algerian struggle lead to very different conclusions which may be summarized as follows: (1) Revolutionaries consider mass support the primary condition for their success; winning and maintaining popular support remains their central objective throughout the struggle. (2) The requirements of guerrilla war, as well as the history of its failures and successes, confirm the primacy of political factors in such a conflict. (3) Popular support for the guerrillas is predicated upon the moral alienation of the masses from the existing government. The revolutionaries' chief aim is to activate and perpetuate the moral isolation of the enemy regime until such isolation has become total and irreversible. (4) The conditions leading to revolutionary wars are not created by conspiracy. They are partly inherent in a situation of rapid social change, but the outbreak normally results mainly from the failure of a ruling elite to respond to the challenge of modernization. (5) A revolutionary guerrilla movement concentrates on "outadministering," not on "outfighting" the enemy. This is a constructive and not simply a destructive undertaking. (6) The use of terror by guerrillas is highly selective; it does not constitute the main reason for the favorable reaction of the masses to their cause. (7) The external sanctuary has greater psychological and diplomatic than military or political value to the guerrillas. A discussion of these points follows.

Organizers of guerrilla warfare give prime attention, in practice no less than in theory, to the human factor. T. E. Lawrence (of Arabia) spoke of guerrilla war in terms of "the algebraic element of things, the biological element of life, and the psychological element of ideas." In other words, although Lawrence's goals were essentially military, military considerations constituted, for him, only one third of the problem of organizing and sustaining guerrilla troops. When Tito was told of the exceptionally unfavorable terrain in the region of Srem ("the area is level as the palm of your hand . . . and with little forests") he remarked: "What a first-class example it is of the relative unimportance of geographical factors in the development of a rising. The basic factor is studious political work, the attitude of the mass of people and the fighting leadership—if these are present the population would fight to the last man." Mao Tse-tung states, "Because guerrilla warfare basically derives from the masses and is supported by them, it can neither exist nor flourish if it separates itself from their sympathies and cooperation." This belief in the need to command popular support governs the movement through all stages of its development.

History confirms the sovereignty of the human factor in revolutionary warfare. While shying away from the wars that were "lost," American military analysts are prone to cite cases of successful anti-guerrilla operations. A heavy favorite—the British "counterinsurgency" in Malaya—is faithfully imitated in Vietnam. (Sometimes too faithfully, as in the case of the strategic hamlets program launched in April, 1962.) But comparisons with Malaya are fallacious, because there the guerrillas were at a severe disadvantage. Their support was limited to a minority of 423,000 Chinese squatters, who were ethnically distinct from and distrusted by the majority of Malays, and popular grievances were not acute enough to make the guerrillas look like liberators to the Malay peasants. Furthermore, the British acted quickly to remove the grievances on which the rebellion was based. Even then it took thirteen years and a total of 260,000 soldiers and police (80,000 British, 180,000 Malays) to put down 8,000 guerrillas (a ratio of 30 to 1). Another success story, the joint U.S.-Philippine victory over the Huks, is less frequently cited because of its embarrassing aspects. The Huk movement collapsed dramatically when Magsaysay convinced the peasants of his will and capacity to introduce reforms. However, the promises made to them were not kept and the Garcia administration witnessed a resurgence of guerrillas. In April, 1962, Macapagal swallowed his embarrassment and ordered a mop-up operation in Central Luzon. According to the latest reports, guerrilla strength in the Philippines is increasing.

The Algerian revolution, the least studied in this country though it comes closest to the Vietnamese situation, had actually been crushed militarily but had won politically when de Gaulle negotiated independence. By 1961, the guerrillas had been reduced to some 5,000 and their ability to engage the French at will had markedly declined. But France faced a sullen Algerian population that it had conquered but could not rule. The F.L.N. was defeated in the field, but it continued to outadminister and "illegitimize" the French.

Why did the Algerian peasants risk, for seven remorseless years, their lives, the honor of their women, and the security of their paltry belongings? Nationalism alone could not explain their violent and resolute rejection of French rule. In no other colony, except Indo-China, did the movement for independence take so violent a turn. And why did not the peasants respond earlier to the militants' calls to arms? The answer comes from one of the historic chiefs of the Algerian revolution. The time was not "ripe," he said. "These events occur where foreign rule is resented, where acute grievances exist and institutional channels for ventilating and satisfying them are ineffective."

Peasant rebellions had occurred in past years of famine and high taxation, but these spontaneous and periodic disturbances, as expressions of frustration over social and economic conditions, are not a sufficient condition for guerrilla revolution. "Revolutionary warfare does not require simply discontent among the masses but a sense of desperation and a grim determination to end injustice and humiliation. It demands patience with prolonged suffering, and a determined conspiracy of silence, and militancy."

A people can summon up that resolution only if they feel morally alienated from their rulers. "The success of a revolutionary war is predicated upon the continual and increasing moral isolation of the enemy. When it becomes total the war has been won, for the population will then fight to the last man." Later, other Algerian leaders told me they had spent more effort fighting the French promises of eventual independence and reforms than fighting the military. The Algerians became increasingly alienated from the French as the latter increased their military effort, which in revolutionary warfare means large-scale killing of civilians (if for no other reason than because the guerrilla is undistinguishable from other peasants), and the F.L.N. became more confident of winning not the military battles but the revolutionary war.

The conditions leading to revolutionary warfare are not created by conspiracy. They are inherent in the dislocations and demands produced by rapid social change, and are predicated on the failure of ruling elites to respond to the challenge of modernization. The pressures for change in the political, economic and social relationships of the past inevitably lead to a confrontation with those whose interests lie in the maintenance of the status quo. In countries and colonies whose rulers are willing to abdicate their monopoly of power and privileges, where genuine reforms are introduced, and new institutions begin to provide for a sharing of power and responsibility, the change is effected in an orderly (if not entirely peaceful) and democratic manner. But when a ruling class resists reforms (which invariably mean reduction in its power and privileges), its confrontation with the new political forces becomes increasingly violent. A regime unwilling to satisfy popular aspirations begins to lose legitimacy; revolutionary forces deliberately accelerate this process, by weakening the efficacy and cohesion of the ruling elite, and by giving form to the amorphous revolutionary conflagration. In the competition for leadership which often takes place in this volatile situation, non-Communist revolutionary groups are handicapped by several factors, the most important of which are the attitudes and policies of Western powers. By supporting the defenders of the old order, a great nation like the United States weakens the fighting power of the democratic forces, drives the cold-war neutralists to seek the help of the Communists, and gives the latter new heroes and martyrs.

Once a revolutionary movement enters the guerrilla phase its central objective is to confirm, perpetuate and institutionalize the moral isolation of the enemy by providing an alternative to the discredited regime through the creation of "parallel hierarchies." The major task of the movement is not to outfight but to outadminister the government. The main target in this bid is the village, where the majority of the population lives, and where the government's presence is often exploitative (collection of taxes). Here the chief and his council are the main link between the people and the government. Breaking this link demands careful planning, organization and hard work. The government is systematically eliminated from the countryside by the conversion or killing of village officials, who are then controlled or replaced by the political arm of the movement. The rebels must then build an administrative structure to collect taxes, to provide some education and social welfare, and to maintain a modicum of economic activity. A revolutionary guerrilla movement which does not have these administrative concerns and structures to fulfill its obligations to the populace would degenerate into banditry. The official American view that the guerrillas' tasks are easier because they only destroy contradicts the findings of those who have studied and observed these movements. During this phase, military confrontation is normally avoided, and the government also treats assassinations as a police problem, and ascribes nonpayment of taxes to administrative lags, bad harvests, etc. The Vietcong is known to have gained control over 70 per cent of rural Vietnam during 1957-60—a period when Americans were presenting Uncle Diem as a rival of Uncle Ho and were going around saying: "Look, no Vietnamese army units are attacked. Therefore, there is no guerrilla threat."

Most compelling, but also most self-defeating, is the myth that terror is the basis of civilian support for the guerrillas. Guerrilla warfare requires a highly committed but covert civilian support which cannot be obtained at gun point. Only degenerate and defeated guerrillas are known to have risked the loss of mass support by terrorizing civilians (some Huk and Malayan die-hards were reduced to it). An outstanding feature of guerrilla training is the stress on scrupulously "correct and just" behavior toward civilians. Political work, believes General Giap, is "the soul of the army," and a Chinese guerrilla expert explains that "army indoctrination is primarily aimed at training the troops to act in such a way that they will gain this total support [of the people]." Guerrilla use of terror, therefore, is sociologically and psychologically selective. It strikes those who are popularly identified as the "enemy of the people"—officials, landlords and the like.

Killing a village chief, however, is often a more complicated affair. Since most chiefs are local farmers who command legitimacy and loyalty through tradition and kinship, the militants ideally want to persuade them into the movement. When that fails, it takes painstaking political work to engineer their assassination and to prepare the villagers to accept it. In the early years of the Algerian revolution it took the F.L.N. from two months to a year to kill a village chief without incurring the liability of public hostility, and that was an anti-colonial war. I was, therefore, amazed to learn that in Vietnam, about 13,000 local officials were killed between 1957 and 1961. Professor Bernard Fall gives a simple explanation: These chiefs, as appointees of Diem, had little legitimacy compared with the Vietminh cadres who had liberated the country from France. Furthermore, the local officials became involved, along with the American-equipped and trained army, in the sordid business of restoring the landlords who had fled the country during the war. (A de facto land reform was achieved under the Vietminh.) These absentee aristocrats even demanded eight years worth of back rent, covering the period from 1945 to 1954. Before the war, the rent had been 50 per cent of the yield; the peasant was thus required to pay 400 per cent of his produce and to surrender his rights to the land! The Vietcong had no problem preparing them to accept the killing of officials engaged in such work.

Terror is also used to insure survival of the militants and of the movement. Robert Kleiman of The New York Times (May 3, 1965) informs us that in Vietnam's "contested areas, with 40 per cent of the population, Saigon usually gets cooperation by day and the Vietcong by night—because that is when their troops and officials are present. It is an old Asian custom." I was amused by the last sentence, for I know it is not our custom, but a universal practice of guerrilla warfare. The population must seem at least neutral if it hopes to escape full enemy treatment from government troops. Rebel troops and officials do not arrive at night from "somewhere in the mountains"; they are present during the day, too, and often lead the show of obedience to the government. At night, the loyal peasant turns into a guerrilla and all know him as such. To insure that the popular conspiracy of silence develops no seams, exemplary punishments are given to those suspected of having informed.

Second-degree terror, which normally does not result in killing, is used to sabotage the government's belated effort to gain popular support. Government schoolteachers and health workers are favorite targets of kidnaping and indoctrination. In June, 1962, a South Vietnamese UN observer informed UNESCO that the Vietcong had kidnaped more than 1,200 teachers; the government's malaria-eradication campaign collapsed after twenty-two health officers had been killed and sixty kidnaped. Guerrilla sabotage normally guards against causing too much hardship on the population and long-range damages to the economy. Industry and even foreign-owned plantations are spared if they pay their "taxes" to the liberation front. And they normally do so when the government is unable to protect them. (In Vietnam the large European rubber plantations, Michelin, SIPH, Terres Rouges, resisted for a while, but started paying taxes to the Vietcong after their French supervisors were kidnaped.)

It is difficult to say at what point the moral isolation of a government becomes total and irreversible, so that no amount of promises and reforms would restore the lost confidence and reduce the peoples' resistance. In Algeria, at least, the point seems to have been reached when the French were reduced to torturing and killing civilians and to "regrouping" the population. Many Algerian leaders believe that their revolution became irreversible at the moment of France's greatest military victory — General Massu's conquest of the Casbah (the Muslim section of Algiers was reduced to rubble during 1957-58). France could no longer expect the confidence, much less the loyalty, of a people it was destroying indiscriminately, albeit unwillingly and despite itself.

The desertion of the intellectuals and moderates often signals, not so much the irreversibility of a revolutionary war, but its take-off. Intellectuals, especially the Asian variety, are a democratic, liberal group, who view organized violence with distaste. Somewhat alienated from their culture, Westernized and city-centered, they distrust the peasants but desire an improvement of their condition. When an armed revolution breaks out, they are likely to play in the middle, hoping to get some reforms under way by using the armed threat as a counter for bargaining. They begin to go on exile or to defect to the rebels after the failure of the regime and the success of the revolution become imminent.

The defending army's pressures for conventional attack on an external sanctuary is yet another sign that a revolutionary war has been lost on home grounds. In revolutionary warfare, armies trained for conventional combat follow a vicious logic of escalation, which derives from acute frustration over an elusive war that puts in question not only their effectiveness but the very validity of their training and organization. Moreover, the morale of professional soldiers cannot be maintained if they know they are fighting a popular rebellion. Hence the compulsion to believe that behind the popular behavior lies the terror of an army trained, equipped and directed by a foreign power, and the wish to draw the enemy into open battles. Since reprisals against the population fail to produce the desired result, carrying the war to a sovereign nation becomes the only road to a conventional showdown. In Algeria this demand led to French participation in the invasion of Suez, then to the bombing of the Tunisian border town of Sakiet Sidi Youssef, and produced a succession of army revolts, the last of which destroyed the Fourth Republic. Had the French Government succumbed to these pressures, France would have been the first power to violate the international practice of respecting the rights of sanctuary—a principle that was observed in Korea, Greece, Cyprus and Malaya.

The importance of an active sanctuary should not be underestimated, although it is not essential to guerrilla success. In Cuba, Yugoslavia and China the revolutionaries did not have active sanctuaries. In Burma and to a lesser extent in Greece, sanctuaries proved of limited value. Politically and militarily, revolutionary guerrillas are, by and large, a self-sustaining group who can go on fighting indefinitely even if infiltration from across the border stops. External help, however, has great psychological and diplomatic value. In a war of attrition, there can be no decisive victory over a strong foreign enemy. At best, one hopes to inflict on it heavy losses, tire it out and, through international pressure, force it to negotiate withdrawal. External help is important in internationalizing guerrilla demands, and keeps alive the hope of liberation. When a revolutionary army loses an ally, it loses not so much military support; it loses hope. When the world is not watching, when the fear of diplomatic sanctions and the threat of a widened war are absent, a foreign power trapped in counter-guerrilla operations is likely to make the final and the only move that may "win"—it starts to commit genocide.

Finally, the assumption that a guerrilla outfit, like a conventional army, can be controlled and commanded by a foreign or externally based government, ignores the organizational, psychological and political facts of revolutionary warfare. The distrust of the "home based" guerrillas, even for their own government in exile, cannot be overstated. The resourceful and tough "interior" leaders and cadres who face the enemy daily, collect taxes, administer, make promises and give hopes to the population are not easily controlled from abroad and make suspicious, exacting and hard-to-please allies. Therefore, zone commanders and political commissars are, for the most part, monarchs of what they survey. As a group, they are joined together by shared experiences, by a common mood which is defiant and insular, by a shared suspicion of "politicians and diplomats over there" selling them out, and by a collective will to defy a settlement that is not of their making.

In Vietnam, the signs are clear. The South Vietnamese regime has no legitimacy, and no government backed by a Western power can hope for popular support in a country where the Communists have capitalized on the nationalist appeal of restoring independence and unity, and where the pro-Western leaders have been Bao-Dai, Diem and the musical-chair generals. The massacre of civilians began as early as 1960 (not counting the earlier repressive measures of the Diem regime), as attested by reputable scholars and even a former Chief U.S. Military Adviser (Lt. Gen. Samuel T. Williams; see U.S. News & World Report, Nov. 9, 1964). It has since escalated. The intellectuals and moderates have deserted or defected. And North Vietnam is subjected to daily bombings. America and its South Vietnamese allies have lost the revolutionary war because they could not win the support of the Vietnamese people, and now their moral isolation is total.

As an Asian, I am aware of the appeals and threat of communism, and I would support policies likely to prevent its expansion. But I do not believe that communism is the wave of the future, and therefore I am neither panicked nor paralyzed. I believe that Vietnam is a unique case—culturally, historically and politically. I hope that the United States will not repeat its Vietnam blunders elsewhere. I do not subscribe to the domino theory and I am anguished by Americans who call Vietnam a test case. Vietnam is the only country in the world where the nationalist movement for independence was led by the Communists during its most crucial and heroic decades. In new countries where institutional loyalties are still weak, the legitimacy and popularity of a regime derives from its nationalist heroes and martyrs. Unfortunately for the free world the George Washington of Vietnam, its Gandhi, was a Communist nationalist. Ho Chi Minh and his associates (including General Giap of Dienbienphu fame) are understandably considered the founding fathers of modern Vietnam. It was morbid optimism to expect an absentee aristocrat to supplant a leader who had devoted a lifetime to the liberation of his country, and to defeat a leadership and cadres whose organic ties with the peasants were cemented by the bitter struggle for independence. It is not fair to blame Diem for driving the Vietnamese to desperation. He had no choice. Given his circumstances his only possible weapons were a power apparatus to regiment the population, all-out support of minorities, and widespread terror. These were not aberrations of a program but the program itself.

Vietnam is also the only country in which the United States gave substantial support to a colonial power in a war of independence. This could not have endeared America to the Vietnamese people. Then in the "Southern zone" America replaced France, and supported the ex-French puppet Bao-Dai; next it put up Diem as "the democratic alternative to Vietnam," and also failed to honor its pledge to hold elections for the unification of the country. To most Vietnamese the present war, therefore, is a continuation of the struggle for independence. I know how Asians feel about America's action. They call it neo-colonialism; some think it is imperialism. I know this is very wrong because Americans are naturally sympathetic to peoples' struggles for freedom and justice, and they would like to help if they could. I prefer the term "maternalism" for American policy in countries like Vietnam, because it reminds me of the story of an elephant who, as she strolled benignly in the jungle, stepped on a mother partridge and killed her. When she noticed the orphaned siblings, tears filled the kind elephant's eyes. "Ah, I too have maternal instincts," she said turning to the orphans, and sat on them.

Soccer: The Rabble Game . . . . David Cort

The relationship between a people's games and its morale is still a riddle, in spite of all the discussion of Greek physical culture, Roman circuses, Gothic tourneys, English playing fields, Prussian duelists and Spanish bullfights.

In America today, the point is sharpened because TV and radio expose American sports to enormous audiences, and reward them handsomely for the commercials. Every sports promoter wants to squeeze into the picture. Right now a plot is unfolding to add yet another, essentially foreign, sport to those molding the American character. That is soccer, played, believe it or not, in 131 nations, because literally anybody is smart enough to kick a large ball. Before we examine the soccer invasion, let us look at the other games we already have, especially on TV.

The striking thing about baseball is that its restrictive rules refine out all spontaneous passion. It has been sublimated to an arbitrary abstraction, a tension of comparative numbers: four balls, three strikes, three outs, four bases. The pitchers screw up the tension with their extraordinary tricks and skills; the batters try to explode it. But for the rules, what would stop a runner on the base paths from picking up the ball and running home with it? Of course, he would be out on two counts: being touched by a batted ball and interfering with the fielders. As visual spectacle, baseball is a dismal thing; as involvement with the team and all the players, personally, it is a compulsive incubus. For in baseball, a player exposes his inner character, and the fans come to know him through and through. Since the game is one of individuals in cooperation, it has the complexity of real life. A baseball fan gets very little catharsis; he worries about the team and all its players.

Football, the other great American game, is extroversion. The passion is formalized and visible: three downs to make the 10 yards, or failure and kick. The great quarterback, the King Arthur, drops back to pass, surrounded by his paladins, and in drive the villains to foil him. But under the very avalanche he gets the ball away, winging straight to a friend who nips it out of the air and runs for a touchdown. Or in the slashing, twisting style of running, given to few, a back miraculously slips off the tacklers and is in the open. There is exhilaration, catharsis, explosion, release. In football, but not in baseball, a numerical defeat can be a "moral victory." But all football games are more alike than all baseball games.

The many games that involve open play to get an object from one end of an arena to another are all said to derive from polo, a very ancient Persian game. They may be roughly said to include hockey and basketball (both on TV), as well as lacrosse, water polo and, of course, soccer. Body contact is inevitable in all of them. The hockey contact is aggravated by great speed, the sticks and skate blades. The basketball contact is made somewhat comic by bare skin and the preternaturally tall boys slapping one another. Hockey has kept an air of heroism; basketball none, but it is still a game of individuals.

---

David Cort is a frequent Nation contributor.

And what of the other TV sports? Golf is so difficult to dramatize that the show consists mainly of the putting on the last few greens where the ball can be vaguely seen rolling toward the cup. In bowling, one strike is exactly like another, and as in golf, the tension comes only toward the end of the tournament, in comparative numbers. A horse race is over so quickly that there is no time for commercials; the horses' numbers can hardly be seen and one must trust the hysterical voice. Boxing is probably the best TV program: a prolonged meeting man to man for all the marbles, with time between rounds for rapid commercials. Of course the current heavyweights have destroyed the cash value of the commercials by falling down quickly. (Parenthetically, the roller derby is choice entertainment for people who liked the old-time slapstick.)

These frivolous conflicts engage people's attention far more seriously than thoughtfully written and staged shows for, I believe, one overriding reason. A sophisticated audience can predict the outcome of most humanly plotted entertainments. It cannot predict the result of an honest sporting event, or there would be no such word in sport as "upset." And the only life anybody is familiar with is one of anxious unpredictability, of, so to speak, "upsets." But the formality, the elaboration of rules, makes defeat less brutal and undignified in baseball and football than in life. Even the best teams are often, or occasionally, beaten. For losers, unpredictability means hope.

Now, suppose one wants to add a new sport to the American scene—and the TV income. We are watching the process right now. In 1960, a businessman, William D. Cox, former owner of the Phillies baseball team and the Brooklyn football Dodgers, rounded up ten crack European soccer teams from both sides of the iron curtain, added a Brazilian team and a pick-up team called the New Yorkers, and started a tournament in New York. This was for the championship of something called the International Soccer League, now in its sixth year. The winner plays the previous year's champion, and since 1962, this has always been Dukla of Czechoslovakia.

William Cox is not paying all these players as a form of foreign aid. What he wants is an American professional soccer league of Americans. The present "New Yorkers" include Germans, Hungarians, Greeks, Englishmen and a Honduran.

How to create American soccer players? One possibility: encourage soccer in the 288 secondary schools that play soccer in the New York metropolitan area. (But only 250 colleges in the whole country play it.) Cox pays for a British professional coach to come over and teach the New York area school coaches. He also has a junior league that plays for the Governor Nelson Rockefeller Trophy. An individual award for "sportsmanship and skill" in his big league is called the Dwight D. Eisenhower Trophy. Certain games are sponsored by the most respectable charities. The public relations are impeccable.

From these innocuous dragon's teeth, Cox expects a crop of first-class soccer players to spring up, fully armed. It is said, in support, that in the New York secondary schools three times as many boys play soccer as play football. Since anyone with feet can kick a ball, the claim is not implausible. But tournament soccer requires a kind of grinding toil that American boys are not attracted to. John Dewey would not have approved of championship soccer.

Come what may, Cox hopes to have an American professional soccer league by 1967, with franchises and teams in ten cities, and TV coverage. Right now he has an occasional TV hour (sponsor: Schaefer beer) with commentary and an interview with himself. The soccer season here would presumably run from September to May, as it does in Europe.

A significant triumph came this year when Cox's New Yorkers won the first section of his tournament; in the play-off against the winner of the second section, they were briskly outfooted by Polonia Bytom of Poland. On August 8 and 11, the Poles met the Czechs' formidable team, Dukla, for the American Challenge Cup and unexpectedly defeated them.

In watching soccer, one is first struck by the foolishness of trying to maneuver a ball only by kicking and butting it. The players seem to be affecting an inefficiency, even contempt. The footwork in fact requires great skill, but this is hardly visible on TV. Soccer's inefficiency is proved by the low scoring: an average of four goals to a match of two forty-five-minute halves, with no substitutions and no time-outs except for the goal keeper (though this rule was waived for this tournament).

Nor can one identify the individuals. The game is a faceless rabble rushing up and down the field. Long-distance runners caught in a squirrel cage, the players pant out the long scramble to nowhere. These are the disinherited of the earth. A soccer game can be compared only to forms of frantic insect activity. It takes a scientist to tell which ants are eating which.

Precisely to avoid this charge, soccer publicity is aimed at creating stars (which do exist, even though one cannot identify them), usually a forward or goal keeper. Still, the game remains a confused hurly-burly. Perhaps that is why it so often leads to patriotic riots. Since one's own side is ignominious, one cannot possibly afford to give the ignominious opponents any magnanimous admiration. The fans hate the enemy without qualification. Life is symbolized as a mean, desperate, endless, exhausting, futile shambles, as in fact life is in many of the 131 countries where soccer is played.

At this very period European soccer is flushed with scandals of bribery and game-throwing, even as two Italian players were sold for $800,000 apiece. Recent fan casualties have been: two killed in Sunderland, England, March, 1964; 318 killed, 500 hurt in Lima, Peru, May, 1964; fifty hurt in Glasgow, January, 1965. In 1963, even New York City fans mobbed the referee. When the Congo team plays Katanga in Leopoldville, troops patrol the field.

If professional big-league soccer becomes an American fixture, it is certain that the top talent will for a good many years be drawn primarily from recent immigrants. One must consider the possibility that the teams would represent immigrant minorities, fighting out and perpetuating their imported national antagonisms on the field and in the stands. That is surely a gloomy prospect.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Tyranny of the Unplenishable Self

DREISER. By W. A. Swanberg. Charles Scribner's Sons. 614 pp. $10.

Leo Marx

This breezy, intimate, thoroughly documented biography reveals everything knowable about the life of Theodore Dreiser except its significance. Not to seem ungrateful, let it be said at once that W. A. Swanberg has written an invaluable book. It is the most complete record we have of a major novelist's life. Yet readers who come to the book without an appreciation of Dreiser's work may find Mr. Swanberg's purpose obscure. "This book," he explains in a concluding note, "is intended solely as biography, not criticism. There have been many analyses of Dreiser's work, but no attempt to study the whole man."

What a curious way to put it! If at times Mr. Swanberg's Dreiser seems to lack a center, the reason may be right there, in the phrasing of that statement. Is it possible to study the "whole man," if the man happens to be an artist, without studying his work? Why write a biography of Dreiser anyway? As if anticipating the only plausible answer, Mr. Swanberg goes on (in the same note) to make a case for the importance of Dreiser's extraliterary life. He says that Dreiser led a life of constant struggle, a struggle "often far removed from literature," and that in his later years Dreiser's "compulsion toward social criticism and mystic philosophy so overmastered him that he all but abandoned creative writing." All of which is borne out by Mr. Swanberg's impressively marshaled evidence.

But it is necessary to add that most of those struggles were confused and pathetic, the social criticism shallow and the philosophy puerile. The Dreiser we meet outside the books he wrote was a miserable human being. ("The story of a tormented life," is the accurate motto on the dust jacket.) Virtually all of his friendships were wrecked by his wanton self-regard. He was an opportunist, a plagiarist, a liar and a lecher. By any standard other than literary his life was a mess, and except for his novels he accomplished nothing memorable. But of course that is a mighty big exception! It is the beginning and the end of all discussion of Dreiser. If anything like "wholeness" can be found in the shambles it will be found in his work. As Mr. Swanberg shows again and again, Dreiser himself could not find it anywhere else. At 60, absorbed in one of his countless brief love affairs (he had been separated from his wife for years), he explains to his mistress, "I am trying to find myself." It is sad and ludicrous, and it is significant only if Dreiser's high place in American letters can be taken for granted.

Yet that is just the trouble: it cannot. If there is an important fact about Theodore Dreiser that Mr. Swanberg fails to make plain it is that his reputation as a major writer is far from secure. Nor would a reader of Mr. Swanberg's Dreiser realize that this man's work has been the subject of one of the longest, most radical and illuminating controversies in our literary history.

It began in 1900, when the manuscript of his first novel, Sister Carrie, arrived in the office of Doubleday, Page & Company, and it is still going on. Frank Norris, a Doubleday reader at the time, thought the book was great. He admired it for its audacious, truth-telling realism, and he persuaded Walter Hines Page, a partner in the firm, to sign a contract. Later, the Doubledays (Frank and his wife Neltje) returned from Europe and read the proofs. They were shocked by the vulgarity and immorality of the novel. (These two charges have recurred endlessly in the sixty-five-year argument about the value of Dreiser's work.) They thought it was vulgar because of the commonplaceness of both its matter and its manner. And they thought it was immoral not because of any erotic details but rather because it seemed to subvert all respectable values. "Amoral" would have been more accurate: Carrie had a successful career even though she had lived in sin; it was as if Dreiser had endorsed unchastity as a way of life.

The Doubledays also regarded the book as a bad commercial risk. They tried to persuade Dreiser to release them and, having failed, they reluctantly honored the contract. Their judgment soon was confirmed by the reviewers, most of whom condemned the novel for immorality, inelegance, pessimism and general unpleasantness. The public, incidentally, took the reviewers' word, buying only 456 copies of the first edition, and giving Dreiser a total of $68.40 for his efforts. This calamity nearly crushed poor Dreiser. He went into a decline almost as disastrous as the one he had described (in depicting Hurstwood) at the end of Sister Carrie. But he was staunch in his commitment to the ideal of fictional truth embodied in that novel. In fact, his loyalty to the canon of "realism" probably was his major lapse in the direction of integrity. Notice, however, that this admirable trait was called forth by literature; unless we place his work at the center there can be little to admire about the "whole man."

Most subsequent arguments about Dreiser's work have been elaborations of the disagreement between Norris and the Doubledays. His early antagonists—Stuart Sherman, a genteel professor of the New Humanist persuasion, was typical—condemned him for "barbarism." That charge embraced his prosaic characters, his inelegant style and his naturalistic view of life. Dreiser's people, said Sherman, were animals, and "his stubborn insistence upon the jungle-motive results in a dreary monotony in the form and substance of his novels." In reply, Dreiser's defenders, notably H. L. Mencken, Sherwood Anderson and Sinclair Lewis, pictured him as a courageous, lonely iconoclast. (This controversy often has tended to line up professional writers against academicians.) Dreiser's friends argued that his crudity was justified by his subject, and that if art accurately imitated nature it could not be harmful. "He is true to something in the life about him," said Sherwood Anderson, "and truth is always wholesome." In 1930, Lewis took the occasion of his Nobel Prize acceptance speech to tell the world about his radical colleague:

> Usually unappreciated, often hounded, he has cleared the trail

Leo Marx is the author of The Machine in the Garden (Oxford).

> from Victorian Howellsian timidity and gentility in American fiction to honesty, boldness and passion of life. Without his pioneering I doubt if any of us could, unless we liked to be sent to jail, seek to express life, beauty and terror.

The choice, as Dreiser's supporters saw it, was between effete aestheticism and harsh truth.

During the great depression and the war, however, the debate seemed to be over. With the vogue of proletarian literature, Dreiser's fictive world became a stock setting for the novel. To readers of Dos Passos, Farrell or Steinbeck, his work hardly seemed subversive. In fact when Dreiser died in 1945, it was evident to most commentators that he had been in the mainstream all along.

But then, the following year, Lionel Trilling reopened the controversy. Writing in The Nation (Apr. 20, 1946), he shifted the ground to the assumptions, largely political, that governed responses to Dreiser's work. The discussion was prompted by the posthumous publication of The Bulwark, but Trilling's real concern was to call into question the values of the liberal-Left literary establishment. He took the liberal tolerance of Dreiser and severity toward Henry James as the measure of a certain intellectual softness. To be sure, some of Trilling's animus—it is impossible to say how much—was directed against the contamination of the New York literary world by Stalinism. (Not long before his death Dreiser had made himself a conspicuous target for just this attack by joining the Communist Party.) That Trilling saw his essay as something more than a routine literary piece is suggested by his polemical, melodramatic tone. "James and Dreiser: with that juxtaposition," he wrote, "we are immediately at the dark and bloody crossroads where culture and politics meet."

Later Trilling made even more of his attack upon Dreiser. He combined the gist of the Nation piece with his earlier Partisan Review attack on V. L. Parrington, and he used the new version, called "Reality in America," as the lead essay in his influential book, The Liberal Imagination (1950). Since then the essay, which has been reprinted in many anthologies, has acquired something like scriptural authority in the academic world. It makes Dreiser and Dreiser's admirers the embodiment of a crude and peculiarly American anti-intellectualism. Trilling identifies this view of life with the populist tendency to denigrate the trained intellect and its works that Tocqueville had discussed long before. And he associates it with a simple-minded, representational theory of art: the test of literary value being the degree of correspondence, as in a mirror image, between the work and a tangible "reality" out there. These unexamined assumptions account for the doctrinaire liberal's preference for Dreiser over James. To think this way is to betray the intellectual's cause. It is the way Dreiser thinks, and he thinks, says Trilling, "as the modern crowd thinks when it decides to think." Hence the readiness of the liberal, who assumes that the crowd is right, to excuse Dreiser's crudities of thought and expression.

The most effective answer to Trilling is Alfred Kazin's "Introduction" to The Stature of Theodore Dreiser, a collection of critical essays published in 1955. On the sources of Dreiser's power, however, he merely rephrases the old arguments. "Every line hurts," he says of certain passages, ". . . because it is all too much like reality to be 'art.'" Unfortunately, he neglects to say whether it is, nonetheless, art—a point on which Trilling is more cogent. At times Kazin talks about Dreiser's work as if it issued from an unmediated, artless transaction with experience. He seems to endorse the ingenious idea, advanced by Malcolm Cowley and others, that in Dreiser's case stylistic ineptitude unwittingly becomes art. Trilling is rightly skeptical of such illogic. His position is closer to that of Joyce Cary, who seems to me convincing on the problem of Dreiserian awkwardness. "Dreiser," he said, "is so anxious to make the reader receive the story as true, that he pretends to have no art at all, not even

A book for people who have had years of experience but feel that their sexual relationships are not complete and that it can be bettered

AN ABZ OF LOVE

A book of love that stormed the best-seller lists in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Holland. This is the complete, unabridged, illustrated edition of the most important book on sex today. The authors — both doctors — treat the question of sexual relationships with complete candor. Their disclosures will prove enlightening, and be a guide to a complete and happier sex life.

"The authors describe the mechanics, the variations, the pleasures and the difficulties of the sexual act. They give exact instructions on practical details. . . . It is time the subject of sex was treated with less reserve and more common sense. This book is supposedly aimed at couples in their thirties and forties, but might well be given to the most ignorant beginners." — TIMES LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

"The authors set out to write a common sense book about sex. They approach the subject with a healthy curiosity, pleasure, and wit, and without inhibition. . . . The book is handsomely made and contains 120 lyrical drawings which are as frank as is the prose. A civilized book . . . its appeal is to mature, sophisticated laymen in general." — LIBRARY JOURNAL

BY INGE & STEN HEGELER

120 illustrations

Special Offer

Price: $10.00
SPECIAL OFFER
$8.95

UNIVERSITY BOOKS, INC.
New Hyde Park,
New York 11041

I wish to take advantage of your special offer at $8.95 of AN ABZ OF LOVE published at $10.00.

Name:

Address:

☐ Cash enclosed ☐ Check enclosed ☐ M.O. enclosed NA-8

grammar. And this itself is high art."

But Kazin contributes most to the defense of Dreiser by placing Trilling's attack in its proper historical context. In effect, he associates the reaction against Dreiser and our insurgent realists with the new genteel tradition that had come in after the war. Now the country was prosperous, the writers moved into the universities, the mistakes of the sociological criticism of the thirties became obvious, and although Trilling did not intend it that way, his sniffish contempt for Dreiser was in perfect keeping with the taste for clean writing and well-bred uninvolvement that was nurtured by the victorious "new critical" school of literary pedagogy. In 1950, the charge against Dreiser was still what it had been in 1900—vulgarity, but now it was exemplified less by inelegant characters than inelegant sentences.

And that is more or less the way things stand today. As anyone who teaches American literature at the college level will testify, Dreiser is a problem. Many students schooled in the reigning academic criticism hardly can bear to read him. Their literary taste has been formed by the essays of T. S. Eliot, the textbooks of Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren and the novels of Henry James. (In the chronology, moreover, James comes just before Dreiser.) Imagine trying to persuade them to take seriously a man capable of writing a sentence like this:

> The death house in this particular prison was one of those crass erections and maintenances of human insensibility and stupidity for which no one primarily was really responsible.

But there always are a few independent spirits who discover Dreiser's other kind of writing, who respond to its power, and who recognize him for what he is—a test case of currently received critical doctrine. Is it possible to write "badly"—compose soggy sentences — and still, in the same work, move the heart? Or, as H. L. Mencken put it after quoting that sentence from An American Tragedy, "What is one to say of such dreadful bilge? What is one to say about a novelist who, after a quarter of a century at his trade, still writes it?"

One great merit of Mr. Swanberg's Dreiser is that it helps us answer the question. I am not suggesting that biographical facts can, of themselves, resolve the critical argument. But the very density of the evidence does clarify some issues. We always have known, for instance, that Dreiser was an ignorant man. But the depth of his ignorance makes a difference: he was ill-read, bigoted, superstitious—at various times he patronized every kind of quack. No wonder the express ideas that appear in his work are stock ideas. Besides, he had no genuine respect for language. He was willing to lend his name to the lowest kind of hack writing. For a time he cynically and successfully edited a high-pressure slick magazine. He did not even care much about the language of his own serious work; incompetent people were invited to cut and rewrite large sections of his novels. Some of his correspondence seems unbelievable. At 40 he addresses an 18-year-old as "Honeypot" in baby talk, viz., "Do ju lub me? Had you sweet doe eyes? Or are dey dough eyes? (Oooh what a slam)." To say, as Mr. Trilling does, that Dreiser thought as the crowd thought may be correct. What it means, though, is that he was largely uneducated, and that the Jamesian sense of a literary vocation (and of the novel as an aesthetic object) was almost wholly foreign to him.

There seem to be two quite distinct and even mutually exclusive conceptions of the novel involved here. One is the representational or realistic novel in the tradition that Dreiser inherits from Defoe. It is judged almost wholly by its lifelikeness, that is, by the novelist's capacity to create an illusion of artless reportage. When the reader is made aware of its formal properties the writer has failed. The other conception is the well-made, imagistic or poetic romance written by Hawthorne and James. Nowadays, formalist critics submit it to a test of holistic integrity not unlike that applied to a Shakespearean sonnet or a Mozart quartet. In this view Art, the writer's ordering of his material, supplants Truth-to-Nature as the primary object of attention. With this conception of the novel Dreiser had no commerce whatever.

But if the weakness of Dreiser's work can be traced to ignorance, its strength derives from a kind of knowledge unavailable to Henry James. Mr. Swanberg's book is the record of a man suffering from acute deprivation, not material poverty alone, but deprivation of status, dignity and — subtlest by far — cultural identity. Many American writers began their lives in poverty, but few of them (at least few white men) have known anything like the total ostracism, the sense of being helplessly down at the bottom that Dreiser knew as a boy. To be put down as poor is one thing, to be rejected as the brother of whores is another. In any case, Dreiser's youth seems to have made him permanently incapable of passing over into middle-class respectability. Even when he had wealth and fame he did not try to make it the way Howells and Mark Twain had made it. When he had his first and best chance, a year at Indiana University, he simply quit — evidently because he was so ill at ease socially. His desperate, lifelong effort to "find himself" enabled him to create Carrie Meeber and Clyde Griffiths. The tyranny of the unplenishable self is the hallmark of all his great characters; they are people who got from their parents little or no sense of themselves, and whose "nothingness" could be assuaged only by an endless reaching out toward new objects of desire.

What are we to say about such a writer? Perhaps Mencken pointed the way in his astute comments on Dreiser's characters: "Their thoughts are muddled and trivial," he said, "—but they can feel. And Dreiser feels with them, and can make the reader feel with them. It takes skill of a kind that is surely not common. Good writing is far easier." No doubt Mr. Trilling would admit that James was not as skillful at making us feel with plebian characters. Yet the James novel he chooses to discuss at length in The Liberal Imagination is, significantly, The Princess Casa-

A Spruce of Marshall Washer's

It had to happen
the lovely spruce
silver and green growing on Marshall's rock growing in open sunshine thicker and thicker the needles clogging the wind
the roots inching over the stone searching for ground that lay twenty feet distant or maybe thirty straight
down
it had to happen
but we'll miss it.

Hayden Carruth

massima. Here James, as if testing his virtuosity, takes for his hero a man who sprang from the pavement of the London slums. The astonishing result is a brilliant political fable. Compared to Dreiser's working-class characters, however, James's Hyacinth Robinson is a figure out of books. Creating him was a literary tour de force, to be sure, but James did not, could not possibly, know what Dreiser knew about lives of chronic deprivation. Each of these writers was formed by a special combination of ignorance and knowledge, and—given the circumstances of American life at the time—the parts were not interchangeable. Having to choose between James and Dreiser, as some would have us choose between Eliot and Lawrence, is a silly, academic game. We need both. To ignore either is to limit the range of the American consciousness.

Notes From Afar: Part II

Harold Clurman

Something about Paris—was it the traffic-choked streets, the political apathy, parts of the exposition of 20th-century sculpture at the Rodin museum?—made me say: "I disapprove of most things nowadays while I enjoy almost everything." This quip ought to be borne in mind in much that follows.

I loved Paris all over again, not because of any plays or pictures I saw there but because it reeks of life. Its wounds as much as its charms are immediately revealed to the eye. Its theatre at the moment is poor but the city itself is theatre.

London now is Europe's most "swinging" town. I went to the theatre six times in seven days. Though I cannot say that I "liked" what I saw, I found everything more than casually interesting. Something is going on in England and I was glad to observe a little of it in the theatre-mirror.

The National Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company (the latter appears both at Stratford-on-Avon and at the Aldwych in London) command the finest acting troupes of the English-speaking world. The cast of Harold Pinter's latest play, The Homecoming, at the Aldwych offers no "stars," but is so thoroughly right that it gives the impression of being the play itself. Acting everywhere in London today generally displays remarkable competence and at times brilliance. One often suspects, however, that roles are being played for recordings rather than for the stage: so much of the effect is verbal and vocal. One hears almost too well.

The plays piqued me in a peculiar way. Each of them seemed to have been conceived in one family and inspired by a single motive. Nearly all were bitter comedies with grins bespeaking self-pity and mockery. My first guess was that the British were now in the grip of an obsession, part of that sexual revolution one hears so much about these days. But I soon realized that this was a mistake. It was not the warmth of sex that emanated from the plays I saw but the chill of a vengeful frustration. Sex provided no solace, tenderness, sensual gratification, entertainment or progeny. It was closer to suicide.

It would be easy to conjecture that having frivolously defied Victorian prudery in the twenties, the British are now grimly battering away at its Puritan residue. But in the plays I refer to sex appears to cause greater frustration than the original inhibitions ever did. The laughter provoked by these plays is rarely ribald or lewd; it is the laughter of a man jeering at his own impotence.

The ambivalence immanent in the new dramatic cycle may be discerned in the recurrence of the homosexual strain. Homosexuality may hold a special fascination for the British theatregoer because mention of its very existence was hitherto banned from the stage. The taboo has now been exorcized. Still, the presentation of homosexuality does not occur in plays which are really about homosexuality. It is made an adjunct to a play's central theme.

The three characters in Frank Marcus' The Killing of Sister George, a spoof on British television, are all Lesbians. In John Osborne's A Patriot for Me, exposing hypocrisy in aristocratic Establishments (an allusion to the Profumo case), the protagonist is a homosexual officer in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire whose betrayal of his country under pressure of blackmail is covered up by recourse to anti-Semitism. Nevertheless, scene after scene is either comically or melodramatically given to displays of homosexual misbehavior — actually irrele-

The Art of F. Scott Fitzgerald
By Sergio Perosa

This is the first critical study of F. Scott Fitzgerald based on his complete works, from the Princeton juvenilia to The Last Tycoon. In a work-by-work analysis, Sergio Perosa reveals the literary craftsman who through the conscious use of a Europeanized technique gave artistic form to the American experience.

248 pages $5.95

The Dropout: Causes and Cures
By Lucius F. Cervantes

In this imaginative book the dropout speaks for himself. His views are compared with those of a high-school graduate having the same I.Q. and similar social and economic background. We learn how these young people feel about their families, friends, and teachers. We also gain insight into many of their basic emotions and attitudes. Reading this book is an important step toward solving the problem of the dropout.

252 pages $5.95

The University of Michigan Press
Ann Arbor

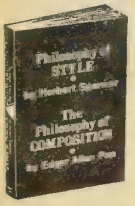
vant to the play's subject. If there is any pornography in these plays it is pornography of the intellect. Muddy thinking, the turbid sentimentality of chattering minds are the end results.

If it is all sex in the head, if the sexual emphasis is artistically marginal, one wonders what, apart from its theatrical effect, is its true purpose or significance. What is really being exposed is rage, the curse sparked by an inability to feel.

There is a positive aspect to this: these plays are not just smartly shocking. Despite faults as drama, they reflect a reality. We can neither dismiss nor forget them. They are almost all well written in the rhetoric of vituperation for which Osborne's Look Back in Anger set the tone, and of which he is still the prime master.

ATTENTION SUBSCRIBERS

Don't miss back-page announcement, this issue



FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

A Forum for Critical Social Thought

Contemporary Issues

Summer Issue

- THE AMERICAN ECONOMY
  by P. Mattick illusion of permanent possibility
- VOICE OF ART
  by L. Yost decline in communication
- THE MARCH OF DIMES
  by F. Exner, M.D.
  the fund business

CONTEMPORARY PRESS
P. O. Box 2357, Church St. Sta.
New York, N. Y. 10008

☐ Single copy (Summer Issue) 50c
☐ Subscription, 4 issues $1.80

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip. ....

The psychological condition of which the new plays are oblique signs has a social cause of great significance.

Because Britain is freer than it has ever been, its people more alert, they shake the old Establishment without seeming to move ahead to anything wholly fresh and liberating. We witness this in the virtual impasse of their politics. The conservative stagnates, the Left feels stymied. Though there surely have been "improvements" since the war, the progress made does not appear to have altered matters enough to act as an inspiring force. There is little mass enthusiasm except for "Beatles," the escape into infantilism. How then can there be any animating purpose? Where action is not sustained by confidence in concrete social consequence the individual, unless he be a true artist, a revolutionary or a saint, lapses into depression, lethargy, cynicism, psychosis or crime. Sex becomes a substitute for the release sought, but sex by itself cannot satisfy the greater hunger or carry the burden of humanity's broader needs. Hence the sadistic sentiments it induces.

The plays themselves do not sufficiently project an awareness of this cause and are thus more symptomatic than interpretive. They strike me as being, for all their hooting and growling, fundamentally complacent. There is little sign that their authors would like to change anything or harbor some notion as to the course through which a change might take place. They appear pleased to enjoy the fruits of their displeasure—personal acclaim with the additional advantage of being definitely "in."

One of the clues to the poverty of these plays is their peculiar length. Once stated, a primary situation is repeated again and again. Nothing specific develops. The often coruscating talk is prolonged from one jibe to another, as if to illustrate the art of insult and making customers. Two plays employ soliloquies, stream-of-consciousness verbiage, semi-fantasy, and in one case the denuding of the central character. Typical too is the use of various women as foils upon which the central male personage may play off his moral disarray and hate. The characters are not made more understandable or sympathetic as the action proceeds; they diminish with verbal extension. They are neither pathetic nor tragic: they are, at best, wretched with jokes which to the audience's delight are frequently obscene.

In David Mercer's Ride a Cock Horse, a one-shot novelist out of the coal pits of the North, a man who manages to render his wife and two mistresses thoroughly miserable, speaks of himself as "harassed by insight but incapable of meaningful action." Insights there may be but not the kind which lead to new paths. That is why they harass.

What is missing in so many of the new plays is the substance of experience. Beckett's shudder is aesthetically admirable in its concise passion. Pinter's The Homecoming is a collage abstracted from real elements pithily picturing a society indifferent to or ignorant of any values. Osborne forages in ever new areas but always returns with the same bag of disaffection. John Arden, none of whose new plays were on during my visit, has greater scope and feeling but is not always master of his material. But generally speaking I find that too many of the new plays, as so much else in contemporary expression, eliminate the world itself, the vessels, bones and structure, even the geography of daily life, so that we find ourselves on a constant excursion in the air, winging over everything without being permitted to land and see anything.

My recent theatregoing in London produced the effect—no doubt exaggerated by its intensity—of making me grateful for the romantic rattle and youthful splash of Cyrano de Bergerac which I had just seen in Paris. Rostand wrote in that play, as in most of his others, an exuberant dramatization or glorification of inadequacy. If we are to suffer defeat, let us at least do so with a suggestion of splendor. And though I don't find Pirandello especially profound in Tonight We Improvise, which I also saw in Paris, he at least offers us the excitement of his game.

Let me add by way of exemplary paradox that my London theatregoing converted me to Socialist Realism! I have never seen a play in this style that I thought really good, but what is suggested by that dismal epithet is something to which I declare myself partial. It is the encompassing of the phenomena of existence informed by a positive ideal, an affirmation of some activating conviction in the face of enduring hardship of life. All the rest is smirking, hissing or puling surrender.

Julius Novick

MAHAGONNY

And appetite, an universal wolf, . . .
Must make perforce an universal prey,
And last eat up himself.

Thus Shakespeare's Ulysses in Troilus and Cressida. But Ulysses was speaking conditionally, about what would happen if. According to Bertolt Brecht, the process was already far advanced in the bourgeois society of Europe in the 1920s, and he dramatized its workings in a very odd opera that he wrote with Kurt Weill, entitled The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny. Thirty-five years after its first production in Leipzig, Mahagonny has finally been given its North American première in Stratford, Ontario, in English, as an offering of the Stratford Shakespearean Festival. By now it is a Weimar Republic period piece; but it is also as contemporary, as timeless, as a piece of Dead Sea fruit.

Brecht's Mahagonny is a mythical town on the coast of a mythical Florida, a shabby Never-Never-Land for grownups. The opera's story concerns a good-hearted lumberjack named Jim Mahoney, who turns up in Mahagonny with three of his buddies, looking for fun. But one lumberjack dies of gluttony, another in a crooked prize fight; Jim is betrayed by his remaining friend and by his girl Jenny, and he dies in the electric chair, guilty of Mahagonny's one capital crime: being without money.

As usual, Brecht is not particularly interested in his plot, nor yet in his characters. In this case they are merely the means of evoking Mahagonny itself, a multi-faceted metaphor for a civilization without solidarity or legitimate purpose, where the only rule is sauve qui peut:

And if someone should kick, well,
that's me, Sir,
And if someone gets kicked it will be you.

Mahagonny is devoted to idleness ("Every week here will be seven days free from labor") and freedom ("Whatever you may want to do, There's nothing would prohibit you"). But in Mahagonny total freedom means total indulgence, an absolute abandonment to personal gratification: eating, fornicating, prize fighting and drinking.

As Brecht portrays it, the life of pleasure lacks even the superficial appeal conventionally ascribed to it. From the first it is tawdry, and gradually it becomes grim. When God condemns everybody in Mahagonny to Hell, He is told that they are in Hell already. Here Brecht is echoing Shaw, who in Man and Superman defined Hell as "a place where you have nothing to do but amuse yourself." But in Man and Superman this idea remains one among many ideas, whereas in Mahagonny "amusing yourself"— the life of appetite — is the subject of the work.

According to Shakespeare's Ulysses, appetite is unleashed by the abolition of "degree," of the system of power and subordination by which the world is ruled and anarchy prevented. Brecht does not consider the cause, nor does he propose a cure. At the end, the characters sing, "We can neither help ourselves nor you now," and walk off-stage. Mahagonny is purely and simply the image of Brecht's despair.

As such, it might tend to seem somewhat repetitious, somewhat heavy-handed, especially in comparison with The Threepenny Opera, the other well-known Brecht-Weill collaboration. In Threepenny, Brecht is working with borrowed material, and the plot and characters are more than merely functional. Threepenny, moreover, is very funny in its sardonic way; Mahagonny, although bristling with ironies, provides very little to laugh at.

The variety and humanity that Mahagonny requires is provided by Kurt Weill's music. Much of it is merely atmospheric, harsh and relentless, underscoring, building up tension, keeping our nerves raw. But when Jim and Jenny sing their tender duet in the second act, a recurring theme in the orchestra suggests that perhaps love is possible even in Mahagonny. Brecht made his characters as vehicles for his own emotion; Weill's music, now and then, gives the characters emotions of their own.

It is an odd sort of music; it reminded me of those "assemblages" which are put together out of assorted junk and fragments of anything that appeals to the artist. And yet, for all his eclecticism, Weill in his Brecht period had a pungent, poignant, highly personal style.

Mahagonny is musically more ambitious than The Threepenny Opera. There is far more music in it; only an occasional line of dialogue is spoken unaccompanied. Much of this music, moreover, requires legitimate voices, which the Threepenny music mostly does not. The Mahagonny music is somehow denser than that of Threepenny, and harder to take in. The best tunes in the one are as good as the best tunes in the other; but in Mahagonny there are fewer of them.

In a bad production, Mahagonny could be a bore. At Stratford, Jean Gascon, the director, has brilliantly capitalized on the opportunities it of-

COLUMBIA PICTURES Presents A STANLEY KRAMER PRODUCTION
A Film Based on KATHERINE ANNE PORTER'S "SHIP OF FOOLS"

Ship of Fools

From the big best-seller!

NOW New VICTORIA Broadway & 46th St. and SUTTON 57th St. & 3rd Ave.

fers. In collaboration with designer Brian Jackson and choreographer Alan Lund, he has bodied forth Brecht's vision in a series of harsh, cogent, vivid images and actions. In the song about God's visit to Mahagonny, for instance, God stalks around on stilts, with an obviously fake beard and a pot for a hat, persecuted by a hideous green follow spot. It is the very image of the modern dead God: pompous, impotent and patently phony.

The performances are brash and broad, but never strident, never out of control. (Muriel Greenspon, a fat mezzo-soprano from the New York City Center, plays one of the founders of Mahagonny with tremendous aplomb; Jean Bonhomme and Yoland Guérard are her colleagues; Thomas O'Leary, a tenor, is Jim, and Martha Schlamme is Jenny.) All the characters spend much of their time speaking for the author directly to the audience, and the performers seem as urgently involved with the author's emotions as with the emotions of their characters. Whether this has anything to do with the famous "alienation effect" I should hate to have to say; but it is an essential factor in the impact of this production.

I wish I had the space to praise this year's Shakespearean offerings at Stratford: Julius Caesar (directed by Douglas Campbell) and particularly Henry IV (both parts; directed by Stuart Burge; with Douglas Rain as a tough-minded Hal, Tony Van Bridge as a charming—sometimes too charming—Falstaff, Leo Ciceri as an imposing King Henry, and William Hutt as a hilarious caricature of Justice Shallow). But the great event at Stratford this year is Mahagonny. It would be a pity if such a production should be allowed to die as scheduled. Is there no way of sending it south of the border, for the edification of us provincials in the United States?

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE

A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books. Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

BOOK STORES: ATTENTION. Experienced bookstore (international) manager. Previous bookshop owner with large clientele seeks similar affiliation in publishing field or bookstore. New York City preferred. Box 578, c/o The Nation.

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to: P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

WALDEN II is a scientifically based community now in its tiny infancy, but similar in plan to B. F. Skinner's book, Walden II. Write only if you wish to participate: Walden House, Box 8971, Washington, D.C.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE IPCRESS FILE

After two World Wars and the liquidation of an empire, espionage no longer serves the British as a subject for popular romance. Like the cowboy with us, the secret agent has become for the British a figure so remote from plausible experience that the common reader can no longer invent Mitty dreams from him. The last wine is now being pressed from this vintage by force of distortion and the taste is wry and disconcerting. A way of measuring how far these late works are "off" is to imagine the embarrassed disapproval a John Buchan hero would feel in the company of James Bond or the spy who came in from the cold. Even leaving aside their personal habits and lack of patriotism, these newcomers have made a trade of danger; the great game is played no more.

Now comes The Ipcress File, a thriller admirably plotted and crackling with violence, but flaunting the absurdity of its subject matter. The agent on the spot is a horn-rimmed hoodlum with affectations for haut cuisine and chamber music and a rat's instinct for survival; his home-office bosses are waspish aunties in bowler hats and Savile Row suits; the master mind working for Albania is an aristocratic sadist whose psychological torture chamber is copied from the apparatus that surrounds Francis Bacon's screaming cardinal. The language of the film is effete mockery, and Sidney Furie, the director, has filmed it in a high style intended to emphasize its paper-thin theatricality. Mr. Furie's mannered camera work has the pseudo-elegance of fashion photography.

The Ipcress File makes wit of style and accomplishes the tricky feat of coining excitement from the very material it is lampooning. But of the old innocent verities—the queen, the flag, the purity of England's young manhood—on which the spy thriller was built into an export product as reliable as Scotch whisky, it has not a trace.

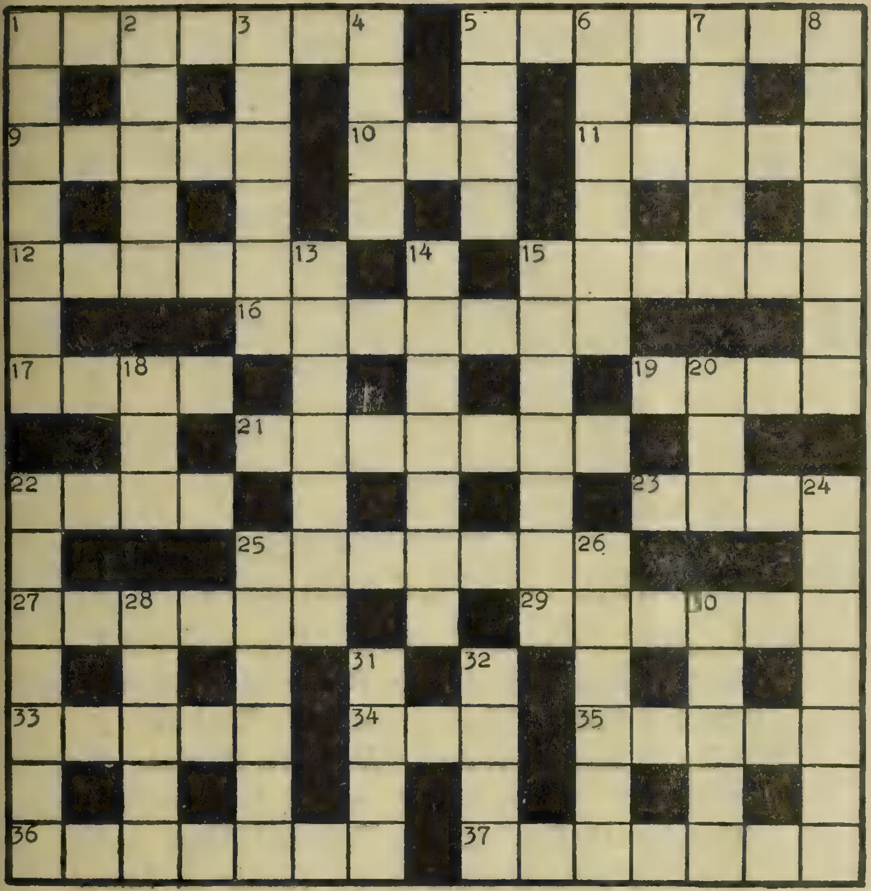
DARLING

Another British movie whose action seems to revolve around a vacuum is Darling, directed by John Schlesinger and starring Julie Christie, Dirk Bogarde and Laurence Harvey. Miss Christie's Dianna Scott, the darling of the title, looks at first like a familiar type: the woman of small talent, no scruples and a compulsive ambition, who will climb to eminence over the wrecked lives of those who trust her candid femininity. But as the film progresses one comes to realize that she has no direction, is incapable of sustaining a scheme, suffers from chronic boredom induced by inability to grasp any idea, and samples life with the petulence of a nervous invalid making her way through a box of chocolates.

As clinical sociology, this character may have merit (and Miss Christie plays it well), but dramatically it is without savor. The Scott woman does considerable damage, but she is bad for people as dry rot is bad for buildings—without volition or profit to herself. It struck me early in the film that she was an appalling bore and then the puzzle was to determine why Bogarde, playing an Ed Murrow type of B.B.C. interviewer, should think otherwise. The picture's psychology never cuts deep enough to encounter that sort of paradox, and the viewer is forced to satisfy himself with the crumbs of incidental satire with which the work is liberally sprinkled. These poke fun at basic institutions, folk wisdom, the pomposity of old age, the gaiety of youth, the glamour of gossip-column society, the sweet boyishness of homosexuality. The thrusts are deft but the targets are almost as modish as the kind of modishness the picture professes to scorn. The dialogue is often so arch that it seems to become embarrassed by its own cuteness. In world affairs the devil theory persists, but on the personal level we seem to have lost our belief in even common wickedness. Without it, drama is becoming one of the decorative arts.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1117

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 and 35 Legally exact, and like Yankee Doodle, everything's in song. (4, 3, 5)

5 A defect in the operation to carry needless fear. (7)

12 As the reed is broken, so does one live. (6)

15 Take out the pledge? Think again!

16 Counseled to join so as to increase what should have a tight grip in it.

17 A radio studio one might be on the 10. (4)

19 and 9 Sort of 4-11 which might make various pillow standards lower. (9)

21 Might be shifted during play, not out in the open. (7)

23 Descriptive of generation associated with 19 and 4. (4)

25 Might contribute to reproducing the work of clients. (7)

27 and 18 One of those tiny weapons carried in some women's handbags, used in periods of mourning or distress? (6, 3)

29 Is it usual to be not, as an alternative, sick of the French? (6)

33 You could make this musician drink big or in kingly style. (5)

36 Some chickens or dogs? (7)

37 and 5 down Bill could be lighter if you have it. (5, 2, 4)

DOWN:

1, 22 across and 34 across Evidently a body can't be prone to make an accountant's justification. (7, 4, 3)

2 Comes close to being caught in its own snare. (5)

3 Time to begin, and it ends up being confused! What to do! (6)

4 and 11 Certainly doesn't take a quick right in the way of 19-9. (4, 5)

6 Graduates might be the new sort in dog-raising. (6)

7 Take one's leave with a lover of an unpenned heroine. (5)

8 The prevailing system of an endless military group. (7)

13 Train of old money in certain signs of the orient. (7)

14 Drawing a number in the inner fabric? (7)

15 Keep oneself from the 10? (7)

20 Metal money? (3)

22 Obviously a barrier confines waters! (7)

24 Sort of holly, at the sound of sight.

25 Strange that one should go hungry this way, since it's made at the end of the harvest. (6)

26 He certainly was a capital writer.

28 and 10 Nocturne? (5, 3)

30 Used to express possibility about a worthless term, and mean. (5)

31 Does not have to need to be given them? (4)

32 Proving time should have meaning. (4)

PUBLICATIONS

Something Different! . . .

Send $1 for the first issue of The Appalachian South. Native Southern mountaineers tell about themselves—folklore, song, history, how greed erodes mountain beauty and human dignity leaving widespread poverty—in 62 pages 9x12. Yearly subscription, 4 issues, $5.00.

The Appalachian South

ANN WILLIAMS, Editor
P.O. Box 4104-N, Charleston, W. Va.

NOT AS A FACELESS NUMBER
Poems by Carl Robins
Introduction by Wm. Wantling
A drug addict serving life sentence fights despair.
500 Copy First Edition
$1.00 Postpaid
HORS COMMERCE PRESS
22526 Shadycroft, Torrance, Calif. 90505

END the war in VIETNAM bumper stickers
1-25, 50c; 25-300, 35c; 300 and over, 20c
Order from:
VOICE Political Party
2534 S.A.B. Ann Arbor, Michigan

TODAY, STARS & MEMORY: a special presentation of poems by James T. Farrell. In THE SMITH/5, the strongest magazine. $1. $3.50 a year. 15 Park Row, New York City 38.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE DRAFTED is must reading for every young man facing service. Send $1.00 to G. Knox, Box 1018, Mission, Kansas.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1116

ACROSS: 1 Impracticable; 9 Trapp; 10 Osteopath; 11 Running; 12 Cocking; 13 Evils; 14 Commingle; 16 Overfills; 18 Benet; 19 Entraps; 21 Tripoli; 22 Erectness; 23 Tutti; 24 Recalcitrance. DOWN: 1 Interferometer; 2 Plaintive; 3 Applies; 4 Throng; 5 Catacombs; 6 Bronchi; 7 En ami; 8 The Great Divide; 14 Cold steel; 15 Guncotton; 17 Frantic; 18 Blister; 20 Their; 21 Tosti.

COMING SEPT. 20!

The 330-Page Centennial Issue of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion—which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent as the September 20 issue of The Nation to subscribers of record.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will be entitled to THE NATION's portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my September 20 issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME______________________________

ADDRESS______________________________

CITY________________STATE________________ZIP No.________

8-30-65

THE
NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

September 6, 1965 . . 35c

LLE PUBLIC LIBRARY
LLE, TENNESSEE

Addendum to 'Why Vietnam?'

A BASIS FOR NEGOTIATION EXISTS

JOHN GITTINGS

The Shadow Presidency

James MacGregor Burns

Twenty Years of Terror & Peace

'Atomic Diplomacy' Christopher Lasch

'A Peril and a Hope' Elinor Langer

LETTERS

Doctrine of hopelessness

Berkeley, Calif.

Dear Sirs: I want to disagree with a major point in Eric Hobsbawm's stimulating article, "The Pentagon's Dilemma: Goliath and the Guerrilla" [The Nation, July 19].

If I understand Mr. Hobsbawm rightly, his answer to the question, "Why is the United States committed in Vietnam in the way that it is?," is threefold: (1) An almost total disregard of the most basic common sense ("Before common sense flies completely out of the window, it is therefore worth taking a look at the nature of modern guerrilla war"); (2) the choice of an inappropriate model for successful anti-guerrilla operations ("That the Mau Mau were defeated in Kenya is no help to the Americans in Vietnam . . ."); and (3) mental illness ("The risk is that the United States, suffering from the well-known disease of infant great powers — a touch of omnipotence — will slide into nuclear war rather than face reality"). We continue to pursue an impossible course in Vietnam either from stupidity or infantile omnipotence or both. . . . I cannot help but find these reasons unsatisfactory, and should like to propose an alternative set.

I believe the United States is pursuing the course of action so well described by Mr. Hobsbawm in his article just because vital interests are directly threatened. The United States Government has laid down the following, I believe, as its total global strategy: (1) At this point in time Socialist governments which do not support actively the notion that national liberation movements ought to be influenced and inspired by Socialist thought are to be tolerated. (2) Those Socialist states which hold the contrary view cannot be tolerated, as they are presently constituted. . . . This does not imply that war with a country such as China is prudent. In fact, given this strategic goal, war is likely to produce quite the opposite effect, although carefully applied military operations might be reasonable. . . . (3) In those areas of the world where social change is inevitable, all efforts must be spent in directing those revolutions toward a national capitalist development, having as their characteristics limited land reform, elimination of radical Communist parties and room for foreign investment.

Our policy in Vietnam is nothing other than full-scale implementation of this total strategy. There is no ignorance concerning the infiltration of personnel and materiel from North Vietnam. Otherwise how account for the absence of a concerted attempt to seal the border and the long-awaited appearance of a systematic naval blockade? No, the bombing of North Vietnam has as its purpose the attempt to force renunciation of an idea, actively and enthusiastically advocated. . . .

Neither is there any ignorance of the usefulness of destroying guerrillas by bombs unleashed by B-52s which are Guam-based. The purpose here is both twofold and indirect: To indicate to the Chinese the possibility of SAC weaponry being converted to conventional purposes and thereby being used to attack Chinese industrial and nuclear capability with conventional weapons from a noncontinental base, namely Guam. Likewise, the Vietnamese peasant is being shown the dangers of supporting a real revolutionary movement. . . . In short, the purpose of the United States Government in Vietnam is to demonstrate with conclusiveness that no truly revolutionary movement can succeed in the "underdeveloped world." And it has chosen this particular area well, for in Vietnam such a movement clearly would have succeeded, without massive intervention. There is no need to win, although surely this would be best and some think possible. All that is required is that the enemy should not win and the hope that the peoples of the world should decide that if such a movement cannot win in such favorable circumstances, there is no hope. Our purpose in Vietnam is to spread the message of hopelessness.

Paul S. Rosenberg

The new persuasion

Oconomowoc, Wis.

Dear Sirs: Eric Hobsbawm is probably premature in stating in your pages that the United States will be defeated by guerrillas in Vietnam. Having experimented with supplying military support and advisers to the Saigon forces, and more recently with its own air and naval forces, the U.S. will now give up "going guerrilla," and bring in its conventional land combat forces and civil-affairs teams. Under these circumstances it is doubtful that local popular support of the Vietnamese and Vietcong guerrilla tactics will be decisive. . . .

Without failing to be appalled by the unbelievable horror of war, I do not find the expected result unwelcome. The world has reached a stage in its military technology at which no group, no matter how outraged, can resort to arms, as the Vietcong has done, to establish its cause.

THE
NATION

Monday, September 6, 1965
Volume 201, No. 6

In this issue

EDITORIALS
109

ARTICLES
111 Addendum to "Why Vietnam?" A Basis for Negotiation Exist
John Gittings
115 The Shadow Presidency
James MacGregor Burns
118 Poland's Perennial Problem
Carey McWilliams
121 The Forgotten Amendment
James D. Carroll

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
123 The Explosion That Froze the World
Christopher Lasch
123 Testament of the Ringed Snake (poem)
Sam Bradley
124 Scientists and Policy at Ground Zero
Elinor Langer
126 The Medium (poem)
Robin Blaser
127 Theatre
Henry Popkin
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 128)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Sept. 6, 1965. Vol. 201, No. 6

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

The United States, with some lapses in consistency as in the bombing of North Vietnam, is applying no more force than is necessary to keep the guerrillas from succeeding. Naturally the more ardent in this country are calling for a higher level of devastation, and the squeamish are objecting to the use of even minimum force. The question is, do the majority of the American people agree in the main with a conventional ground force and civil-affairs teams course of action? . . . Robert L. Kealy

Is Violence Un-American?

If it is, so is Old Glory. No nation of modern times is more addicted to violence, legal and illegal, than the United States. But it cannot take its violence straight. It prefers violence mixed with moral hypocrisy.

Los Angeles is a case in point. The headlines provoked the usual flood of editorials and preachments about how much we abhor violence, the senselessness of it, how it never really benefits anyone, and how we must have "order"—meaning, in this context, a return to the old disorder. Genuine order, which must be based on justice and magnanimity, is like the heavenly saints—formally revered but given short shrift in practical affairs.

Isn't it true that our foreign policy has been under strong Pentagon influence since 1945? Who is the international wholesaler of arms today? Who has scattered military aircraft, tanks, bombs, submarines, guns and every variety of weapon throughout Latin America and the Middle East? Who has armed the Pakistanis and the Indians alike? What nation has spent, in all history, what we have spent on arms since 1945—in what we are pleased to call peacetime? What nation has a reputation (and not undeserved) for turning what are basically political questions into military questions, to be settled by violence?

But, it may be objected, the comparison is unfair. War is conducted according to rules and as a last resort in defense of national interest. This is true only up to a point. Was it according to the rules when the United States bombed Hiroshima and Nagasaki, or, for that matter, when it burned Tokyo from the air? Pearl Harbor was infamous enough, but the attack was not directed against civilians. In Vietnam today, we are shown pictures of Vietcong prisoners being tortured by Vietnamese government troops while American "advisers" look on. This most abominable form of violence is sanctioned because the enemy is Communist and therefore, in our lexicon, subhuman. But this is no more true than that all Americans condone torture. A U.S. sergeant has returned after twenty months in Vietcong captivity to report that he received the same food as his captors and was given medicine when they had it; his complaints boil down to forced labor, propaganda lectures, and a bamboo bed with one blanket.

Listening to the propaganda chorus, one would think that the quality of humanity belongs only to us. We say that the casualties in Vietnam are not really terrible. We compare our casualties there with our highway fatalities (our automobiles are built to contain a considerable element of violence), but the Vietcong casualty figures are sweet to our ears. So far in 1965, U.S. and Vietnamese pilots have killed more than 15,000 Vietcong in air strikes alone. The kill ratio during the week of the Vantuong Peninsula battle was more than 12 to 1 in our favor.

We not only love violence but the more killing we can do, at a distance and with a minimum of risk, the better we like it. The tradition of violence is embedded in American history. But anyone who thinks that the violence of technological warfare does not feed back into the civilian population must think that babies are born without insemination.

The fact we must face is that a large part of the Negro population is without occupation, without status, without hope. If in a particular place like Watts these pariahs decided that "Whitey" could be made to listen to their "manifesto" only if they attacked the police and property, they may have been misguided but they were certainly not un-American. They were simply following the American pattern as laid down in war, labor disputes, race relations in the deep South, electronic entertainment, and much else separated from the more genteel aspects of American life. The ratio of their casualties was about the same as that in Vietnam, but they did a quarter of a billion dollars' worth of property damage and scared the country. It is the property damage that has attracted attention. In that respect the "manifesto" was successful. If it is not to be repeated, we shall have to understand that once again our own violence recoiled on us. If we want peace, whether at home or abroad, we shall have to do a great deal more than meet violence with violence.

Handcuffs on Foreign Policy

When responsible citizens offer cogent criticism of our role in Vietnam or other aspects of foreign policy, they are politely brushed off or, of late, accused of betraying the men at the fighting front. In contrast, the Johnson Administration is acutely sensitive to the political blackmail exercised by minor pressure groups. These sodalities exercise a significant veto power over U.S. foreign policy which the Administration suffers without audible protest and to the disadvantage of the country. Three instances may be cited.

1. In June, 1964, Moscow approved a consular treaty with the United States which had been under negotiation since 1959. Five years had been spent in bargaining and deliberation for a modest achievement, namely, setting up the ground rules for the conduct of consular relations, in anticipation of the reopening of consulates closed down since 1948. The proposed treaty is clearly in the American interest. Some 12,000 American tourists went to the USSR last year, compared with 1,079 Russians who came here. But the Administration simply sent the treaty up to the Senate where it languished for a year until last July 30, when the Foreign Relations Committee under Senator Fulbright held hearings and on August 3 reported the measure to the Senate, with only three Republicans and two Democrats opposed. But Senator Mansfield apparently will put the matter over until next year—an election year in which there will be little chance of ratification by the required two-thirds vote.

Why has the Administration been so dilatory? Partly because the Liberty Lobby, a small but noisy right-wing outfit, began to bombard Senators with mail and telephone calls, but mainly because J. Edgar Hoover opposed the treaty. The President was in favor, the State Department was in favor, the Foreign Relations Committee was in favor, but Mr. Hoover was opposed, and that was that.

2. The State Department suggested to the Firestone Tire & Rubber Company the building of a synthetic rubber plant for Rumania, which is showing Titoist tendencies and ogling the West. Again Mr. Fulbright was in favor, but Young Americans for Freedom began to scream, Goodyear saw a chance to sideswipe a competitor, and the project died.

3. Again, consider this year's big Soviet wheat purchase from Canada — $450 million — bringing this year's Soviet grain purchases in the West to $600 million, but none of it from us. In the meantime, we are sitting on a 900-million-bushel wheat inventory. In 1963 we were going to sell wheat to the Russians, and President Kennedy pronounced it in the national interest. Hoping to cajole George Meany, Mr. Kennedy included a "sweetener": 50 per cent of the wheat was to be carried in American bottoms. This imposed a surcharge of some 11½c a bushel, and killed off the deal. Canada got the business. American shipping interests, longshoremen and sailors missed out entirely.

The reasons for this chronic Presidential timidity are no doubt complex, but one stands out. Perhaps the most woeful result of the cold war has been the erosion of integrity, courage and dignity among seemingly powerful American businessmen and politicians, right up to the President. As soon as there is the least danger of the accusation of softness on communism being hurled at them, they act as if they had no power at all.

The Rim of Hell

If every American could be induced to read Robert Scheer's pamphlet, "How the United States Got Involved in Vietnam" (Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, Box 4068, Santa Barbara, Calif. 93103, sample copy free), the outlook for the future of mankind would be considerably less gloomy. Scheer shows how easy it is for a private pressure group to hoodwink most of the people of a technologically advanced, highly literate country like the United States and to impose a tyrannical regime on a small, backward, largely illiterate country like South Vietnam. All this was and is carried on under the cloak of godliness and patriotism, and ends up with the advanced country using its superior technology to devastate the small country and its neighbor to the north.

Scheer has interviewed many of the key participants in the Vietnam tragedy, including Edward Lansdale, the CIA operative and Air Force major general who is now taking a second try at persuading the Vietnamese peasantry that though Uncle Sam comes laden with napalm and high explosives, their welfare is close to his heart. The activities of William C. Bullitt, Cardinal Spellman, Joseph P. Kennedy, John F. Kennedy, Leo Cherne and a host of others are documented. Wesley Fishel, a young professor at the University of California at Los Angeles, was the first to promote Ngo Dinh Diem as the man to overturn the Geneva Agreements between the Viet Minh and the French on behalf of the Americans. He was joined by many liberals and ex-liberals. Justice William O. Douglas introduced Diem to Senators Mike Mansfield and John F. Kennedy, who were likewise impressed with his qualifications. Leo Cherne, active in the cold war as president of the International Rescue Committee, sent Joseph Buttinger, a former leader of the Social Democratic party in Austria, to set up a refugee office in South Vietnam. Lansdale introduced Buttinger to the Diem entourage in Saigon. President Eisenhower was reluctant to involve the United States deeply, but Sen. Joe McCarthy was on his flank and Cardinal Spellman, Joseph P. Kennedy, the Luce publications and a host of other influences were brought to bear on him. Soon the crusade against the Ho Chi Minh regime and the South Vietnamese peasants was in full career, although Eisenhower conceded that 80 per cent of the South Vietnamese would have voted for union with North Vietnam had the United States and Diem allowed the election agreed upon at Geneva to be held.

A bizarre item in the subsequent hostilities is the role of Michigan State University as a cover for the CIA and in the organization of a South Vietnamese government. Fishel had left UCLA for MSU, which thereupon became a power in both South Vietnamese and American politics. Fishel asserts that for months he was the only effective contact between Ambassador Lawton Collins and Diem. After two years Fishel "surfaced," in CIA terminology, and became head of the MSU program in Vietnam, which employed fifty-four professors and 200 Vietnamese assistants to organize a South Vietnamese FBI and perform other services for the freedom-loving people. The head of the MSU School of Police Administration trained Diem's palace guard, which was supplied with guns and ammunition from the U.S. Military Assistance Advisory Group. "Interviews with some members of the project," Scheer writes, "revealed that involvement in a high priority program gave them a heady feeling of glamour and prestige." And good jobs.

Diem received a tremendous build-up in the United States as the savior of Vietnam, but since his only domestic support came from his co-religionists and the mandarinate, he was finally thrown aside and assassinated. The subsequent series of pseudo-governments is recent history. The late Dr. Tom Dooley, whose role in these events has been celebrated in book and movie, unknowingly summed it up when he called the 17th Parallel "the rim of Hell," with "the demons of Communism stalking outside and holding the upper half of their country in their strangling grip." Hell now blankets both North and South Vietnam, and the end is not in sight.

Engineering Misdirected

Strong support for Seymour Melman's complaints about the misuse and exhaustion of national resources by the cold War (Our Depleted Society) may be found in an article by Dr. J. R. Pierce, of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, in the July 23 issue of Science. It is Dr. Pierce's contention that by the use of government funds we are alienating engineering education from the civilian economy.

Of the 20-odd billions going annually into research and development, two-thirds or more is supported by the federal government, and this huge expenditure is largely channeled into things like nuclear submarines, combat aircraft, radar and guidance, missiles, atomic explosives, and space travel. Of these outlays Pierce heartily approves, but what worries him is the effects on engineering education. Engineering research at educational institutions is supported by the government with an equally lopsided proportion. About 80 per cent of all such support comes from the government, and over 80 per cent of that originates in the Department of Defense and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The rest is accounted for in driblets, of which the only sizable ones come from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the National Science Foundation, and the Atomic Energy Commission. Only in chemical engineering does major support of research and development flow from other than governmental sources.

What effect does this funding have on the students and the profession? "Undergraduate engineering education," Pierce writes, "is a reflection of the ideas and attitudes of leaders in engineering education. These are men who have been leaders in university research and teaching. Their attitudes reflect the research they have done." Nowadays that research is predominantly centered in "mission-oriented" defense and space subjects. This bias, continually fed with federal money, filters down to the students, graduate and undergraduate alike, who are the future members of the profession.

Those graduates who go into industry are no longer content with the traditional responsibility of the engineer, which is to invent and design industrial equipment and consumer products inexpensive and efficient enough to find a market. Most of the highly talented graduates flock with their mission-oriented Ph.D. theses into glamorous and well-paying jobs in defense and the aerospace industry, while those who stay at the universities, with the same preoccupations and conditioning, prepare to raise another generation of engineers in their own image. In turn, these engineers will create a new technology as divorced from human needs as the present one.

The top leaders of engineering education—men on a par with the intellectual leaders in the law, medicine and other professions—are by no means oblivious to all this but, says Pierce, "they have been subjected to inexorable financial forces, and these forces have established a pattern which makes it difficult for the educators to follow the dictates of their own wisdom." At this rate, there will soon be little wisdom to draw on.

Addendum to 'WHY VIETNAM?'

A Basis for Negotiation Exists . . .

John Gittings

London

Speaking on July 28, President Johnson told his news conference that "Hanoi has set forth its own proposal. We are ready to discuss their proposals and our proposals and any proposals of any government whose people may be affected. . . ." This was in fact the first official recognition by the President or any of his spokesmen that the North Vietnamese Four Point Proposal for negotiations was even worth discussing—although it had been put forward by Premier Pham Van Dong as early as April 8. It had previously been given scant attention. Speaking at a teach-in at Oxford University on June 16, the British Foreign Secretary, Michael Stewart, had followed the American line in dismissing Hanoi's proposal as totally unacceptable, since it required that Americans should leave at once and that Communists and Communists alone should determine the future of Vietnam.

This is an inaccurate interpretation of the Four Point Proposal (which I shall detail later), as President Johnson presumably now recognizes. Failure to examine these proposals in detail has led to the belief that Hanoi is opposed to any kind of negotiations, except on the unrealistic precondition of prior American withdrawal from Vietnam. But what is really at issue is not the willingness to negotiate—both sides have said that they will — but the basis on which Hanoi is prepared to negotiate. A corollary to this lack of analysis of the Hanoi position is the widespread belief that the "Communist side," as Michael Stewart used the term at Oxford—North Vietnam, the National Liberation Front (NLF), China, and even the Soviet Union — is united in its attitude toward negotiations. The truth is that major differences exist between the Soviet Union and China on this question; even between the NLF and Hanoi there are noticeable variations in nuance.

Considerable efforts have been made to present the Soviet Union as being unwilling to shoulder its responsibilities as co-chairman of the 1954 Geneva Conference on Vietnam. These efforts have been particularly noticeable at

---

John Gittings, a research assistant at The Royal Institute of International Affairs, London, is currently working on a study of the Chinese Communist army.

the Foreign Office in London, where the British Government itself has been under pressure to assume those responsibilities as the second co-chairman, and to dissociate itself from American policy. But the record gives a very different picture.

It was in August, 1964, at the time of the Tonkin Gulf incident, that the Soviet Government under Mr. Khrushchev virtually washed its hands of Vietnam, and indicated as much to the then British Foreign Secretary Mr. Butler. But the new Soviet administration, headed by Mr. Kosygin, saw the dangers of this stand-off policy, both because it gave China a free hand in Southeast Asia and because it encouraged the United States to think that it could safely escalate the war in Vietnam. In November, 1964, Kosygin pledged Soviet support for Hanoi if the war was extended from the South, and on February 6, 1965—the day before such extension took place—he arrived in person in Hanoi at the invitation of the North Vietnamese Government.

The following day, speaking before a mass rally in Hanoi, Kosygin publicly proposed that the Geneva Conference should be reconvened. He said that the Soviet Union "supports the resolution of the conference of nonaligned countries in Cairo on the convocation of a new international conference on Indo-China with a view to the peaceful settlement of the questions which have arisen there."

According to private information, the same proposal had already been made on February 6 by the Soviet Ambassador in Peking to Foreign Minister Ch'en Yi, and on February 7 by the Ambassador to France in Paris.

This new initiative was overshadowed by the Vietcong attack on Pleiku and the instant American "retaliation" of the same day. British and American officials took no notice of Kosygin's remarks. In the official view of the British Foreign Office, "suggestions that a new Geneva conference should be convened are regarded as premature," there was "no purpose" in reconvening such a conference, nor was there "any enthusiasm" for cooperation with the Soviet Union (The Times and The Guardian, February 9, 1965).

Meanwhile, the French Foreign Minister, M. Peyrefitte, called on the Soviet Union and Great Britain to take the necessary steps to restart talks, and twice in the following week the Soviet Union was reported to have informed Britain that it wished to promote negotiations and to resume the co-chairmanship. But Britain supported, without reservation, the American view that negotiations could not take place unless—as Mr. Stewart put it—"the Vietcong should cease their activities," thus demanding what amounted to a unilateral cease-fire by the Vietcong. The French proposal met with an unenthusiastic reception in London. On February 20, Britain proposed to the Soviet Union a form of words to be circulated to the Geneva powers asking their views on the situation, but reportedly emphasized that "it would do nothing without the closest consultation with the United States."

In view of Britain's unquestioning alignment with the United States, the Soviet Union appears to have regarded Paris rather than London as the most fertile ground for discussions. On February 23, following talks between President de Gaulle and Mr. Vinogradov, it was made known that Russia and France had agreed to seek an international conference on Vietnam. It has been argued that their motives were disingenuous — that Russia simply wanted to embarrass the West, and that France was motivated by plain anti-Americanism. Yet it cannot be denied that France has consistently advocated negotiations since September, 1963, and that the Soviet Union was sticking its neck out—and inviting Chinese criticism — by its advocacy of a peaceful solution even after the bombing of the North had commenced. "It has become clear," wrote the diplomatic correspondent of the London Guardian on February 25, "that the Soviet Union has been taking the initiative over the calling of an international conference on Indo-China."

But it soon became apparent that the Soviet initiative had shot its bolt for a variety of reasons. Chief among these were the lack of British cooperation and the intensification of American bombing, which stiffened the resolve of both Hanoi and the NLF not to negotiate under duress. Their reluctance was made clear at the Indo-Chinese People's Conference, held in Cambodia, March 1-9, and attended by all the neutralist or Communist governments and parties of Indo-China. There a Cambodian proposal for a new conference on Vietnam, backed by the Soviet Union and supported by the nonaligned nations, was firmly rejected by Hanoi and the NLF.

Since then the Soviet Union has apparently refrained from further initiatives, although as late as June a Chinese statement accused Moscow of "trying to bring about peace negotiations, in a painstaking effort to find a way out for the U.S. aggressors," which suggests continued activity behind the scenes. Kosygin seemingly realizes that the decisions can only be taken in Vietnam and Washington, not in Moscow. Visiting London in late March, Gromyko again expressed willingness to act jointly with Britain as co-chairman, but expressed the pessimistic belief that the calling of a conference was a matter for the countries principally involved — North Vietnam and the United States. Three months later the same sense of impotence was reflected in Moscow's reply to the suggested "Commonwealth Mission." The Soviet Union, it said, was not "authorized" to enter into any discussions with regard to Vietnam.

One related initiative—for a conference on Cambodia, proposed by the Soviet Union on April 3—had also come unstuck. This was due partly to British delay in acting upon the proposal, and the clumsy admission by Gordon Walker on his mission to Southeast Asia that the conference would provide a backdoor approach to negotiations in Vietnam. This in turn aroused North Vietnamese suspicions and led to Cambodia's own rejection of the proposal.

At various times since 1962, North Vietnam and the NLF have expressed willingness to negotiate on the "neutralization" of South Vietnam. In effect, they were prepared to offer the U.S. a "way out," by which South Vietnam would be neutralized but would remain independent of the North for a period of time, although in the long run reunification would take place. In November, 1964, for instance, senior officials of the NLF told British reporter Dennis Bloodworth that they now accepted "a broad, largely non-Communist coalition government [which would] mean that outh Vietnam would remain a sep-rate state for several years to ome." Premier Pham Van Dong of North Vietnam told a British M.P., Villiam Warbey, at the beginning f this year, as reported by The uardian, February 9:

> We have no desire to rush political re-unification. We want the opening up of trade and communications between the North and South and the reunion of the divided families, but political re-unification will result from a slow process of rapprochement between our Government and the new democratic Government in Saigon. This is a matter we shall settle between ourselves, in our time, and without outside interference.

This relatively cautious and long-term approach is written into the manifesto of the NLF, which calls for the institution of a "largely liberal and democratic regime" and the election of a "new National Assembly through universal suffrage" (Article 2); for the "peaceful reunification by stages on the basis of negotiations," and the restoration of "commercial and cultural exchanges between the two zones" (Article 9). It reveals a sense of sober realism at the difficulties which any process of reunification is bound to encounter. Even following the bombing of North Vietnam, this long-term view of reunification has been reaffirmed by leaders of the NLF in, for example, the well-known interview of its Secretary-General, Huynh Tan Phat, with the French journalist Georges Chaffard (L'Express, April 25). There seems little doubt that if reunification ever did take place, it would do so along these lines, and that it would not assume the form of a simple North Vietnamese "take-over" of the South. It is believed that sections of the NLF itself would resist any attempt at annexation of the South by Hanoi.

But the question now is whether Hanoi and/or the NLF believe any longer that negotiation is a viable method of attaining their objective. The immediate effect of the bombing of the North was to stiffen the resolve of both, and to make them unwilling even to talk of negotiations. It was not until April 10 that the North Vietnamese National Assembly put forward what could be regarded as a realistic offer of negotiations—the Four Point Proposal which has been reiterated at regular intervals since then. This proposal enumerates the following four points, which it regards as the only proper basis for a political settlement: (1) . . . the U.S. Government must withdraw from South Vietnam all U.S. troops, military personnel. . . . (2) Pending the peaceful reunification of Vietnam, the military provisions of the 1954 Geneva Agreements must be strictly respected; the two zones must refrain from joining in any military alliances with foreign countries. . . . (3) The internal affairs must be settled by the South Vietnamese people themselves, in accordance with the program of the South Vietnam NLF, without any foreign interference. (4) The peaceful reunification is to be settled by the Vietnamese people in both zones, without any foreign interference.

"If this basis is recognized," the proposal concludes, "favorable conditions will be created for the peaceful settlement of the Vietnam problem, and it will be possible to consider the reconvening of an international conference along the pattern of the 1954 Geneva Conference on Vietnam." In plain language, what does this mean? The essential points in the North Vietnamese position, as outlined in this proposal and in subsequent statements, are as follows:

- The eventual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam has to be recognized as the basis of a settlement; it does not have to be carried out before negotiations can begin. It has been made quite clear that the method of withdrawal is negotiable, but that the principle must be accepted in advance. For example, in an article by General Nguyen Van Vinh, broadcast by Hanoi radio on July 26, it was stated that:

> For a political solution, and to achieve true peace in South Vietnam, the U.S. imperialists must first of all agree to the withdrawal of their forces. Concerning the way of conducting this withdrawal, the imperialist side has many experiences: the French have withdrawn from Indo-China and Algeria, and the Americans have withdrawn from Laos and other areas in the world.

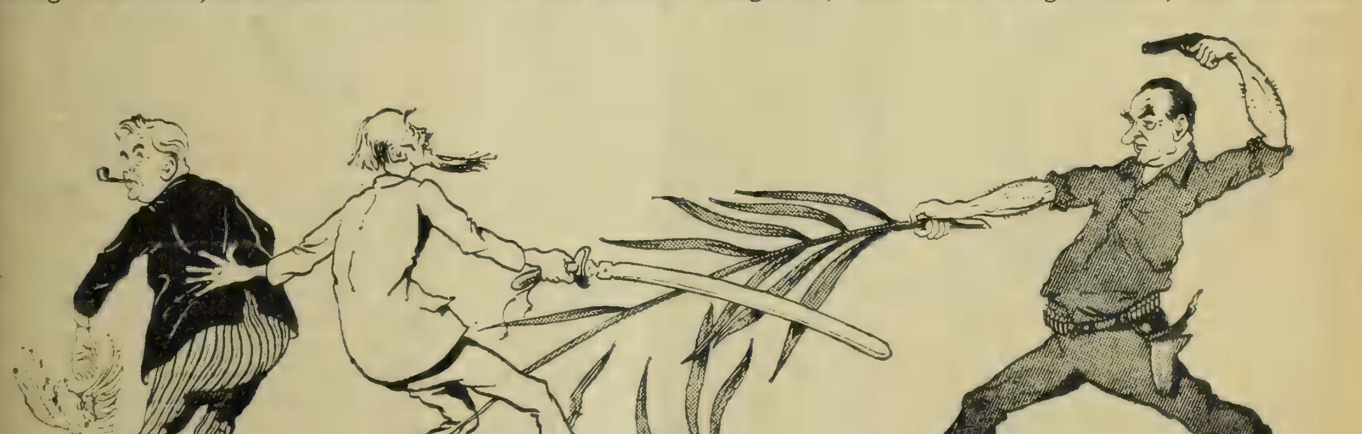
- Hanoi will not accept any negotiated settlement which perpetuates the division of Vietnam, or otherwise seeks to dilute the full force of the Geneva Agreements. The purpose of negotiations is simply to insure that those agreements are fully carried out. North Vietnam has repeatedly pledged its support for the agreements, and the NLF



Winters, Gazet van Antwerpen: Ben Roth Agency

American Peace Offensive

wishes to see them implemented "in accordance with the spirit and letter of an international agreement of full legality" (statement of March 22). They presumably continue to accept the authority of the International Control Commission in any settlement, although this remains to be clarified.

◖ Hanoi's precondition for negotiations is that the United States should publicly "recognize" that the object of such negotiations should be the implementation of the Geneva Agreements, restoring the territorial integrity and unity of Vietnam. The United States is also required to "recognize" that the NLF program is the right way to set about political reform in South Vietnam. What is then negotiable, it is implied, is the way and the pace and the guarantees by and with which reunification will be carried out.

It can be argued that this is a totally unacceptable proposal. Nevertheless, from Hanoi's point of view, the United States has already moved a long way toward it and could move even further. In February, Johnson would only negotiate after prior withdrawal by the Vietcong; in April, only with Hanoi and for the sole purpose of securing an "independent South Vietnam"; by June-July, at least some lip service was paid in Washington to the principle of reunification, and to the NLF's right to participate in negotiations. The longer we hang on, the argument in Hanoi might run, the further Johnson will move toward the realization that the only face-saving way out for America is to beat a decent retreat through negotiations which will lead to reunification and total American withdrawal. As the article quoted above suggested by way of sweetening the pill:

> The Americans also want to know what they will obtain in return for this withdrawal. Certainly, they will get something. They will, in return, obtain peace, friendship, honor for the U.S.A., and benefit for the American people's interests and lives.

But does the NLF see eye to eye with Hanoi on the question of negotiations? Its five-point stand as set out in the March 22 statement differs from Hanoi's Four Point Proposal in three respects: (1) It lays greater stress on the role of the NLF as the "only genuine representative of the 14 million South Vietnamese people." (2) It employs more hostile and belligerent language. (3) It appears to make the actual physical withdrawal of the U.S. from South Vietnam a precondition for negotiations—a demand so unrealistic as to amount, in effect, to a rejection of negotiations.

This is another of those occasions where the NLF speaks with a voice different from that of Hanoi. Even if the difference is not particularly marked, it should give food for thought to those who believe that the NLF is merely a Hanoi puppet. It is partly explicable by the simple fact that those who actually engaged in the field — i.e., the Vietcong—have even less reason to take American offers of negotiations seriously, and are reluctant to weaken morale among their own supporters by making the slightest conciliatory gesture. In addition, there have been occasional hints of a certain amount of disillusion within the NLF toward Hanoi. Some NLF leaders may well feel that negotiations would give North Vietnam a greater say in the future of the South than they themselves could win on the battlefield. Most important of all, until the NLF is recognized in its own right as a major participant in any negotiations, it obviously will not reveal its hand publicly.

In private, as usual, the NLF attitude is slightly more conciliatory. On the major point of American withdrawal, its president, Nguyen Huu Tho, told one journalist that "withdrawal of all American troops with all their arms and equipment" need only be the "basis of any eventual agreement" (Sunday Times, June 27). Both he and the Secretary-General, Huynh Tan Phat (in his interview with Georges Chaffard), have defined the kind of negotiations which they would accept. Such negotiations should be primarily an internal affair among all the Vietnamese parties. The role of the foreign powers should be limited to making proposals, ratifying the agreements reached, and providing guarantees for their execution. What the NLF rejects absolutely is the idea that any foreign power should have a decisive say in the internal affairs of Vietnam.

The attitude of the Chinese toward negotiations accords more closely with that of the NLF than of North Vietnam. Prior U.S. withdrawal is an absolute precondition, all offers of mediation are imperialist or revisionist hoaxes, etc. This strong propaganda line is reinforced by three considerations: First, there is the genuine belief, based on the Chinese Communist party's own revolutionary experience, that a people's war can be won against superior odds, and that offers of negotiation are meaningless. Second, the fact that the Soviet Union is in favor of negotiations in itself compels the Chinese, in their present implacable mood toward "modern revisionism," to be against. Third, China regards Vietnam as a test case in the struggle against American imperialism (just as America believes the reverse). Opposition to American aggression in Vietnam is the "spearhead" of a world-wide frontal attack on the enemy, and no weakness must be shown.

But as in the case of the NLF, the real Chinese position is undoubtedly more complex, and is explained unofficially in terms which could be paraphrased in the following way: In the present tense situation, decisions must be left entirely to the people on the spot — the Vietcong. Even if they are making mistakes, we must be scrupulously careful not to diverge publicly from them—unlike the Soviet Union, which has blatantly weakened solidarity with the Vietcong by its so-called "peace initiatives."

But we Chinese reserve our position on negotiations; we don't reject them out of hand if circumstances change. For instance, we have not yet given a reply—affirmative or negative — to the Soviet proposal of last February. On the question of American withdrawal, we would refer you to Chairman Mao's interview with Edgar Snow early this year, in which the Chairman said that U.S. withdrawal after a conference was one of several possibilities. [Interview published by the Sunday Times, February 14.] If a conference does eventually take place with the full participation and concurrence of the NLF, of course we shall be there. But it is up to them to decide.

To conclude, "the Communist side" does not present a totally united front on the desirability of negotiations. This is the first myth which needs to be exploded among a major part of Western political and press opinion. Further, Hanoi is on open record as accepting the principle of a negotiated solution—China and the NLF accept it but with more ambiguity. What is at issue is not whether negotiations should take place but what the basis of such negotiations should be. Here lies the crux of the difference between America on the one hand and North Vietnam and the NLF on the other. The latter will negotiate only on ways and means of implementing the 1954 Geneva Agreements, and would prefer to fight on rather than accept any dilution of those agreements. America, however, has refused to endorse them from 1954 until very recently. The Vietnamese suspect that despite recent statements, America's policy has not undergone any genuine change, and that talk of "reunification" and "respecting the Geneva Agreements" by Mr. Rusk is outweighed by talk of "maintaining an independent South Vietnam" by Mr. McNamara. It will take a lot to convince them otherwise. From their point of view, they accepted one compromise solution in negotiations at Geneva in 1954, and were subsequently let down; they will not accept another compromise. As the North Vietnamese delegation to the Helsinki Peace Congress argued at a meeting with the British contingent (Peace News, August 13):

> On the question of negotiations, we think we already have negotiated and have the basis for the solution of the problem. The Geneva Agreements recognize the independence, sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Vietnam. It was not easy to get these agreements—they took a lot of negotiating. Now it is said we should negotiate again. For what? Shall we negotiate for a solution where Vietnam is not independent and not unified? No. Nor shall we negotiate for the perpetuation of division of our country.

Like almost every other facet of the Vietnam situation since 1954, the problem of negotiations can be reduced to the following question: Do we accept the reunification of Vietnam on the terms of the Geneva Agreements? If the answer is no, then it is futile even to offer negotiations to Hanoi and the NLF, and there is little alternative but to fight on. If the answer is yes, then in effect we have accepted their "basis" for negotiation. However much Western liberal opinion may dislike it, there is no middle way between these two choices.

The Shadow Presidency

. . . James MacGregor Burns

People were freely predicting at the time of Lyndon Johnson's inaugural in January, 1965, that the nation was headed for a modern era of good feelings. The President himself had said after his election that the country had reached a new "consensus on national purpose and policy." He was quite right—the nation had indeed reached a consensus over the goals of freedom and equality. But these are not the only problems that occupy men, and history warned that eras of apparent good feelings could conceal heats and ferments that would erupt in turbulence and strife years later.

And an unblinking look at the world and the nation in the mid-sixties discloses a profusion of interlaced problems, any one cluster of which could occupy a people's energies: at home the problems of rapidly changing group and class and generational relationships, education, urban disorder, mounting crime rates, social anomie and alienation, automation, political apathy, along with the more old-fashioned issues such as transportation, farm subsidies, labor-management relations, tax reform, monopoly and administered prices, medical care; and abroad, nuclear proliferation, the continuing and in many areas deepening poverty of tens of millions, the population explosion, the disruption of old rural cultures and the flood of people into the restless cities, the fragmentization of Africa, the social unrest of Latin America, Communist expansion in Asia, along with the week-to-week "little" crises, any one of which could explode into a major one.

It is impossible in the mid-sixties to predict in what forms these problems will emerge with the passage of time. One might speculate, though, that many of the most crucial domestic problems will revolve around certain old but still compelling value questions. Given the trends in the nation that one can predict with the greatest certainty—huge population increases in the urban and suburban areas, accelerated social mobility, a constantly enlarging and increasingly homogenized middle-class population, a decline in ethnic solidarity and variety—one might guess that once the old problems of equality and freedom have been subdued, sharper questions will emerge over the possibilities of individuality and privacy in a mass culture. If the past century has seen the early tension and later partial reconciliation of values of liberty and equality, we may be at the threshold of an age increasingly preoccupied with the relation of liberty and fraternity, of privacy and community, of the individual and the group. If in past years we have been concerned with mainly quantitative problems—the amount of goods and services produced and how they were distributed—we may be more occupied in the future with the quality of American life in a great, affluent, complacent, and perhaps mediocre society.

The quality of American life—this is not a new phrase nor a new political issue. It is older than Jefferson's dreams and as young as the Great Society. No one has defined the hope and the promise better than President Johnson. In May of 1964 he proclaimed at the University of Michigan:

> The Great Society is a place where

James MacGregor Burns, chairman of the Political Science Department at Williams College, is the author most recently of The Deadlock of Democracy: Four Party Politics in America (Prentice-Hall).

every child can find knowledge to enrich his mind and enlarge his talents. It is a place where leisure is a welcome chance to build and reflect, not a feared cause of boredom and restlessness. It is a place where the city of man serves not only the needs of the body and the demands of commerce but the desire for beauty and the hunger for community.

It is a place where man can renew contact with nature. It is a place which honors creation for its own sake and for what it adds to the understanding of the race. It is a place where men are more concerned with the quality of their goals than the quantity of their goods. But most of all, the Great Society is not a safe harbor, a resting place, a final objective, a finished work. It is a challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor.

The crux of the problem is whether a system of Presidential government so perfectly adapted to, and so largely facilitative of, quantitative liberalism—that is, of the augmentation and fairer distribution of goods—can redefine its purpose and shift its strategy in order to embrace new values with their implications for changes in means and instrumental goals. Such a shift calls for much more than making the White House into a show place of the arts, or awarding medals to heroes of culture, or bestowing Presidential recognition on private cultural enterprises. It means a concerted and sustained and expensive effort to impart values like those of Johnson to the barren lives of millions of Americans, middle class as well as deprived. It means diverting the kind of resources into cultural, recreational and educational activities that we have in the past poured into economic recovery, or even into national defense. And such an effort might be controversial and even unpopular. Many Americans would oppose it and deride it; by its very nature such an effort would bring foolish blunders and mishaps that could be easily caricatured; and certain ventures—perhaps an effort to improve the quality of commercial radio and television—could precipitate clashes with powerful interests.

Above all, the shift from the pursuit of quantitative to qualitative goals would call for comprehensive, sustained and broadly unified policies—in short, for planning. Effective planning is impossible except in the context of at least a rough ordering of values, instrumental goals and means. It will be as important to have clearly thought out, long-range priorities in this respect as it would be in planning increased productivity. Winston Churchill once said that "those who are possessed of a definite body of doctrine and of deeply rooted convictions upon it will be in a much better position to deal with the shifts and surprises of daily affairs than those who are merely taking short views, and indulging their natural impulses as they are evoked by what they read from day to day." Considering the intractable nature of the many human problems implicit in the quest for a qualitatively great society, Churchill's remarks are as relevant to a cultural strategy as to a foreign or economic.

Presidential government is a superb planning institution. The President has the attention of the country, the administrative tools, the command of information, and the fiscal resources that are necessary for intelligent planning, and he is gaining the institutional power that will make such planning operational. Better than any other human instrumentality he can order the relations of his ends and means, alter existing institutions and procedures or create new ones, calculate the consequences of different policies, experiment with various methods, control the timing of action, anticipate the reactions of affected interests, and conciliate them or at least mediate among them. If, as Hubert Humphrey has said, we need not a planned society but a continuously planning society, the Presidency provides strong and versatile tools for that purpose.

Still, we must acknowledge that the Presidency has become an effective planning agency for reasons of chance as well as volition. In this century the Presidency has been the center of the conflict between labor and capital and later between segregationists and civil rights forces; it has steeled its will and its ideology in the struggles against Nazi tyranny and Communist expansion. After a century of planless growth the Presidency found its place as a key part of the American system of ends and means. The question is whether Presidential government can detach itself enough from set ideas and existing institutions and old ways to embrace new goals. With leadership, to quote Philip Selznick, "the problem is always to choose key values and to create a social structure that embodies them. The task of building values into social structure is not necessarily consistent, especially in early stages, with rules of administration based on economic premises. Only after key choices have been made and related policies firmly established can criteria of efficient administration play a significant role. Even then, the smooth-running machine must accept disturbance when critical problems of adaptation and change arise."

To define new goals, to fashion new institutions to realize those goals, to avoid both utopianism and opportunism, to build popular support without improper manipulation, to allow for flexibility of means and redefinition of ends, and always to elevate purpose over technique—all this is the test of creative leadership. It will be the test of Presidential government in the years ahead. To define leadership in this way is to see the importance of a number of proposals that have been made to strengthen the Presidency and hence to enable the President to reshape institutions and processes: four-year terms for Representatives (to bring Presidential and Congressional constituencies into closer correspondence); the granting of full power to the President to control executive department organization; finding means of attracting the highest talent to the executive department, especially to its major staff positions; efforts to bring into the policy-making process intellectuals with creative and innovative gifts; providing the President with greater discretionary power over fiscal policy, including the item veto and the granting of authority to change tax rates within certain limits; and above all, the further strengthening of the elected leadership of Congress so that it can act more quickly and comprehensively in harmony with the President. But the greatest need of Presidential government does not lie in this kind of reform. We can expect many of these changes to take place in any event as the Presidency becomes increasingly institutionalized. Indeed, some are already taking place, in substance if not in form. Some of them at best will simply speed up transitions that already are under way—for example, greater Presiential control over fiscal policy.

The greatest need of the Presi- ency in the years to come will e an opposition that challenges residential values, Presidential nethods, Presidential institutions, hat is eager to take power and to resent its own definition of the ational purpose.

Of all the vital elements of Amer- can democratic government the ational opposition is the most dis- rganized, fragmented and ineffec- ive. As a responsible opposition to he President, Congress is an almost total failure. Hostile Senators nd Representatives bombard the White House from all directions. Typically they fail to advance alternative proposals and hence they do not provide the voters with an idea as to how the opposition would govern if it got the chance. The Congressmen usually prefer to play the game of bargain and even resort to various forms of genteel blackmail with the President rather than criticize forthrightly and dramatically. No wonder that Presidents in recent years have been far more sensitive to criticism in the press than on Capitol Hill.

Good reasons exist for the debility of the opposition. In part it is a simple reflection of the power of Presidential government. "The aggrandizement of the President, especially by the electronic media," as V. O. Key, Jr., has said, "has made the dispersed minority leadership one of low public visibility." The main difficulty is the bifurcation of the opposition into the Presidential and Congressional parties. Once the Presidential candidate—the Presidential party's leader—has made his strenuous campaign and lost, he then becomes "titular" leader of the whole party. This is a polite term for being shelved or even repudiated. For once the campaign is lost, the Congressional party leaders try to assume the opposition role. They hold formal and visible positions from which to conduct the attack, while the titular leader usually has no formal position to fall back on, as in the cases of Stevenson in 1956, Nixon in 1960 and Goldwater in 1964. But the Congressional party cannot carry the burden of militant leadership, because of its own internal divisions, its separation between the House and the Senate, and its lack of institutional structure (as compared with the Shadow Cabinet in Great Britain). If the opposition party has lost the Presidency but still controls one or both branches of Congress, as in the case of the Democrats after 1956, it lacks the advantage of being completely in the opposition; it suffers from having a modicum of power and responsibility. If the opposition party lacks control of Congress as well as of the White House, it has a poor forum from which to appeal to the public and virtually no machinery to support a focused and sustained attack on the government.

Schwering

The opposition's impotence becomes more serious as Presidential government becomes more powerful. No matter how benign a government may be, it will be tempted to manipulate public opinion, to try to dominate the flow of opinion, to cover up mistakes, and to cast doubt on the patriotism or at least the honesty of outside critics. The more that government represents a consensus, or claims to, the more tempted it may be to succumb to some of these tendencies. Above all a consensus government may become flabby and complacent and lose the cutting edge of energy, initiative and innovation. The very tendencies toward excessive concern with technique that we noted above can cause a government to lose direction and momentum unless the opposition holds it to its promises and threatens to oust it from power.

The problem is especially acute in the United States because of the lack of well-organized and programmatic parties. This is less of a problem for the President because, as we have seen, he has built up his own Presidential party to provide him with an electoral footing and other political resources. The opposition Presidential party, lacking a President and having to make do with a titular leader, is not anchored in an organized mass following and a militant cadre. It must improvise—and that in turn encourages a similar opportunism and absence of direction in the Presidential establishment.

Another great need of the American Presidency is a potent and competitive shadow Presidency. At the very least the opposition party should establish some kind of collective leadership, modeled perhaps after the Democratic Advisory Council of the 1950s, to give the Presidential party a strong voice. More than this, it should experiment with an annual or biennial convention or conference both to choose a top leader and to renovate its program. The failure of the opposition to take this primitive step is not due to any innate difficulty but mainly to the divergent constituencies and institutional jealousies of the Congressional party, which wants to dominate the opposition role even though it fills that role so feebly. Ideally there would be an annual convention, a dependable system for collecting adequate funds, a large national staff with regional and state units under it, an effective propaganda apparatus, and talented, articulate and highly visible leadership. Whatever the exact form, it is clear that the opposition party today has a rare opportunity to exercise Jeffersonian leadership — that is, to build a new political institution.

Even more important, the opposition party must display creative leadership in defining its own version of the national purpose. It is not for outsiders to lecture the opposition party as to the goals it might propose, but one must note the great opportunity that may lie before it. If Presidential government as shaped by liberals for egalitarian purposes cannot shift its own strategy toward qualitative goals, if Presidential government under Democratic Party leadership may be hobbled by its own successes, then the opposition could seize the initiative. American conservatives have long been interested in the now intensifying problems of individuality and community, identity and alienation, liberty and fraternity, innovation and tradition, equality and hierarchy. As Clinton Rossiter has argued, they have not blinked at the hard questions about man in society. And it was under Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt, both Republicans, that the nation first addressed itself most directly to problems of the quality of American life. In executing one of the oldest of political and military strategies —shifting the grounds of the combat—modern conservatives can come to grips with liberal democracy and its Presidential establishment.

Perhaps all this is unnecessary—perhaps we can give in to the acknowledged rewards and virtues of Presidential government, without worrying much about competition, criticism, alternatives and the tasks of an opposition. But a great people will not be content long to float in such a slack tide. At the conclusion of his study of a group of working men in an Eastern city—a group that was not technically a cross section of a larger population but may be highly indicative of social trend —Robert Lane wrote: "The man o Eastport has no cathedral buildin in his air space to raise his sens of importance and mission; he i not engaged anywhere in a struggl against want or fear or squalor i such a way as to engage his min and take him out of himself; he i not, like the Italian Fascists wh were his uncles, rebuilding a glori ous Roman history; manifest des tiny, the conquering of a continent are parts of a history not quite hi own, and anyway they refer t completed tasks. What shall he d that will call out the greatness i him? Against the background of a great purpose, he might measure th political system and say whether o not it is just. But he has no way t conjure up such a vision, and henc no way to take the measure of his society."

Poland's Perennial Problem . . . Carey McWilliams

Warsaw

That age-old irritant, "the Polish Problem," which Briand called "le rheumatisme de l'Europe," seems to have been finally eliminated. The essence of the problem was that Poland had no natural borders except in the north, the Baltic, and the South, the Carpathians. Caught up for centuries in East-West, largely German-Russian, power politics, Poland's geographic position invited the partitions, risings and suppressions which were recurrent themes in its tragic prewar history. Historically the Poles sought to play one power against the other, but this seldom resulted in a policy of "neutrality"; what the Poles most often succeeded in doing was to antagonize both Germany and Russia. Poland, as John W. Wheeler-Bennett once said, was "a canary who has persistently endeavored to swallow two cats."

In this sense, "the Polish Problem" has ceased to exist—for the foreseeable future. Circumstances have aligned Poland with the Soviet Union in such a way that it would not want to be "neutral" if this were possible. It is not merely that the "recovered" or former German territories have been valuable acquisitions but that the Soviet Union has the same stake in holding the present Oder-Neisse line as do the Poles. Present-day Poland, moreover, is ethnically more homogeneous, and makes more sense geographically, than did the Poland of the inter-war period. Also, 50 per cent of the population now living in the former German territories was born there. But the main reason for feeling that "the Polish Problem" has been solved is the permanent alienation of Polish opinion which German cruelty achieved in World War II.

Nearly every Polish family has good reason to remember German inhumanity. Two generations of Poles would have to die before these memories would dim perceptibly. Today it is not so much a question of active enmity as of profound distrust. The behavior of the East Germans, ideological blood brothers, merely confirms Polish attitudes. The East Germans, who can now visit Poland on border-crossing cards, are regarded as arrogant and hypocritical. The East Germans profess, for example, a vast lack of interest in visiting concentration camp sites and memorials; their position is that they have no responsibility for what happened there and no desire to be reminded of it. Nor are the West Germans more tactful. When the Krupp interests recently proposed the construction of industrial plants in Poland on a partnership basis, the Poles made careful note of the fact that Krupp had sited the proposed plants in the former German territories.

But if World War II liquidated "the Polish Problem," it left Poland with its historic problem—peasant agriculture. As late as 1921, Poland had roughly the same percentage of its population dependent on agriculture as England had in the late 17th century — about seventy out of every 100. The value of output per farm was about half as much as in West European countries, and a huge surplus labor force was to be found in rural areas. Virtually nothing was done betwen World War I and World War II to break the dominance of peasant farming; the level of industrialization on the eve of World War II was lower than in Spain, Hungary and Italy. The need to industrialize was widely acknowledged but there were strong pressures against it. Large landholders were not favorable, and peasant political leadership in Poland as elsewhere tended to be demagogic and reactionary. Even those who sought to press industrialization did so in terms of recommendations, usually prepared by French or American advisers, that failed to consider the extent to which peasant agriculture handicapped any effort to modernize the Polish economy.

As Samuel L. Sharp has pointed ut, pre-World War II Poland was a “capitalist” country without capital: “The poverty of the peasant masses prevented the development of an internal market for industrial goods.” In 1922, the 64 per cent of the population still dependent on agriculture consumed only 47 per cent of the national income, mostly in the form of their own retained production and “only 12 per cent in the form of goods purchased on the market.” France, of course, had an interest in propping up Pilsudski’s Poland as a buffer state, but neither French nor West European industrialists generally were eager to further the industrialization of Poland. The little capital Poland managed to secure from the West, obtained at excessively high interest rates, was improvidently invested. In a word, prewar Poland displayed the characteristic feature of an economically underdeveloped country, namely, a striking discrepancy between available capital and existing manpower: “insufficient capital endowment for the productive and efficient use of the labor force” (Jozef Pajestka).

Restructuring such an economy is not an easy task, particularly in a war-ravaged land. It is not surprising, therefore, that special circumstances as much as ideology have dictated the form the effort has taken. Since native capital was inadequate, and foreign funds were not available, Poland had to tap what its economists call “the reserves of backwardness” — that is, unused manpower — in order to launch an investment program. In effect, its reserves of manpower had to be capitalized. One such device was to require compulsory deliveries of certain farm products at prices lower than those obtainable on the free market (this was also, of course, a device to control prices for these products). Obligatory deliveries were in addition to normal land taxes, which were graduated in relation to size of farming unit, different kinds of soils, amount of arable land, and other factors. The difference between the value of forced deliveries and the market price constituted a sizable fund which was used to press industrialization.

For the time being, the modernization of agriculture had to be deferred; industrialization offered better immediate prospects for putting large numbers of unemployed to work with the minimum delay. To this end, a policy of maximum employment was adopted based on the fullest utilization of existing industrial plants which, in the interwar years, had never been operated at full capacity. By comparison with the prewar period, employment outside of agriculture rose in the postwar period by over 4 million (in spite of lower population figures). The reconstruction of the economy from losses suffered during the war was fairly quickly achieved; by 1949, Polish industrial production surpassed the prewar level by 63 per cent. Postwar construction needs were, of course, enormous; the reconstruction of Warsaw alone took about 10 per cent of the national investment while it was under way. Here again policy stressed the importance of putting as many people to work as quickly as possible. Construction work was often carried out with the use of simple techniques and with no major supplies of equipment and machinery. The big construction program was, in turn, a factor in stimulating the demand for industrial goods and industrial investment. In industry, construction and government, certain categories of normally high wages were kept at an arbitrarily low level. The policy of maximum employment stepped up the demand for agricultural products and thereby tapped reserves of “hidden” peasant manpower on the farms. It also drew surplus farm manpower to the cities. The agricultural population declined from 60 per cent before the war to 47 per cent in 1950, then to 38 per cent in 1960. Western critics would say that such policies amounted to “sweating the capital out of the peasants and workers,” but a nation without capital, faced wth an imperative need to industrialize, has got to get the capital from some source.

To carry out such drastic policies in an economy as war-ravaged and backward as Poland’s was in 1945, required tight controls, notably over wage and price policies. But the extent of the debacle facilitated the imposition of these controls. In Poland today, foreign trade is rigidly controlled by the state. The entire wholesale and over 90 per cent of retail trade is handled by state firms or cooperatives. Over 93 per cent of all those working outside agriculture are employed in the nationalized sector of the economy.

Only in agriculture does private ownership of the means of production prevail, and even here the state exercises strong indirect controls. There is, as might be expected, the usual bureaucratic top-heaviness and inefficiency. The fact, too, that state socialism was imposed in Poland — that it came in the wake of wartime collapse and occupation— creates an odd impression at times, as though large sections of the population had never been directly involved in the process of social revolution. An economically underdeveloped country, particularly in the circumstances that Poland faced after the war, has great need for favorable foreign trade balances but few means of acquiring them. Polish ham is a fine product but the market is limited. Breaking into competitive West European markets is enormously difficult. Then, too, Poland has a shortage of raw materials. In fact all the East European countries face this same problem, a circumstance that minimizes inter-bloc trade and makes these countries competitors for inadequate supplies of Russian raw materials. To develop raw-material sources requires large capital expenditures and takes time. Another factor limiting inter-bloc trade is that the member states are all strongly protectionist (they have to be), so that there is not too much that they can do in the way of mutual aid, except in technological exchange and a few other fields.

The ideological blueprint for reconstruction called, of course, for the collectivization of peasant holdings. But Poland was in no position to press collectivization. The Church was one block but of greater importance was the fact that not enough alternative jobs were available to absorb the manpower that would be displaced. Peasant farmers are at least self-supporting. By deferring plans for collectivization, which the regime was forced to do, migration to the cities was slowed down while new job opportunities were being created. Nor was there much point in attempting to collectivize peasant holdings when the means to mechanize agriculture were not available, with the result that today 87 per cent of Polish agriculture is still in the private sector. State farms account for 12 per cent and cooperatives for 1 per cent. Most of the state farms are in the western or “recovered” territories; here it was easy to collectivize farms and, in this area also, farm units were larger to begin with. The state farms are primarily used as experimental farms, to supply seed and breed livestock for the peasant farms. Most of the privately owned farms are very small holdings of 5 to 7 hectares; 50 hectares is the maximum for a single holding. Something like 50 per cent of the peasants live in villages. Today 78 per cent of the villages have electricity, which is also available in about 74 per cent of the isolated farmsteads. Quite a number of peasants—say 10 per cent—work part time in factories or for the government, and a large number of holdings are really no more than rural residences for urban workers.

Until about 1955, the regime used the device of compulsory deliveries as a means by which it hoped to force peasants into cooperatives or state farms. But with characteristic stubbornness, the peasant wouldn't be squeezed; he simply clamped down on production. Without increased capital investment in agriculture—which the regime was not prepared to make at the time—the only way to step up agricultural production was to relax controls. Once compulsory deliveries were cut back, those mysterious "hidden" reserves of the peasant were promptly tapped. For a period of four or five years production steadily increased, but it has now begun to taper off. The Polish planners I interviewed are convinced that if further gains are to be achieved, substantial investment funds must now be channeled into agriculture. A big nitrogen plant is being constructed, which will increase the amount of available fertilizer; Polish farms should be receiving three or four times more fertilizer than at present. Investment is needed also to develop better seed and livestock, for storage facilities and drainage projects, for pesticides, for mechanization, etc.

Initially the regime set out to stimulate agricultural production in areas which promised the largest immediate results. For example, pig production was encouraged. Polish peasants know how to raise pigs, Polish rye is excellent pig fodder, and the life cycle of the animal is short. Pig production also yielded an export item for which there was a good if limited market. But soon the Poles found themselves in a bind. Polish soils are thin and mediocre, and pig manure is not a satisfactory fertilizer. Cow manure is better, and cattle products, milk and beef, offer a better market potential. However, cattle require grain, and Poland is short of grains. In addition, Poland has more horses than the United States and horses consume grain. If Poland could afford a variety of special-purpose tractors, it might be possible to decrease the dependence on horses, but the available types are less versatile on peasant holdings than horses.

Moreover, Polish peasants have a special fondness for horses which are, in their eyes, status symbols. In cities such as Warsaw and Krakow, a familiar sight is the V-shaped shallow peasant cart, drawn by one horse, used to transport building materials, rubbish, farm produce, almost anything. The peasant, wearing a cap, squats in the V-shaped trough, flecking the horse with a whip and cursing him fondly. The horse trots along on one side of a long, often very crudely fashioned wagon pole. Uniformly the horses are well kept and exhibit the marks of good breeding; many seem to have been bred for more elegant uses than those to which they are put. Surplus American grains were a great aid to the Poles for a time but, unfortunately, Poland has little to offer us that we want or need by way of exchange for grain. Recently it has been possible to buy grains on somewhat more favorable terms from France and Mexico, but the problem remains.

The main device used to channel investment into agriculture is the Agricultural Development Fund. Previously the total value of the difference between obligatory deliveries of meat and grain was simply added to the general social accumulation. Now it is returned to the peasants, not on an individual basis but as a village investment fund which is administered, subject to firm guidelines, by the local Agriculture Circle. Such funds can be spent only for the purchase of the means of production (about 75 per cent is spent for mechanization) and peasants must pay a portion of the purchase price. The equipment, of course, is in charge of the local Agriculture Circle. Compulsory deliveries—long a bone of contention—were being gradually eliminated, but the curtailment has been checked for the time being, in an effort to increase capital investment in agriculture. Today the price difference with which the accounts of some 38,000 Polish villages are credited each year amounts to approximately 3,500 million zlotys (24 to the dollar). This is about as much as the taxes paid by farmers.

Admittedly, peasant holdings are too small to be economically efficient. But consolidation is slowly taking place by a process of "natural elimination." The son of a peasant couple goes to the city to take a factory job. For a time the couple can carry on alone but as they grow older — and eventually die — the holding is usually consolidated with some larger unit (much the same process is at work in our own Middle West). In some areas of Poland there is still a large pool of unemployed manpower in rural areas; in her areas there are actual man- wer shortages. One of the prob- ns is the immobility of peasant bor; ties to village and family are rong, and peasants do not like to ove. With a population of around million, the Poles do not have a rmal population policy; population essure is not regarded as exces- ve. The population profile shows rtain distortions: for example, a g increase in young workers for hom jobs must be found in ever- creasing volume. If one takes into nsideration families for whom griculture is a supplementary urce of income, then about 50 per ent of the population is still rural —a high percentage. But only 38 er cent are directly dependent on griculture for a livelihood—a sig- ificant drop compared to prewar igures.

Progressive taxation is used to iscourage capitalist tendencies in griculture; the percentage of farm- rs formerly in the kulak class— hose who employed permanent arm laborers—has dropped signifi- antly. Today the rural population ivides—depending on the region— nto three classes: medium farmers the real peasant-type holding), rom 45 to 62 per cent; peasant aborers, from 47 to 24 per cent; nd the remainder, composed of inhabitants of rural areas whose occupation is nonagricultural — old-age pensioners, part-time factory workers, et al.—from 6 to 20 per cent (Social and Political Transformations in Poland, edited by Dr. Stanislaw Ehrlich, Warsaw, 1964, p. 83).

Polish agricultural planners and economists are quite specific on the point that town-and-country, urban-rural relations are with them the subject of constant investigation and an ongoing, unresolved theoretical debate. With automation on the increase, it may well be that there is more of a future for the small holding, in one form or another, than might have been thought possible some years ago. Jerzy Tepicht, writing in the volume cited, puts the problem this way: "An obstacle in agricultural growth is not only—and now not even primarily—the small size of the farms but their social peasant character. By peasant character we mean a universal one (many crops and many kinds of livestock on a small farm) based on traditional means of production and not counted (unpaid) family labor, plus countless other ties of the family with the farm. For the time being this peasant nature of agriculture may spare us some of the trouble connected with investments and with finding employment for a portion of the rural population, but in a country undergoing the process of industrialization it is bound to produce unavoidable conflict" (p. 83, the author's emphasis). Later, in the same article, Tepicht goes on to say: "The fact that these experiments"—in the type of farm unit—"are being conducted suggests that no new model for social farms has yet been formed in People's Poland to replace the peasant farm of today. . . . It is possible that not one model, but several, may emerge."

Because Poland is the classic case of peasant-dominated agriculture, it will be extremely interesting to see how Polish policy unfolds. In Geneva, shortly before his death, Adlai Stevenson called attention to the world-wide problem caused by the rush of small farmers, and rural residents generally, into cities at a vaster rate and in larger volume than the cities can provide jobs for them. The Poles have wisely decided not to accelerate this process but to use the "reserves of backwardness" in rural areas to achieve Socialist ends. The peasant problem—preeminently Poland's problem—has clearly not been solved, but it is assuming new dimensions and it has been reduced in scale.

The Forgotten Amendment . . . .

James D. Carroll

In Griswold v. Connecticut, the birth-control case handed down on June 7, the Supreme Court confounded most of the informed members of its public by giving everyone something and no one everything. June 7 was one of those days when it was impossible to tell the good guys on the Court from the bad. While Justices Harlan and Black in the background were decorously exchanging the mantles of judicial restraint and judicial activism, in the foreground Justices Douglas and Goldberg were excitedly announcing the discovery of a general constitutional right to marital privacy and the rediscovery of the Ninth Amendment to the Constitution.

The Court's decision was clear and simple: seven members agreed that the Connecticut statute prohibiting the dissemination and use of birth-control information and devices is unconstitutional. The grounds on which the decision was reached were not so simple: the statute violates a right to marital privacy that is fundamental to our civilization and our way of life. To explain their reasoning, the seven members of the Court who agreed with the decision produced four opinions. The dissenting Justices Black and Stewart produced two. June 7 was a good day for those who like to read Supreme Court opinions.

It is evident that the appellants, Estelle T. Griswold and Dr. Charles Lee Buxton, had got what they wanted. The Planned Parenthood League's birth-control clinic in New Haven can now legally disseminate birth-control information and devices. The citizens of Connecticut can now practice birth control in peace. But the appellants paid for this victory, if not out of their own intellectual pockets, then out of the intellectual pockets of those who believe that some form of compulsory birth control will be necessary in the future. The price they paid was the Court's recognition of marital privacy as a right that transcends the social interests of the state. Three of the Court's liberals, Chief Justice Warren, Justice Goldberg and Justice Brennan, went far out of their way to state flatly that a law requiring compulsory birth control would be just as unconstitutional as the Connecticut law outlawing voluntary birth control, since both laws would violate the right of marital privacy. This observation was a dictum, of course, but it was no idle or academic dictum, nor was it a sop tossed to the beggars who wanted the Connecticut law upheld.

---

James D. Carroll is a Russell Sage Resident in Law at the Maxwell School, Syracuse, N. Y.

These Justices expressed an acute awareness that many people in the United States and elsewhere are convinced that some form of compulsory birth control is inevitable. For example, Kenneth Boulding, who is widely and I think rightly respected as a thinker of prescience and insight, recently outlined the world's population problem and explained his response to it: "I think in all seriousness," Boulding wrote in The Meaning of the Twentieth Century, "that a system of marketable licenses to have children is the only one which will combine the minimum of social control necessary to the solution to this problem with a maximum of individual liberty and ethical choice." Boulding's plan may seem absurd at the moment, but who fifty years ago could foresee that in the 1960s the Catholic Church would re-examine its stand on artificial birth control?

The grounds of the Court's decision should satisfy many citizens who wanted the Court to leave the Connecticut statute alone. Even those who think the Court should quit playing the role of interpreter of the American conscience should be pleased with the majority's affirmation of a right to marital privacy and with the clear suggestion that the majority will recognize other forms of a general right to privacy in the future.

Prior to the birth-control decision, a right to privacy had to be tagged on to one of the specific rights affirmed in the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth or Sixth Amendments. If the action of a state were involved, the right had to be arrived at through interpretation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. A central issue in the case was this: Is there a constitutional right to privacy that applies to both state and federal action involving relationships not enumerated in the Constitution?

The majority of the Court held yes. The majority flatly stated that a constitutionally protected "zone of privacy" against state and federal action exists, a zone not limited to the exact relationships specified in specific constitutional provisions. In cases of state action, this zone of privacy is guaranteed both by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and by the Ninth Amendment. In cases of federal action it is guaranteed by the entire Bill of Rights.

The boundaries of the zone of privacy will have to be defined in future cases. Those who regard the invasion of the individual's privacy through the collectivization of man as one of the great threats of our time may come to regard the Griswold case as the Magna Charta of the 20th century. In more modest terms, they may derive immediate solace from Justice Douglas' concluding words of the Court's opinion:

> We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system. Marriage is a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred. The association promotes a way of life, not causes; a harmony in living, not political faiths; a bilateral loyalty, not commercial or social projects.

To the student of constitutional history, perhaps the most interesting aspect of the birth-control case is the Court's recognition of the Ninth Amendment as a mechanism for the expression of "the collective conscience of our people" against both federal and state action. The Ninth Amendment reads: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." The recognition at this time of the Ninth Amendment as a substantive limitation on state and federal action is truly an astounding development. As Bennett B. Patterson pointed out ten years ago in the Forgotten Ninth Amendment, the Supreme Court throughout its entire history has almost completely ignored the Ninth Amendment.

As far as I can determine from a recent check of Supreme Court cases, the Court never in its entire history has decided a single case on the basis of the Ninth Amendment. It has discussed the Ninth Amendment in half a dozen cases. In one of these, United Public Workers v. Mitchell, it used the Ninth Amendment to support a decision arrived at on other grounds. Throughout most of its history, the Court has apparently accepted the traditional understanding of the amendment expressed by Justice Stewart in his dissenting opinion in the birth control case. Justice Stewart argued that the Ninth Amendmen was adopted merely to make clea that the adoption of the Bill o Rights did not alter the plan tha the federal government is a government of express and limited powers "Until today, no member of this Court has ever suggested that the Ninth Amendment meant anything else. . . ."

Justice Goldberg expressed the new meaning of the Ninth Amendment in his concurring opinion He argued that the language and history of the Ninth Amendment reveal that the framers of the Constitution believed that other fundamental rights which are protected against government infringement exist alongside the rights specifically mentioned in the first eight amendments to the Constitution. The Ninth Amendment recognizes that these fundamental personal rights, such as the right to marital privacy, are protected from abridgment by government though not specifically mentioned in the Constitution. The courts must look to the "collective conscience of our people" to determine whether a principle is so rooted there as to be ranked as fundamental.

The recognition by the Court of the Ninth Amendment is of fundamental importance as an affirmation of the Court's intention to protect the sovereignty and dignity of the individual. In a way, this recognition constitutes the declaration of a new Bill of Rights for the 20th century, for as Patterson said in his prophetic book:

> There is no clause in the Constitution, except the Ninth Amendment, which makes a declaration of the sovereignty and dignity of the individual.
>
> Since individual freedom is the basis of democracy, and is the virtue which marks the excellence of our form of government over all other forms of government . . . the Ninth Amendment immediately takes its place as the most important declaration in our Constitution, because such a declaration is nowhere else therein to be found.

Who won the birth-control case? All of the parties to the case, both immediate and remote, lost something, but I personally think that in the Court's recognition of a constitutional right of privacy and in the Court's recognition of the Ninth Amendment, everyone gained a lot.

The Explosion That Froze the World

TOMIC DIPLOMACY: HIROSHIMA AND POTSDAM. By Gar Alperovitz. Simon & Schuster. 317 pp. $7.50.

Christopher Lasch

ar Alperovitz is a young historian ained at Wisconsin, Berkeley and ambridge; he is presently a fellow King's College. His book is not lemic but history, done with great are and subtlety and with a keen nse of the limitations of historical roof." It rests on the works of other storians, on the official records of merican diplomacy, on the published emoirs of participants in the events escribed, and on the important unublished diary of Henry L. Stimson -in other words, on all the available vidence, in English, bearing onAmeran diplomacy from March to Auust, 1945.

The book contains hundreds of itations to these sources, to say othing of scores of additional foototes carefully expanding on points reated in the text. Because his conlusions differ in important respects rom the conclusions of other hisorians—notably those of Herbert Feis — Alperovitz has taken appropriate are to show, in minute detail, exacty where other historians have gone wrong and why they have gone wrong, and he has done so without rancor or ostentatious display of superior wisdom. In short, he has proceeded in the best traditions of historical scholarship.

The nature of the subject makes it inevitable that Atomic Diplomacy will become part of a continuing debate about the origins of the cold war. It is for this reason that I have tried to emphasize the nonpolemical, noninflammatory character of the book. And although I shall be concerned here with showing what light the book throws on the debate over the cold war, I should be doing the book an injustice if I were to give the impression that it has to be justified on the grounds of its immediate contemporary relevance. As an extremely thorough and imaginative exercise in historical reconstruction, based on evidence which is necessarily incomplete and often ambiguous, Atomic Diplomacy can stand on its own feet. It will be reviewed and advertised as "controversial" and "provocative," but the most important thing about this book is that it is the work of a historian who knows and respects his craft.

Alperovitz's chief contention is that the atomic bomb had a decisive influence on American diplomacy in the period in question, particularly on American relations with Russia. Alperovitz is not attempting to explain why the bomb was used against Japan, still less why it was dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki instead of an uninhabited island. He believes that the available evidence does not permit conclusive answers to those questions. It is possible, indeed, that they should not even be asked, because the statesmen who made the "decision" to use the bomb did not see them as questions at all but as foregone conclusions. Truman's celebrated remark about the bomb's having been "no 'great decision,' " often taken simply as a sign of moral callousness (which it was), also points to an important historical truth: the question was not whether to use the bomb but what implications using it would have for our diplomacy. It is those implications, and the way in which they were perceived by the men who knew the secret, which Atomic Diplomacy sets out to explore.

As early as April, 1945, according to Alperovitz, American officials from Truman on down had decided to force a "symbolic showdown" with the Soviet Union over the future of Eastern Europe. Truman believed that a unified Europe was the key to European recovery and economic stability, since the agricultural southeast and the industrial northwest depended on each other. Soviet designs on Eastern Europe, Truman reasoned, threatened to disrupt the economic unity of Europe and therefore had to be resisted. The only question was whether the showdown should take place immediately or whether it should be delayed until our bargaining position had improved.

At first it appeared to practically everybody that delay would only weaken our bargaining position. Both of our major bargaining counters, our armies in Europe and our lend-

Testament of the Ringed Snake

Your eyes are my mirrors.
I wake at noon. I wake in a walk of somber sun. The earth's unremembering is in my coil; semblance is the ground grovelling of what-is met with what-yet-is-not — adamant bright scales underlaid, overlaid!

My shade is the swift shape that's there in timedark, Lethean dark of your eye.
If the cold and the dead make you prey,
Can you, belly-proud, listen for rebirth?
The black spot draws black weather.
Death's a summer circus, earth-consigned, blood-sweet.

In me, wed descent, ring down from your noon reflection. Each pool of shining regathers you, great predator and fancy's daft rash renegade. I find no vein of mineral or crystal that can hold you still.
Heat urges mutations. I see you change.

I flick forth my red tongue (never committed to song):
"Perhaps there's lightning of living yet."

Sam Bradley

Chistopher Lasch, a member of the History Department, the University of Iowa, is the author of The American Liberals and the Russian Revolution (Columbia University Press), and most recently, The New Radicalism in America 1889-1963: The Intellectual as a Social Type (Alfred A. Knopf).

lease credits, could be more effectively employed at once, it seemed, than at any future time. Accordingly, Truman tried to "lay it on the line" with the Russians. He demanded that they "carry out their [Yalta] agreements" by giving the pro-Western elements in Poland an equal voice in the Polish Government (although Roosevelt, who made the Yalta agreements, believed that "we placed, as clearly shown in the agreement, somewhat more emphasis" on the Warsaw [pro-Communist] government than on the pro-Western leaders). When Stalin objected that Poland was "a country in which the USSR is interested first of all and most of all," the United States tried to force him to give in by cutting back lend-lease payments to Russia.

At this point, however—probably on April 25—Secretary of War Stimson convinced Truman that "we shall probably hold more cards in our hands later than now." He referred of course, to the atomic bomb, and if Truman decided to postpone the showdown with Russia, it was because Stimson and other advisers persuaded him that the new weapon would "put us in a position," as Secretary of State James F. Byrnes argued, "to dictate our own terms at the end of the war."

To the amazement of those not privy to the secret, Truman proceeded to take a more conciliatory attitude toward Russia, an attitude symbolized by the Hopkins mission to Moscow in June, 1945. Meanwhile, he twice postponed the meeting with Churchill and Stalin at Potsdam. Churchill complained, "Anyone can see that in a very short space of time our armed power on the Continent will have vanished." But when Truman told Churchill that an atomic bomb had been successfully exploded at Alamogordo, exceeding all expectations, Churchill immediately understood and endorsed the strategy of delay. "We were in the presence of a new factor in human affairs," he said, "and possessed of powers which were irresistible." Not only Germany but even the Balkans, which Churchill and Roosevelt had formerly conceded to the Russian sphere, now seemed amenable to Western influence. That assumption, of course, had guided American policy since April, but it could not be acted upon until the bombing of Japan provided the world with an unmistakable demonstration of American military supremacy.

Early in September, the foreign ministers of the Big Three met in London. Byrnes—armed, as Stimson noted, with "the presence of the bomb in his pocket, so to speak, as a great weapon to get through the thing"—tried to press the American advantage. He demanded that the governments of Bulgaria and Rumania reorganize themselves along lines favorable to the West. In Bulgaria, firmness won a few concessions; in Rumania, the Russians stood firm. Litvinov, the Soviet Foreign Minister, made a telling comment on American policy. "Why," he asked, "did you Americans wait till right now to begin opposing us in the Balkans and Eastern Europe? You should have done this three years ago. Now it is too late, and your complaints only arouse suspicions here."

Alperovitz does not comment on the remarkable events he describes, but they point implicitly to two conclusions. In the first place, the object of American policy in the first months of the cold war was not to defend Western or even Central Europe but to force the Soviet Union out of Eastern Europe. The Soviet menace to the "free world," so often cited as the justification of the containment policy, simply did not exist in the minds of American planners. They believed themselves to be negotiating not from weakness but from almost unassailable superiority. Nor can it be said that the cold war began because the Russians "broke their agreements." The general sense of the Yalta agreements—which were in any case very vague—was to assign to the Sovie Union a controlling influence in Eastern Europe. Armed with the atomi bomb, American diplomats tried t take back what they had implicitl conceded at Yalta.

The assumption of American mora superiority, in short, does not stan up under analysis. That conclusio leads to a second: that America diplomacy in the early stages of th cold war must be judged strictly b the standards of power politics, if i is to be judged a success. But the inescapable fact is that, even by tha test, it completely failed to win its objectives. Atomic supremacy did not as Byrnes had hoped, enable us t "dictate our terms." Instead it merely encouraged what William A. Williams has called the "illusion of omnipotence." Stimson himself, the architect of the strategy of delay, was the first to realize that its failure dictated a new approach to the Russians, designed to internationalize atomic power. The alternative, he now saw, was an arms race which would imperil the world for years to come.

The only defense of American diplomacy which Alperovitz's book leaves intact is the defense made by unthinking anti-Communists, that it is sound policy to oppose Communist power anywhere, at any time, by whatever means come to hand. Such a defense can be made, but it can hardly claim to go by the name of realism. Realism demands a more accurate assessment of one's own power to control events. The failure to understand the limits of our own power, it is now clear, has undermined our foreign policy at every turn.

Scientists and Policy at Ground Zero

A PERIL AND A HOPE: The Scientists' Movement in America. By Alice Kimball Smith. University of Chicago Press. 591 pp. $10.

Elinor Langer

A Peril and a Hope is an almost day-by-day account of the problems and accomplishments of atomic scientists in the years 1945-47, as they moved out of their laboratories to attempt to influence political decisions about the disposition of the bomb they had constructed. It is a detailed and loving book, the kind some mothers keep about their babies, and it suffers from some of the same defects. The problem is not exactly lack of objectivity: no facts are twisted, events distorted or evaluations biased. What is missing is perspective. It is as if a mother recorded "July 20: today Johnny said 'Mama' "—but neglected to note that Johnny was 5 when the event took place. Nobody could have taken the trouble to write this book unless he assumed that the scientists about whom he wrote were seated firmly in the center of the universe during the years in question. In Mrs. Smith's case it seems likely that this conviction grew out of affection and close association: during the war her husband was one of e scientists at the Los Alamos labora ry where the first bombs were as mbled; later she herself worked on e Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, e most enduring and significant em em of the scientists' political com itment. But even her own exhaustive holarship fails to prove the point. he result is that while A Peril and Hope is a highly competent book, ifficult to criticize on its own terms, s own terms are a trifle ludicrous. ore seriously, the book contributes a fundamental misconception that as now reached such large propor ons that a fresh article examining it ppears nearly weekly: the Myth of he Important Scientists.

---

Elinor Langer writes on politics for Science magazine.

Like all myths, the Myth of the mportant Scientists reflects some ele nentary truth — in this case, the fact hat scientists are more important than hey used to be. Before World War II, cience was a private occupation, ometimes pursued at great sacrifice, ursued almost always in isolation rom politics and from society. Now cientists are part of the national establishment. They preside over a research and development budget now approaching $16 billion annually. They advise the President and members of the Cabinet on a wide range of public-policy issues. They administer large government bureaucracies in the fields of medical, nuclear and basic research. They sit on panels deciding how federal research dollars should be distributed. They are presidents of universities. They head successful corporations in aerospace and other new fields. They organize for LBJ. A few will be going to the moon.

Since the Hiroshima bomb marks for many people the great divide between Then and Now, it is natural that they have looked to the early postwar period for the source of the scientists' alleged political power. But even in the most fluid period, the power of the scientists was much overrated. The physically concentrated conditions of wartime work on the bomb encouraged a corporate sense among atomic scientists. The bomb elicited passionate introspection and moral concern. Droves of scientists flocked to Washington to see what they could do. They set up an organization known as the Federation of American Scientists. They worked feverishly, often without salaries, talking to Congressmen, cajoling editors and reporters, lecturing to the public, trying to explain what atomic energy was, and how the government might safely cope

Coming Sept. 20!

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent as the September 20 issue of The Nation to subscribers of record.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will be entitled to THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my September 20 issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME______________________________

ADDRESS______________________________

CITY______________STATE__________ZIP No.__________

9-6-65

with it. But the truth was they could do very little. They revolutionized the life of the scientific community, but their revolution had relatively little impact on your life and mine.

From 1945 to 1947 the scientists were involved in three main problems. The first was the question—if there ever really was a question—about whether to use the bomb against Japan. Acting within the rigid limits of Manhattan Project security, many scientists, particularly those at the Chicago laboratory, whose role in building the bomb was largely completed before the closing months of the war, made intense efforts to bring a variety of alternatives before United States policy makers. A famous poll suggests that they never spoke with a single voice but tended essentially to take a long-range view. Some scientists argued for a nonmilitary demonstration of the bomb; others advocated warning Japan in advance and seeking to end the war without such massive slaughter. Many also urged that the fact of the bomb's existence be shared with Russia (which it never fully was) and that an early start be made on plans for postwar control. But the scientists who were most influential in the government and who had mediated between the government and the bomb project throughout the war tended to view the question with the shorter range vision that prevailed in Washington. In a report to the War Department, top scientists—including men like Oppenheimer and Compton—finally concluded that "we can see no acceptable alternative to direct military use" [of the bomb]. Whether the sometimes eloquent counterarguments of the scientists in the field went read or unread in Washington is essentially irrelevant. This episode foreshadowed a phenomenon that now occurs continually. The closer scientists are to government, the less likely they are to take a stand on unfashionable premises or contribute new modes of analysis. In a sense, "administration scientists" are more "administration" than "scientists," and as they cease to express a viewpoint that can be called "independent," they have neither more nor less power than other government functionaries. More important in assessing scientists' influence on the decision to bomb Japan, are the political and diplomatic considerations stressed in the book by Gar Alperovitz, also reviewed in this issue. United States decision makers paid some attention to the moral and other questions raise by the scientists, but they weighe more heavily other matters on thei minds.

Arguments about the bomb were ca ried on under the tightest secrecy. Th first fight in which the atomic scien tists were publicly prominent was th postwar struggle over what kind c domestic atomic energy agency Con gress should establish, and whether should be controlled by civilians or b the military. The Manhattan Projec was run by the military. Securit measures were heavy. There was stric compartmentation: two scientist working in the same laboratory o related topics could not communicat with each other about their work un less one had a clear "need to know. Virtually no research could be pub lished.

The scientists came to hate the ar my brass who ran the isolated enclave where they worked and who, the thought, totally misunderstood the na ture of scientific research. They feare that continued military control woul not only interfere with their work i nuclear physics but would appear bel ligerent to the rest of the world an seriously handicap the research o peaceful uses of atomic energy the hoped to undertake. On this point th scientists won their only major battle after a lengthy fight, the Atomic En ergy Commission was established un der civilian rule. But the result wa disappointing. In almost no time th AEC became what amounted to a civil ian arm of the military. While th agency is not itself belligerent, it ha contributed docilely to the develop ment of international tensions: it main job until recently has been sim ply to produce fissionable material fo the military.

Often the progress in peaceful use of atomic energy has been so slow i is not even in the same league wit military applications. And the securit provisions are not exactly a mode for the ACLU. This is not to say tha the atomic scientists were at fault Individuals might have reached privat nirvanas by burning their clearance and refusing to build more bombs, bu collectively they were powerless t make the AEC turn out the way the hoped.

A third measure of the scientists' in fluence is an event that is surprisingl unremembered. Perhaps dearer to th atomic scientists than the domesti arrangements for atomic energy wa their belief in the need for some kin of international control. They were

The Medium

It is essentially reluctance   the language a darkness, a friendship, tying to the real but it is unreal

the clarity desired, a wish for true sight, all tangling

'you' tried me, tried the everyday which caught me, turning the house in the wind, a lovecraft   the political was not my business   I could not look without seeing the decay, the shit poured on most things, by indifference, the personal power which is simply that,   demanding a friend take dullness out of the world   (he doesn't know his lousy emptiness)   I slept in a fire   on my book bag, one dried wing of a white moth   the story is of a man who lost his way in the holy wood because the way had never been taken without at least two friends, one on each side, and I believe my dream said one of the others always led   now left to acknowledge,

he can't breathe, the darkness bled
the white wing,   one   of the body of the moth that moved him, of the other wing,   the language is bereft

Robin Blaser

erwhelmingly surprised by the flex- le position outlined in the Acheson- lienthal report which, with key modi- cations (in the direction of tough- ss), became the keystone of the U.S. osition in the first talks on interna- onal control at the United Nations the summer of 1946. The scientists dorsed the report and worked hard gain its acceptance. Two weeks and vo days after the U. S. plan was un- eiled, the United States set off an tomic bomb at Bikini. Mrs. Smith emarks with some surprise that the ilitary had played almost no role at ll in formulating the U. S. disarma- ent proposals. They didn't need to. hey had plans of their own—whose xecution caused Red Star to point out hat the U. S. seemed more interested perfecting the bomb than in limit- ng it. Many people feel that Bikini ad a lot to do with the hardening Soviet suspicions of U. S. intentions, and, therefore, with the cold war. Again, the point is not that the scientists were in the slightest measure at fault. It is that other concerns and other people were shaping our lives and in these decisions the scientists were only marginally involved. They were just as helpless as the rest of us.

The record of the 1945-47 period is not such a sturdy one: two losses—dropping the bomb, and the failure to achieve international controls; and one doubtful victory—the civilian Atomic Energy Commission. In the end, the one thing the scientists seem to have done that really touched our lives was to invent first one bomb, then another. It seems to me it is the same way now. We are still vulnerable to the products of their laboratories. But in political matters the scientists are like the rest of us—mastered rather than masters.

THEATRE

Henry Popkin

INTERNATIONAL THEATRE INSTITUTE

Tel Aviv

At the recent congress of the Interna- ional Theatre Institute in Tel Aviv, an East European delegate whom I had never met before abruptly announced to me: "Vous êtes un ange." This happens to be true, but I was surprised that the Eastern bloc knew it and thought it worth mentioning at this moment. When the delegate went on, in French, to praise my generosity and to urge me to visit his country, I realized that I had been mistaken for the UNESCO representa- tive. I could not think of a graceful way of correcting the error, and so I tried discreetly to direct attention to the badge that identified me as an American delegate. Finally, I could do no more than to promise a visit next year to the country in question; at the first opportunity, I informed the UNESCO representative that one of the East Europeans was looking for him.

Imperfect as it was, the encounter was characteristic of the ITI. This body exists to promote international communication among theatre people, and the estimable goal must often have as one of its by-products international conversation at cross-purposes, or even international misapprehension. I prize the ITI precisely for the opportunity it provides for a continuing dialogue among nations. It is in order to keep up my part in the conversation that I keep attending the ITI congresses—Vienna in 1961, Warsaw in 1963, Tel Aviv in 1965. I might even go to New York in 1967.

The official business of the ITI is no more exciting than the official business of most conventions, but some of its incidental reverberations are significant. The formal discussions that follow are sporadically interesting. What is really important is the possibility, realized in various ways, of communication with the great theatre world of Europe and especially with that mysterious universe behind the iron curtain. The cultural thaw goes on; it continues and develops, even in the face of the war in Vietnam.

Consider that Rumania, which used to be rather resistant to the thaw, has now officially permitted the free choice of artistic forms. I trust there is no penalty for failing to express oneself freely, but I am reminded of a line from an avant-garde Czech play, Václav Havel's The Garden Party (itself a sign of the times): "Everybody who is honestly interested in our common cause should have from one to three contrary opinions." Gradually, East Europe has been becoming less of an indistinguishable inchoate mass. But the Soviet Union stands aloof.

Enlightening dialogues are not confined to exchanges across the iron curtain. Sometimes even the nations of the West can startle one another. When, in 1963, I made a passing reference to the extraordinary off-Broadway success of Jean Genet's The Blacks in New York, a French delegate rose to express his surprise. How was this possible, he wondered, in view of the American racial situation of which we have heard so much? He supplied his own answer to this hard question: The success of The Blacks must be due to the integrationist policy which is led by President Kennedy. This year, during the formal discussion of the classics on the modern stage, I was speaking up in defense of certain free reinterpretations, like Roger Planchon's Henry IV: Part One and George Dandin in France and Jerzy Grotowski's Doctor Faustus in Poland, when a French delegate attacked, with surprising sharpness, the inauthenticity of Planchon's George Dandin (which was an example of right-wing conservative interpretation in comparison with his Henry IV). Alan Schneider, who was an American delegate, remarked dryly that he had been meaning to ask what the French Establishment thought of Planchon, whose work he admired; he supposed that now he knew.

Even though the official languages of the congress are English and French, the Russians always speak Russian and bring their own translator. (In 1963, they moved that the tongue of Pushkin and Chekhov be made one of the official languages of the meeting; the motion failed.) Some of the Russians do, unofficially, speak English and French, but they evidently prefer not to do so. The language barrier serves to isolate the Russians; at the concluding banquet of the session at Haifa, for example, a Soviet delegate made the principal address, which was then translated into Hebrew, and so remained a mystery to most of those present. I am informed that he deplored the decision to discuss the classics on the modern stage at this year's meeting. This complaint again reflects the "official" stiffness of the Soviet position. It reminded me that two years before, the Russians—while objecting to the prevailing pessimism of Western drama

---

Henry Popkin frequently writes on the theatre for Vogue and other magazines.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

YOU DON'T HAVE TO BE DRAFTED is must reading for every young man facing service. Send $1.00 to G. Knox, Box 1018, Mission, Kansas.

OP-SCENE comments by Bernard, Smith and Pollak. In THE SMITH/5, the strongest magazine. $1. $3.50 a year. 15 Park Row, New York City 38.

Just out!

The SECOND BOOK of

THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES

74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns

For postpaid copy send $1.50 to

Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.

(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. A book by Bin Dir Woor, self-designated Symbolical World President. Claims: "unique, entrancing, epochal." Next to The Bible it should become a Holy Book for all mankind. Price: $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 Seventh Avenue, N.Y.C.

Advertise
Your Needs
In The Nation

FUN TO READ!

THE IDLER is a lively, individualistic liberal monthly that entertains as it informs. Warm humor and cold facts mixed into a pleasant, personal and personable journalistic pot.

Send $3.00 today for a year's subscription. Money back if not satisfied.

Discover THE IDLER and you will have made a new friend.

THE IDLER
125 Fifth St., N.E.
Washington 2, D. C.

Please send me a one year's subscription to THE IDLER. Enclosed is $3.00.

Name ....

Address ....

........................Zip........

—had complained that the West had not sent its leading, deplorable dramatists to that year's discussion of the dramatist and his audience. Why were Duerrenmatt and Ionesco and Tennessee Williams not present? The question was valid, but the Russians had no dramatists in their delegation either. The Russians, unlike the rest of the East Europeans, seem determined not to be "with it." (The only communicative Russian I met this year was a cultural attaché who drove me from Haifa to Tel Aviv and urged me to collect stamps.) On two occasions at this year's meeting, the Russians found themselves voting against most of their East European allies. One of these votes occurred when the Polish delegation led a revolt against the leadership of the ITI. The Polish revolt was largely symbolic; the Poles did not, I believe, object to the character of the leadership or of its official slate of candidates for the next executive committee, but only to their existence. Proposing two additional candidates, a Polish delegate told an illustrative anecdote in the form of a fable: God created Eve and then told Adam: "You have now grown to man's estate. You are an adult, capable of mature, reasoned choice. Now tell me, and decide carefully, whom do you want to marry?" God, he explained, was the present executive committee, Eve was the new slate, and Adam was the congress. In a close vote, the official slate won, but those who opposed it comprised a strange alliance — the Scandinavian nations and the so-called satellites of East Europe. Alone among the Communist nations, the Soviet Union voted on the side of the Establishment.

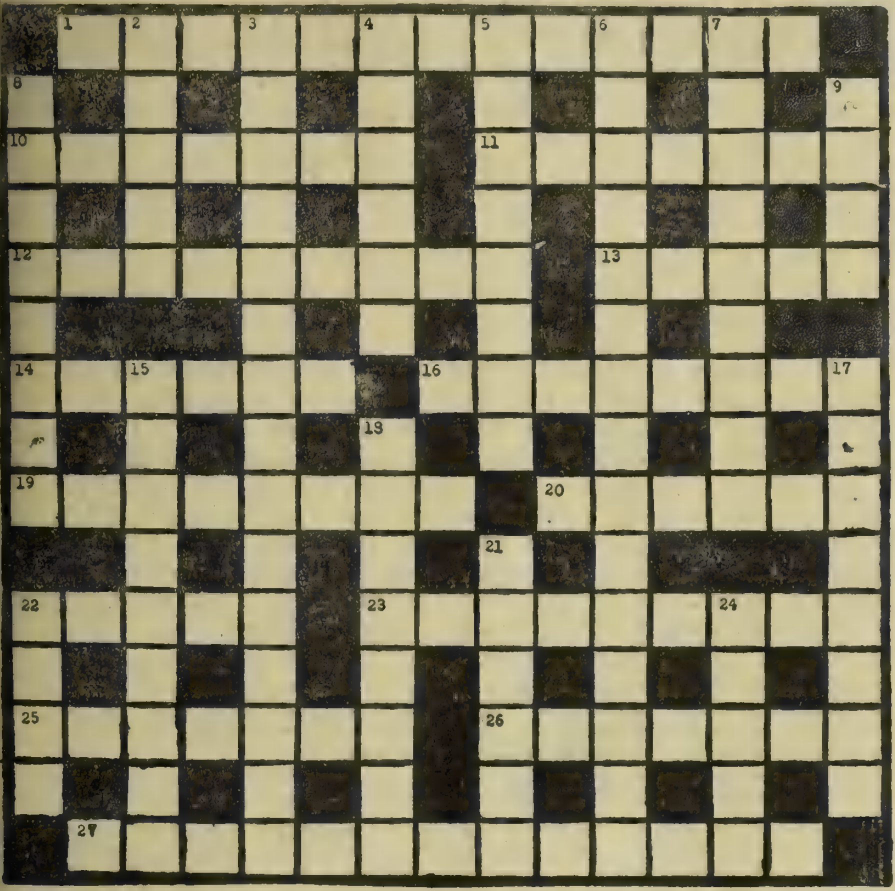
Another curious division accompanied one of the few truly dramatic moments at this drama conference. Invitations for the 1967 congress were issued by the United States, Canada and Hungary, but it was clear at once that only the American bid would be taken seriously. The Colombian and Canadian delegates asked if American visas could be obtained for everyone who wanted to attend. The American chairman, Rosamund Gilder, who is also president of the ITI, replied that she had been promised cooperation from the State Department, and pointed out that even nations not on friendly terms with the United States manage to be represented at the United Nations in New York. O delegate arose to observe sadly th his nation did not belong to t United Nations; he was, of course, East German. At last, the Hungari delegate effectively terminated t discussion by rather gallantly e pressing his hope for a successf congress in New York, offering renew Budapest's bid only if Ame can visas were not forthcoming. Th congress voted unanimously to ho its next meeting in New York; fo countries—the Soviet Union, Ea Germany, Bulgaria and Colombia- abstained. I imagine that the Sovi Union weighed, with proper tole ance, the self-indulgent desire of th Poles, Czechs, Hungarians and R manians to go to New York, but co cluded that East Germany was more need of moral support.

The discussion, when we final reached that long-promised topic, th classics on the modern stage, pr duced no division along political line It was considerably more animate than the Warsaw discussions whic had consisted mainly of the readin of formal, frequently irrelevant pa pers, interrupted only by the eloquer protest of an Israeli actress wh wanted to hear some real discussior

This year, the delegates refough the battle of the ancients and modern as they revealed themselves to b partisans of traditional or "modern ized" versions of the classics. Th American delegates who participate in these talks were consistently "mod ern" — Schneider, Richard Schechne of Tulane Drama Review, and my self — and we were joined by th Rumanian director, Liviu Ciulei, an Luigi Squarzina of Italy, who told hov he had interpreted Troilus and Cres sida as an antiwar play of contem porary significance and had cla Cressida in a bikini. An East Euro pean, irked by the emphasis on cos tume, asked derisively who was th best-dressed Hamlet we had ever seen The case for a conservative approach to the classics was stated more elaborately by two French delegates, the director Jean Meyer (formerly of the Comédie Française), who provided French instances of the influence of historical circumstance upon dramatic form, and A. M. Julian, of the Theatre of the Nations in Paris, who called upon the director only to respect the play and not to express himself. Such differences could only be aired and not resolved, but the dialogue continues and that's what cultural conventions are for.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1118

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Fashionable, but relying completely on the little things? (2, 2, 3, 6)

10 A dated dancer might be dangerous in Kansas. (7)

11 Acts as a rule. (7)

12 Things about our country that might be caught in a camera? (9)

13 A baby song is extremely like this composer. (5)

14 Weaponless—hence rather jumpy?

16 Fond and fast becoming like a tie?

19 Presented in public, but clarified for the cook. (8)

20 Petit four, perhaps. (6)

22 The way one might have met to make music? (5)

23 There's little work in such as silver associated with a dish and a spoon, if you remember! (9)

25 Disorders that cats and dogs have? (7)

26 Is it a sign of softness to tell an important church official? (7)

27 With reflection, is such a raid not so nice? (13)

DOWN:

2 Would den mothers possibly have such assumption of superiority? (5)

3 Stage fans, perhaps, but they didn't give the original owner a lift. (7, 8)

4 The one who did Frankie wrong, or is it some other chap? (6)

5 Smarting under a new environment? They don't always stay put. (8)

6 Main event for fighters? (5, 10)

7 Is the rule not so broken as to be let go? (4, 5)

8 Commoner? Certainly not—though you might not recognize him. (8)

9 A modest sort of pale blonde? (4)

15 See 17 down

17 and 15 down Strictly speaking, not much in the way of 12 could precede it. (8, 6-3)

18 A few lines obviously left around and transposed. (8)

21 Should such a box be found next to the skipper? (6)

22 Mark an animal to hold back the main force. (4)

24 The muse of moderators? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1117

ACROSS: 1 Fine and dandy; 5 Bugbear; 12 Reside; 15 Redeem; 16 Advised; 17 Sign; 19 and 9 Downgrade; 21 Scenery; 23 Beat; 25 Stencil; 27 and 18 Minute gun; 29 Normal; 33 Elgar; 36 Setters; 37 and 5 down Money to burn. DOWN: 1, 22 across and 34 Figures don't lie; 2 Nears; 3 Agenda; 4 and 11 Dead wrong; 6 Gowned; 7 Elope; 8 Regimen; 13 Educate; 14 Limning; 15 Refrain; 20 Ore; 22 Dampens; 24 Tallyho; 25 Starve; 26 London; 28 and 10 Night air; 30 Mangy; 31 Alms; 32 Term.

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE

A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books. Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.

Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232

Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

REAL ETATE — FOR SALE

SOUTH JERSEY. Writer's year round hideaway in pine woods. 2½ hours New York, ¾ hour Philadelphia; 25 minutes ocean, near lake and river. 4 rooms, large fireplace plus detached studio, patio. Payments, including taxes, $75 month. Tel: 609-625-2939, or write: FIVE ACRES, WEYMOUTH ROAD, MAYS LANDING.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC). 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to: P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

APARTMENT AND HOUSE PAINTING. Decorators ideas, free estimates, no obligation. Fine work, fair prices. [illegible] 6-2319 after 5 P.M.

"END VIETNAM WAR NOW"

Bumper Stickers 25c Each

$10.00 per 100

Mass. PAX 44 Brattle Street

Cambridge, Mass. 02138

EXPERT PROOFREADING AND COPY EDITING

KARIN KLEINMAN

78-07 Springfield Blvd.

Bayside, N. Y. 64

SP 6-2449

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to

THE NATION

Reader's Service Division

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCT Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

ALTERNATIVE PERSPECTIVES on VIETNAM

International Conference at Ann Arbor, Michigan, Sept. 14-18, 1965

PURPOSE: To carry forward the critical examination of current U.S. policy begun by the teach-in movement by moving from the analysis of the weaknesses and dangers of current policy to the search for viable alternatives through the development of new perspectives not based on the assumptions of the Cold War which have led us into a dead end on the issue of Vietnam.

PROGRAM: An international cooperative venture that seeks to unite three integrally related functions: *analysis, communication and action.

1. International Study Groups (September 14-16) composed of about 40 humanists, religious thinkers, social theorists and area and development specialists who will meet in small groups, each set up to examine the problem of Vietnam from a particular new perspective—other than that provided by power politics and within the Cold War framework—and to derive concrete alternatives to current American policy.

2. Open Sessions (September 17) with members of the university community throughout the nation and representatives of other communities—writers, artists, professionals, and religious, labor, civil rights and community groups interested in the problem of Vietnam and world peace—to hear reports from the study groups and addresses by study group members from different parts of the world; to be followed by teach-in type seminars concerned with alternative perspectives on Vietnam and concrete alternative policies.

3. Action Workshops (September 18) composed of individuals and representatives of groups from various parts of the U. S. and from other parts of the world who will report on various activities and plans; participants, in accord with their specific interests, will divide themselves into workshops to map out specific action projects of a local, regional, national or international nature.

The three conference segments are designed to feed into each other. The study groups to generate new ideas on which the subsequent activities will draw; to contribute to the development of international networks of intellectuals; to make possible the drafting of a joint statement of principles; to produce ideas that can be fed into the seminar discussions and into the action workshops; the seminars and action workshops to lead to a basis for cooperation between all persons and groups interested in ending the war.

A full statement of the assumptions of the conference and a detailed outline of the conference program are available in a 20-page booklet, "Alternative Perspectives on Vietnam."

Sponsored by: Inter-University Committee for Debate on Foreign Policy in association with:
Michigan Faculty-Student Committee to Stop War in Vietnam; Office of Religious Affairs, University of Michigan; Universities Committee for Problems of Peace and War; and the following individuals (partial list):

HENRY D. AIKEN
Philosophy, Harvard
ABE AJAY, Artist
ROBERT C. ANGELL
Sociology, Michigan
RUDOLF ARNHEIM
Psychology, Sarah Lawrence
DeWITT BALDWIN
Religion, Michigan
JOHN C. BENNETT
Union Theo. Seminary
DANIEL M. BERMAN
Pol. Science, American Univ.
HANS BETHE
Physics, Cornell
KENNETH BOULDING
Economics, Michigan
MSGR. JOHN S. BRADLEY
Ann Arbor, Mich.
GERMAINE BREE
Literature, Wisconsin
EDWIN A. BURTT
Philosophy, Cornell
HARVEY COX
Theology, Andover-Newton
RICHARD F. DURBIN
Biophysics, California
PHILIP EVERGOOD, Artist

ABRAHAM EDEL
Philosophy, CCNY
JAMES FARMER, C.O.R.E.
JULES FEIFFER
Cartoonist-Writer
ABRAHAM FEINGLASS
Amal. Meat Cutters, Chi.
OTTO FEINSTEIN
Econ., Wayne State
HORACE FRIESS
Religion, Columbia
PATRICK E. GORMAN
Amal. Meat Cutters, Chi.
A. GRUNWALD
Nuclear Engin., Chicago
WILLIAM HAMILTON
Theology, Colgate-Roch.
WILLIAM B. HARVEY
Law, Michigan
NAT HENTOFF, Writer
MORRIS HIRSCH
Mathematics, California
MARSHALL G. S. HODGSON
History, Chicago
JASPER INGERSOLL
Anthropology, Catholic Univ.
HERBERT C. KELMAN
Psychology, Michigan

STANLEY KUNITZ, Poet
DENISE LEVERTOV, Poet
DAVID LIVINGSTON
Dist. 65, RWDSU, AFL-CIO
ROBERT LOWELL, Poet
R. DUNCAN LUCE
Psychology, Pennsylvania
LENORE G. MARSHALL
Writer
EMIL MAZEY
United Auto. Workers
ROBERT MOTHERWELL
Artist
A. J. MUSTE, F.O.R.
C. KILMER MYERS
Bishop, Episcopal Ch., Mich.
JAMES O'NEILL
Romance Languages, Mich.
TALCOTT PARSONS
Sociology, Harvard
LINUS PAULING
Chemistry, Santa Barbara
JEAN PIAT
Anatomy, Pittsburgh
HILARY PUTNAM
Philosophy, Harvard
CHARLES A. REICH
Law, Yale
AD REINHARDT, Artist
H. V. RICKENBERG
Biology, Indiana
DAVID RIESMAN
Sociology, Harvard
CLEVELAND ROBINSON
Dist. 65, RWDSU, AFL-CIO
WALTER G. ROSEN
Biology, Marquette
JOHN C. SCHUDER
Biophysics, Missouri
PHILIP SIEKEVITZ
Biochemistry, Rockefeller
J. DAVID SINGER
Political Science, Michigan
M. BREWSTER SMITH
Psychology, California
W. D. SNODGRASS, Poet
HERBERT J. SPIRO
Political Science, Penn.
RICHARD SCHLEGEL
Physics, Michigan State
THEODORE NEWCOMB
Psychology, Michigan
HAROLD TAYLOR
Educator and Writer

RABBI JACOB WEINSTEIN
K.A.M. Temple, Chicago
DAGMAR WILSON
Women Strike for Peace
VERY REV. D. WINZEN
Mt. Savior, Elmira
MYRA WOLFGANG
Hotel, Rest. Workers Union
QUINCY WRIGHT
International Relations, Va.
GARDNER MURPHY
Menninger Clinic
CARL OGLESBY, S.D.S.
KENNETH J. ARROW
Economics, Stanford

RAY CRAIG
Education, Colorado
D. MACDONALD, Author
ROBERT BRUSTEIN, Critic
L. UNTERMEYER, Poet
HARVEY SWADOS, Writer
LOUIS SIMPSON, Poet
EDWIN E. MOISE
Mathematics, Harvard
WILLIAM R. DORRANCE
Internal Medicine, Stanford
C. WAYDE SAVAGE
Philosophy, U.C.L.A.
JANE JACOBS, Writer
DONALD HALL
English, Mich.

Nat'l Board of Inter-University Comm.

DAVID ABERLE
Anthropology, Oregon
DENNIS ROSEMAN
Student, Michigan
ROBERT BROWNE
Eco., Fairleigh-Dickinson
BOB BUCKHOUT
Psych., Wash. (St. Louis)
NOAM CHONSKY
Linguistics, MIT
BARRY COMMONER
Botany, Wash. (St. Louis)
RONALD CORWIN
Student, Syracuse
WILLIAM DAVIDON
Physics, Haverford
STANLEY DIAMOND
Anthropology, Syracuse
DOUGLAS DOWD
Economics, Cornell
CHARLES DREKMEIER
Pol. Science, Stanford
MORTON FRIED
Anthropology, Columbia
T. FUSE
Sociology, Carleton
WILLIAM GAMSON
Sociology, Michigan
FATHER GERARD GRANT
Philosophy, Loyola, Chicago
GEORGE GOSS
Student, Texas
JOE H. GRIFFITH
Student, Cornell
IRVING HOWE
English, Hunter

ARNOLD KAUFMAN
Philosophy, Michigan
LAWRENCE KRADER
Anthropology, Syracuse
ANTHONY LEEDS
Anthropology, Texas
RICHARD D. MANN
Psychology, Michigan
BANKS McDOWELL
Law, Boston
JONATHAN MIRSKY
Chinese, Pennsylvania
HANS MORGENTHAU
Political Science, Chicago
ANATOL RAPOPORT
Math. Biology, Michigan
MARSHALL SAHLINS
Anthropology, Michigan
JOAN W. SCOTT
Student, Wisconsin
MICHAEL SHUB
Student, California
STEPHEN SMALE
Mathematics, California
BENJAMIN SPOCK
Pediatrics, Western Reserve
RICHARD STROHMAN
Mathematics, California
ARTHUR J. VIDICH
Sociology, New School
WILLIAM A. WILLIAMS
History, Wisconsin
MARSHALL WINDMILLER
Int'l Rel., San Fran. State
MARY WRIGHT
Asian Studies, Yale

(Affiliations listed for identification only)

ALTERNATIVE PERSPECTIVES ON VIETNAM
P. O. Box 1385, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106

☐ Please send a copy of the conference call
☐ I am interested in attending the conference
☐ I would like to add my name to the list of sponsors and supporters
☐ I enclose $.................. to help defray the costs of the conference

Name ______________________________

Address ______________________________

City ______________ State ________ ZIP ________

THE
NATION
1865 Centennial Year 1965

September 13, 1965 . . 35c

RLINGAME
LIC LIBRARY
rlingame, Calif.
EP 1 4 1965

Whatever Happened to the State Department?

CHARLES W. TAIT

The Return of Flying Saucers

Daniel Cohen

Flannery O'Connor

WEBSTER SCHOTT

LETTERS

Socialists' conference

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: In your August 30 issue you published my letter informing your readers of the First Annual Socialist Scholars Conference to be held Sept. 11 and 12 on the New Brunswick campus of Rutgers University. The site of the conference has now been changed to Columbia University. For further details we refer your readers to our advertisement which appears in this issue.

Marvin E. Gettleman
Assistant Professor of History
Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn

A shade of difference?

New York City

Dear Sirs: Eqbal Ahmad's article, "Revolutionary Warfare" [The Nation, Aug. 30], moves me to ask the following question: What magic formula does one use to distinguish a noble, idealistic, progressive guerrilla movement which murders thousands of local officials (13,000 in South Vietnam between 1957 and 1961, according to the author) and a certain number of schoolteachers and health workers ("selectively," of course!) from a wicked, unidealistic, unprogressive guerrilla movement which does exactly the same thing?

J. Hermann

Note: Just for laughs (and for a change), how about publishing a letter that doesn't agree with you?

Woodland, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Professor Ahmad's article on revolutionary warfare is required reading every American politician and diplomat. Ernest Nash

The above message was received by Western Union telegram.—Editor.

The question of guilt

Bronxville, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Your editorial, "Watts: The Forgotten Slum" [Aug. 30], stresses the one most important contributing factor to that tragic riot which could have been avoided had persons in responsibility only listened to the warning cries that were in the air constantly these past two years.

The most typical and damaging of this attitude on the part of various Los Angeles leaders was Cardinal McIntyre's remark in a 1963 press conference: "The Negro is better treated in Los Angeles than anywhere in the United States." He then went on in the next several months to refuse to support those who were fighting to retain California's Fair Housing laws, and silenced by action or threat any members of the Catholic clergy who dared speak out in defense of civil rights. The DuBay case was but one of many, and how right Father DuBay was when he predicted the serious unrest among the Negroes of Los Angeles. To one who has served as president of the Catholic Interracial Council in San Diego and been active in the same organization in San Francisco, I can only say that Cardinal McIntyre's lack of awareness best demonstrates the truth of your editorial.

It is hoped that the board appointed by the Governor considers the charges against Cardinal McIntyre as well as those against Chief Parker. They may be quite similar.

Walter G. Hooke

Appreciation

Quito, Ecuador

Dear Sirs: This letter is written to express my appreciation for the many fine editorials and articles you have published discussing the Vietnam situation. They have been excellent. Please continue them.

James J. Billings

Education versus culture

Burbank, Calif.

Dear Sirs: The drive toward conformity and the elimination of "controversy" in publicly supported facilities has reached ludicrous proportions here in Burbank. By a vote of 4 to 1 the City Council has changed the existing rules regulating the use of the auditorium and meeting rooms of the Public Library. Under the new rules these facilities are limited to "city-sponsored organizations or community cultural groups." Specifically excluded are educational organizations. Yes, education has been declared out of bounds in the Burbank Public Library. Not culture, just education. This weird pitting of the educational against the cultural is just a transparent façade, to ban from the library auditorium such groups as the American Civil Liberties Union, which was characterized as an educational group; Human Relations Council and the American Association of University Women, which were classed as "political" because they have legislative committees. ACLU and other groups concerned with vital public issues have been in a running battle with a city manager and city council pressured by right-wing and extremist elements since last spring, when ACLU (local chapter) dared to hold a debate on "Released Time for Religious Education in Public Schools" in the library auditorium. Extremists failed to stop or disrupt this meeting. A timid city council caved in at the demands of the right wingers to stop all "controversy" at the public library. ACLU is preparing its court case against the city of Burbank, for clear and flagrant violation of the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights (free speech and assembly).

The question arises: how great is the distance between censorship in the library auditorium and censorship on the bookshelves? At which step of the escalation is book burning reached? Is this an isolated incident or is it the forerunner of a systematic campaign to "purify and sterilize" Library U.S.A.?

Theodore Schoenman

THE
NATION

Monday, September 13, 1965
Volume 201, No. 7

In this issue

EDITORIALS

129

ARTICLES

131 The Return of Flying Sauce
Daniel Cohen

134 Portugal:
Imperialism on Credit
Antonio de Figueiredo

137 Whatever Happened to the State Department?
Charles W. Tait

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

142 Flannery O'Connor:
Faith's Stepchild
Webster Schott

146 Theatre
Julius Novick

146-147 Up Rising (poem)
Robert Duncan

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 148)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Grandin Conover, Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Sept. 13, 1965. Vol. 201, No.

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

EDITORIALS

The Decline of State

n this issue (p. 137) Charles Tait tells the story he gradual supersession of the State Department he Department of Defense. It is not so much that military have muscled in—there was no necessity rough tactics. The State Department and its cian staff have sought out the military, deferred to n, and given them responsibilities which in preis U.S. history had never belonged to them. Thus lem situations all over the world have come to defined in military terms, with diplomacy playing ibsidiary role if any role at all.

revealing light is thrown on this sinister process an imbroglio that recently engaged the attention Senators Morse and Fulbright. American Univer's Special Operations Research Office was set up 1956 as one of the innumerable "nonprofit" outfits ducting research for Defense on whatever the detment conceived to be within its ever-widening ere of interest. One of SORO's operations was oject Camelot," the purpose of which was to identify tors involved in social change and, in the words one reporter, "suggest possible actions for forestal violence and a breakdown in government." The ale in this case was Chile. Our ambassador in ile, Ralph Dungan, knew nothing about this enterse; either his superiors in Washington were ignot of what was going on or they did not bother to orm him. It was all left to the delicate sensibilities mature judgment of the soldiers and the SORO ial scientists. However, when news stories appeared the Chilean Government protested, Dungan comined to Washington and the project was provinally canceled.

The Camelot social scientists were mobilized under other name and set of initials—Special Activities oup (SAG) — and are currently at work on new posals for the Army. A number of similar studies in progress: "Task Simpatico" for Colombia, "Task lony" for Peru. Most of these are designed to prole the basis for "civic action" programs, which nator Fulbright found to be essentially counterolutionary. He said he was concerned about such ojects, not only because they gave offense to the ellectuals of the countries involved but "because I lieve there lies beneath the jargon of 'science,' in ich these studies abound, a reactionary backwardking policy opposed to change. Implicit in Camelot, in the concept of 'counterinsurgency,' is an asmption that revolutionary movements are dangers to the interests of the United States and that the ited States must be prepared to assist, if not acally participate in, measures to repress them. . . ."

The key to this "intervention by research" is to be und in appropriations. The Department of Defense has $6.7 billion for research and development—more than 1,000 times the $5.9 million allotted to the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. Defense has at its disposal $23 million for research in the behavioral and social sciences, as opposed to $3.5 million for all forms of research and intelligence in the State Department.

The Defense Department has now agreed that all projects that affect foreign relations must henceforth be cleared through the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, who presumably will take someone in the Department of State into his confidence. But the problem remains. The State Department created a vacuum and the Defense Department, abetted by eager academics, proceeded to fill it. President Eduardo Frei Montalva of Chile told Ambassador Dungan that militarism might become as dangerous to Latin American democracy as communism is supposed to be. Militarism has been defined by Hannah Vogt as the "abdication of the political way of thinking in the interest of the military one." It is a perfect description of the State Department's role in recent years.

Firm Denial

Further evidence of the abject performance of the State Department is provided by the "firm denial" which the department issued when first queried about Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew's charge that he had been offered a $3 million bribe to release a CIA agent who had been attempting—with a clumsiness characteristic of the agency—to buy security secrets in Singapore. In a matter of hours, the department was forced to withdraw its denial. Our Ambassador in Kuala Lumpur, James D. Bell, was also made to look ridiculous because he, too, had issued a "firm denial" of the charge.

Nor is the Singapore incident an isolated case. In The New York Times of September 2, Seymour Topping provides an interesting run-down of similar incidents in Southeast Asia. At one time or another, Burma, Cambodia and Indonesia have, with good reason, complained of hostile operations against their governments conducted by the CIA. Activities of this sort have left a heritage of anti-Americanism in the region that will cause trouble for American diplomacy for a long time to come.

These embarrassments would not have occurred if the State Department had been directed by men with a proper respect for its role and function. The trouble is that successive Secretaries of State in the postwar period have abjectly surrendered, without audible protest, a large measure of the department's traditional responsibilities to the Department of Defense and to the Central Intelligence Agency.

The New York Election

Whether the City of New York is any longer governable is an open question, but in this year's election the voters have been given a chance to put the proposition to a fair test. Divisions within the Democratic Party have flushed out some likely candidates.

In the September 14 primary, Democratic voters will be offered not an echo but several choices. Beame, Screvane, O'Dwyer and Ryan are better than average candidates and the competition among them has dramatized the key issues. Orin Lehman, a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Comptroller on the Screvane slate, is an exceptionally well-qualified candidate who brings to the dispirited politics of New York a family name and tradition long identified with public service in the city and the state.

Of the Democratic candidates for mayor, Rep. William F. Ryan stands first in our ratings. He has been an able, energetic and courageous Representative, and in his handling of issues in the primary campaign he has demonstrated a real flare for big-city politics.

Looking beyond the primary, The Nation's choice will be Rep. John V. Lindsay. Whether Mr. Lindsay, if elected, could succeed in governing a virtually ungovernable city is, to repeat, an open question; but he would bring to this formidable task the necessary qualities of character, intelligence and leadership.

The Air Force Takes Over

At the 1961 convention of the American Rocket Society, General Bernard A. Schriever, the commanding general of the Air Force Systems Command, told the delegates that "the ability to operate in space may be the key to our national survival." The Nation's reporter followed him around as he sounded this theme at press conferences, a big luncheon meeting, private interviews, televised panel sessions, and wherever the bull was thrown. The Nation saw little chance that in the long run the Air Force could be limited to the 100,000-foot ceiling then imposed on it, with the ostensibly civilian NASA in charge of the vast domain beyond. Now the Air Force generals and their legislative allies (some of whom, like Barry Goldwater, are also Air Force officers) have won a long running battle, and Schriever will head up the "Manned Orbital Laboratory" program as well as the Systems Command. Lyndon B. Johnson was never one to thwart the Air Force, and he will now be happy to see it thrive in space alongside NASA, his other love.

The outlook is that NASA will thrive less, and the Air Force more, for Schriever and company are not accustomed to sharing their domain on a live-and-let-live basis. Not that NASA is in danger of early starvation—enough of it must be preserved to lend some public relations substance to the shadow of the 1958 Space Act, which dedicated our efforts up there exclusively to "peaceful purposes for the benefit of mankind." The President paid touching tribute to noble concept when, in his announcement that would soon be orbiting, he reiterated that "our A can dream for outer space is a dream of peace."
the moist-eyed gaze he reserves for such occas he used the right word. It is indeed a dream, and eral Schriever can be relied on to treat it as such

Of course the Air Force has not been waiting the MOL go-ahead to pursue its aims in space.
have the Russians. The empyrean is already fu Russian and American hardware equipped with e rate sensing and photographic apparatus to obs what is going on down below. But the Air Force, the Chinese Reds, believes that man is the dec force in war, and they want airmen in space w they can not only observe but act. The $1.5 bi MOL program announced by Mr. Johnson is ha more than an Air Force version of the NASA Ge program, but it is only a beginning. From it, by al dications, an aerospace force will not develop acc ing to any dream of peace but the strategy and t nology of war. The Air Force wants the capabilit intercept the reconnaissance satellites of the en and end their nefarious activities. It would like to all the observing and deny it to the enemy. If can do this better than unmanned hunter spacec
the Russians will be sending their astronauts aloft the same purpose. A glorious prospect emerges.
the vacuum of space, where man has all he can to survive, men who happen to have been born different parts of the earth will be killing one ano for God and country.

The Biggest Gimmick

America, the land of opportunity, is also the sium of the sales gimmick. In dollar volume, other gimmick can approach the trading stamp dustry or, as it prefers to be called, the premium centive business. Its prosperity is a living proof
P. T. Barnum knew what he was talking about.
now a cloud appears on the stamp horizon.
Lester L. Wolff, an enterprising freshman Congr man from New York, has been asking questions ab
the inner workings of the stamp business and gett answers from food chains and other retailers, when he invited representatives of the stamp c panies, none showed up. They sent observers to informal meetings, they sent lobbyists to try to suade Mr. Wolff from pursuing his inquiry, but t are not going to talk unless a formal Congressio investigation is launched and subpoenas are issu

Representative Wolff became interested in trad stamps because he suspected that this essenti parasitic industry might be a factor in the stea rising cost of living. Over $38 billion in annual re sales is tied in with stamps, including 43 per cent all food sold in the United States. Food mark operate on a low margin of profit—between 0.5
2 per cent of sales—while stamps cost the stores
3 per cent. The ratio may be even higher when m try to beat the competition with double or triple p days. The companies used to claim that the ps were paid for out of increased volume, and was true when the first store in the neighbor-to adopt stamps took customers away from · stores; but now that the saturation point has reached it must be clear that neither the con-r nor the merchant is getting something for ing.

effect the housewife (the clientele of the pren store is almost entirely female) is supporting ırallel, high-priced retailing system. The stamp ies are already the largest wholesale buyers of l appliances like toasters and heating pads, which distribute at the manufacturers' inflated list s, on which the stamp collector more often than pays a sales tax. The intelligent housewife is ed into defensive stamp collection, since she vs she is paying for the stamps, willy-nilly. Unɔtedly many women revel in perusing the premium logues and choosing "gifts" for themselves and r loved ones, but why should the sensible house-be forced to pay extra for the food her family ls in exchange for overpriced merchandise they
't need?

Another point raised by Representative Wolff is that the Internal Revenue Service may have been too indulgent with the stamp interests. Company practice is to file corporate income tax returns on the basis that not less than 95 per cent of the issued stamps will be redeemed. But the actual redemption ratio is generally estimated at 90 per cent, and some industry estimates range as low as 80 per cent. Whatever the true figures, the difference is gravy for the companies. Redemption is usually prompt—six to twelve months—yet the companies hold back $50 million a year against stamps that may never be presented for redemption. Since 1950, they have accumulated $950 million in reserves against 384 billion stamps, most of which will still be unredeemed at the Last Judgment.

Some food chains in the Northeast are beginning to rebel against the stamp imposition, but at the same time, with the price of medicines already high, drug stores are going under the yoke. The Nation has always been opposed to promotions of this type. [See editorial, "The Trading Stamp Mystique," October 5, 1964, and "Trading Stamps—The Welcome Hoax," by Desmond Smith, October 26, 1963.] It is high time for a full-dress investigation which will bring all the facts to light.

he Return of Flying Saucers . . . Daniel Cohen

July 26, 1952, the U.S. Air ce diverted all commercial air
fic away from Washington,
., and sent up jets to defend city from invasion by invisible ceships. Radar operators had ected a number of unexplained ps" on their screens, and alugh the weather then prevailing Washington had produced simi-
"blips" on other occasions, the ing-saucer "flap" had by then ched such intensity that metelogy was ignored in extraterres-l panic.

Compared to the boom years of 47-58, flying saucers have today len into relative obscurity, but re are still thousands of people the United States who believe ssionately that the earth is being ited regularly by great numbers spaceships from other worlds.
ery unexplained light in the sky
a possible spaceship, every unplained hole in the ground a sign a possible spaceship landing, and ybody who calls this nonsense is possible agent of a giant con-iracy to hide the truth. Some of the enthusiasts are quite mad, but surprisingly, the majority are sane and often very intelligent. Yet they have remained in this bizarre state of mind for nearly twenty years. Flying saucers are, as one commentator has termed them, "a major myth of the space age."

The Air Force is still patiently investigating reports of saucer sightings. In the latest information sheet it notes that since 1947 it has investigated 9,127 cases of sightings. Of these only 667 are now classed as "unexplained." Any unusual bit of publicity will bring in a new flood of sightings. This happened last January when True magazine ran another "flying saucers are really here now!" article by Maj. Donald E. Keyhoe (U.S.M.C. Ret.). The article resulted in a healthy jump in newsstand sales for True, and Major Keyhoe's organization, the National Investigations Committee for Aerial Phenomena (NICAP), got some 3,000 letters from saucer-seeing readers.

During the summer of 1965 the country experienced the biggest wave of saucer sightings it has had in years. Large numbers of reports came in from Oklahoma, Texas, Kansas, Colorado, and from as far east as Chicago. Newspapers gave saucer stories prominent display and flying saucers again became a common topic of dinner-table conversation. One of the saucers that was seen over Texas was even photographed. The picture showed only an indistinct light, but according to The Christian Science Monitor of Aug. 16, "It makes the clearest case yet for a thorough look at the saucer mystery."

Officers at Project Blue Book, the Air Force's agency charged with investigating saucer reports, calmly pointed out that the sightings were most likely cases of mistaken identification of the planet Jupiter and four prominent stars, due to unusual atmospheric conditions that "gave them a scintillating effect." But such an explanation was hardly satisfactory to the man who thought he had seen a spaceship.

The original flying saucers were seen by Kenneth Arnold, a salesman and veteran pilot. On June 24, 1947, Arnold was flying his private plane over the Cascade Mountains in Washington when he niel Cohen is managing editor of ience Digest.

---

saw nine bright, disk-shaped objects approaching Mt. Rainier. The disks were probably a mirage caused by the mountains, but to Arnold they looked like strange craft traveling at almost 1,700 miles an hour. Arnold's story was picked up as a "silly season" item by newspapers all over the country and Arnold found himself the butt of a lot of jokes.

But one person who read Arnold's story didn't laugh. He was Raymond A. Palmer, editor of Ziff-Davis Publishing Company's science-fiction magazines, Amazing Stories and Fantastic Adventures. Palmer was, and is, devoted to the idea that truth is stranger than fiction. He had already published a collection of "true stories" known as The Great Shaver Mystery. The articles were written by Richard S. Shaver, a Pennsylvania welder, who claimed to have a racial memory of the fabled continents of Lemuria, Atlantis and Mu. All the old mystic tales were there, but Shaver and Palmer breathed new life into them. It was effective stuff: people began to come upon Shaver's evil deros (detrimental robots) as they popped up from beneath the ground.

By 1948, the Shaver mystery was losing its grip on the science-fiction audience; circulation was slipping. Palmer then took up the cause of flying saucers. In the first issue of his new magazine, Fate ("true stories of the strange, the unusual and the unknown"), published in the spring of 1948, he printed an article under Arnold's byline entitled, "I Did See The Flying Disks."

Fate had limited appeal and to most people saucers were still a joke, but a series of deaths took the humor out of them. In June of 1948, two men reported seeing six saucers near Tacoma, Wash. Palmer sent Arnold to investigate. The men told Arnold that the saucers had dropped metallic fragments on their boat and showed him some lumps of slag as proof. Puzzled by the story, Arnold notified Army Intelligence. Two officers from Hamilton Air Force Base, Calif., arrived and after an investigation decided that the whole thing was a hoax. As they were returning to base their plane crashed and both officers were killed. The cause of the crash was determined to be entirely natural, but Arnold was convinced that it had been due to extraterrestrial sabotage, and Palmer wrote darkly that he "wanted no more dead men on his hands."

A genuinely mysterious death took place on January 7 of that year when Capt. Charles Mantell was killed in a crash of his P-51 while chasing what he thought was a flying saucer. The almost certain cause of this tragedy has now been established. Mantell must have blacked out and crashed while pursuing a giant plastic skyhook balloon. These instrument-carrying balloons, sometimes 100 feet or more in diameter, were launched quite frequently during 1948. Although they were easy to see and thus produced a large number of saucer reports, they were officially classified as secret until 1950. Mantell did not know what he had seen; neither did the public. Those who did know couldn't say anything. Imagination ran wild.

For the rest of 1948 and 1949, reports of sightings continued to pour in. The Air Force was naturally interested in any unknown craft that might be cruising U.S. air space and started an investigation. At first the investigators were inexperienced and their explanations were unconvincing. To the believer, simple inefficiency could not account for the garbled reports. The reason was more sinister — conspiracy.

In December, 1949, Major Keyhoe produced his first saucer sensation for True. It was "The Flying Saucers are Real," and was one of the most successful articles in magazine history. By pulling together the best saucer sightings and adding his authoritative-sounding interpretation, Keyhoe managed to convince a lot of people that there were spaceships in the sky. After that everybody jumped in. One news commentator said the saucers were from Russia. Columnist Henry J. Taylor said they were a secret U.S. Air Force project. U.S. News & World Report agreed. Even The New York Times ran an editorial entitled, "Those Flying Saucers — Are They or Aren't They?" True kept banging away with new "revelations." Look publicized "The Hunt for the Flying Saucers." Life asked, "Have We Visitors From Outer Space?" Worried now, the Air Force gave investigation of saucer reports high priority and drafted a panel of civilian scientists to help.

Meteors, mirages, balloons, and a host of other things to be flying saucers to a fused public. There were hoaxes but they were usually and did not form the back of saucer sightings. If som thought he had seen a spacesh was difficult to convince him he had not. Even the Air Force puzzled. As late as 1956, Ed
J. Ruppelt, former head of saucer-investigation project, a book in which he concluded
he had never found any evid that spaceships were cruising earth, but added that all the ports couldn't be written off.
haps the galactic Magellans
there after all.

There were other more typi
American responses. One radio sonality billed himself as "the ing disc jockey." Manufacturer children's toys brought out saucers. There were saucerbur and flying-saucer candy. But lic interest can be maintained rumor for just so long. Reports tinued to come in, but they all of the same vague type.
spaceship landing had ever reliably reported and no little g men had turned up at the W
House. Interest began to fade.

When the saucer tide recede left behind a hard core of dedic believers. And, as is typical of believers, they have split int number of mutually hostile tions.

There have probably been 10 more flying-saucer groups in United States during the last tw ty years. Some have thousands members. Others are composed the founder and a few frie sometimes just the founder. Gro are born, die and are replaced different arrangement of the s people under a new organizati name. One thing they always do they can put a few dollars toge and get their hands on a mi ograph machine, is publish.

On one fringe today are "contactees," those who have a ally seen, talked to, or comm cated telepathically with space
ple. An example of a conta group is The Star Light Fell ship. They meet in New York to hear messages from the sp people "instrumented telepathic through the Direct Voice Met of Mental Channelship by Ja
White Star." Messages are recei from The Interplanetary M

ncil, June of Venus, U-Ray-Ma
Mars and other Buck Rogerish ures. Jackie White Star also rs from Medgar Evers and Pope n XXIII. All messages are a mix-e of hope, cheer and a fuzzy,
stic Christianity.

Flying-saucer contacts are re-rted regularly in the Hollywoodsed Cosmic Star, perhaps the gest metaphysical-psychic publition in the country. The story of California man who boarded a aceship that landed near his me can be found in the same ue with an announcement of a icago psychic convention which ll feature the clairvoyant, Peter rkos.

The most successful contactee
s George Adamski. In 1952, he et and talked with the pilot of a ing saucer from Venus. After at he reported many chats with ace people and even a trip to the oon via saucer. Adamski's book, side the Space Ships, attracted far eater attention than a book of is type usually gets. Until his ath this year he toured the world, cturing on his experiences. Natully Adamski's success inspired a st of imitators.

Somewhere in the middle of the eological road is Saucer News, published by The Saucer and Unexplained Celestial Events Research Society of Fort Lee, N.J. The editors of Saucer News do not automatically accept the claims of the contactees, but are sympathetic to all but the most extravagant. They are interested in the facts of saucer sightings but are equally interested in what they conceive to be the philosophical implications of saucers.

In their June issue, Peter Kor, a veteran of millions of words of saucer speculation, wrote: "The saucer movement is nothing less than a spontaneous religious revolution in process! Almost unconsciously, it is forcing a reformulation of the basic existential questions in the public mind."

On the extreme right of the saucer spectrum is the largest and most influential of the saucer groups, Major Keyhoe's NICAP. Estimates of NICAP membership run as high as 5,000. The group emphatically rejects the contactees and almost all other saucer groups —in fact, it emphatically rejects the term flying saucer. Saucers, they correctly point out, have been seen in many shapes: round, spherical, square and cigarlike, and in many sizes ranging from the tiny to the enormous. They prefer the term Unidentified Flying Objects or UFOs.

The organization has a heavy military-technological bias. Most of the sightings they report seem to take place over military installations and NICAP regards the word of a serviceman, pilot or police officer as far more reliable than that of an ordinary citizen. They devote approximately equal energy to investigating reports and harassing the Air Force.

NICAP has four basic beliefs: (1) That UFOs are spaceships; (2) that the Air Force knows this and is covering up the facts; (3) that the only solution to the UFO problem is a Congressional investigation; and (4) that NICAP is made up of serious, intelligent, responsible people who are not at all like the rest of those saucer nuts.

Understandably, other saucer groups resent this attitude and strike back in various ways. The June issue of Saucer News carried the headline, "Is NICAP an Air Force Front?" The article didn't contain any facts but reached plenty of conclusions: NICAP is headed by an ex-military man and a lot of ex-military men are members; NICAP is also very strict and stuffy compared with other groups. Therefore, NICAP has been set up by the military to smother all real saucer investigation in boredom.

This accusation was comparatively mild. In 1958, Flying Saucers published an article which insisted that NICAP, all the other saucer groups, the Air Force, and just about everyone else were dupes of "minds schooled in deception and contraception [sic] — the elite corps of the Central Intelligence Agency." Just what the CIA was covering up, and why, was not made clear. The conspiracy fantasy plays an important part in saucer lore.

NICAP's drive for respectability is almost touching. It proudly lists its Board of Governors and Advisors, which include engineers, military officers, clergymen, doctors and several professors. Some members also claim that the group includes Congressmen, Senators and a former head of the CIA, although their names are not published.

Keyhoe proudly quotes Barry Goldwater as saying, "I am indeed interested in UFOs. I frankly feel that there is a great deal to this and I have discussed it often with many Air Force officers."

The United States is not the only country with saucer enthusiasts. One of the slickest saucer publications today comes from Japan. The French, who take a more theoretical approach, have contributed much sophisticated pseudo-scientific hash to saucer lore. Aimé Michel claimed that saucers drew their tremendous power from an unknown electromagnetic force.

Brazil has had a particularly embarrassing time with saucers. In 1958, a group of faked saucer pictures was presented to the Brazilian Government. After weeks of dispute they were released to the press as genuine by the President of Brazil himself. On July 12 of this year, The New York Times reported sightings in Britain, France, Portugal, the Azores and Deception Island in the Antarctic.

Science popularizers like Isaac Asimov and Willy Ley have made occasional forays against the saucer enthusiasts. At a lecture Asimov once said, "I think anyone who believes in flying saucers is a crackpot." Most scientists, however, simply don't want to get involved and ignore the whole thing. One who does get involved is the astronomer and astrophysicist Donald H. Menzel. For years, Dr. Menzel has carried on a one-man war with the enthusiasts in books, articles, on radio and television and in the columns of the saucer publications. He has traveled thousands of miles to investigate saucer reports. Among the believers he has a place next to the Air Force as the chief instrument of the powers of darkness.

The saucer enthusiast is ever hopeful. NICAP's The UFO Investigator announces a "wave of important new sightings" in its April issue. Readers are told to prepare, because at any moment a saucer might land where it can be seen by hundreds, or fly at a low altitude over a city where thousands can see it. Failing such contacts, "rapidly growing UFO evidence can end the censorship; more and more cracks have appeared in the secrecy wall."

The breathless anticipation that at any moment they will be proved stunningly right, and all their detractors will bow their heads in shock and shame, keeps saucer morale high. But for how much longer? The saucer groups are probably doomed to extinction as older members die and others, disillusioned by the coyness of the space people, drift off to other interests.

Still, there is something about the saucer myth that holds the imagination. The various g have had some success in recr high school and college stu who could not have experience intoxicating excitement of "th flap." Belief in saucers, as in thing else, generates a sense of munity, and gives the believ feeling of superiority over clo outsiders who refuse to see wh so obvious. It becomes a conve weapon with which to strike at an indifferent government military bureaucracy. It give believer a chance to thumb his at all those smart-guy scie who talk about all sorts of thin can't understand but are too s to know that the world is rounded by spaceships. And important of all, it promises the whole dull pattern of ordi day-to-day life may be drasti altered at any moment, and the chosen few will be prepare the big change.

A saucer renaissance, per touched off by space-explor activity, is always possible.
summer's saucer sightings doubtless made many new conv
Even if the movement does guish, the flying saucer will n really die. It has become, like lantis and the Great Pyramid integral part of mystic litera

PORTUGAL

Imperialism on Credit . . . . .

Antonio de Figueire

London

The comment being made by many Portuguese on the re-election of 70-year-old Admiral Americo Tomas on July 25 for a new seven-year term of office as President was that his insistence on remaining in power could spring only from the naval tradition whereby the captain is expected to go down with his ship. Yet the tranquil façade of Portugal this past summer was such that the casual visitor could hardly have grasped the reasons for this sense of doom.

The apathy of the Portuguese was partly caused by the re-election itself. For the first time since a constitutional amendment abolished universal suffrage in 1959, the President was to be elected by an electoral college comprising the members of the National Assembly, the Corporative Chamber, and representatives of municipalities and legislative councils from Portugal and the overseas provinces. The facts that only 556 of the 582 members of the college turned up for the ceremony, and that there were thirteen blank votes cast in protest for the mere formality of the re-election of a single candidate, seem to indicate that even the long-dormant consciences of some of the power elite in Portugal were pricked by the significance of the event. The constitutional amendment, which c soon after and was partly prom
by General Humberto Delga agitated campaign in 1958, been one of the main factors be the ferment in Portuguese pol over the past few years.

The Portuguese President, head of state, is empowered to point or dismiss the Prime Minis
Dr. Salazar, who is—constitutio ly at least—no more than a str man by proxy. Under universal frage it was theoretically poss for the opponents of the regim elect a candidate of their choice. He would then, accordin plan, dismiss Dr. Salazar, app a new prime minister, and open way for what was known in Po guese politics as "the constitutio coup d'état."

Antonio de Figueiredo is a Portuguese economist now living in exile in London, where he represents the Portuguese Democratic Movement. Mr. Figueiredo is the author of Portugal and Its Empire (Victor Gollancz).

years past, the opposition's ef-centered on this possibility.
n Dr. Salazar was more vigor-they repeatedly saw their plans rated by electoral rigging;
her their candidates resigned he eve of election day or, like ral Delgado, stood for election, achieved little more than the orary embarrassment of the
ne. Now, however, when Dr.
zar's age is a factor in Portue politics, the constitutional ndment has acquired even ter importance; the Presidential ion is bound up with the probof the succession of Dr. Salazar the very survival of the re-
. In the event of Dr. Salazar's h or retirement, the responsiy for the succession of the prime ister will fall on the President;
he event of the latter's death ther equally suitable candidate ld be found for election by the tuguese regime's own electoral ege.

irect universal suffrage still aps for the 130 members of the ional Assembly, whose election takes place later in the year.
the government has refused to w the creation of a Christian nocratic Party, and with censor-
, State Police (PIDE) vigilance doubtful electoral rolls and ctices, the opposition has very e chance to compete against the ernment's own publicly financed tional Union (Uniao Nacional)
ty. Since, in any case, the Na-al Assembly members are only art of the electoral college, and re are still other government lies intervening over the eligibilof candidates, the legalistic cita-has become virtually invulner-
e.

Against this background it necessary to place the element of speration that has characterized opposition's actions. The seizure the Santa Maria in 1961, the rtive Beja uprising in 1962, Genl Delgado's foolhardy conspira-ial visit to Spain that ended in brutal assassination earlier this r are part of a wide and dramatic uggle. The Portuguese opposition unique in that it is the only demotic movement to depart from the spectability of European politics, operate under a central Frente Liberacao Nacional (National eration Front) in exile in Algiers.
Inside Portugal itself two alternaes remain. One, mostly preferred by the younger generation and equally desperate, is to join clandestine organizations, largely controlled by the Communists. These belong either to the classic Partido Comunista, specializing in long-term indoctrination, or to its rival, the more militant F.A.P. (Popular Action Front). Both are linked to the exile movement that operates among the Portuguese settled in Brazil (a former Portuguese colony, still the home of 1 million Portuguese-born); France (where there are an estimated 200,000 Portuguese immigrants, many of them illegal); Morocco, Algiers and wherever Portuguese are found. Lately there have emerged some equally desperate radical and Catholic groups, since Portugal is perhaps the only Catholic country in the world where underground Catholic publications, such as Direito a Informaçao (The Right to Know), are circulated along with illegal Communist newspapers. The other alternative, paradoxically, is the exercise of the only constitutional right that is open to the opposition—that of appealing to the President, such as he is, to dismiss the prime minister and appoint a more conciliatory government.

It has long been a feature of Portuguese politics that groups of elderly men, the identifiable torch carriers of Portuguese liberalism, periodically write to or are received by the President, to whom they try to explain the opposition's view of the state of the nation. The group, Social Democratic Action, is headed by Senhor Cunha Leal, a former Republican prime minister, and Prof. Mario de Azevedo Gomes, a former Republican minister. The group enjoys a semi-tolerated status, partly because five of its fifteen directorate and secretariat members are in their 70s, partly because they are all on indefinite bail for previous charges. Earlier this year, apparently due to a mistake on the part of the censor, their statements were published in a daily Lisbon newspaper. Their periodical submissions to the President, nevertheless, can be said to form a historical record of the opposition's doctrine on national issues, especially those affecting the crucial problem of the empire.

When Dr. Salazar integrated the colonies in the constitution as overseas provinces of a single Portugal, the Social Democrats were quick to warn that the expedient would not work out. The status of colonies, they argued, implied at least a transition; the new status was tantamount to a unilateral territorial annexation that could only lead to trouble, as it meant the perpetuation of Portuguese rule. Successively they alerted the regime to the impending rebellion in Angola in 1961, and tried to find an honorable solution to the Goan question. So far they have been remarkably accurate in their prophesies.

Catherine Merrill

Now, when Portugal is apparently holding its own on three colonial fronts in Portuguese Guinea, Mozambique and Angola (all of which are beset by guerrilla warfare), and despite the existence of a small colonial boom in both Angola and Mozambique (exports have more than doubled in the past few years), the opposition still anticipates disaster. Defense expenditure already takes up as much as 40 per cent of the budgets of Portugal, Angola and Mozambique, often as much as the combined total spent on social assistance and education. Portuguese Guinea, where there are now more Portuguese troops than settlers, has long been a liability. In order to meet the dual task of maintaining an estimated 100,000-man military and police apparatus dispersed in Portuguese Guinea, Angola and Mozambique, and stepping up economic and social development in a race against time, Portugal has had to increase taxes to the extent of wiping out the gradual improvement in living standards that was beginning to be felt after the first thirty years of dictatorial rule.

Moreover, Portugal's economic future is now heavily mortgaged. Since 1961, the flow of incoming capital, through investments and public and private loans, has averaged £30 million annually, a large sum by Portuguese standards. In the crucial year of 1962, West Germany alone contributed with a loan of 250 million marks; from 1963 to 1965, the amount of loans granted by United States and European banks exceeds $100 million, at rates varying from 5½ to 5¾ per cent and terms between five and twenty years. In addition to the already considerable foreign stake in the economies of Portugal, Angola and Mozambique, the opposition argues, the economic partnership offered to West German, Belgian, Japanese, British, American, French and South African investors and creditors will be a threat to Portuguese sovereignty. West Germany, now one of the main exporters of goods and capital to the Portuguese escudo area, already has secured a major military establishment in Portugal, including an air base at Beja.

In addition, the phase of international police collusion with South Africa and Rhodesia has been superseded by an increasing trend toward military and economic integration of Angola and Mozambique in the white supremacist bloc now in the making in southern Africa.

The premise of Dr. Salazar's policies is that financial commitments will be paid by increased earnings with the export trade of the overseas territories. Politically he believes that the apparent incompatibility between Portugal's nonracist legislation and South Africa's apartheid will maintain the distinctive political entity of Angola and Mozambique. On the international level he hopes that the West will eventually and openly rally behind the white-dominated bloc in southern Africa, to form a Formosa-like citadel against the less reliable forces of Pan-Africanism. The Portuguese Foreign Minister, Franco Nogueira, has repeatedly pointed out that the United States and British attitudes toward Southeast Asia are an encouraging precedent for Western support in the event of Africa's own liberation wars, waged from the independent territories north of zambique and Angola.

The long-term risk of such cies, the opposition contends, is Dr. Salazar is committing the co try to perpetual colonialism war; his policies, even in a pu Portuguese context, might be clever by half.

No one welcomes Dr. S zar's imperialism on credit m than the strong white element Mozambique and Angola who now being flooded by South Afri apartheid propaganda. Unless believes that their reactions southern Africa's social and ra environment were miraculously ferent from those of white So Africans and Rhodesians, one easily understand why they are coming increasingly sympathe toward their white neighbors. Angola there are now an estima 220,000 whites as opposed to million blacks; in Mozambique, equivalent figures are 120,000 6.5 million.

Until recently Africans were g erned by a native statute which duced them to the condition wards of the administration; il eracy was as high as 99 per ce Since they did not qualify for t vote, the statute was a natural fo of political apartheid. In 1961, the wave of legislative reforms th were made necessary owing to t international pressure that follow the rebellion in northern Angola, t indigenato system was abolish and the franchise extended to literate Africans. At the same ti education for Africans was stepp up to such an extent that in bo Angola and Mozambique the nu ber of rudimentary schools increas by 50 per cent. New lyceums (hi schools) and technical schools we opened in all main towns; unive sities in both Angola and Moza bique were established in 1964. form of apartheid still persists the requirement of primary (n rudimentary) school examinati for the right to vote. Even so, th overall consequence is that the pe centage of the 1 million-odd Af cans now attending school, wh could qualify for the vote, will in decade or so be greater than tha of white voters. Under Dr. Salaza citizenship rights may mean ve little, but the implications in th future of equality between white and blacks might mean that Afr cans could come to occupy powe gally by sheer weight of numers.

The government's propaganda as managed only to deceive those ho conceive it. It consists of emhasizing, for the benefit of international diplomatic opinion, the omparison in negatives between he alleged Portuguese racial tolerance and South Africa's apartheid, r the segregation prevailing in colnies formerly under British rule. ccording to the regime's theorists, he Portuguese were somehow enowed with a historical vocation for ontacts with peoples of different aces and creeds. The fact is that n southern Africa apartheid is the bsolute negative on which all comarisons must be based; as long ago s the 1940s, the South Africans ave been saying that the Rhodeians, the Mozambicans and the ngolans would adopt apartheid when conditions were ripe.

The racial tolerance of the Portuguese for Africans in their own land s still based on a deeply ingrained sense of their own racial superiority. n practice it results from the differences in income and social standards which run along the boundaries of race, thus creating a natural color barrier in everyday life. The changes that will follow the simultaneous rise in living standards of a new class of African white-collar workers—including education and the franchise—have introduced incipient racist philosophies into minds of white Angolans and Mozambicans. These, however, are disguised in oversimplified forms of ideological suspicion toward the hundreds of Africans who are now jailed for nationalist activities. Already Dr. Salazar has had to curb the sympathetic tendencies of high-ranking military and administrative people who, after only a brief term of duty among Angolans and Mozambicans, have come to share the view that the future of Portuguese reaction is in the untapped territories of Angola and Mozambique, not in impoverished and exiguous Portugal.

In order to escape the dangers of African independence, Portugal is likely to end up, just the same as a bad debtor, after losing the colonies to the white Angolans and Mozambicans. Any major dislocation in Portugal, such as might be caused by Salazar's death, will be the white settlers' golden opportunity to follow the example of Rhodesia in proclaiming their own unilateral declaration of independence. In such circumstances Portugal would have crowned its long imperialist exploitation of Angola and Mozambique by contributing to the creation of a bloc in southern Africa that would, in years to come, be a threat to peace in Africa and the world. The establishment of foreign bases in Portugal, coupled with a keener interest on the part of Spain in the future of the only rebel Iberians who succeeded in escaping the rule of Madrid, is seen as an indication that Portugal's imperialism in Africa is being made at the expense of Portugal's own subordination to foreign influence.

These are some of the main factors that explain the sense of doom of Portuguese democrats. While the attentions of the world are diverted to successive crises in Vietnam and the frontiers of the cold war, they know that it would be useless to make pathetic appeals for the solidarity of progressive opinion in the world. Therefore, in my efforts here to state the case of the silenced and oppressed Portuguese democrats, I feel I should not mislead with partisan optimism. It is a painful fact that the assistance provided by the West and NATO to Salazar's regime is for the time being achieving some measure of containment, or postponement, of Portugal's moment of truth.

When one reflects on the race between the various forces that make up Portuguese politics — fascism, capitalism, white separatism, racial supremacy on the one hand, and those of radicalism, African nationalism, liberalism, communism on the other — one wonders how long a regime embodied in a 76-year-old dictator can last. The danger in the Portuguese situation is that no one, not even Salazar, really knows. The regime itself, in a recent statement refusing the creation of a Christian Democratic Party, admitted the possibility of civil war if parties were tolerated. By implication, it acknowledged that after forty years it can still do no better than impose a policy of containment in which peace is a euphemism for oppression. Perhaps the world, when it finally finds a solution for Vietnam, will discover that the process of disintegration of the Portuguese empire also did not develop overnight —it fermented in neglect until it was too far advanced for United Nations peace missions to bring a solution.

Whatever Happened to the State Department?

Charles W. Tait

In the first half of 1965 three events gave evidence of a dangerous new turn in American foreign policy: the dropping of Belgian paratroopers on Stanleyville, combined with support of the white South African mercenaries; the bombing of North Vietnam and commitment of American ground troops to South Vietnam in large numbers; and the unilateral military invasion of the Dominican Republic. Common to all three moves is an open reliance on military force. It is no longer a simple question of whether military men are making decisions that they are not qualified to make—and are supposedly forbidden to make under our tradition of government. They are making such decisions because our foreign policy is in the hands of civilians who are unable to view the world in other than military terms, because the military's overconfidence in solutions by force of arms and its restless impatience with less direct methods have infected civilian policy makers. And this has happened because the President, the Congress and much of the press have accepted the dangerously oversimplified view that

---

Charles W. Tait was formerly an intelligence research specialist in the Department of State.

America's foreign-policy problems are military, to be decided by military means, and at times and places of America's choosing.

More than ten years ago, C. Wright Mills described in The Power Elite how the American Government had come to view international reality in purely military terms. He showed how we had become convinced that peace was no longer a real goal but, at best, only "an uneasy interlude existing precariously by virtue of the balance of mutual fright." Similarly, in his lectures at Princeton in 1954 (Realities of American Foreign Policy, Princeton University Press), George Kennan pointed out how military considerations had become for us the only reality, and called attention to the dangers arising from our concentration on the military aspect of the Soviet threat. Both Mills and Kennan deplored the neglect of diplomacy that resulted from this change of view.

Subsequent events have only confirmed what Mills and Kennan said a decade ago. Having solved to our satisfaction the problem of containing communism by a system of military alliances and foreign bases, we believe that we have now also perfected the military means for solving the problem of Communist revolution and military insurrection within the perimeter of our influence. We have the military and technical means to intervene quickly and decisively almost anywhere in the world, without consulting anyone, without regard for treaties, and without even a decent regard for the opinions of mankind. And we have shown this year that we intend to make full use of these means whenever and wherever we are convinced that the situation calls for them.

Where is this to stop? Already there are signs that a conflict with China, far from being something we are trying to prevent, may be something we are trying to provoke. A section of the American military wanted to launch a nuclear attack on the Soviet Union in the years before the Russians had acquired their own atomic bombs. Given the background of American fear of China and the smarting, among the military, over the stalemated war in Korea, it is plausible that these views should again come to the surface as China moves toward nuclear arms. Surely we do not believe our own assertion that the escalated war in Vietnam, a war reaching up to the very borders of China, will provoke no Chinese response. It could be that we would welcome a response, any response, which would give us the pretense for a massive nuclear strike against China.

How has the military view of foreign affairs come to dominate the American mind? Our high command won a great victory in World War II, and won for itself great power and prestige as a consequence. Out of that war came vast new problems and responsibilities, and the military leaders seemed the only ones capable of handling them successfully. So General Marshall was entrusted with the important mission to China and later became Secretary of State.

But the military also controlled the two defeated and occupied enemy powers, Germany and Japan. In the chaotic postwar years, in the developing cold war, this meant a military control of policy in both Asia and Europe. The creation of NATO and the rearming of Western Germany as a full-fledged military partner have given a permanent military cast to American policy in Europe. In the Far East, Communist victory in China, followed almost at once by the invasion of South Korea, led to a permanent militarization of U.S. policy in that area as well.

In the absence of any other view, a military interpretation of foreign affairs was inevitable, and led to the permanent ascendancy within the counsels of government of military men. The aim of U.S. foreign policy has become the formation of military alliances, the establishment of military bases, the development of military-aid programs — even in areas such as Latin America, remote from Communist military threats. As the war-damaged economies of Europe and Asia recovered, foreign economic aid became foreign military aid, and the export of American military equipment is now a principal activity of the Pentagon. Military staffs have become a prominent part of every diplomatic mission and often overshadow all other diplomatic functions.

As a result, we have accepted the view which no other Western government has ever accepted (and no Communist government either, for that matter) that foreign-policy problems are basically military problems, that in fact the conduct of foreign policy is basically a mil tary exercise. Everything from th European Common Market to th Indian development plan is viewe from a military perspective and, there is trouble in an area like Vie nam, General Collins must be se out to appraise the situation an make recommendations. If the situation gets worse, General Taylor mus be dispatched to solve it. And if becomes desperate, the resources c all four armed services must be directly employed in force.

Yet it is not right to tal loosely of military control of for eign policy. Soldiers have not seize power—they have done what the have been asked to do by their civi ian superiors. It is not their fault i their way of looking at things, thei way of solving problems, has bee taken over as national policy. Civilians, represented by McNamara McCone and Bundy, have convince a President who is unsure of himself in affairs abroad that militar solutions offer the quickest an most effective answers to the problems of foreign policy. The attraction lies not only in the directnes and simplicity of actual militar force. The air of technical efficienc and objectivity which surrounds decisions made by computers; the impressive apparatus of intelligenc agencies with their networks o agents and almost instantaneou transmission of top-secret, evaluate intelligence to policy makers; th jet transports, aircraft carriers, helicopters, radio communications from Pentagon to forward command pos —all these give an illusion of purposeful action. Is it any wonder tha they impress men who worship technical gadgetry and pride themselve on their ability to make speedy executive decisions?

Unfortunately, even the most refined gadgetry cannot be a substitute for knowledge of men—knowledge of their history and knowledge of how and why they think and ac as they do. David Halberstam, appraising McNamara's performance as Secretary of Defense, has sai that he understands everything "except men and ideas." It is ironic tha the first civilian Secretary of Defense to establish control over the Pentagon should end up as its mos abject captive because he canno understand the strange ideas, and still stranger behavior, of the men of Vietnam. But he is not alone in his ignorance and bewilderment.

essors, who are supposed to be icularly clever with ideas, have the same difficulties.
cGeorge Bundy, the President's cipal adviser on national se-ty affairs, spoke to the Harvard pter of Phi Beta Kappa last June he four basic elements this na-must consider in its relations the rest of the world. They e, in his view: U.S. military er as the key to peace; limited of the United Nations; foreign and the threat of communism.
Bundy's list is an accurate sumy of what the Administration as the true situation, with milipower in first place. Conspiculy absent from his list of reali-are the nationalism, anti-coloism and social revolution which convulsing Asia, Africa and in America, and the manifestas of which take up a lot of Mr.
dy's time in Washington and field trips as well. Of course, se factors do appear in Bundy's
—they are part of his definition the threat of communism which must oppose with military ans, with economic aid and,
en it suits our convenience, with ited use of the United Nations.
in the end Bundy's view of rey is as oversimplified and dis-ted as McNamara's. He too has understanding of men and ideas, d prefers to move in the more nageable world of military pow-economics and empty oratory ore the United Nations.

Finally, the President himself has licated in his many public statents on Vietnam and Santo Do-ngo that he has adopted the view reality that sees only a vast Com-nist conspiracy and armed agession that must be halted by surior military power, or bought off vague promises of economic aid.
s actions and his statements bey an ignorance of how other untries feel. President of a coun-convulsed by racial troubles, he n see no harm in sending white lgian paratroopers into Stanley-le and supporting white South rican mercenaries in the Congo.
can order Marines to Santo Do-ngo, without even notifying the S of his intentions, when Marines the very symbol of U.S. interrence in the affairs of the Cariban republics. He can insist on the ntinued military occupation and rtition of Vietnam, under a pup-t government lacking any au-ority among its own people and held in power only by American power, and then go solemnly before the UN and ask that the northern part of that country, which he has placed under ceaseless air attack, be pressured into ceasing its aggression against its neighbor. These actions bespeak a poor sense of judgment in the White House, a loss of the sense of reality, a grasping at military straws, while the great waves of events beat over the heads of bewildered advisers and planners.

The United States Government has always said that the danger posed by Communist Russia and China flows from three sources: their aggressive, messianic pretensions toward the rest of the world; their highly developed military machines; and their ignorance of the true state of affairs outside their own borders, especially of their adversaries' willingness to fight. Yet even in the most trying days of Stalin we could count on the political prudence of the Soviet leaders and on their strict control over the Red army. But now in our own government, the boundary between responsible political judgment and rash military action has broken down. And it has done so because we have developed our own aggressive and messianic pretensions toward the rest of the world, and have misjudged both the limits of our own military power and the strength and determination of the forces arrayed against us. Just as the Germans and Japanese by 1941 had become reckless from their long series of easy victories and the steady retreat of their opponents, we too are now dizzy with success. Our victories in the Second World War, our holding the line in Germany, Korea and Formosa, our successful confrontation with Russia over Cuba—all these have given us an exaggerated confidence in our cleverness and strength, a disdain for prudence and compromise, and an itching desire to move on to greater and more decisive victories.

Perhaps none of this would have happened so easily if we had had all these years a vigorous and effective State Department with a decisive voice in the formation of American foreign policy. We do have a State Department and a foreign service, but the index of its present effectiveness and role in policy making has been Mr. Rusk's infrequent appearances this year to state the Administration's policies. Ten years ago, C. Wright Mills pointed out that America lacked a genuine civil service, and that nowhere was the lack of professional competence and detached judgment more conspicuous than in the Department of State. Prior to the Second World War we had a small and highly competent body of professionals in the foreign service; it matched, more or less, the rather limited role we chose to play in world affairs as a detached, neutral nation. But we had never developed a service that was fully professional —ambassadorial appointments remained part of the political spoils system, and the American people deeply distrusted both diplomacy and diplomats.

As the United States role in world affairs expanded rapidly after 1941, the State Department and the foreign service failed to expand correspondingly in power and influence. The basic reason for this was that our involvement, when it came, was overwhelmingly military, but continuing hostility and suspicion in Congress played its full part. So did the prominence of economic aid in our relations with other countries. The State Department voice became only one of many speaking on foreign affairs, and it was often a weak voice treating of things hard to understand and even harder to accept. For it was the unexpected victory of the Communist revolution in China, coming at a time when the United States was most apprehensive about the dangers of internal Communist subversion, which struck the first blow at the professionals of the department and foreign service. The campaign against the department was carried on by Sen. Joseph McCarthy, but it was aided and abetted by the new Republican Secretary of State who took office in January, 1953. John Foster Dulles not only failed to shield his department from attack; he gave the attackers key positions in the department from which to launch their destructive activities. He went far toward emasculating the department by disbanding the Policy Planning staff and by adopting an Olympian disregard for all internal counsel not in accord with his own rather simple and fixed ideas.

The result has been to reduce the Department of State and the foreign service to the status of a second-echelon agency that conducts certain technical overseas operations of the U.S. Government. It is difficult to believe that the State Department, if it had had any real say in the decisions made this year, would have allowed matters to proceed as they have. At the very least, it would have urged a greater solicitude for the political sensitivities of African and Latin American states, more recourse to consultation and discussion with friends and allies, keener appreciation of the long-range political effects of precipitate military actions. And from these there might even have arisen different policies!

The eclipse of the State Department has been accompanied by the rise of the Central Intelligence Agency to a decisive position of power in the formation of American foreign policy. This inscrutable agency had its origin in the wartime intelligence and secret-operation organization of the OSS, and it has never lost its semi-military character, its close links with the Pentagon, its access to unlimited funds, and its freedom from Congressional scrutiny and control. Designed originally as a central clearing house for intelligence and as the agency responsible for operating spy networks overseas, the CIA has grown to monstrous proportions. It is agency whose views seem to ca most weight with the Adminis tion's policy makers; and it c ducts its own foreign policy thro its clandestine operations on all c tinents. It commands an impress technical apparatus, and can gr out at short order imposing in ligence reports on any subject, h ever abstruse, on any country, h ever remote. Like McNamara's P tagon, it sports that indefinable of the go-ahead, no-nonsense, 20 century corporation which can liver reliable technical data in shortest of time to busy executi who themselves must make s technical decisions.

But the CIA has never been a to transcend its military and c spiratorial origins, either in its vi of reality as a whole, or in its e mate of concrete situations. Si the agency is committed to all ki of doubtful operations aimed changing and influencing the cou of events in critical areas, it is able to separate its intelligence ju ment from its desire to see s operations succeed. The most tra instance was the Bay of Pigs aster, yet despite this and other backs, the agency has remained p eminent in the counsel of the ministration, not only because intelligence it provides is so mu more "definite" and "concrete" th that provided by the State Depa ment but because it embraces same view of reality held by Pentagon and White House.

Finally, much of the bla for the permanent ascendancy the military point of view in world relationships must be laid
Congress and the national pre
Few Congressmen have lived outs
the United States for any length time. Because of this isolation a the limited vision that goes with few legislators arrive in Washi ton with any background kno edge of foreign affairs. On other hand, most Congressmen ha spent some part of their lives the armed forces, and a very c siderable number keep up active serve commissions. This means the very least that the military joy an understanding of and ceptivity toward their point of vi
And often it means active supp
in Congress for the military posit and a readiness to accept all-military demands which have be rejected even by the civilian sec es of the various military de-tments. The Pentagon has used ample supply of officers and its sh budget to keep Congress well plied with military liaison offi-s—that is, lobbyists. And it has de sure that committees and npathetic Congressmen and Sen-rs are fed with a version of nts that supports the military's atiable demand—not only for re men and equipment—but for re and more say in the determi-ion of foreign policy.

As for the press, it is not on-that some columnists manage to the military view before the pub-disguised as impartial, objective nment, and not only that the ve views of people like General vers are widely syndicated. In its ndling of foreign news the press
s two steps further. First, the sh of an American helicopter es as more important news than fall of a civilian government in tnam. Even David Halberstam, former Times correspondent in tnam, reveals inadvertently in book how inadequate his view
s. He was reporting on a war, d more particularly on the Amerins participating in that war. Very le of his time went into the Vietmese side of it; he shows al-st no understanding of the colo-l background and the French inlvement after 1945. Is it any won-r that Halberstam accepts un-tically the necessity for the war?
this is the best that American wspapers can do, the public must vitably remain ignorant of what really happening in the world.
ain, the reporting in the Ameri-
n press of the rescue from Stan-yville last winter was a vivid in-nce of the failure of the press to form and clarify, because all atntion was focused on the "humanterest" aspect of Americans being amatically rescued from crazed ommunist" insurrectionists. How any papers took the trouble to etch the tortured background of ese events, to explain the violent rican reaction to them, or even print the interview with the res-ed American consul who denied ntly that the rebels were Commu-
sts?

Furthermore, the American press
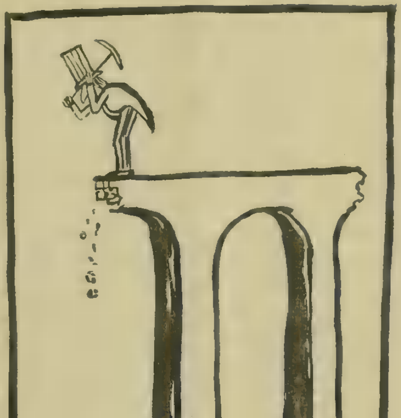
ils to report how responsible iends of the United States view a oblem like Vietnam or Santo Do-ingo, and how they react to what e are doing there. To an alarming degree the American press handles foreign opinion as does the Soviet press. It selects those foreign statesmen and newspapers that support American policy, and omits all qualifications and reservations. Outright criticism is ignored or put down to perverse anti-Americanism, Communist influence or both. It is unlikely that more than a handful of Americans are aware of the sober, restrained criticism of our actions that has appeared in the London Observer, and in the counterparts to that paper from Oslo to Tokyo.

Yet at no time since the thirties has the United States been more divided in feelings and attitudes from the outside world, and the separation is not confined to the questions of Vietnam and the Dominican Republic. The other nations can see, if we will not, the dangers that our policies present to the peace and stability of the world. And the critical issue is that policies based on a military view of reality are being pushed to their logical limit by the very party and Administration that claims to represent liberalism, respect for other nations and a patient search for world peace.

What can be done to bring sanity back into our conduct of foreign affairs, to prevent the steady escalation toward a nuclear war with China, and possibly with Russia as well? Even though Congress dutifully endorsed the Administration's actions in Vietnam and the Dominican Republic and issued a blank check for further such actions, there are signs of unrest among responsible Congressional leaders, especially in the Senate. Senator Fulbright's speech on Vietnam recognizes the true Vietnam situation —that a military victory cannot be won, and that major concessions will have to be made by us as well as by the other side. But Congressional action must go much further in the direction of open opposition. The crisis demands it, and the opportunity now exists because the present Congress contains enough new men in both houses who have broken free, at least in part, from the stereotyped military thinking of their immediate predecessors. Only open, determined opposition in Congress will force the President and his Administration to face the facts of the external world.



Maybe the moment is also at hand to attempt to reconstruct the State Department and foreign service into the professionally competent and effective body that this country needs if it is to play its responsible part in the world. This means an end to the use of ambassadorial posts as political pay-offs, and to the spirit of dilettantism that underlies it. But it means also a recovery of respect for professional diplomacy. It means a readiness to seek patiently after peace and stability, to take the long-term view (which implies taking the past seriously), and a willingness to grasp the powerful historical forces which are changing the face of the earth and our place on it.

Perhaps such reform will occur only when a sizable portion of the American people are converted to reality in foreign affairs, when they are willing to drop their fear of revolution and communism, their misplaced faith in military solutions and pious oratory at the UN. This would mean listening to someone like George Kennan, even to General de Gaulle, to say nothing of Romulo Betancourt and Jomo Kenyatta. But meanwhile we have a right to expect that our elected officials, both in the White House and Congress, will do some of this listening and pause before it is too late. And we may hope that our press will help us see the world as it is and hear some of the voices speaking the truth. At the moment these voices are drowned out by the roar of helicopters, jet fighters and machine guns.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Flannery O'Connor: Faith's Stepchild

EVERYTHING THAT RISES MUST CONVERGE. By Flannery O'Connor. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 269 pp. $4.95.

Webster Schott

After reading Flannery O'Connor's final stories I ended the night listening to the mathematical music of the baroque. Order had to be restored, the monsters exorcised from the imagination and pressed back into her fiction.

Losers all, her characters act out the Gothic rituals of defeat and destruction in the nightmare American South. And if Miss O'Connor's god was ever aware of them (a problem to return to eventually), he is now obliviously sawing logs in heaven, as Pär Lagerkvist suggested in The Eternal Smile. Let them kill and be killed or grind their teeth in anticipation.

There are nine stories here, all episodes of fatal error and ironic retribution—modern Old Testament scenes in eschatology as the earth binds winding sheets around her failures. First a fat white woman, beaten to the pavement for offering a Negro boy a penny at the end of a bus ride, dies of a stroke or heart attack. Next a farm spinster is gored to death by the bull she commanded her hired man to shoot. A progress-crazed old farmer in "A View of the Woods" pounds his 9-year-old granddaughter's skull against rocks until her "eyes were fixed in a glare that did not take him in"; then he staggers suicidally into a lake as immense as his guilt. In "The Comforts of Home" a son accidentally shoots his mother; he was aiming at their slut boarder. In "The Lame Shall Enter First" a child hangs himself after seeing his dead mother waving from a distant star. In "Judgment Day," the only story placed in the North, an ancient Southern D. P. headed home to die gets as far as the stairs and expires; the Negro in the next apartment shoves the corpse's head, arms and legs through the spokes of a staircase as if in a stock. The last three stories settle for purgatory: an invalid intellectual returns to Georgia and waits for the water-stain holy ghost to descend from the ceiling above his bed. A maniacal ex-sailor, with a Byzantine Jesus tattooed on his back, wails against a tree, unrecognized, like Christ crucified. A self-righteous hog raiser, deranged by accusation and assault, sees a vision of herself at the very end of a heavenly procession led by white trash, bands of "black niggers in white robes and battalions of freaks and lunatics shouting and clapping and leaping like frogs."

Flannery O'Connor ventured into the world. She was born and reared in Georgia, and died there a year ago at the age of 38. But she lived as an adult in New York City, Connecticut and Iowa City, where she studied in Paul Engle's Writer's Workshop. She lectured and read in at least five states and visited France and Italy. Yet all her fiction—these stories; her first collection, A Good Man Is Hard to Find (1955); her two novels, Wise Blood (1952) and The Violent Bear It Away (1960)—rise out of the Baptist South. Their recurring ethos is that hereditary conflict of wills one imagines warring behind closed doors as he drives lost at twilight on a back road near the battlefield at Vicksburg. Like an expert on one function of the spleen, she chose a small territory of soil and soul and treated it as though nothing else really existed. Human behavior beyond distorted Christianity, outside the lower social orders of the rural South and the domestic arrangements of widowed parents and their children, is perceived as if by accident.

She had only a few ideas, but messianic feelings about them. Children and parents, rarely husbands and wives or brothers and sisters, strike at one another. The family unit—not society as a whole—opens the trap to dysfunction and cataclysm. Only the land, trees and sky possess beauty. Her adults look like mistakes; even her children are ugly. Love enters her stories as the comprehension of loss after death of a child or parent.

Her chief characters belong to genus Southern Neanderthal. Th minds are pre-Darwinian and p Christian. The only belief that mi make a difference in their lives Baptist literalism. Like astrology, nonfunctional, but provides a defens reflex system against thought. M O'Connor's Negroes are "niggers," dowed with physical strength, gr fears and animal survival powers. I intellectuals — a college profess schoolteacher, social worker, th failed writers and a Wellesley girl create special hells. They know ab paperback books, psychic compen tion, electric blankets, racial equal but nothing about themselves. E cated atheists, they can claim more stability than the red-necl semi-literates they loathe. Flann O'Connor's reality is destiny out control, choices made after alter tives have been frozen. To begin of her stories is to anticipate its e The only questions are how the dre ful punishment for living will be livered and in what manner savage sense of humor will delay agony.

"If nothing happened, ther no story," Flannery O'Connor once s to Robert Fitzgerald. Events take pla words are spoken in her stories reasons her characters would not derstand. Buried in their psychic h tories, black flowers of chaos blo because Miss O'Connor creates the The tattooed Parker marries a wom he does not love. The social work Sheppard, persists at rehabilitating psychopathic youth even though boy is destroying his own son. H characters aspire to the impossible of mysterious inner needs. We beli in them because Flannery O'Conn visionary logic descends on us like clamp. Intelligence says wait. But emotions follow her to exhausti She had the fictionalist's only requis gift—a genius for deception.

"I think the first thing you ne to realize about fiction," she wrote one of her nun correspondents, "is the writer [tries] to see an action, a series of actions, clearly. To ma anyone see a thing, you have to straight out what it is, you have describe it with the greatest accura The fiction writer is concerned w the way the world looks first of all."

The phenomena of sight obsess

Webster Schott is literary editor of Focus/Midwest and reviews for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and The Christian Science Monitor.

. Events and revelations come in ngs of optical epiphanies. What characters see and how they see the colors of their eyes and the ections in them, their visions in is or at the instant of death, the y of hues and shadows in trees and , reinforce what we feel about the e-man inside the shell.

Before the reducing class at the the fat woman's sky-blue eyes in title story are "as innocent and ouched by experience as they st have been when she was ten." mpled like a blimp after the hand- blitzkreig, she seeps into death. e eye, large and staring, moved htly to the left as if it had become noored. The other remained fixed him [her son], raked his face again, nd nothing and closed." Lights 't farther away the faster the youth s for help. Darkness and his sins ep him back to her.

Vindows to the soul, eyes signal ludes and clues to action and mean- . Visions and vistas serve as codas. "same pale slate color as the an," O. E. Parker's eyes "reflected innocent spaces around him as if y were a microcosm of the mys- ous sea." The Jesus tattooed on his k as a desperate gesture to make tact with his wife has "eyes to be yed." His wife cannot recognize the us. "He don't look. . . . No man ll see his face." She watches Parker, ing like a baby against the pecan , welts forming on the face of his ooed Christ, and "her eyes harden- still more." As the horns pierce her y, Mrs. May in "Greenleaf" had look of a person whose sight has n suddenly restored but who finds light unbearable." Smell, sound, esthesis orient Miss O'Connor's racters. Vision directs them; emo- nal stimuli enter through their eyes. eir frustrating pasts, obliquely ed, turn their responses into acts hostility, hatred, violence. Curiously, are denied the sensuality of sex. introduce the erotic would have en Miss O'Connor outside the psy- physical graveyard. She was, ap- ently, never in love.

lannery O'Connor is everywhere in stories. She entered fiction by way of painting and cartooning, which partly accounts for the visual intensity. Many of her characters struggle to walk or move in their states of shock; she herself used crutches when these stories were written. Like most of her characters, the continuous personal presence in her life was one parent—her widowed mother. One sees the spinster author sitting in bed, paring her fingernails and watching the peacocks on her farm, tolerating the ministrations, wandering through visions of violence in the distances surrounding her. Along with physical pain, sight was the most intense sensual experience available to her. Enlarged by a medieval religious attraction to the manifestations of evil, sight gave her art its phantasmagorial reality.

The most imaginatively endowed Roman Catholic writer the United States has developed, Flannery O'Connor once said of the eucharistic symbol, "If it were only a symbol, I'd say to hell with it." She received the last sacraments before her death in Milledgeville. She went to mass every day when she lived with Robert Fitzgerald and his wife in Connecticut in 1949 and 1950. When lupus (the disease that eventually killed her) got worse in 1957, she went to Lourdes and then to Rome for an audience with Pius XII. At Notre Dame that year she had said: "The Catholic sacramental view of life is one that maintains and supports at every turn the vision that the storyteller must have if he is going to write fiction of any depth." She chose the title of this book from Teilhard de Chardin, the evolutionist Jesuit theologian who theorized that matter and spirit would eventually converge at "point omega." Judging from Fitzgerald's introduction and the evidence of the stories, she did it for ironic effect. Flannery O'Connor must have viewed Chardin as another "interleckchul" and Vatican II an "Eyetalian" conspiracy against the blood of Christ and the one true faith.

Her Catholicism belongs, it seems to me, somewhere near the time of the Inquisition. The village priest in "The Enduring Chill" is a hard-of-hearing country bumpkin. "You will never learn to be good unless you pray regularly," he says, when Asbury Fox asks him what he thinks of James Joyce. Ignatius Vogle, S. J., appears briefly in the same story to suggest the "real probability of the

ATTENTION SUBSCRIBERS

Please turn to page 148 for special NATION announcement

"...the churches have been so caught up in the inertia of a white privileged class that they have betrayed their gospel..."

—ROBERT W. SPIKE

In his new handbook, this front-line integration leader shows churches the "why" and "how" and the urgency of their involvement in the civil rights movement—NOW.

"It is 'must' reading that should win a place alongside the [illegible] commentary of King, Baldwin, Lomax and Silver."
—[illegible] FACKRE, The Christian Century

"Every church member, and especially those who have had honest misgivings about church involvement in the civil rights crisis, should read this book. . . . Perhaps this book can add urgency to the search for new structures of congregational life, discussion, and worship which can mobilize the lay man and woman for a new kind of participation in the world. Let us hope so."
—[illegible], Director
Commission on Social Welfare, N.C.C.

The Freedom Revolution and the Churches

by ROBERT W. SPIKE,
Executive Director, Commission on Religion and Race, N.C.C.

At all bookstores, $2.95

ASSOCIATION PRESS
291 Broadway
New York, N.Y. 10007

New Man, assisted, of course, by the Third Person of the Trinity." Very cool, he has the same trouble as Asbury and looks beyond the cross. He's too damned smart.

On three occasions in the Gospel according to John, Jesus calls the devil "the ruler of this world," and in Flannery O'Connor's stories evil is man's inevitable fate. Helplessly enveloped by satanic emanations, her characters sense the poisons, breathe deeper and sink. "Pride is the queen and mother of all vices," Thomas Aquinas said with rhetorical affection. The loss of Paradise was the price Adam and Eve paid for their pride. In every story, Flannery O'Connor's characters aspire beyond their capabilities. Asbury tries to write and can't. He attempts to liberate Negroes and instead gets undulant fever and his mother's banalities. Sheppard, in "The Lame Shall Enter First," cannot possibly rehabilitate a monster who has the intelligence of a near-genius and the will to destroy his child. Thomas, another would-be writer living on his vanity and his mother, in "The Comforts of Home," stumbles into matricide when he exceeds his psychological potentialities. O. E. Parker tries to have himself tattooed out of anxiety—his solitary fate—and into love. He goes down the emotional drain with Jesus on his back.

Vanity corrupts Christian belief, selfless intention, personal sacrific "To help anybody out that need it was her philosophy in life," M Turpin tells herself in "Revelation In the doctor's waiting room as s says, "Thank you, Jesus, for maki everything the way it is," she ge socked in the eye and thrown to t floor. Grandpa Fortune tries f wealth and progress and succeeds murder. The boy Norton acquires belief in God and hangs himself ov it; the delinquent Johnson believ so strongly in the Bible that he tea out a page, eats it and goes on his life of crime.

According to Christian orthodox everything is inverted in Flanne O'Conner's stories. No one can fi happiness or salvation. No one a quires the grace she speaks of. H South is Salem metamorphosed; would take a Second Coming to gi her people hope.

In one of her letters to the nove ist, Richard G. Stern, Flanne O'Connor said to look up Joh Hawkes in Providence because h was a good writer. Despite her a tacks on existentialists, she saw th world in the same distorted an sinister form as did Hawkes. Sh dramatized Sartre's hell of oth people. She confirmed James Purdy conviction that love is impossib in the present. Pagan Christian symbols and practices frame her wor Ignorant fundamentalism, not Catholic pageantry and transubstantiatio haunts the preachers and believe in her stories and novels. Why, on wonders, could she not write length about Catholics? Why did sh choose as her larger models the mi shapen Oral Robertses of the South She selected those properties Christianity that served to justify he black reality. The emerging Catholi theology that implies the visitatio of Christ may have regenerated ma ter and dignified all of life wa anti-art and personally intolerabl It denied her particular vision hell on earth. She talked about fre will, the sacramental view, redem tion by Christ. But her characte have no real choice — only fai glimmers of possibilities lost.

Flannery O'Connor's work is fille with irony — small hope turned t great despair, rewards transforme into punishments, seriousness mocked by comedy, vanity in modest hate in place of love, grotesque disguised as simplicity. But the del cious irony probably escaped he

(Continued on page 146)

SOCIALIST SCHOLARS CONFERENCE

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY — McMILLIN THEATER
September 11-12, 1965

PANEL I —9:35 A.M., Sept. 11: Class and Ideology
Chairman: H. H. Wilson
Papers: Richard Hamilton, Eleanor Leacock
Commentators: Vernon K. Dibble, James F. Becker

PANEL II —2:30 P.M., Sept. 11: Modern Imperialism
Chairman: Paul M. Sweezy
Paper: Conor Cruise O'Brien
Commentators: Timothy Harding, A. Norman Klein, Said Shah

PANEL III—9:30 A.M., Sept. 12: American Conservatism
Chairman: Alan Trachtenberg
Papers: Allen Guttmann, Warren Susman
Commentators: Norman Dain, Eileen Kraditor

PANEL IV—2:45 P.M., Sept. 12: The Future of American Socialism
Chairman: Ann Lane
Discussion Leader: Staughton Lynd
Discussants: Herbert Aptheker, Norm Fruchter,
Eugene D. Genovese, Sylvester Leaks

Registration: 9:00 A.M., Sept. 11 and 12. Full registration fee $5.00
Students any sum between full registration fee and $1.00

Luncheons: John Jay Hall, Sept. 11 and 12, 12:30 P.M., $2.50 each

Dinner: John Jay Hall, Sept. 11, 6:30 P.M., $5.00
Dinner Address, 8:00 P.M.—Maxwell Geismar

SPECIAL LATIN AMERICAN ISSUE

August — WORLD MARXIST REVIEW carries: 8 articles on present situation and perspectives
A Supplement: Latin America, Yesterday and Today

July — WORLD MARXIST REVIEW carries: Social Doctrine of the Vatican and the 20th Century

Single Copies 50c per issue; $3.50 for yearly sub.
NEW ERA BOOKS, 80 East 11th St., New York 10003, Room 212

NINE-YEAR MINE-MILL CONSPIRACY CASE GOES TO U. S. SUPREME COURT

nited Auto Workers

We oppose governmental harassment of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. . . . The civil liberties of that union must be protected in the interest of ensuring the civil liberties of all unions.

mal. Meat Cutters Butcher Workmen

We . . . feel that a great miscarriage of justice is being perpetrated upon a union that deserves to live.

eamsters Union

We feel that it is of vital importance that we lend our aid to make sure that trade unionists are fully protected against the abuses that grow out of the use of conspiracy charges by the government.

lational Farmers Union

. . . The Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers have not been fairly treated.

ulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers

. . . The conspiracy charges against these officials of the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers is a matter of grave concern to all sections of our American trade union movement.

ntl. Typographical Union

. . . The 107th Convention . . . authorizes the Executive Council to join with the American Civil Liberties Union, and other trade unions . . . seeking reversal of these convictions.

National Maritime Union

We are deeply concerned about the persecution of some of the officers of your International, and it was the decision of the National Office . . . to aid in your appeal of the "conspiracy charge" . . . which threatens the entire labor movement.

United Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers

We have regarded the accusations against the leaders of your union . . . as part of an employer-inspired conspiracy to weaken and divide a militant American trade union and to hamper the efforts to protect and advance the interests of its members.

The American Civil Liberties Union will soon file a brief with the U. S. Supreme Court asking the court to review the conviction, after a second trial, of six past and present officials of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. The six have been charged with conspiracy to defraud the gvoernment with the filing of false non-Communist Taft-Hartley affidavits.

Also asking for Supreme Court review will be several international unions. The concern of these unions in Mine-Mill's defense stems from the following:

- The indictment, charging a "conspiracy" dating back 16 years, was handed down in 1956 and is a hangover of the shameful mccarthyite Fifties.
- The case was first brought to trial in the midst of a long and bitter nationwide strike by Mine-Mill against major U. S. copper producers.
- The section of Taft-Hartley involved in the case was repealed by Congress six years ago, a month before the first trial opened.
- The defendants, each with more than 25 years service in the industry and in the union, have steadfastly denied the charge. They have the united support of the Mine-Mill rank and file membership.

For over 150 years the American labor movement has fought the use of the conspiracy charge against unions. It has been a favored weapon in attempts to smash unions and unionism.

"It is difficult," says Norman Thomas, "to resist the conclusion that [in this case] the government was willing to do a little unionbusting in the name of anti-Communism, under the forms of law. . . . Should the decision of the lower court be sustained, civil liberties for us all would be less secure."

Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers

A strange and cruel persecution. . . . OCAW . . . has taken the position that this case should have been dropped.

Transport Workers Union

It is with serious concern and grave alarm that we view the prosecution of officers and members of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers Union on a "conspiracy" charge. We thought that such a charge . . . had been relegated to the dust heap of history where it belongs.

Bro. Sleeping Car Porters

We are deeply concerned about the persecution of the officers of your union. . . . I sincerely hope . . . you will be able to reverse this conspiracy conviction.

Amal. Clothing Workers

Enclosed find check . . . in connection with the defense of some of the officers of your International against a "conspiracy" charge. . . . There is common cause for concern in this situation.

Packinghouse Workers

We join . . . in opposing the governmental harassment of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. . . . Labor must particularly disapprove the use . . . of the conspiracy doctrine which has historically been the legal weapon of the anti-labor forces.

International Longshoremen & Warehousemen

The conspiracy trial is a gimmick. . . . Mine-Mill needs every support—from within the labor movement and from outside . . . to help lick the conspiracy trial.

Amal. Lithographers

. . . We believe that a victory for the defense in this case is very important to the labor movement and to the preservation of civil rights.

Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union

We in the RWDSU believe that the use of charges of conspiracy against your union leaders represents a most serious threat to the entire labor movement.

WRITE: Mine-Mill Defense Committee

941 East Seventeenth Avenue
Denver, Colorado 80218

Based on the most depressing features of Christianity, the consignment of man to the evil forces within him and the denial of an evolving intelligence to help himself, her stories created a small universe. As patterns of thought her work suggests the absolute theological dead end enlightened Catholicism is struggling to escape. Artistically her fiction is the most extraordinary thing to happen to the American short story since Ernest Hemingway.

Reality is fantastic. Violence does bear life away. Sometimes. Myopic in her vision, Flannery O'Connor was among those few writers who raise the questions worth thinking about after the lights are out and the children are safely in bed: What is reality? What are the possibilities for hope? How much can man endure?

THEATRE

Julius Novick

SHAKESPEARE FOR THE PEOPLE

It was obvious, when Joseph Papp was starting his New York Shakespeare Festival, that Mr. Papp was out of his mind. Shakespeare is an expensive author to produce; when you refuse, on principle, to charge admission, the whole thing becomes an economic nightmare. It is said that a certain foundation once refused to give Papp a grant on the incontrovertible ground that there was no prospect of his festival's ever becoming self-supporting. One New York critic publicly begged him to charge a small admission in order to stay alive.

But Mr. Papp, in addition to being a madman, is a master promoter, a born impresario. His enterprise has prospered, and become an empire, with an annual budget of close to a million dollars. In the winter, a Papp company tours the New York City schools; this summer, three separate Papp companies mounted six plays, all by Shakespeare; and Papp presents folk-song concerts, poetry readings and dance recitals as sidelines.

Similar enterprises have begun to proliferate in many places, extending Papp's work of bringing theatre to the people by means of free outdoor performances. A group called Theatre in the Streets tours New York City every summer; Brooklyn has its own outdoor theatre in Prospect Park; Washington, D. C. has its outdoor Shakespeare Festival in the shadow of the Washington Monument; other cities have followed suit. One is reminded of the epigraph Moss Hart made up for one of his plays: "Mad, sire? Yes, sire, they are mad, but observe how they do light up the sky."

The audience at Papp's 2,300-seat outdoor theatre in Central Park is probably the most cosmopolitan in New York. It lacks the air of constipated prosperity so prevalent among Broadway audiences; students, Negroes, foreigners, turn up in good numbers, and so do ordinary families from Queens who can't afford Broadway. But it is predominantly a middle-class audience, and this has n satisfied Mr. Papp. Last summe therefore, he expanded his operatio to include a second company, whic tours the five boroughs with its ow portable 1,600-seat outdoor theatr This summer, after the second cor pany got finished taking Henry V ar The Taming of the Shrew to neig borhoods like Harlem and Bedfor Stuyvesant, the portable theatre w taken over by a third company, whic is presenting Romeo and Juliet i Spanish for the benefit of New York large and widely neglected Spanis speaking minority.

I usually catch up with the tourir productions in a playground in Spa ish Harlem. The audiences the seem to be drawn almost entire from the neighborhood, and they co sist mostly of small children (wh will grow up, if Papp's efforts pro per, far more familiar with Shak

Up Rising

Now Johnson would go up to join the great simulacra of men, Hitler and Stalin, to work his fame with planes roaring out from Guam over Asia, all America become a sea of toiling men
stirrd at his will, which would be a bloated thing, drawing from the underbelly of the nation
such blood and dreams as swell the idiot psyche out of its courses into an elemental thing until his name stinks with burning meat and heapt honors

And men awake to see that they are used like things spent in a great hecatomb of youths, this Texas barbeque of Asia, Africa and all the Americas,
And the professional military behind him, thinking to use him as they thought to use Hitler without losing control of their business of war,

But the mania, the ravening eagle of America
as Lawrence saw him "bird of men that are masters, Lifting the rabbit-blood of the myriads up into—" something terrible, gone beyond bounds, or
As Blake saw figures of fire and blood raging,
—in what image? the ominous roar in the air,
the omnipotent wings, the all-American boy in the cockpit loosing his flow of napalm, below in the jungles
"any life at all or sign of life" his target, drawing now not with crayons in his secret room the burning of homes and the torture of mothers and fathers and children, their hair a-flame, screaming in agony, but in the line of duty, for the might and enduring fame of Johnson, for the victory of American will over its victims, releasing his store of destruction over the enemy,
in terror and hatred of all communal things, of communion, of communism;

has raised from the private rooms of small-town bosses and business men, are than most of us above the verty line). I saw several babes in ns; one in front of me sucked gelically on her pacifier and emitted t a peep all evening. Most of the ls, and some of the adults, behave if they were at a ball game: saun-ing in late, leaving early, wander-around the theatre, keeping up ntinuous conversations, occasion-y shouting their opinions at the ayers. One little girl had a toy ray n, which she fired off noisily at tervals during the show.

One performance in another part Harlem had been bombed out by ck throwers, but the audiences I as part of seemed to like what they ere getting. The youngsters enjoyed e comedy, especially the bawdy ssages in Romeo y Julieta, but ey liked the fights best of all. When ercutio fell to the stage and rolled er in his death throes, they laughed and shouted and clapped and cheered. Such a lively crowd makes empathy difficult, but after a while I realized that many people were sitting quietly and seemed to be listening attentively; the rest seemed to be enjoying the occasion and the spectacle, if not the play itself. Almost every scene in Romeo was applauded.

It is admirable of Papp to refuse to condescend to his neighborhood audiences, and to insist on giving them Shakespeare instead of Harvey or Mr. Roberts; it is brave of him to schedule, for his 1965 Central Park season, three of Shakespeare's least popular plays. The catch is that his productions these days tend not to be very good, so that it is questionable how much of Shakespeare his audiences are actually getting. Papp has so spectacularly made two blades of grass grow where from the council chambers of the gangs that run the great cities,

swollen with the votes of millions, from the fearful hearts of good people in the suburbs turning the savory meat over the charcoal burners and heaping their barbeque plates with more than they can eat, from the closed meeting-rooms of regents of universities and sessions of profiteers—

back of the scene: the atomic stockpile; the vials of synthesized diseases eager biologists have developed over half a century dreaming of the bodies of mothers and fathers and children and hated rivals swollen with new plagues, measles grown enormous, influenzas perfected; and the gasses of despair, confusion of the senses, mania, inducing terror of the universe, coma, existential wounds, that chemists we have met at cocktail parties, passt daily on the way to classes or work, have workt
"to make wars too terrible for men to wage";

raised this secret entity of America's hatred of Europe, of Africa, of Asia,
the deep hatred for the old world that had driven him out,
and for the alien world, the new world about him, that might have been Paradise
but was before his eyes already cleard back in a holocaust of burning indians, trees and grasslands, reduced to his real estate, his projects of exploitation and profitable wastes,

this specter that in the beginning Adams and Jefferson feard and knew would corrupt the very body of the nation and all sense of our common humanity, this black bile of old evils arisen anew,
takes over the vanity of Johnson;
and the very glint of Satan's eyes from the pit of the hell of America's unacknowledged, unrepented crimes that I saw in Goldwater's eyes
now shines from the eyes of the President in the swollen head of the nation.

Robert Duncan

Who else wants really sharp knives?

Send for the free brochure "Kitchen Cutlery that Really Cuts"

Think they don't make sharp knives any more? Comus PRO knives are different — they really cut! And you can try these professional quality knives for 30 days without risking a penny.

The Secret is the Steel

The remarkable Comus PRO knives are not made of stainless steel. The blades are not scalloped or saw-toothed. Instead, they are razor-keen, high-carbon, cutlery steel — forged, ground and oil-tempered to hold their edge. This is the steel used for professional cutlery . . . These are the knives used by professional chefs.

Still Sharp in 1974?

Yes! Carbon steel does make an astonishing difference. Comus PRO knives are so sharp you can thin-slice tomatoes and fresh bread — carve rare chuck as if it were finest tenderloin — chop and mince vegetables like lightning. And a few occasional swipes on steel or stone keeps your Comus PRO knives factory-sharp for ten, twenty years, or even more!

Send for Free Brochure

Comus PRO knives are not sold in any store, so send today for our free brochure. By return mail, we'll send you pictures, prices and facts on the new Comus PRO knives. Then you decide whether you want to try them for 30 days at our risk. Write today to:

The Comus Division, Breck's of Boston
Y74 Breck Building, Boston 10, Mass.

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. [illegible]

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Coming Sept. 20!

The 330-Page Centennial Issue of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent as the September 20 issue of The Nation to subscribers of record.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will be entitled to THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my September 20 issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________STATE__________ZIP No.__________

9-13-65

none grew before, that few crit have had the heart to discuss i quality of his crop. Probably ev city with any cultural life to spe of possesses its critical sacred co in New York, the Shakespeare Fe val is one such (although Wal Kerr of the Herald Tribune very ge ly blew the whistle on it recentl

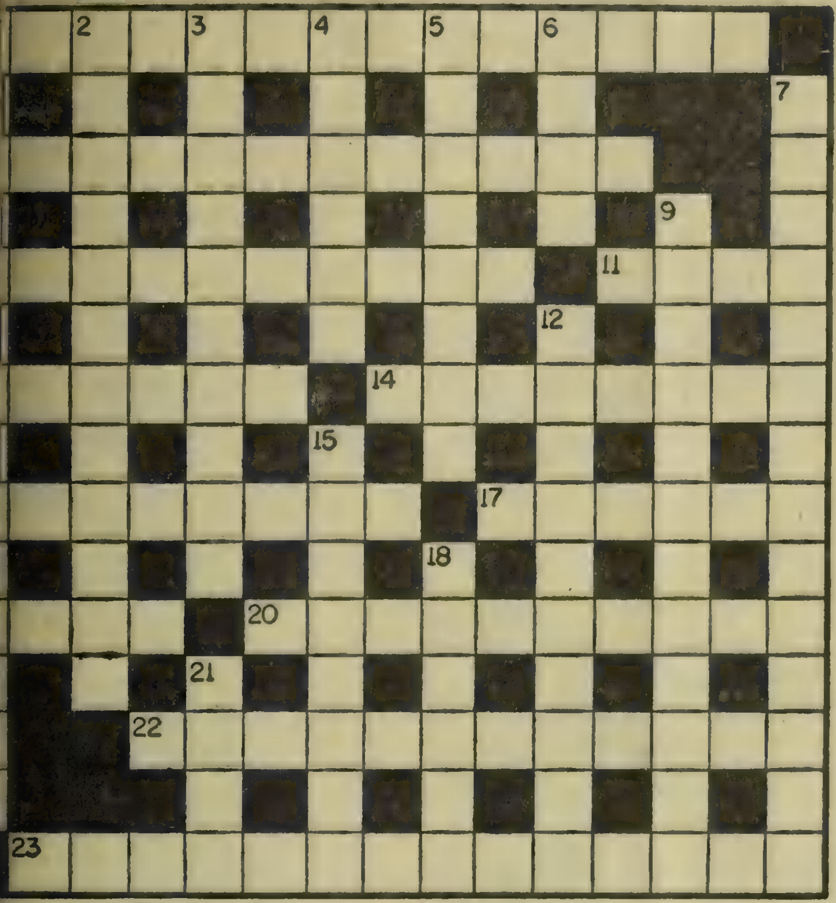
The most obvious fault of the fe val's productions is the tendency its actors to be either miscast, or ready for Shakespeare, or sim lousy actors. All festival compan are sedulously integrated, with ple of Negro actors and even an Orien bit player; of course nonwhite acto up to now, have had even less centive than white ones to beco proficient in Shakespeare. But wh as well as nonwhite actors have giv terrible performances for the festiv There are plenty of good classi actors, of various colors, around directors who know where to fi and how to use them. Better dire ing is what the Shakespeare Festiv really needs.

The Central Park season this su mer was the best in years, but th only means that little flagrant i competence was to be seen. The se son opened with a slick but supe ficial Love's Labor's Lost, directed Gerald Freedman. Coriolanus, staged by Gladys Vaughan, was de perately dull: the lines were spok well enough, except by a few ha cases, but not much creative atte tion was paid to their meanin Shakespeare's saeve indignatio w largely missing from Troilus an Cressida as directed by Mr. Papp, b the production was entertaini enough; Richard Jordan, an excelle Shakespearean juvenile, was an a pealingly vulnerable Troilus, a there were some funny caricatur and grotesques.

It could be argued, of course, th since after all they're free, Papp shows are bargains in any case; t same can be said of the Washingto D.C. festival's woeful Merry Wive But a Shakespearean performan still costs three hours out of the li of every member of the audience, a this expenditure, even if there be other, still demands compensation the quality of the production. Fu thermore, second-rate productions gi their audiences a distorted idea Shakespeare, and are likely to p some people off him forever. A finally, the best way to get good wo is to demand it loudly and insistent and to accept no excuses in its p'ac

Crossword Puzzle No. 1119

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

n eager miss might not really try keep one this length—since a anner following is implied. (8-2-4)

pertains to the basis of life itelf. (12)

roving true art's an awkward alernative to home-cooking. (10)

ee 2 down

escriptive of a figure in speaking f a pair on iceskates. (6) iolet? If you have a problem of djustment, the head type might e called for. (8)

oldier-writer with a sister in the anding beach. (8)

f things do, you probably find hem touching. (6)

hooting is often said to be comaratively free from apprehension. 4)

What such a slipper does is wrong. (10)

What a storm on Lake Erie might do for an animal. (5, 7)

Fairly low bowers, though it somеimes takes pluck to emulate them.

DOWN:

The one of state, with agreeable parties? (14)

and 11 across The people of Ireland, in the long run? (5-7, 4)

3 Made by those calling up? (10)

4 A masquerade role is played by those who make things go smoothly. (6)

5 An upset basin over the liqueur. (8)

6 A legendary hero? Sharp! (4)

7 Stone repairing, possibly, in order to make journeys from one place to another. (14)

9 Are they otherwise legal, perhaps spent alongside the river? (4, 8)

12 Such a state is fluid, and is not looking up, certainly! (10)

15 Score one more, if you're counting.

18 Quite likely to be ultimately responsible. (6)

21 For protection, they used to put it on the post. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1118

ACROSS: 1 Up to the minute; 10 Twister; 11 Governs; 12 Americana; 13 Lully; 14 Gun-shy; 16 Stand-off; 19 Rendered; 20 Gateau; 22 Motet; 23 Elopement; 25 Litters; 26 Prelate; 27 Consideration. DOWN: 2 Pride; 3 Ostrich feathers; 4 Herman; 5 Migrants; 6 Naval engagement; 7 Turn loose; 8 Stranger; 9 Ashy; 17 and 15 Fourteen ninety-two; 18 Reversed; 21 Hopper; 22 Mole; 24 Erato.

lers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address ests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N. Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to million titles. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, 19 Salem, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

Just out!
The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

DON'T DIE WITHOUT A WILL. Two Will Forms and Easy-Reading Will Book—$1.00. Nat'l Institute for Family Research, 1800 N. Argyle, Los Angeles 90028.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC). 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709.

VACATIONS

WINDY HILL ON ORANGE LAKE
A pleasantly informal vacation in friendly atmosphere. Swimming, Boating, Fishing on Natural Lake. Badminton, Volley Ball, Ping-pong, other sports. Records, Books, Summer Theatre, Golf nearby. Food of excellent quality in generous quantity. $60.00 Weekly; $10.00 Daily; Weekend: Fri. Supper thru Sun. Dinner $20.00.
Tel.: Newburgh 562-1232
Jane C. Arenz, R.D. Box 160, Walden, N.Y.

PERSONALS

THE BEAUTIFUL EQUALITY PIN . . . $1.00. Student Peace Union national office, 5 Beekman Street, New York 38, N. Y.

SOCIETY FOR HUMANE ABORTION. For information send stamped, self-addressed envelope to: P. O. Box 1862, San Francisco, 94101.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words): 3-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (min.)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

YOUR POSTMASTER SUGGESTS:

ZIP CODE NUMBERS

TO HELP SPEED YOUR MAIL—

USE THEM IN

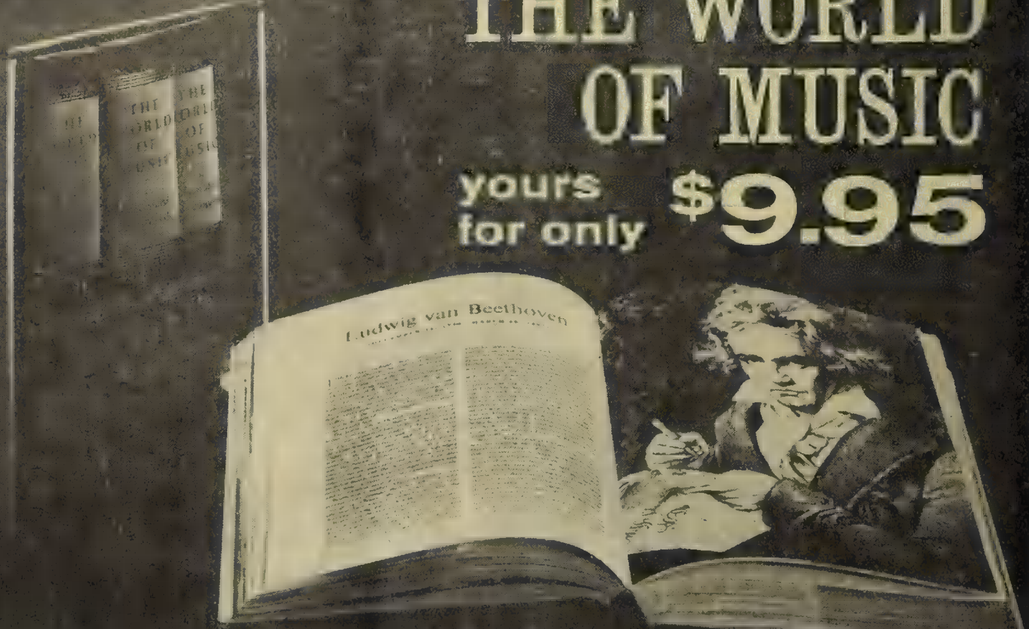
ALL ADDRESSES

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

From the Gregorian Chant to electronic music, from folk songs to opera – a lavishly illustrated, brilliantly edited encyclopedia . . .

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

yours for only $9.95



RETAIL $50.00

4 VOLUMES IN AN ATTRACTIVE SLIPCASE • 6¾" x 7¾" x 9¾"
1,536 PAGES • MORE THAN 5,500 ENTRIES • OVER 2,000 ILLUSTRATIONS

A magnificent, profusely illustrated encyclopedia, The World of Music spans the whole range of our vast musical heritage. For devotees of both classical music and jazz, for performers and listeners, for the musicologist and the music lover, this handsome four-volume reference set offers a fund of knowledge—easily accessible and clearly written by leading musical authorities—on every aspect of musical experience.

Here are biographies of the great composers and performers of past and present; penetrating analyses of hundreds of musical masterpieces; detailed articles on popular and film music, opera, ballet, scoring, choral works, folk songs, modern dance, jazz, vocal music, and performing groups.

The number and variety of illustrations alone make The World of Music unique. There are hundreds of portraits of performers and composers from the fourteenth century to the present; scenes from operas, musical plays, ballets, and musical films; reproductions of stage sets, playbills, and musical scores; drawings, paintings and sculpture whose themes relate to music.

The World of Music is the most comprehensive, visually attractive reference set on music that has ever been published – a basic work that belongs in every home library.

the seven arts book society offers you the opportunity to build what André Malraux described as "a museum without walls" – to enrich your home with the finest books on the arts – at substantial savings. The selections of The Seven Arts Book Society – like those listed below – are all books of permanent value: oversize, richly illustrated volumes with definitive texts. Moreover, as a member you will regularly enjoy savings of 30% and more. Why not discover the great advantages of belonging to this unique organization today? You may begin your membership with THE WORLD OF MUSIC – itself a selection of The Seven Arts Book Society, and typical of the kind of books members regularly receive – for only $9.95.

RECENT SEVEN ARTS BOOK SOCIETY SELECTIONS

[illegible] Nouveau, Robert Schmutzler. Retail $25.00. Member's price $18.95.

[illegible] Illustrated History of Furnishing, Mario Praz. Retail $25.00 Member's price $19.95.

Ben Shahn: Paintings and Graphic Art, James Thrall Soby. Retail $25.00. Member's price $14.95.

Key Monuments of [illegible] History of Architecture, Henry [illegible]. Millon and Alfred Frazer. Retail $17.50. Member's price $13.95.

Great Styles of Furniture, Charles Vandam. Retail $22.50. Member's price $17.95.

Michelangelo, Frederick Hartt. Retail $15.00. Member's price $11.95.

Picasso, Hans C. L. Jaffe. Retail $15.00. Member's price $11.95.

Abstract Painting, Michel Seuphor. Retail $20.00. Member's price $15.95.

The Eternal Present: The Beginnings of Art [illegible] The Beginnings of Architecture, Sigfried Giedion. Retail $25.00. Member's price $19.90.

The [illegible] of Mankind, edited by André Malraux and Georges Salles. The monumental history of world art, including Sumer: The Dawn of Art, The Arts of Assyria, Persian Art, The Arts of the South Pacific, The Birth of Greek Art, The Art of Ancient Iran. Retail (each volume) $25.00. Member's price (each volume) $18.95.

Delacroix, René Huyghe. Retail $35.00. Member's price $19.95.

Encyclopedia of Modern Architecture, texts by [illegible] leading architectural historians. Retail $15.00. Member's price $10.95.

[illegible] History of Far Eastern Art, Sherman E. Lee. Retail $25.00. Members' price $18.95.

---

the seven arts BOOK SOCIETY, inc.

One Park Avenue, New York, New York 10016 S 65-9N

You may enroll me and send THE WORLD OF MUSIC for only $9.95 (plus postage and handling). I agree to buy four additional selections or alternates in the next 12 months, from the wide range of books available to me at substantial savings. When I do not want the current selection—or prefer to order another book—I may do so on the convenient form provided for this purpose. I may cancel my membership at any time after purchasing the four additional books.

Mr.
Mrs...
Miss please print full name

Street...

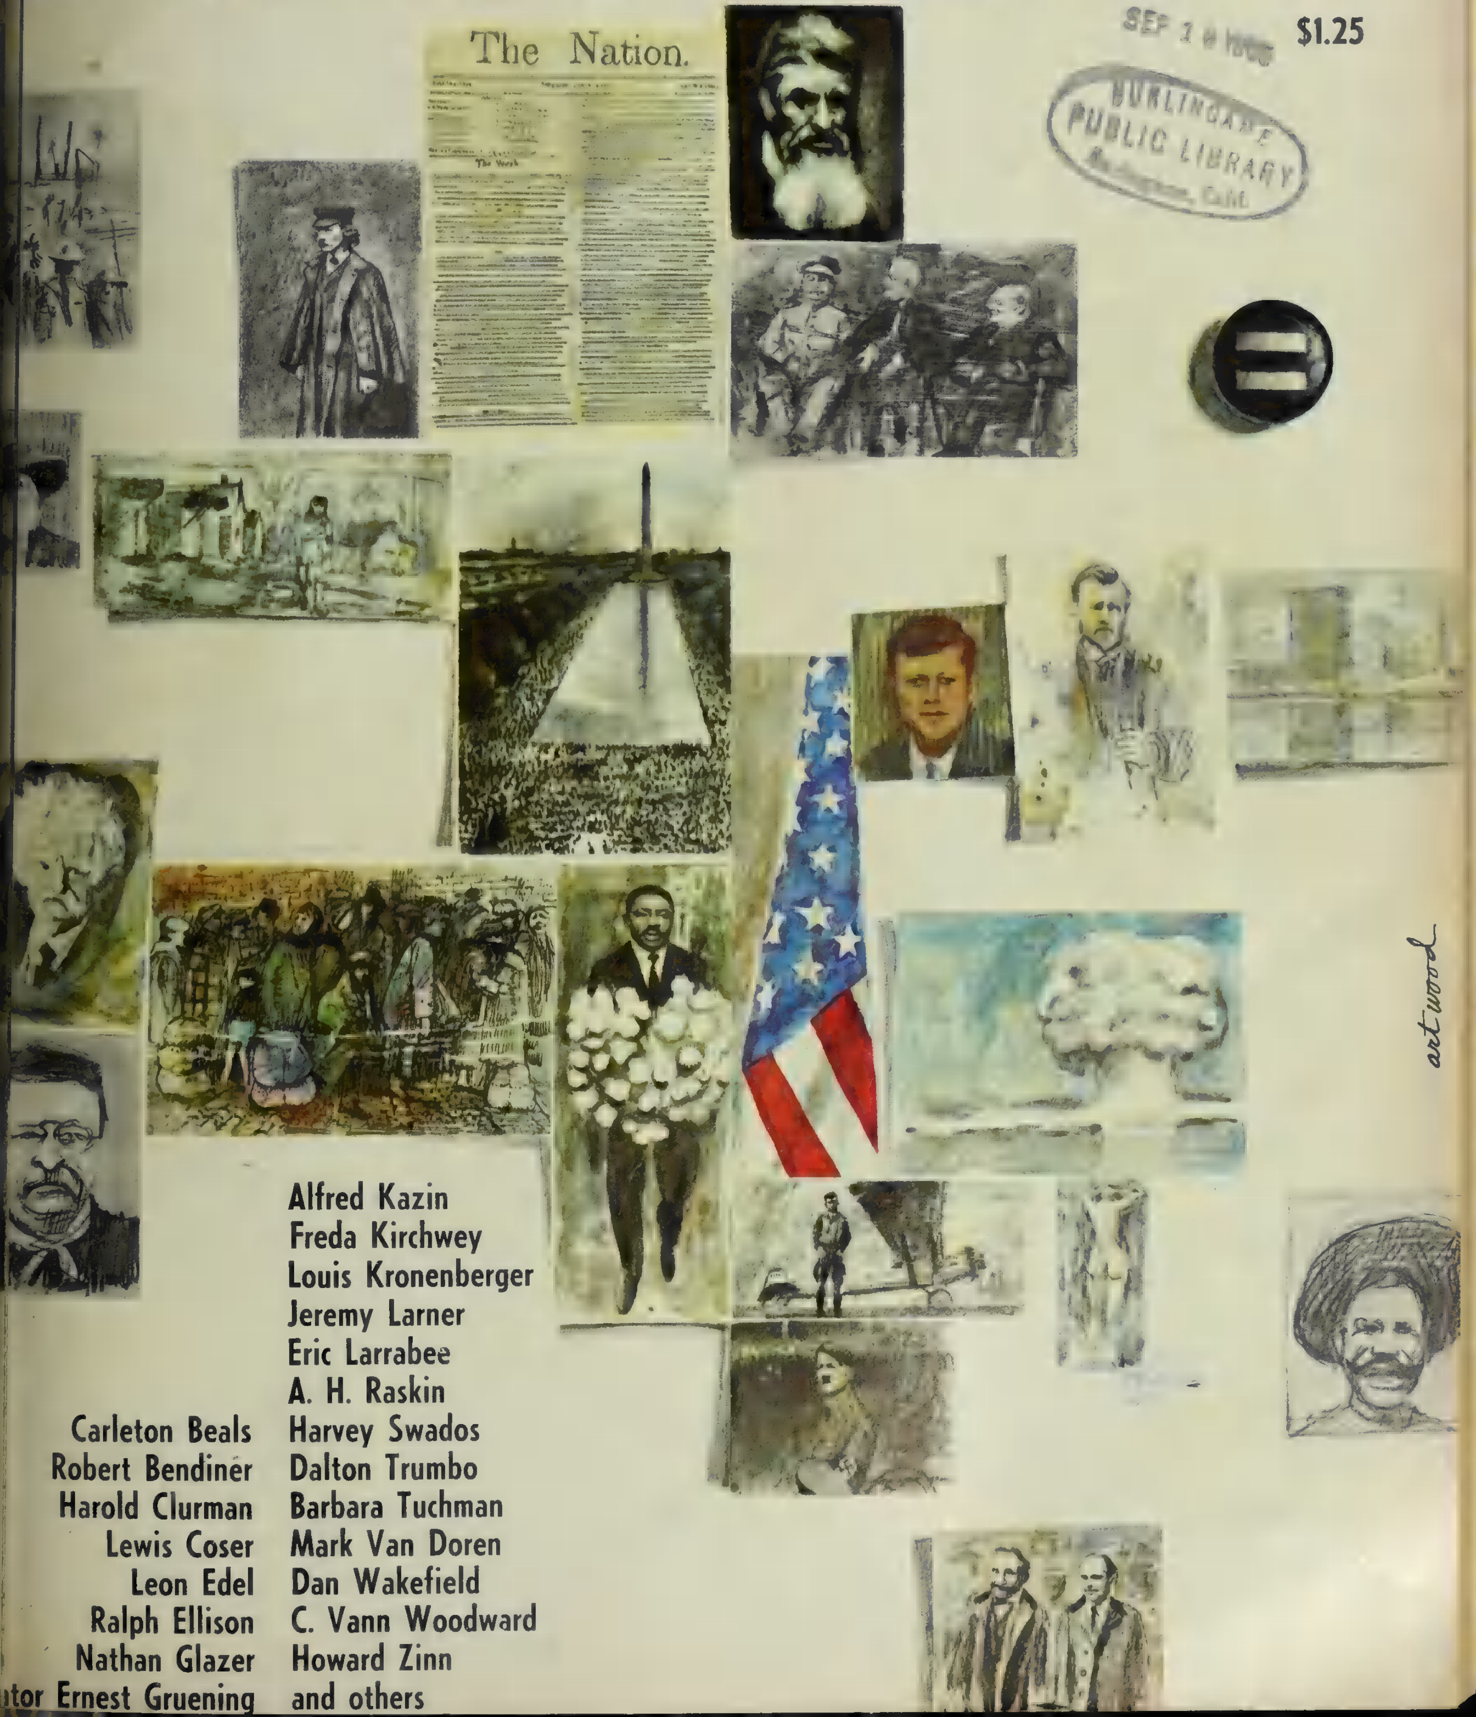
City............................State.............Zip Code......

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE

THE NATION

$1.25

SEP 1 0 1965
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.



Carleton Beals
Robert Bendiner
Harold Clurman
Lewis Coser
Leon Edel
Ralph Ellison
Nathan Glazer
entor Ernest Gruening
Alfred Kazin
Freda Kirchwey
Louis Kronenberger
Jeremy Larner
Eric Larrabee
A. H. Raskin
Harvey Swados
Dalton Trumbo
Barbara Tuchman
Mark Van Doren
Dan Wakefield
C. Vann Woodward
Howard Zinn
and others

Where will tomorrow's talent come from?

From the same places that talent has always come from. Little theatre groups, speech classes, drama workshops, off-Broadway, local radio and television stations.

But how long will it take? And will the supply of bright, gifted youngsters keep up with the cries for more and more talent being made by three networks, 569 television stations and over 100,000,000 American viewers? These questions are among the most challenging currently facing the broadcast industry.

To supplement the traditional program development in which all broadcasters engage, the American Broadcasting Company is doing something extracurricular to help discover and develop new creative talent. At the American Academy of Dramatic Arts, for instance, ABC will underwrite acting courses for sixteen students each year. At the Annenberg School of Communications, University of Pennsylvania, ABC scholarships will cover courses in communications management. Grants for aspiring writers from all over the country will be established at the School of Drama at Yale University.

And in the Fall of 1966, ABC will set aside one hour a week of prime time for a program that will give young performers—as well as writers, directors and technicians—a chance to try new creative departures.

It seems to us that the best way to provide better entertainment for the American public is to develop better entertainers.

ABC Television Network

OCT 18
MAY 19
AUG 17

Obviously,
the secret of living to 100
is to be honest, courageous, intelligent and stimulating.

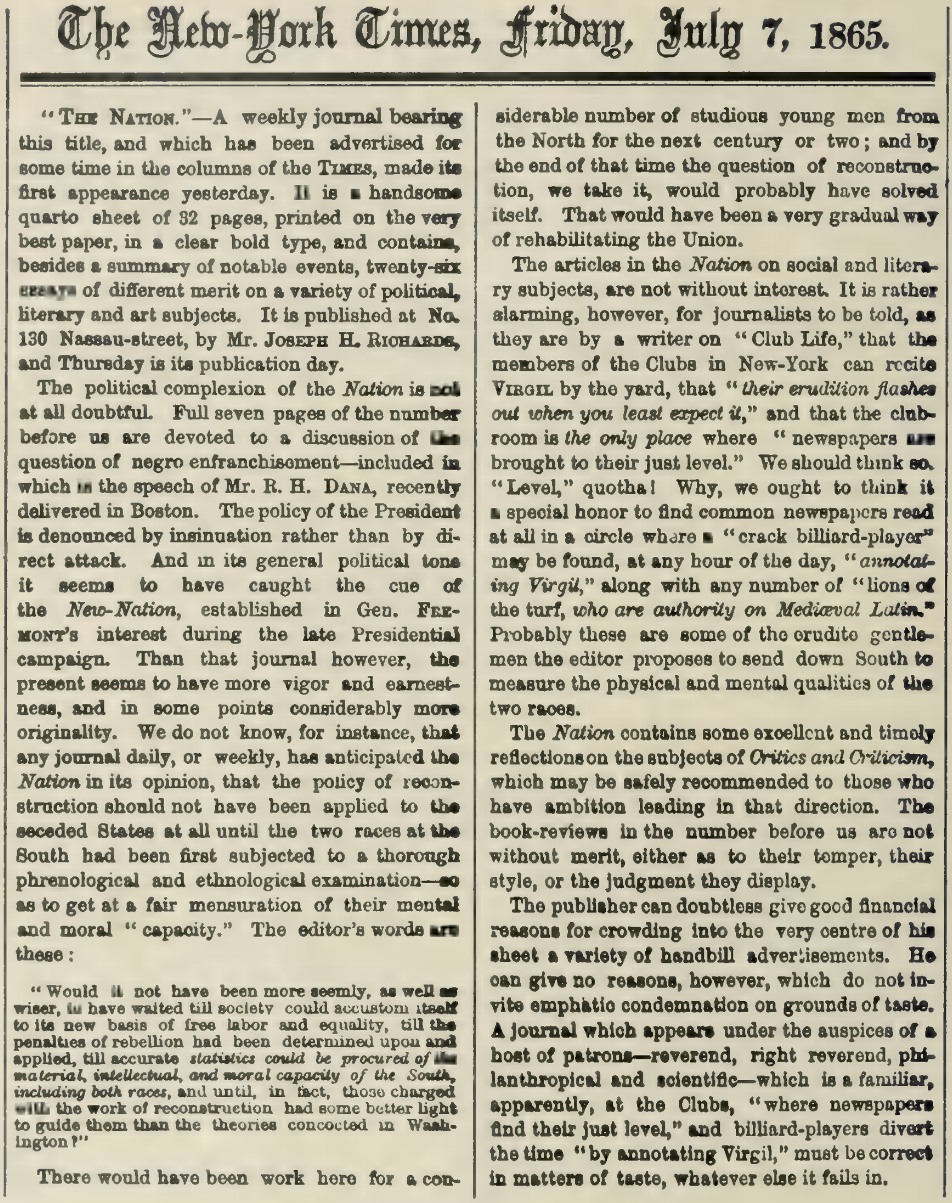
That's good to know.

Newsweek (only 68 years to go)



The New-York Times, Friday, July 7, 1865.

"THE NATION."—A weekly journal bearing this title, and which has been advertised for some time in the columns of the TIMES, made its first appearance yesterday. It is a handsome quarto sheet of 32 pages, printed on the very best paper, in a clear bold type, and contains, besides a summary of notable events, twenty-six essays of different merit on a variety of political, literary and art subjects. It is published at No. 130 Nassau-street, by Mr. JOSEPH H. RICHARDS, and Thursday is its publication day.

The political complexion of the Nation is not at all doubtful. Full seven pages of the number before us are devoted to a discussion of the question of negro enfranchisement—included in which is the speech of Mr. R. H. DANA, recently delivered in Boston. The policy of the President is denounced by insinuation rather than by direct attack. And in its general political tone it seems to have caught the cue of the New-Nation, established in Gen. FREMONT'S interest during the late Presidential campaign. Than that journal however, the present seems to have more vigor and earnestness, and in some points considerably more originality. We do not know, for instance, that any journal daily, or weekly, has anticipated the Nation in its opinion, that the policy of reconstruction should not have been applied to the seceded States at all until the two races at the South had been first subjected to a thorough phrenological and ethnological examination—so as to get at a fair mensuration of their mental and moral "capacity." The editor's words are these:

> "Would it not have been more seemly, as well as wiser, to have waited till society could accustom itself to its new basis of free labor and equality, till the penalties of rebellion had been determined upon and applied, till accurate statistics could be procured of the material, intellectual, and moral capacity of the South, including both races, and until, in fact, those charged with the work of reconstruction had some better light to guide them than the theories concocted in Washington?"

There would have been work here for a considerable number of studious young men from the North for the next century or two; and by the end of that time the question of reconstruction, we take it, would probably have solved itself. That would have been a very gradual way of rehabilitating the Union.

The articles in the Nation on social and literary subjects, are not without interest. It is rather alarming, however, for journalists to be told, as they are by a writer on "Club Life," that the members of the Clubs in New-York can recite VIRGIL by the yard, that "their erudition flashes out when you least expect it," and that the club-room is the only place where "newspapers are brought to their just level." We should think so. "Level," quotha! Why, we ought to think it a special honor to find common newspapers read at all in a circle where a "crack billiard-player" may be found, at any hour of the day, "annotating Virgil," along with any number of "lions of the turf, who are authority on Mediæval Latin." Probably these are some of the erudite gentlemen the editor proposes to send down South to measure the physical and mental qualities of the two races.

The Nation contains some excellent and timely reflections on the subjects of Critics and Criticism, which may be safely recommended to those who have ambition leading in that direction. The book-reviews in the number before us are not without merit, either as to their temper, their style, or the judgment they display.

The publisher can doubtless give good financial reasons for crowding into the very centre of his sheet a variety of handbill advertisements. He can give no reasons, however, which do not invite emphatic condemnation on grounds of taste. A journal which appears under the auspices of a host of patrons—reverend, right reverend, philanthropical and scientific—which is a familiar, apparently, at the Clubs, "where newspapers find their just level," and billiard-players divert the time "by annotating Virgil," must be correct in matters of taste, whatever else it fails in.

. . . when you want to see it on the record

The New York Times

100TH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE

THE NATION

IN THIS ISSUE

14 David Boroff: In Memoriam
15 Publisher's Foreword
18 The Personal Note: Memoirs of NATION Publishers and Editors — George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey, Mark Van Doren, Ernest Gruening, Robert Bendiner
42 THE NATION and Its Century — Richard Clark Sterne

LEGACIES FROM OUR PAST

54 1865: The Great Transition — Abraham Eisenstadt
62 Fashions in Liberalism — Robert Lekachman
67 The Staggered Culture — Louis Kronenberger
72 American Journalism: Essay to Assay — Penn Kimball
77 The First Anti-Imperialists — Barbara Tuchman
83 In Pursuit of Sandino: Imperialism Still Rides — Carleton Beals
88 A Gallery from THE NATION

U. S. PORTRAIT 1965

92 Waiting for Realty: Death of a Small Town — Dan Wakefield
98 Waiting for Reality: Birth of the Megalopolis — Scott Greer
103 The Fat Cats of Labor — A. H. Raskin
108 What's Left of the Left? — Harvey Swados
115 Deviance and Deviates — Howard Becker
120 The New Improved Drug Scene — Jeremy Larner
125 Woman's Search for Identity — Hilda Sidney Krech

SOME ARE MORE EQUAL

129 "Tell It Like It Is, Baby" — Ralph Ellison
137 The Peoples of America — Nathan Glazer
142 Flight from History: The Heritage of the Negro — C. Vann Woodward
147 The South Revisited — Howard Zinn
153 "The South As It Is" — John Richard Dennett
157 Hollywood in Black and White — John Oliver Killens
161 A Different Drum — George W. Broadfield

PROBLEMS OF FREEDOM

166 The Fear of Positive Thinking — Lewis A. Coser
171 Public Education for Private Enterprise — Edgar Friedenberg
176 Is Freedom Academic? — Louis Joughin
183 Honor Bright, and All That Jazz — Dalton Trumbo
191 America's Schizophrenic View of the Poor — Paul Jacobs
198 Time to Kill: Automation, Leisure and Jobs — Eric Larrabee

(Continued on page 5)

STAFF FOR THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE

James J. Storrow Jr., Publisher
David Boroff, Editor
Anne C. Abramovitz, Assistant
Victor Bernstein, Managing Editor

Art Wood, Art Director
Henry M. Christman, Consultant
John D. Lloyd, Advertising

STAFF FOR THE NATION

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Elizabeth Sutherland, Books and the Arts
Marion Hess, Copy Editor
Grandin Conover, Assistant Editor
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Denise Levertov, Poetry
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

THE NATION, Sept. 20, 1965, Vol. 201, No. 8
©1965 The Nation Centennial Inc., New York

The Nation is published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by the Nation Company and copyright 1965 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y., and at additional mailing office. Tel.: CH 2-8400.
Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.
Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.
Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest and the Public Affairs Information Service.

The classic Nation report— published in book form for the first time

THE SOUTH AS IT IS: 1865–1866

One hundred years ago, in the spring of 1865, the very first issue of The Nation announced the publication of a series of letters to be written during a journey to seven Southern states by a special correspondent "charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences." Dennett's account is a remarkable piece of journalism, accurate and trustworthy, and written with vividness and color. And in its prophetic quality, it is particularly relevant today. $6.95

Edited and with an Introduction
by Henry M. Christman

by John Richard Dennett

The intensely personal account of a young woman's summer in Mississippi–1964

Unlike any other civil rights book, this is a work of tremendous impact and enduring significance by an extraordinarily gifted young writer. Miss Belfrage maintained a library, worked with children, taught illiterates, registered voters, was jailed for five days—experienced, that is, all the routines of civil rights workers in the Deep South. But there is nothing routine about her descriptive and narrative powers. Hers is a book that is vibrantly alive with deep involvement, and with the beauty and terror of an extreme situation. $5.00

FREEDOM SUMMER

by Sally Belfrage

author of
A Room in Moscow

PULITZER PRIZE WINNER

Howard Mumford Jones

"His style is intelligent and attractive; his learning is gracious. Certainly a good book, and probably a great one."
—The New Yorker Illustrated $8.50

O STRANGE NEW WORLD

AMERICAN CULTURE: THE FORMATIVE YEARS

He masterminded the "day that will live in infamy"

YAMAMOTO

THE MAN WHO MENACED AMERICA

This fascinating biography of the admiral who created the entire plan of attack on Pearl Harbor is also the story of the war in the Pacific from the other side: the Japanese plans and calculations and brilliance—and the ultimate mistakes that cost them the war.
Photographs, maps $6.95

by John Deane Potter

The Viking Press
New York, N.Y. 10022

IN THIS ISSUE (cont.)

THE WRITTEN AND SPOKEN WORD

203 The Literary Mind Alfred Kazin
207 The New Apocalypse Eugene Goodheart
212 THE NATION and Its Poets Alexander Laing
219 Poems: Robert Hazel, Denise Levertov, Wendell Berry
221 Theatre: The Laggard Art Harold Clurman
227 TV: The 21" Bore Robert Alan Aurthur
232 Notes on the New Style William Phillips
237 Henry James and THE NATION Leon Edel

271 Crossword Puzzle

PRENTICE-HALL
will publish a selection of the major articles in this Centennial Edition
of The Nation
early in 1966.

Tentative title

THE STATE OF THE NATION

from the publishers of the national bestseller
UP THE DOWN STAIRCASE
a novel by Bel Kaufman $4.95

THE AMERICAN FORTS SERIES
as planned by Stewart Holbrook

Now available
GUNS AT THE FORKS
by Walter O'Meara $6.95

LOUISBOURG: Key to a Continent
by Fairfax Downey $6.95

THE PRENTICE-HALL SERIES IN NATURE AND NATURAL HISTORY
Joseph Wood Krutch, Consulting Editor

Now available
THE GREAT AMERICAN FOREST
by Rutherford Platt $6.95

MODERN JEWISH STORIES
Short stories by Philip Roth, Nadine Gordimer, Isaac Babel, Isaac Bashevis Singer, Irwin Shaw, Bernard Malamud, and others. $4.95

PRENTICE-HALL
Englewood Cliffs, N. J.

Pardon Us If Our Ad Looks 50 Years Old—It Is . . .

THE ABINGDON PRESS
1789

"The Abingdon Press is the trade imprint of the oldest publishing house in the United States; its impress on any book is a guarantee of scholarship, reliability and workmanship . . . Booksellers may unhesitatingly commend any publications bearing the trade mark or imprint of the Abingdon Press—confident that all such publications will stand the highest critical test."

Where were you on July 8, 1915? Well, our ad was where you see it now . . . here in The Nation. Fifty years have passed but everything we said then can be repeated now. In the 176 years since its beginning, Abingdon has published many monumental literary works, among them—Clarke's Commentary (1824); Strong's Concordance (1894); the massive 12-volume Interpreters Bible (1957); and The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible—a biblical encyclopedia published in 1962. All are still going strong.

Abingdon Press has stood the test of time, and today—just as fifty years ago—you can place your confidence in the Abingdon imprint.

ABINGDON PRESS
New York Nashville

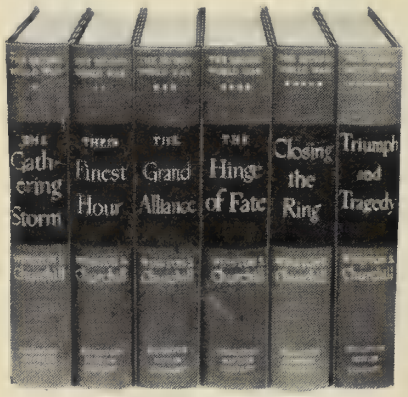
YOU CAN CONTINUOUSLY ACQUI

as a member of th

Begin by choosing any of the se

IN A SHORT EXPERIMEN

THE SUGGESTED TRIAL: You simply agree to buy three Club Selections or Alter



The Gathering Storm
Their Finest Hour
The Grand Alliance
The Hinge of Fate
Closing the Ring
Triumph and Tragedy

404. THE SECOND WORLD WAR
by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL
Retail prices,
if bought separately, total $39

MEDICAL ENCYCLOPEDIA

469. THE NEW ILLUSTRATED MEDICAL ENCYCLOPEDIA FOR HOME USE
Edited by
ROBERT E. ROTHENBERG, M.D.
Retail price $50

ABRAHAM LINCOLN
The War Years
Carl Sandburg

281. ABRAHAM LINCOLN The War Years
by CARL SANDBURG
Illustrated
Retail price $36

Judaism
Islam
Hinduism
Catholicism
Protestantism

506. GREAT RELIG OF MODERN MAN
Retail price $24

428. THE WORLD OF MATHEMATICS
Edited by
JAMES R. NEWMAN
Retail price $25

The Oxford Book of American Verse
The new Oxford Book of English Verse

509. THE OXFORD BOOKS OF AMERICAN AND ENGLISH VERSE
Retail prices
total $14.50

609. THE HARPER ENCYCLOPEDIA OF SCIENCE
Edited by
JAMES R. NEWMAN
Illustrated
Retail price $40

IF YOU PREFER YOU MAY CHOOSE THIS 8-VOLUM SET FOR $1.50 A VOLUME

OUR ORIENTAL HERITAGE
THE LIFE OF GREECE
CAESAR AND CHRIST
THE AGE OF FAITH
THE RENAISSANCE
THE REFORMATION
THE AGE OF REASON BEGINS

599. THE STORY OF CIVILIZATION by WILL DURANT and ARIEL DURANT • Retail price $86

ALUABLE BOOK-DIVIDENDS LIKE THESE OOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB

elow [UP TO SIX VOLUMES] FOR ONLY $1 A VOLUME

UBSCRIPTION

thin the next twelve months

THE WORLD'S GREAT THINKERS
The Social Philosophers
The Political Philosophers
The Philosophers of Science
RANDOM HOUSE

53. THE WORLD'S GREAT THINKERS
Edited by SAXE COMMINS and ROBERT N. LINSCOTT
Retail price $14.95

BERNARD SHAW
COMPLETE PLAYS WITH PREFACES
DODD, MEAD

560. BERNARD SHAW
Complete Plays with Prefaces
Retail price $45

A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH SPEAKING PEOPLES
The Birth of Britain
The New World
The Age of Revolution
The Great Democracies
WINSTON S. CHURCHILL
DODD, MEAD & COMPANY

282. A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING PEOPLES
by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL
Retail prices, if bought separately, total $24

The American Language
Supplement One
Supplement Two
H. L. MENCKEN

551. THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE
by H. L. MENCKEN
Retail price $25

BOOK-DIVIDENDS: An unprecedented home-library building plan every book-reading family should know about

THE OBVIOUS purpose of this suggested trial is to have you discover, by actual experience, the extraordinary opportunity you will have to acquire a well-rounded library at little cost—through the Club's unique Book-Dividend system. The system is simple: If you continue after this trial, with every Club Selection—or Alternate—you buy you will receive a Book-Dividend Certificate which, together with a nominal sum, can be redeemed for your choice of a fine library volume.

✶ HOW CAN THIS BE DONE? A portion of the amount members pay for the books they buy is accumulated and invested in entire editions of valuable books and sets through special contractual arrangements with the publishers in each case. These are the Club's Book-Dividends, and members are free to choose among them. Since the inauguration of the Book-Dividend system, over $330,000,000 worth of books (retail value) has been earned and received by members through this unique plan.

✶ GOOD SENSE ▪ No less important than this almost incredible library-building plan are three other long-proved benefits of membership. First, members have a wide choice among the best new books—at least 200 a year. Second, the Club's prices to members average 20% below retail prices. Finally, and perhaps most important, the Club's unique method of operation insures you against missing the new books you fully intend to read, but so often fail to through overbusyness.

DO NOT SEND MONEY . . . A BILL WILL BE SENT WITH YOUR SET

BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB, Inc. A129-9
345 Hudson Street, New York 14, N. Y.

Please enroll me as a trial member of the Book-of-the-Month Club and send me the library set or sets—up to six volumes—whose number(s) I have indicated in the box below, billing me $1 for each volume ($1.50 a volume if I select the 8-volume Story of Civilization). I agree to purchase at least three monthly Selections—or Alternates—during the first year I am a member. Members prices for these books average 20% less than retail prices. I have the right to cancel my membership any time after buying these three books. If I continue after the trial, I am to receive a Book-Dividend Certificate with every Selection—or Alternate—I buy under the system described above. (A small charge is added to all book shipments to cover postage and mailing expense.) PLEASE NOTE: Occasionally the Club will offer two or more books together at a special combined price. Such purchases are counted as a single book in fulfilling the membership obligation.

INDICATE BY NUMBER(S) IN BOX THE SET OR SETS YOU WANT ☐

MR.
MRS. } ....
MISS
(Please print plainly)

Address...

City.................................Zone......State............ 5-66

The trademarks BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB and BOOK-DIVIDEND are registered by Book-of-the-Month Club, Inc., in the U.S. Patent Office and in Canada.

GREAT MOMENTS AT CHICAGO

Frederick M. Thrasher died a year ago with no descendants. But the solitary scholar who left the masterpiece, THE GANG, had, in another sense, thousands of descendants. His work charted a new direction for sociology, focusing the study of man in society into a study of man in cities—in the great metropolises which have come to dominate, shape and menace our culture.

Thirty-eight years ago, Thrasher roamed the side streets of Chicago making friends with street corner gangs. He spent seven years questioning, observing, recording, synthesizing his findings. His study of no less than 1,313 gangs has become a sociological classic that is still read and studied today.*

Frederick Thrasher was one of the pioneer group of sociologists at the University of Chicago, the institution that gave the world its first department of sociology in 1892. His professional descendants—at Chicago and elsewhere—are today following his example, recording and interpreting every aspect of the big city's life. The wide-ranging results are reflected in these new books:

GROUP PROCESS AND GANG DELINQUENCY
By JAMES F. SHORT, JR. and FRED L. STRODTBECK. Highly original insights into the gang delinquency among juveniles from different backgrounds. 353 pp. $7.50

CONTRIBUTIONS TO URBAN SOCIOLOGY • By ERNEST W. BURGESS and DONALD J. BOGUE. Readings from 44 Chicago sociologists, documenting the main findings in urban research over a period of fifty years. 690 pp. $12.00

RACKETVILLE, SLUMTOWN, HAULBURG • An Exploratory Study of Delinquent Subcultures. By IRVING SPERGEL. A first-hand study of juvenile delinquency in three different areas of a large eastern city. 232 pp. $5.00

THE HERITAGE OF SOCIOLOGY • A series edited by Morris Janowitz. GEORGE HERBERT MEAD ON SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. Edited by Anselm Strauss, $8.95; WILLIAM F. OGBURN ON CULTURE AND SOCIAL CHANGE. Edited by Otis Dudley Duncan, $7.50; LOUIS WIRTH ON CITIES AND SOCIAL LIFE. Edited by Albert J. Reiss, Jr., $7.95. Also in paperback, $2.95 each.

STREET CORNER SOCIETY • By WILLIAM FOOTE WHYTE. This study of life in an Italian-American slum has become one of the most celebrated classics of American sociology. 2nd edition, 7th printing. Cloth, $6.00; paper, $2.95

*THE GANG A Study of 1,313 Gangs in Chicago. Abridged with a new introduction by James F. Short, Jr. Cloth, $7.50; Paper, $2.95.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Cornell UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE FIRST UNIVERSITY PRESS IN AMERICA

Established in 1869

> The new university we presume will not be fettered by precedents, but will mark out for itself a new path, enlightened by the past but adapted to the present. In such a course there are great dangers, but also great advantages.
>
> The Nation
> July 13, 1865

A CENTURY ago, in its second week of publication, the new magazine carried a long editorial to welcome the founding of Cornell University. The hopeful words quoted above were soon shown to be prophetic. The fledgling university did face great dangers, but these were met with courage and verve, while its freedom from the fetters of precedents was employed to advantage.

Led by its brilliant first president, Andrew D. White, Cornell marked out many new paths in American higher education. Only four years later, in 1869 (and acknowledging the example of Oxford and Cambridge), Mr. White established Cornell University Press, the first university publishing enterprise in this country. White named as director of the press his close friend, Daniel Willard Fiske, who was also professor of north European languages, and librarian. While playing all three roles, Professor Fiske managed to publish a list of books before the year was out.

Cornell University Press was to contribute to publishing history again in 1931, when the Comstock Publishing Company was incorporated into its organization, and once more in 1955, when it launched the first modern trade paperback series to issue from an American university press.

The Comstock firm, founded in 1893 by two Cornell professors, had achieved an eminent reputation for publishing in the biological sciences and nature study. Cornell University Press continues to publish in these fields under the imprint of Comstock Publishing Associates, a division of the press. Cornell Paperbacks now number forty-six, and approximately ten new books are added to the series each year. In only one decade of the paperback revolution they helped to create, these books have sold nearly half a million copies.

The number of Cornell University Press books in print now stands at five hundred. Current publishing programs are adding between fifty and seventy-five titles a year. The list of publications spans the range of the university curriculum, and includes monographs, translations, advanced reference books, and serious nonfiction works written for scholars and general readers.

ANDREW D. WHITE, Cornell University's first president

Represented in the Cornell catalogue are some of the most distinguished names in American scholarship: Howard Adelmann, Carl Becker, Max Black, Harry Caplan, Robert K. Carr, Lane Cooper, Robert E. Cushman, Jean-Jacques Demorest, Mario Einaudi, Walter Gellhorn, Howard Mumford Jones, George Kahin, Alfred Kahn, Horace Kallen, Theodore von Kármán, Milton Konvitz, A. L. Kroeber, Henry A. Myers, Sidney Painter, Linus Pauling, Dexter Perkins, Clinton Rossiter, George Sabine, Carl Stephenson, Moses Coit Tyler, Louis Wright.

Nearing its own centennial, Cornell University Press is happy to congratulate The Nation at the close of its first century of distinguished publishing.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS
ITHACA, NEW YORK

Everybody benefits

when there's a
to protect

By 1980, according to a recent Federal Power Commission study, technological progress in the power industry could make possible a 27% reduction in the retail cost of electricity. This could amount to as much as $11-billion.

Will this saving be passed on to consumers? Or will it be retained by the commercial companies which dominate the power industry? The answer will affect the entire economy and every citizen in the nation.

The cost of electricity is built into the price of virtually everything we use. In addition to the monthly electric bill we all pay, there is a power-cost factor in every automobile, every bottle of milk, every pair of shoes we buy. If the electricity used in manufacturing costs too much, the manufactured product also costs too much.

But how can we tell if electricity costs too much?

We can do so by maintaining a "consumers' electric yardstick" with which to measure the power companies' rates. This yardstick is composed of three elements:

1. A limited amount of non-profit power generation, some by the government, some by the rural electric cooperatives and other non-profit producers.

AMERICA'S

consumers' electric yardstick the price you pay for power

2. A limited amount of non-profit power transmission, some by the government, some by the rural electric cooperatives and other non-profit producers.
3. A limited amount of non-profit power distribution, some by the rural electric cooperatives, some by the other non-profit distributors — municipal systems and power districts.

These elements in the consumers' electric yardstick combine to provide "competition-by-example" n the electric power industry—which is by nature a monopoly. And this yardstick is the American consumer's best protection against excessive power costs.

State and Federal regulation of the power industry is more effective when supported by the consumers' yardstick. Consumers who live near areas where the yardstick now is effective can testify to its value. For example, a consumer in Portland, Ore., near the Bonneville Power Administration yardstick, pays his commercial power company 5.35 for the same amount of electricity that costs the Boston, Mass., consumer $9.91! The same principle holds true for power rates of commercial companies near the TVA area.

The experts tell us that only about 15 to 20 percent of the nation's total electric power capacity needs to be operated on this non-profit basis in order to provide an effective yardstick. It has dropped to only about 13 percent at present, and, unless something is done, is going to drop even further as power needs double every few years . . . leaving tomorrow's consumers practically no protection.

This is why America's consumer-owned rural electric co-ops and other non-profit systems believe that coal should be used to generate non-profit power in the depressed Appalachia area, why generation and transmission loans from the Rural Electrification Administration must be continued, why the huge government-built desalinization plants now under study must be designed to use the waste heat for producing electricity as well as fresh water, and why arrangements for interconnecting the nation's power resources into a single transmission system must include rural electrics and other non-profit distributors.

We believe everybody benefits when there's a consumers' electric yardstick to protect the price you pay for power.

If you would like more information on the "Consumers' Electric Yardstick" write: National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, 2000 Florida Avenue, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20009

20,000,000 people working together to serve their communities

Consumer-Owned RURAL ELECTRIC SYSTEMS

UNITED STATES JAPAN ARGENTINA MALAYSIA URUGUAY AUSTRALIA MEXICO ITALY VENEZUELA YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN FRANCE

FRANCE YUGOSLAVIA ITALY AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA JAPAN UNITED STATES ARGENTINA URUGUAY MEXICO VENEZUELA SPAIN

ARGENTINA AUSTRALIA VENEZUELA FRANCE UNITED STATES MALAYSIA MEXICO YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN JAPAN URUGUAY ITALY

AUSTRALIA URUGUAY MEXICO MALAYSIA ITALY ARGENTINA VENEZUELA JAPAN YUGOSLAVIA UNITED STATES FRANCE SPAIN

JAPAN FRANCE SPAIN ITALY MEXICO URUGUAY UNITED STATES VENEZUELA AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA ARGENTINA YUGOSLAVIA

UNITED STATES JAPAN ARGENTINA MALAYSIA URUGUAY AUSTRAL A MEXI O ITALY VENEZUELA YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN FRANCE

FRANCE YUGOSLAVIA ITALY AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA JAPAN UNITED TATES ARGENTINA URUGUAY MEXICO VENEZUELA SPAIN

ARGENTINA AUSTRALIA VENEZUELA FRANCE UNITED SIA MEXICO YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN JAPAN URUGUAY ITALY

AUSTRALIA URUGUAY MEXICO MALAYSIA ITALY ARGENTINA VENEZUELA JAPAN YUGOSLAVIA UNITED STATES FRANCE SPAIN

JAPAN FRANCE SPAIN ITALY MEXICO URUGUAY UNITED STATES VENEZUELA AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA ARGENTINA YUGOSLAVIA

UNITED STATES JAPAN ARGENTINA MALAYSIA URUGUAY AUSTRALIA MEXICO ITALY VENEZUELA YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN FRANCE

FRANCE YUGOSLAVIA ITALY AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA JAPAN UNITED STATES ARGENTINA URUGUAY MEXICO VENEZUELA SPAIN

ARGENTINA AUSTRALIA VENEZUELA FRANCE UNITED STATES MALAYSIA MEXICO YUGOSLAVIA SPAIN JAPAN URUGUAY ITALY

AUSTRALIA URUGUAY MEXICO MALAYSIA ITALY ARGENTINA VENEZUELA JAPAN YUGOSLAVIA UNITED STATES FRANCE SPAIN

JAPAN FRANCE SPAIN ITALY MEXICO URUGUAY UNITED STATES VENEZUELA AUSTRALIA MALAYSIA ARGENTINA YUGOSLAVIA

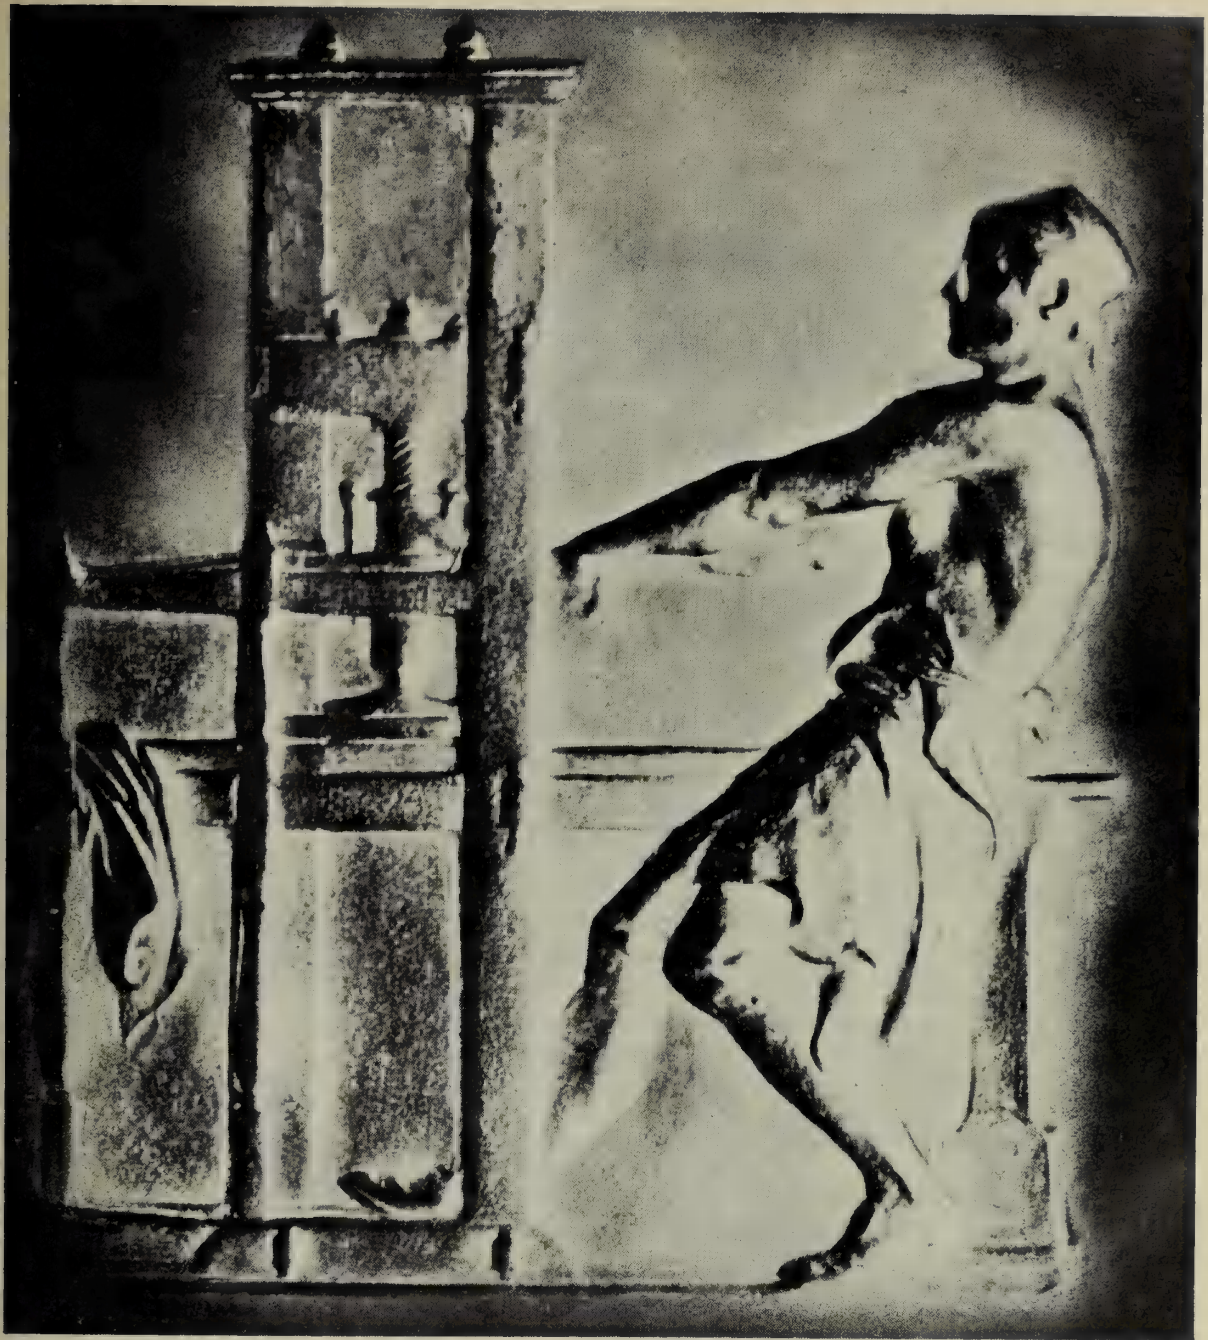
THE RIGHT NOTE

Back in 1961—"long before satellites dawned on the electronic horizon," as Jack Gould of The New York Times put it—the five CBS Owned television stations created INTERNATIONAL HOUR, a program exchange with nations all over the globe. Purpose: to sound a note of understanding among people of divergent tongues and cultures by exchanging programs that speak a universal language—programs of music and dance indigenous to the originating countries.

This year, the fifth of the exchange, twelve nations participated. Millions of viewers in the United States, and millions more abroad, were given the rare opportunity to enjoy unusual sights and sounds: a symphony by a prominent Japanese composer...a Malaysian folk ballet ...spirited music of the Argentine plains.

INTERNATIONAL HOUR is one of a number of regular and special projects in which the five CBS Owned television stations combine their efforts, talents and resources to create local programming scaled beyond the means of the individual station. It is typical of venturesome, out-of-the-ordinary television fare that so often enables the CBS Owned stations to sound the right note in the communities they serve.

CBS TELEVISION STATIONS A Division of Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.,operating WCBS-TV New York, KNXT Los Angeles, WBBM-TV Chicago, WCAU-TV Philadelphia and KMOX-TV St. Louis.

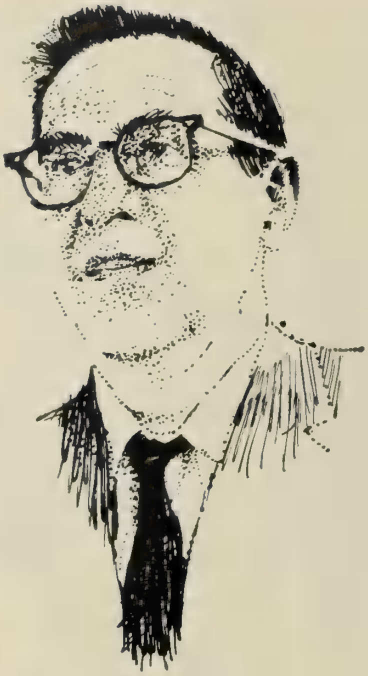


the press of freedom

The true enlightenment of the average man began with the Gutenberg printing press and continues today in the form of responsible newspaper publishing. A recent poll of journalism educators listed the St. Louis Post-Dispatch as one of only four United States dailies of the 20 leading newspapers of the world. Judgment was based on editorial integrity, political independence, accuracy of reporting, depth of newspaper coverage, size and experience of staff.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Founded by Joseph Pulitzer in 1878



DAVID BOROFF

March 28, 1917—May 15, 1965

My friendship with David Boroff was brief indeed: less than two years, or the time it took to put this book together. When we met for the first time, I was seeking an editor with whom to work—and I knew at once that I had found him. Most of the hours we later spent together were in professional collaboration.

It is odd, then, that now when I think of David, it is not as an editor who was rewarding and fun to work with (which he certainly was), nor as an exceptional teacher, a prolific writer and book reviewer (which he also was).

Rather, I think of a happy and intensely youthful man swooping across Manhattan on his bicycle; I see his earnest face, so often lighted by a warm smile, as we discussed literature, race relations, politics or philosophy in his study or my own. Most of all I think of David as husband and father, playing on the carpet with his little son Philip—much loving and much loved.

It is so, I am sure, that his close friends will remember him. Others will have different memories: his students will recall an understanding and inspiring teacher; the literary world, a writer and critic of sensitivity and integrity; the world of serious readers, a lively contributor to many journals and the author of "Campus, U.S.A."

The pages that follow represent his last work; he died, suddenly, during the final months of their preparation. This centennial issue of The Nation is the labor of many people, but of David Boroff more than any other.—J.J.S.Jr.

PUBLISHER'S FOREWORD

In the beginning was the jungle. Man, slow of foot, possessing neither teeth nor claws as useful weapons, lived a precarious life in a hostile environment, more hunted than hunter. The most non-specialized of creatures, his small number of physical superiorities over the other animals were all defensive, designed to perceive, communicate or elude danger.

His best defense was his instinct for fear. The killers of the animal world—hawks, wolves, sharks—do not know fear; but their victims possess it, for without fear (as without pain) there would be no survival. Fear is the property of the gentle creatures—and of man.

But in recent times man has become the greatest hunter of all; and in the end, an exterminator. We have all but conquered our environment, bent it almost to our own design. Ecologically, perhaps not much that is good can be said for the design, but the fact remains that we are no longer seriously threatened by anything on earth save the consequences of our own actions.

What has enabled us to climb out of the jungle is the written word. Without this, none of our other distinctive features—neither weight of brain, opposed thumb, color vision nor vocal flexibility—would signify greatly. They are matters of degree and make us superior animals—but they do not enable us to do anything our grandfathers' grandfathers could not do just as well. That we are in many areas capable of doing more and knowing more than our remote ancestors, is solely due to a written language.

But language is a tool, and all tools may be misused. The great advantage of the written word is that it makes available to us the experience and ideas of the past; the great danger lies in its uncritical acceptance. Truth is often a relative thing: yesterday's brilliant deduction can be a misconception today, tomorrow a dangerous delusion. Valid ideas are not to be plucked indiscriminately from the shelves of a library like canned goods in a supermarket.

Yet this is what we often do. The dead hand of the past points, and we follow. In our own time we have seen people become like the lemmings, running towards destruction in unthinking response to pressures and motivations long since left behind. In this way, for instance, Nazism led the Germans—a civilized and intelligent people—into unbelievable barbarity. It is the way the radicals of the Right, the self-styled "conservatives," would lead us today; and many of us follow. Response to the stimuli of yesterday's fears invites tomorrow's destruction.

Fear is a natural imperative, demanding to be felt. But all the ancient fears: darkness, wild beasts, thunder and lightning, fire and the elements, have for us lost their mystery; and what we understand, we no longer fear. So man's need to fear finds an outlet in his fellow man: we fear each other. We fear the next man's ambitions, the hostility of those who are unlike us, the peculiar ideas of our neighbors, the rivalry of our acquaintances, the opinions of our friends, the unspoken thoughts of those closest to us.

We have mastered our external environment, but our internal environment betrays us. Just as the degree of salt in human sweat and tears reflects the composition of the oceans whence came our remote ancestors, so our minds and our personalities reflect our jungle past and its fears. And if the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, the fear of our fellow man is the fount of irrationality.

Thus we have created, and continue to maintain at staggering cost, the capability of destroying all mankind, including of course ourselves. But can we really conceive of ever using it?

We are assured that it is vital to our economic health to continue to devote to the machinery of destruction one-tenth of all we make and own. If such tithing be really necessary, would not its fruits be better and more safely disposed of in the sea?

We in America do not officially recognize the existence of the most populous country in the world. Will one-quarter of the human race kindly go away?

These massive absurdities of our time betoken the irrationality engendered by fear. Many of the traumas of the immediate past become equally absurd, once removed from their contextual tensions and dispassionately examined. The Great Depression was more the consequence of unreasoning fright than of anything else. More recent absurdities—McCarthyism, the antics of HUAC, blacklisting, riots in our Northern cities and bombings in our Southern towns—all spring from that atrophy of reason produced by fear. And surely the most monumental example of all was the surrender of a major political party to utter irresponsibility. War is Peace; 1984 might have arrived twenty years ahead of time. Yet it is clear that this particular insanity was only temporarily averted; its symptoms are still with us, its causes still operative. Government by "consensus" is hardly a solution to problems requiring imagination, invention, or even mere innovation to solve.

NEVER BEFORE in history could it be more truly said: we, the human race, are racing right up to Destiny's wire; the fearful Omega of ultimate doom awaits our fateful and final step. Omega bestrides the world, implacable; we look it in the eye and are hypnotized. Its feet are rooted firmly in our past, to whose stimuli we are still reflexively responding. Like Cerberus, it has three heads: science, nationalism and expanding population.

As humans, we have the same natural need to use our faculties as have other species; our faculty of reason, under the spur of our inextinguishable curiosity, has produced the need to know. The fruit of the Tree of Knowledge has always irresistibly tempted us. So we have produced the systematization of the means and the ends of knowledge, the structure of thought which we call science. This structure, the inevitable product of our humanity, originally served well the purposes of self-preservation; today, under the thralldom of nationalism, it threatens our destruction.

Nationalism, like science, originated in the instinct for self-preservation which we share with all forms of life. It was inevitable, and also of great value. Our civilizations, our cultures, our environmental mastery, all were nourished under its wing. And so, indeed, was science. But today science, controlled by nationalism, threatens to destroy humanity—if not in an atomic holocaust, then by the slow strangling of a population increase to which medical science has measurably contributed.

Expanding population, the third of the Cerberean heads, approaches a critical mass. Under its inexorable pressure, the outdated and inadequate social structures of the world are fast crumbling. If allowed to continue, overpopulation is certain to overwhelm—some say in a matter of a generation or two—any curbs, however well or skillfully contrived, which we may succeed in fashioning to stave off disaster.

Nationalism, under the insatiable demands of more mouths than can possibly be fed, will inevitably and desperately strike out with science to destroy the world. The circle of cause and effect thus linked surrounds us completely; we must cut our way out at some point or perish.

Time is most emphatically not on our side, nor will our human dilemma resolve itself. We need vitally a new response (to borrow Toynbee's phrase) to this new challenge—a world-wide response, or ours is likely shortly to be added to his catalogue of dead civilizations.

Certainly such a new response will not be achieved through traditional modes of thought. And new modes, on an international scale, are not easy to come by. The thought process itself is restricted by the very language which makes thought possible. We cannot think without words, and the abstract words which are the building blocks of thought inevitably acquire connotations within each language that make their interlingual conveyance an approximation at best.

To the linguistic difficulties are added others arising from the nature of our established institutions. The very fact that an idea, concept, or doctrine is taken for granted by millions of Americans (or Frenchmen or Russians or Japanese) is to say that it will probably not be widely examined—and therefore is almost certainly wrong. So our society (Great or not) marches on, acting upon false assumptions, accepting premises no longer relevant, and trafficking in non-thought through the medium of a communications establishment controlled not by thinkers, but by advertisers.

WHERE, THEN, IS the fresh thinking to come from? A rhetorical question, surely: it must come from fresh minds competently trained in the exercise of reason and prepared to examine and re-examine, question and criticize, free to accept or reject or modify the concepts bequeathed to them. This is what our educational establishment is for. But it can hardly be said to serve this purpose, as Edgar Friedenberg points out later in these pages.

I think, however, that there is hope. Despite the attachment to the status quo of our communications industry, and the faintheartedness of our educational system (certain shining exceptions in each); despite the vested interests of the economically-wedded industrial and scientific establishments (Où sont les chercheurs d'antan?), there is one group in our society that isn't buying—our students. We have given them a world which is a working model of insanity; they quite rightly reject it.

Of course there is immaturity in much of their rebellion; it is hardly logical to blame the young for being at times immature. But the point is that they, and the young generation in general, have at many times and in many places shown the courage to be different and to revolt, to refuse to accept what in their eyes is injustice, and the good sense to tell nonsense for what it is. They are the best hope of our disordered world; if there be a way out of the trap we are in, it is they who, given time, will find it.

The difficulty of finding a hearing for truly original thought, a rostrum from which new voices may present new ideas—this problem will always be with us. The communications industry in general—network TV and radio, the big newspapers, the mass magazines—are obviously too beholden to advertisers to whom, in turn, they must deliver audiences by the million, to be seriously considered as free media of expression for the unpopular view and the iconoclastic idea. This is not to say that a good many laudable gestures are not made by them in the direction of a free expression of opinion. But year in and year out, they cannot be more venturesome than their cash balances allow.

Thus the field has been left to the small-circulation magazines. Today, in this country, they are the best testing-ground for fresh ideas, non-popular thinking, free expression on every subject. Except with respect to their own financial health (their income is almost entirely from subscriptions), it is a matter of no great concern that their circulations are very small. But it is a matter of the greatest concern—to all of us, readers and non-readers—that they exist at all. For anyone with something relevant to say, they provide a place in which to say it, and an audience who will listen.

THE NATION is one of a small band of such magazines. Most of them are published with a decidedly liberal bent; their courage and their integrity are admirable. I think it unfortunate that the conservatives lack such a paper.

THE NATION, however, is neither liberal nor conservative nor radical, nor does it habitually reflect the views of any group, political or otherwise. Its pages are available to anyone, of whatever belief, with something relevant to say and the ability to say it. I became the publisher of its 100th Anniversary Issue because I believe it to be vitally necessary that such a journal should continue to thrive. The furrows of conventional thought have been plowed both long and deep; it is a bumpy route across them, but it is the only way to the other side.

It is the purpose of this issue to reflect THE NATION's century of travel upon this route of independent expression and dissent (and its detours from it as well). Its purpose also is to call attention to the symptoms of some of our age-old illnesses as they appear today—anti-intellectualism, intolerance, jingoism, imperialism, for starters—and, looking to the future, to foresee where we are likely (and shortly) to find ourselves. Caveat lector. I have tried, finally, to project in this issue as much as possible the character and tone of THE NATION in the hope that you who find some virtue herein may be prompted to become regular readers of the magazine. Let it be said that the magazine has need of all who may discover a need for it.

I salute THE NATION's present publisher, editor and staff for their long devotion to excellence in journalism. They have shown both the ability to achieve excellence and the courage to maintain it. I can think of no higher praise. J. J. S. Jr.

THE NATION has been one of the few voices which has been heard on behalf of individual liberty and social justice consistently throughout its existence. I have particularly valued it in the post World War II period, not because its independent radical thinking was not needed before, but because the climate of oppression and bigotry in the United States has made all the more noteworthy THE NATION'S outspokenness since 1945. THE NATION is one of the few journals which has had the courage to expose and oppose the Cold War and those who promote it. I take great pleasure in congratulating THE NATION upon its 100th anniversary.

—Bertrand Russell

THE PERSONAL NOTE

Publishers and Editors of THE NATION, past and present, talk a little about themselves and—from the inside—a good deal about the magazine.

GEORGE KIRSTEIN

Publisher Since 1955

In the twenty-three years since graduating from college, I had worked continuously with maximum vacation breaks of two or three weeks a year and perhaps a month's interim between jobs. After a year as errand boy in a Hollywood movie studio, I worked for eight years in a New York store, two years in Washington for the government, three years in the Pacific on a Navy ship, four years as an industrial consultant and five years as the executive vice president of a medical insurance company. Now it was summer of 1955, and I was determined to travel, to study, perhaps to write, but in any event not to work again until I had thought out just what it was I wanted to do. My marriage had broken up; I was alone and free to follow any promising path.

The voice on the telephone identified itself as "Carey McWilliams, editor of The Nation." I scarcely knew Mr. McWilliams although he had once tried to persuade me by phone to write an article weighing the advantages of government sponsored medical insurance against the benefits of the existing voluntary plans. Now when Mr. McWilliams asked to see me I presumed he wanted to renew his request for the article. I explained I was planning a trip, I was on vacation and I would not accept any writing assignments for the time being. He persisted in requesting a meeting; a week later I entered The Nation's office for the first time.

Mr. McWilliams explained that The Nation was for sale; furthermore if a new management did not assume its obligations very soon, the magazine might well be forced to suspend publication after ninety years of vigorous life. The magazine was in debt; the fund-raising activities which had sustained it were becoming unproductive; and the expenses of printing and distribution were steadily rising. In addition to its financial problems, the magazine was suffering from the illness of McCarthyism in that many self-styled liberals believed that its editorial policy paid insufficient obeisance to the cold war cult of "anti-communism."

At the end of an hour's discussion, I asked, "If I assumed the financial responsibility for the magazine, who would be the boss?" His idea was that I would have complete authority over the publication's business policies; he would control its editorial content.

George Kirstein

I told him that the reason I had resigned from the medical insurance company was that I had divided authority with a doctor who controlled the professional aspects; but professional decisions affected fiscal performance so the setup was impossible. In the same way editorial policy would affect financial operations, so I declined to accept his concept.

"But," he argued, "suppose we disagree on editorial policy? You know little about the magazine and its history and, more important, I know little about you. I would rather see it cease publication than lose its character or surrender what it has stood for down the decades."

"I don't blame you," I replied. "After all, you have devoted years to this venture. I'll tell you what I am willing to do. I worked for Dr. Frank Graham on the War Labor Board. He's as fine a man as I ever knew. You know him, too, and now that he is at the UN he is available here in New York. If we disagree on editorial policy, we will put our argument before Dr. Graham, and whichever side he supports will prevail." Dr. Graham was generous enough to agree to act in this arbitral capacity, but we never called upon him to settle our differences, so this dispute-settling machinery died of disuse after a year.

Another problem had to be confronted.

"There is one thing, Mr. McWilliams, that I would want to know before considering your proposal. This magazine is being called all colors of the spectrum from pink to rosy red. That doesn't give me the slightest pause, particularly considering the people who are doing the calling. But if we are summoned before one of the inquisitional committees, as we well may be, I want to know how you intend to testify in response to the $64 question: 'Are you now or have you ever been a Communist?' "

Mr. McWilliams, a lawyer by training, discussed briefly his resentment and outrage at the Congressional Committee's practice of asking this question. He then said, "I have the deepest sympathy and respect for those who plead the Fifth Amendment in order not to involve friends and former associates. But so far as I'm concerned, after making my protest about the propriety of asking the question, I would have no other course but to swear to the truth. I am not now, nor have I ever been, a Communist." No Congressional or any other investigating body ever summoned us, and in due course the "Red" epithets ceased not because our policies changed but because the cowards who used the name-calling tactic to gain society's stamp of approval for their own political views, past and present, finally regained a modicum of courage in the less hysterical atmosphere following Senator McCarthy's unlamented death.

IN THE WEEKS THAT followed this preliminary discussion, I studied the financial statement of the publication, and read at random through its back issues. My father had been a subscriber to THE NATION when I was in school and college, and I had been an off-again on-again reader for years. I discussed the proposal to assume responsibility for the publication with my brother Lincoln and my sister Mina Curtiss, both of whom had been occasional authors or book reviewers for THE NATION over many years. I talked to many people, seeking their judgment as to whether I should undertake this task and their evaluation of my chances of successfully filling the role if I did. All agreed that it would be a tragedy for writers, staff, subscribers and even for the American press as a whole if THE NATION ceased publication. All were equally frank that my qualifications for the role were not ones that by any means assured success. My experience with journalism was limited to a four-year stint of writing a weekly column on labor relations for the trade paper, Women's Wear Daily, and my only other accomplishment along literary lines was the authorship of a very specialized book, Stores and Unions. Nevertheless, the major problems confronting the publication were financial and administrative, and in these business areas I felt qualified to accept the challenge.

By early fall of 1955, all of the arrangements for the transfer of THE NATION had been concluded, and my education began. One of the earliest tasks was to find financial support, for the size of the annual deficit was far beyond my personal capacity to meet. In the past, the magazine had attempted to solve the increasing problem of its financial deficit by soliciting relatively small amounts from a large list of supporters. As this method had proved inadequate in the past, I determined to find a relatively few people who would join me in furnishing sufficient funds to cope with what I hoped would be, and what eventually became, a considerably smaller loss. It took a year to find the eight people who agreed to join with me in the effort to keep the publication afloat long enough to have at least a chance of reversing the trend toward ever greater losses. Some of these early supporters I had known previously; others Mr. McWilliams knew; some were known to neither of us, but all had in common that they were thoroughly familiar with THE NATION's history and convinced of the importance of its continuity. Of the original group, all but one have continued their generous support throughout the decade and there have been two additions. These faithful partners have preferred to remain unheralded; they have never had a formal meeting and few have even met each other socially. They have never made the slightest effort to affect editorial policy and have limited their nonfinancial relationship to the magazine to the occasional proffer of a helpful suggestion which could be accepted or rejected without resentment on either side. A faculty member at Harvard, another at Columbia, a dairy farmer, an attorney, a recent graduate of Princeton, an author-scholar, two socially minded housewives, and a corporate executive comprised the list. My gratitude for their support is profound; without it THE NATION would probably have perished.

A plethora of experts, armed with conventional wisdom about publishing, saw the solution to THE NATION's problems in terms of a massive drive to increase the number of subscribers by offering cut-rate subscriptions through expensive advertising and even more expensive mailings. The reasoning behind this effort was that if circulation increased, advertisers would be attracted to use more pages and presto the last line on the financial statement would turn from red to deep blue. Having had no publishing experience, I adopted this method but after a brief trial I concluded that it is nonsense for a magazine which is not edited to be popular to seek popularity in the hope salvation will be gained through advertising revenues. Most magazines in general, and THE NATION in particular, would be far better with no advertising, and if there are not at least a sufficient number of intelligent people willing to pay for what they read instead of having advertisers pay for it, we are indeed in a sorry plight. After the first experiments with conventional methods of increasing circulation, we consistently limited our efforts to improving the quality of the publication in the hope that word of mouth comment about journalistic excellence would result in more readers. I have never believed that there is a close correlation between circulation size and the usefulness or lasting impact of a publication on the intellectual community which it is designed to serve. Over the decade, THE NATION's deficit has not disappeared, but it has become more manageable, the circulation has increased a little, the income has increased a lot, and the future may well disclose new methods of efficiency in production and distribution of periodicals which will permit a self-supporting operation.

The basic staff of the magazine remained on the job following the changeover. Robert Hatch, who had conducted the movie column, joined the staff as literary editor and after eight years became managing editor following the retirement of the very capable Victor Bernstein. We made a determined effort to attract new authors who would become identified with the publication, and one of the greatest rewards of the decade was to witness the well-merited growth in reputation of Fred J. Cook, Dan Wakefield, David Cort, and a score of others whose work appeared less frequently. Such established authors as Harold Clurman and Alexander Werth continued to contribute, effortlessly making the transition from one regime to the next. After a few years, we adopted a policy of having the poetry editorship revolve among younger poets. W. S. Merwin, who had suggested this procedure, became the first poetry editor in the rotating system, succeeding M. L. Rosenthal, himself a poet as well as a poetry critic. Merwin was followed by Denise Levertov, Paul Blackburn, David

My greetings to THE NATION as it reaches its Centennial. Its pages were an inspiration to me in my teens for it's helped me untangle many a web of confusion.

And during the rest of my life it has prodded, provoked, challenged, questioned, and protested—leaving no vital issue untouched.

It has served the people in the best journalistic tradition this country has known.

—Justice William O. Douglas

Ignatow, A. R. Ammons, and again by Miss Levertov for a second stint.

For some time the editorials which opened the magazine were written by various staff members, but we determined that if one man composed the bulk of them, there would be a consistency of style and tone which was unobtainable with wider authorship. Carl Dreher, almost miraculously from my viewpoint, has, during the last eight years, expressed each week the consensus of the magazine's editors, arrived at by the conference method. He has also advised the editors on scientific subjects.

WHEN ALL DUE RECOGNITION has been given to the staff and to the contributors, the fact remains that it is a magazine's editor who is the key figure. In the ten years we have been working together, Mr. McWilliams and I have never had an argument over matters of basic policy nor have we yet exchanged an angry word. That is not to say we have always agreed on all matters of mutual interest; it is simply to say we have continuously found a common ground on which we could both stand without violating our individual strongly held convictions. I have never ceased my wonderment at Mr. McWilliams' insatiable curiosity which drives him to read almost every publication printed anywhere in English. His memory of authors and their favorite subject matter is encyclopedic. His powers of persuasion have been demonstrated a thousand times when he has persuaded still another busy writer to undertake an assignment for the relatively modest compensation to which THE NATION's balance sheet constrains it. If I had any criticism of the conduct of his office I would accuse him (and have done so) of being too patient, too tolerant of authors with too little to say who don't even say that very well. However, the number of articles that have been published after having been rewritten, reworked, restyled and helpfully edited, attests to the fact that even this fault, if it is one, has been of benefit to the publication. If THE NATION's century-long contribution to journalistic history remained undimmed in this last decade, the credit must go to Mr. McWilliams.

The rewards of being THE NATION's proprietor have been great. I have met and been associated with poets, writers, journalists and critics of talent and of conviction. I have worked with editors who knew that their rewards would not be in high compensation, popular acclaim or general agreement. Rather their success could only be measured in terms of angry letters, cancelled subscriptions and editorial attacks in the mass press. In addition, I have repeatedly seen ideas that were first set forth in THE NATION, picked up weeks and even months later by the popular press, sometimes with generous acknowledgment, more often with none. This important role as purveyor of new and unpopular ideas has long been and remains the firm base of that most tenuous of all the adjectives used to describe THE NATION—"influential."

About a year after I came to THE NATION, I visited Justice Hugo Black in his office in the new Supreme Court building. I expected five minutes, at most, of this busy man's time, but the discussion turned to courage, particularly political courage, and this is a topic on which Justice Black is expert.

Several times I rose to leave, but I was motioned back to my chair. After about three quarters of an hour, a secretary came in with papers to be signed and I walked toward the door. On the threshold, Justice Black stopped me. "You know, Kirstein, what you are doing is important." I replied somewhat sceptically, "Justice Black, of the 180 million people in America, I doubt very much if one million of them have even heard of THE NATION." "Oh," he said with a smile, "I would think your estimate is high. But there are very few voices of dissent in America today and if the time ever comes when there are none, it won't be America." His words have been my compensation.

CAREY McWILLIAMS

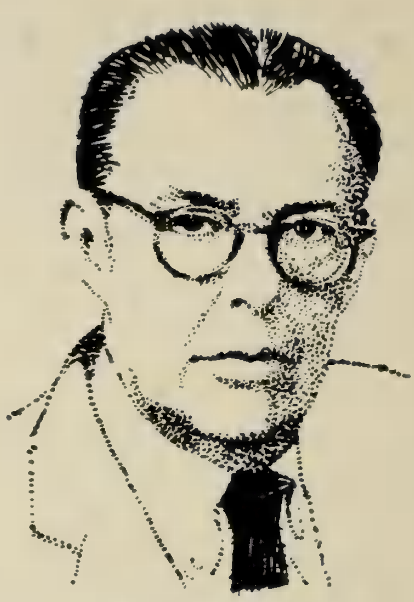
Editor Since 1951

NOT UNTIL I WAS A FRESHMAN in college did I become acquainted with THE NATION. The favorite reading matter of the cowhands and cattle ranchers of northwestern Colorado where I spent my pre-college years consisted of penny-dreadfuls and "cowboy" romances. As a freshman, I made four delightful discoveries (none was assigned reading): H. L. Mencken's The Smart Set, the plays and prefaces of George Bernard Shaw, THE NATION and The New Republic, and the massive unread Collected Works of Ambrose Bierce. I was a devoted reader of The Smart Set and later of The American Mercury as long as Mencken edited it and I have been a reader of both THE NATION and The New Republic since I discovered them. My first articles appeared in The American Mercury, THE NATION, and The New Republic.

As with many other persons, I liked THE NATION and The New Republic for somewhat different reasons. In general, I read The New Republic primarily for its "books and arts" section, THE NATION for its political and social criticism. In college I greatly admired—and still do—Edmund Wilson. Not only did I read with avidity everything that he wrote but I corresponded with him and had the pleasure of chauffeuring him about southern California in a Model-T Ford when he was gathering material for The American Jitters. Later, when I began to contribute to The New Republic, I would always have lunch with the staff on visits to New York and in this way got to know Bruce Bliven, Malcolm Cowley, George Soule, Betty Huling, Otis Ferguson and the others. A visit to New York that did not include the ritual of some quick stout drinks with Betty and Otis at the New Weston Hotel (Bruce was rumored to disapprove of midday cocktails) was unthinkable.

IN MUCH THE SAME way, I began to contribute articles to THE NATION from southern California, where my family had moved after the catastrophic collapse of the cattle market following World War I. After Brothers Under the Skin was published in 1943, I came east at least twice a year, on lecture trips, and lunch with THE NATION's staff also became a ritual. Actually my first tie with THE NATION was through Joseph Wood Krutch with whom I had corresponded; I remember that he took me to a party at Hart Crane's apartment when I was in New York for the publication of my first book—a biography of Ambrose Bierce—in 1929. On these semi-annual visits to 20 Vesey Street, I got to know THE NATION staff—Freda Kirchwey, Robert Bendiner, J. King Gordon, Margaret Marshall, Lillie Shultz, Del Vayo, I. F. Stone, Keith Hutchison, Willard Shelton, Maxwell Stewart, Harold Field and the others. I never met Villard but I corresponded with him. It was Villard, incidentally, who first proposed the appointment of a national commission on civil rights. In a letter to me (dated May 4, 1943), he told of how he had presented the idea of a commission to President Wilson, who had replied that he could not appoint such a commission because he was a Democratic President from the South and the South might get the impression that he felt there was something to criticize in the attitude of the South on the Negro problem! On one of my visits to New York, J. King Gordon, who was then managing editor of THE NATION, asked me to become a contributing editor, which I did effective January 20, 1945. For a nominal stipend, I was to contribute one or two articles a month and submit editorial paragraphs, mostly about civil rights, race relations, and issues of particular interest to West Coast readers.

As a result of this relationship—and a growing friendship with Freda Kirchwey—I became familiar with some aspects of THE NATION's finances and the problems it faced. The magazine had done quite well during the years 1938-1944—these were the only years it showed a profit—but in the postwar period some of the old problems returned in aggravated form. The more I was exposed to these problems, the more I sympathized with Freda, and with Evans Clark, her husband, a gallant, generous and nerveless man. I had occasion then and later to admire Freda's extraordinary courage, her unshakable faith in THE NATION, her derring-do spirit, her kindness and consideration, her good-humored forbearance under extreme provocation, and her general unflappability. From Freda I acquired, by contagion, something of her enthusiasm for THE NATION and her confidence that it could survive—as indeed it has—all manner of adversities. As I became aware, by slow stages, of some of the severe financial problems the magazine faced, it was only natural that I should offer to lend a hand. In this period—and for some time before—THE NATION had raised a substantial part of its budget through fund-raising dinners and functions, built around public issues, under the skilful direction of Lillie Shultz. But as the cold war came on and wartime good feeling toward the USSR abated, it became increasingly difficult to raise money in this manner. So, in a careless moment, I suggested that it might be a good idea to hold a fund-raising function in Los Angeles. Out of this suggestion came a conference, held under the auspices of THE NATION, at the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles, September 21-22, 1946. In retrospect this conference has—for me at least—a certain historic interest. (For this conference, I edited a special 46-page Western Supplement which dealt with certain postwar Western problems. In the editorial introduction I ventured the suggestion that, for all the serious problems it faced, California stood on the "threshold of a great expansion." I never made an easier or a safer prediction. California has a way of making its boosters look like prophets.)



Carey McWilliams

A few words about the conference, which was devoted to the theme "The Challenge of the Postwar World to the Liberal Movement," will point up the special interest it has for me in retrospect. The first session on "The 1946 Elections and America's Future" was chaired by John B. Hughes, then one of the West Coast's best-known radio commentators. The speakers were Oscar Chapman, then Undersecretary of the Department of the Interior; Irwin de Shetler, Regional Director of the C.I.O.; Susan D. Adams of the ILGWU; Loren Miller, the distinguished Negro lawyer—since appointed to the Los Angeles bench by Governor Brown; and Richard Ibanez, outstanding representative of the Mexican-American minority. The second session, which Chet Huntley chaired, on "America's Foreign Policy and Its Relation to Peace," included as speakers Dr. Harold Fisher, Director of the Hoover Library, Stanford University; Freda Kirchwey, and J. Alvarez Del Vayo. The third session, "Economic Security as a Factor for Peace," included as speakers Dr. Arthur Ross, Institute of Industrial Relations, University of California; Richard Boke, Regional Director, Bureau of Reclamation; Paul Raver, Director, Bonneville Power Administration; Dr. William Fowler, California Institute of Technology, and—ironically enough—Ronald Reagan, today a leading Goldwaterite Republican and likely candidate for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in 1966. The fourth session, "Organization for Democracy," was chaired by Maury Maverick; the participants were Dr. Lloyd Fisher, University of California; Dr. Harry Girvetz, University of California; Mary McCall of the Screen Writers Guild; Dr. Robert E. H. Harris, then chief editorial writer for the Los Angeles Daily News; True Broadman, a Hollywood radio writer; and Dr. Curtis Warren, Superintendent of Schools, San Francisco. The dinner meeting was chaired by Bartley C. Crum; the speakers were Thurman W. Arnold, Freda Kirchwey, Senator Wayne L. Morse, Dore Schary, and Will Rogers, Jr., Democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate that year.

THIS WAS THE last time, perhaps for a decade, that such a broad spectrum of "the liberal movement" assembled on the West Coast for a discussion of important public issues. Most of the important independent civic and political groups cooperated and sent delegations. The sessions were crowded, several to overflowing, and the dinner meeting netted a large sum for THE NATION. It is interesting to remember that the conference coincided with Henry Wallace's famous Madison Square Garden speech and his subsequent dismissal from the Cabinet. After the 1948 campaign it would have been impossible to have held such a meeting. The high hopes for the postwar period which had been generated during the war years seemed to crest at this conference. In the East, the wave had already broken. As Freda Kirchwey commented in an editorial (October 5, 1946): "California is a state where political interest is lively, discussion free, lines loosely drawn, personalities important. People like to say: 'In California, politics are fluid.' No words could express the situation better. Until recently the Left groupings, from Communists and their sympathizers to the liberal elements in the old parties, have supported a loose coalition or at least maintained a truce. The factional fight has been less bitter, open breaks less sharp and final, than in the East." But with the case of the Hollywood Ten, the breaks came thick and fast, and some of them have remained irreparable. For California liberals, the unforgettable event of the period was the Democratic Senatorial primary fight between Will Rogers, Jr., and Ellis Patterson. I was active in the Rogers campaign and still retain vivid impressions of the bitterness of that election and the splits it precipitated. The social life of Hollywood, Bel-Air and Beverly Hills was never quite the same after that disastrous campaign.

THE LOS ANGELES CONFERENCE was a reflection of the fact that the West Coast had begun to impinge on the national political consciousness in a new way. The increase in THE NATION's circulation in California no doubt had something to do with my appointment as contributing editor in 1945, which in turn precipitated the conference. That THE NATION had decided, for the first time in its history, to hold such a conference in Los Angeles—that it had begun to look to the West Coast for new sources of support—was itself an indication of a new awareness of the West Coast. Also the circumstance that liberal expectations for the postwar period glowed a little brighter and a little longer there than in the East seemed to imply that California enjoyed a degree of immunity from the virus of "anti-communism."

And to a degree it did. But in point of fact red-baiting had been more virulent in California than elsewhere; it was merely that the liberal movement being somewhat stronger than in the East had been able to cope with it more effectively—that is, until the 1948 election. California has an old freewheeling "libertarian" tradition, associated with such names as Fremont Older, Lincoln Steffens, Col. Charles Erskine Scott Wood, Francis J. Heney, John R. Haynes, Rudolph Spreckles and Simon J. Lubin, that proved helpful in surmounting the first onslaughts of "anti-Communist" demagoguery. It is the kind of state in which, from the days of Dennis Kearney and the "sand lot riots" of the 1870s to the present time, controversies have tended to degenerate into shouting contests. The state's politics have always been of the catch-as-catch-can variety. The extremes are highly developed and articulate. California has probably had more witch hunts and more free-speech fights than any state in the union. But with the onset of the cold war, the political atmosphere became envenomed to a degree that only those who experienced it will believe. There seemed to be no bottom to the quagmire of malice, gossip, name-calling, finger-pointing, and recrimination. The experience left me with an abiding contempt for professional "anti-Communists," including the academic variety, and a conviction that "anti-communism" was, on the domestic scene, a far more dangerous force than communism had ever been. To be sure, the Left was not free of blame for the debacle that ensued, which paved the way for McCarthyism, but the major responsibility rests on those who should have known better but who, for a variety of motives, succumbed to the hateful pressures of the period. Two dear friends of mind, Louis Adamic and F. O. Matthiessen, committed suicide during these years, in part (but only in part, of course) because of their despair over the course events had taken and the brutal way in which they had been treated by former friends and colleagues.

In general I approved of what Henry Wallace said in his Madison Square Garden speech, but once it became apparent that the forces most actively supporting him had adopted a rule-or-ruin attitude and were determined to set up a new party, I found it impossible to go along and said so publicly. What I was principally opposed to was the split with the Democratic Party. THE NATION took essentially the same position, of course, and what Freda Kirchwey had to say on the subject editorially in the issue of February 21, 1948—months before the returns were in—makes good reading today: "It (the Wallace movement) has been rejected by the C.I.O. and the A.F. of L., and the four Railway Brotherhoods, by the Socialists, by organized farm groups, and by the overwhelming majority of New Deal leaders who served under President Roosevelt. Even so staunch an admirer of Henry Wallace as Sen. Claude Pepper has repudiated the third party crusade. . . . Entirely apart from the ideological dangers of making a progressive party dependent on organized Communist strength, the fact is that to do so is to build on quicksand. Let the line change, for reasons beyond the control of Mr. Wallace, and the foundations of his movement will collapse overnight."

With the Smith Act prosecutions, the loyalty program, the miserable showing of the Wallace-Taylor ticket, and the general deterioration of USSR-U.S.A. relations, the Great Witch Hunt got under way with a rush and a roar. Even before McCarthy emerged as a national figure, the course of events was clearly indicated. The consolidation of power by the Chinese Communist Party, the emergence of McCarthyism, and the outbreak of the Korean War merely fanned the flames of the domestic cold war.

THE NATION, of course, found itself directly in the line of fire. While the paper had refused to support Henry Wallace, it continued to insist that peace with Russia was possible and desirable (see the special issue: "Peace with Russia: Can It Be Negotiated?" of December 16, 1950, with such contributors as H. Stuart Hughes, James P. Warburg, Hans J. Morgenthau, Isaac Deutscher, R. H. S. Crossman, Claude Bourdet, Sir Benegal N. Rau, Harrison S. Brown, Abba Eban, Grenville Clark and others). Today such a stand meets with general approval; so distinguished a spokesman for the liberal movement as John Kenneth Galbraith recently pointed out that an understanding between Russia and the United States was the "fulcrum" of American policy. But this was a most unpopular position to take in 1950. Nothing in its history does THE NATION more credit than its resolute refusal, under Freda Kirchwey's editorship, to join the cold war or to chorus in on the domestic witch hunt.

But largely because of its stand on these issues, the magazine's financial problems became more acute. Costs began to soar at precisely the time that fund-raising through public functions became impossible. In the spring of 1951, Freda asked me to come to New York to help plan a special civil liberties issue. To this day I do not know whether she intended then to invite me to join the staff or whether that idea occurred to her during our discussions. But before I left to return to the Coast, she asked me to join the staff on a full-time basis and put it to me pretty much on the basis that despite my reluctance to leave California, I should accept, as the position of the magazine could hardly be more critical. Frankly, the thought of leaving California even for six months or a year did not appeal to me. I had lived in southern

My congratulations to THE NATION on its centennial year. I have always admired the clarity and vigor of THE NATION and have appreciated the fairness that it has granted in the expression of its editorial view. —Sen. Margaret Chase Smith

California since 1922 and was about as deeply rooted in the region as any migrant is ever likely to be (see: Southern California Country: An Island on the Land and California: The Great Exception). I had contracts for books and other commitments. In 1951 we were living in our ramshackle old California redwood bungalow on a half-acre lot, complete with avocado, lemon and eucalyptus trees, high on a hilltop overlooking downtown and central Los Angeles. The hilltop view is superb—as the natives say, "On a clear day you can see Catalina Island." I still prefer it to the New York skyline. All the same, I did agree to return to New York for a short time. I have stayed, to date, fourteen years.

FROM EVERY POINT of view, I was a much less likely successor to Freda Kirchwey than she was to Villard or than he was to all the editors reaching back to Godkin. For one thing, I am the first West-of-the-Mississippi person to edit THE NATION, and one might expand that statement by saying "West of the Alleghenies" or, more specifically, "West of the Bronx." I have suggested that one reason for this odd jump to the West Coast was the emergence of the region as a new center of political power and interest; another reason may be found in my special interests and their relation to the American social scene (in an editorial of January 20, 1945, announcing my appointment as a contributing editor, Freda Kirchwey cited these interests as the reason for my appointment). Somewhat in the order of their emergence, my special interests have been: organized labor and civil liberties, migratory farm labor, race relations, demagogic mass movement and, of course, all things relating to California, its history, sociology, folkways, cults, population dynamics and politics—not to mention its coast line, mountain ranges, desert areas and lush valleys.

An interest in organized labor whetted my interest in civil liberties. I was a member of the board of the American Civil Liberties Union in Los Angeles at a time when it had only a few hundred members; the local chapter now has seven or eight thousand members. The then-director Clinton J. Taft used to send me on various quixotic missions; in the late 1920s, he sent me off on a state-wide speaking tour urging repeal of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. I was lucky to get back alive. Through these missions and assignments I became interested in migratory farm labor. I was often asked, for example, to investigate the strikes, mass arrests, criminal syndicalism prosecutions, and other actions which infringed on the civil liberties of migratory farm workers.

Migratory farm labor, like trade union organization and many civil liberties issues, is really an aspect of majority-minority relations. California is an excellent laboratory in which to study relations of this sort. The social structure is not rigid. Continuous, heavy in-migration has kept the state in constant flux and turmoil. Its population includes every ethnic strain, every racial type, every social class. Sequences that take decades to unfold elsewhere are often enacted there in a few years—you can see the process taking place before your eyes, as though in slow motion. For example, in the years from 1935 to 1940, I saw how a minority can be created under certain circumstances. During these years, several hundred thousand dust-bowl migrants surged into the state. Circumstances forced them into the subordinate role of farm laborers, at least for a time, and they were, of course, promptly stereotyped as "Okies" and "Arkies." The stereotype was precisely the same as that of Negroes and Mexican-Americans, despite the fact that the dust-bowl migrants were indubitably white, Protestant, and of Anglo-Saxon background. My interest in migratory farm labor (Factories in the Field, 1939; Ill Fares the Land, 1942) resulted in my appointment to head the Division of Immigration and Housing under Gov. Culbert L. Olson. Among its other functions, the division is charged with a general responsibility for the welfare of alien immigrants and enforcement of the labor-camp act. There were then about five or six thousand such camps—in which, at the peak of the season, the camp population would total 160,000 to 175,000 men, women and children. Naturally I was brought into close contact with most of the minority groups: Mexican-Americans, Negroes, Filipinos, Japanese-Americans, Indians, etc., not to mention "Okies" and "Arkies." Out of this experience came my interest in racial and ethnic minorities (Brothers Under the Skin; Prejudice; A Mask for Privilege; North From Mexico)

UP TO THIS point, I had been interested in majority-minority relations as an observer; now some of the issues came into sharp personal focus and out of this experience came my interest in demagogic mass movements. Long before McCarthy made his famous speech in Wheeling, West Virginia, on February 9, 1950, red-baiting had been more or less endemic in California. The San Francisco General Strike and Upton Sinclair's EPIC Campaign of 1934 had touched off an orgy of red-baiting. But despite this—in fact probably because of it—Culbert L. Olsen, who was himself a product of the EPIC Movement, was elected governor in 1938—the first Democrat to hold the office in nearly half a century. It was, of course, to be expected that Olson, whose first official act was to pardon Tom Mooney, would be given the full red-baiting treatment. Also elected under the sponsorship of the EPIC Movement were two young assemblymen: Sam Yorty, now Mayor of Los Angeles, and Jack Tenney. In the first year of the Olson administration, both Yorty and Tenney were flaming left-wing liberals, but as the political climate changed, so did their enthusiasms. An adroit politician, Yorty never let his new "anti-Communist" enthusiasms get the better of his cool political judgment, but Tenney went completely overboard and finally ended up, some years later, as Gerald L. K. Smith's Vice Presidential running mate. As part of their effort to discredit the Olson administration, Yorty and Tenney—egged on by conservative Democrats and Republicans—induced the legislature to set up the Tenney Committee (on Un-American Activities), which is still in existence. Over the years, and particularly as Chief of the Division of Immigration and Housing, I had been involved in numerous head-on collisions with such groups as the Associated Farmers, the American Legion and similar organizations. The fact that I had urged both the LaFollette and Toland Committees to hold public hearings in California, prepared Governor Olson's lead-off statements to both committees, held the first farm wage-rate hearings in the state, opposed the mass evacuation of Japanese-Americans, and prepared the draft report on the Los Angeles "zoot suit" race riot for the committee appointed by Governor Earl Warren (who succeeded Olson in 1942) had not endeared me to these interests. So I was given top billing by the Tenney Committee as some kind of "enemy of the people," but the real target was, at all times, the Olson administration. (Part of the story of those years is to be found in Robert E. Burke's book, Olson's New Deal for California, and in Dr. Edward Barrett's fine book on the Tenney Committee). By the mid-1940s, therefore, I considered myself an expert on witch-hunting techniques and the uses of "anti-communism." From 1946 on, it was increasingly apparent to me that a demagogic movement of great force and virulence was in the making. Witch Hunt: The Revival of Heresy embodies my forebodings; it was published, in 1950, just as the national spotlight began to focus on McCarthy.

THESE INTERRELATED SPECIAL interests, all of which began to assume increasing national importance after 1945, had prompted my appointment as contributing editor (see Freda Kirchwey's editorial of January 20, 1945, to which I have referred) and they are probably responsible for the fact that I was later asked to become editor. In the period from 1951 to date, the major editorial preoccupations of THE NATION, I should say, have been with the cold war, the domestic cold war or witch hunt, and the revolution in race relations. Until she resigned in September, 1955, Freda concentrated on foreign policy, which is her special interest, and gave me pretty much a free hand with domestic issues. The carry-over of my special interests is reflected in such special issues of THE NATION as "How Free Is Free?," our special civil liberties issue of June 8, 1952; "The Southern Negro," September 27, 1952; "The FBI," October 18, 1958; "The CIA," June 24, 1961; "Juggernaut, the Warfare State," October 28, 1961; and "The Ultras," June 30, 1962. Shortly before I came to New York in 1951, I prepared a new edition of Brothers Under the Skin with a new introduction in which I wrote that "a permanent revolution in race relations" had begun, and explained why. THE NATION's special issue, "The Southern Negro," clearly foreshadowed the course this revolution has taken to date. Some of the other special issues have, of course, made Fred J. Cook a familiar name in American journalism.

* * *

In the early summer of 1955, Freda Kirchwey, who about that time had been called upon to meet more than the normal ration of emergencies, said that she would be willing to relinquish the magazine to me if I could raise the funds necessary to liquidate the indebtedness the paper had accumulated and insure continuity of publication. Some of the individuals I had been able to interest in THE NATION promised to continue their support, so I then set out to find a publisher who would contribute or help raise the balance that was needed. If THE NATION was to be reorganized, I knew that I would need the help of someone who had executive talent and experience. At this critical juncture, a friend told me that George Kirstein had just severed his active connection with H. I. P. (Health Insurance Plan) and was about to set off on a cruise in his sailboat. I had met him once, at a dinner party, and on another occasion had tried to get him to do an article for THE NATION. What I knew about him suggested that he possessed ideal qualifications: he knew the magazine and what it stood for; he had served in World War II; he had important executive experience in government (War Labor Board) and in business; we had many mutual friends. So I got him on the phone—just shortly before he was about to set sail—and asked him how he would like to be publisher of THE NATION. This out-of-the-blue query didn't seem to faze him. He came to the office, asked some very good questions, and then asked me to prepare a memorandum on what I conceived the functions and responsibilities of a publisher to be. It was almost as casual as that. If I had spent a year in hot pursuit of the ideal publisher, I could not have done better. If it had not been for his generous and timely intervention, I certainly would not have been able to carry out Freda Kirchwey's suggestion. In addition, the magazine has benefited enormously from George's supervision, his keen judgment, and his eye for the relevant. Like Freda, he has steady nerves and doesn't frighten easily. This, of course, is neither the place nor the time to tell how much THE NATION owes to all its friends and supporters, to its contributors and its readers and to its fine staff. But I do want to say here that no editor ever had better or more considerate or helpful working colleagues than I have had in the persons of Victor Bernstein, Robert Hatch and Carl Dreher.

ON BALANCE, I am not at all sorry that I deserted that hilltop home in Los Angeles to come east to edit THE NATION, much as I want some day to write the books I had on my agenda in 1951. Since then, THE NATION has been my "home" in the sense that I have probably spent almost as many hours at the office as I have at home with my family; winter, spring, summer, fall—day and night—THE NATION has been my constant preoccupation. Discovering what THE NATION is—and what it is not—has been an instructive experience, for its survival for a century is one of the major miracles of American journalism. It is more than a publication; it is an incorporeal entity with a life of its own that exists quite independently of personalities, ownership transitions, or editorial successions. It has friends in all sections of the country, in all quarters of the globe, not one in ten of whom is a subscriber or ever has been. But they know about THE NATION and find many ways of demonstrating their friendship. Communications reach it from all points of the compass; clippings descend upon it from Bombay and Boston, Ceylon and Cincinnati, from the executive mansions of state capitals as well as federal, state and county prisons. Many of these communications are simply addressed to "The Nation, New York." No one has ever "owned" THE NATION; it is impossible to own or possess it or bequeath it or sell it or mortgage it. If it ever ceased to be what it has always been, it would simply not exist—regardless of who "owned" it or how much money stood on deposit in its name. It is an idea, a spirit, a name without an address; it is fragile, without physical assets, but it is free and so it lives. It is of the past as well as the present; it belongs to all those who have read it, quoted it, written for it or helped it; to those who have reviled it no less than to those who have respected it. To have edited it for a day would have been a privilege; to have been responsible for it for more than a decade is an experience to be cherished.

An editorial writer needs stimulation as well as information, and I find both in THE NATION.
—Herbert L. Matthews,
Editorial Board, N.Y. Times

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Associated with THE NATION for 37 years; Editor and Publisher, 1945-55

IT ALL BEGAN on a bright August afternoon when my husband and I slid alongside the landing at Bennett's camp on Raquette Lake, pulled our duffle out of the canoe, and walked up the path to our tent. Two weeks of paddling through the lakes had left us with only three conscious desires—a hot bath, our mail, and supper that we hadn't cooked ourselves.

The mail came first—even before unpacking. In among the pile of family letters was a typed envelope addressed to me. I opened it in its turn. Could I guess it concealed a suggestion that would fix the course of my life for the next 37 years?

It was from a young woman I had known slightly at college who was now a secretary in the office of THE NATION. She had heard, she said, (how, I had no idea) that I was looking for a job. She thought there might be one with a project just getting under way—a section on international affairs to be issued every other week as a supplement to THE NATION. If I was interested, I'd better act quickly.

The letter had been forwarded from New York and had rested for several days on the table in our tent. I passed it over to Evans. "Read this one next," I said.

Evans read the letter and for perhaps three minutes we talked over the suggestion it brought. Then I sat down and wrote to Mr. Villard, THE NATION's editor and owner, and also to Henry R. Mussey, formerly my economics professor at Barnard and now managing editor of THE NATION. A reply came from

Mr. Villard himself, expressing interest but asking some pointed questions about my journalistic background, my knowledge of foreign languages, my European experience. I decided that the best thing to do was to meet these issues—and the editor—head on; so that night we boarded the train for New York.

Next morning I went down to Vesey Street to see the editor. Our meeting was amiable. In spite of admitted gaps in my qualifications, Mr. Villard approved some things about me. One was my father, for whom he had a long-time friendship and admiration; they had labored side by side for many liberal reforms. Happily, I too had taken part in several movements close to his heart. I had campaigned for woman suffrage, in and out of the state; and as an early member of the Woman's Peace Party, I had been active in the foredoomed struggle to keep the United States out of the European conflict. Of both these causes his courageous mother was an early and active partisan—a fact that influenced his judgment in many subtle ways—and he obviously approved when I told him I had been a member of the delegation of women that had demonstrated in front of the Capitol at Washington the previous spring, in one last effort to stave off the fatal commitment to war. We had known, of course, that our pleas would be valuable only for the record; that very night, April 2, President Wilson delivered his war message.

HOW MUCH THIS background influenced Mr. Villard, I don't know. In any case he told me there was an opening on the staff of the International Relations Section that I might perhaps fill. I would be expected to read, mark, and clip newspapers and reports from all over, file clippings, prepare copy, read proof and help with the make-up, all under the close eye of William MacDonald, editor of the I.R.S. If I proved capable, I might also write paragraphs for the editorial pages, and notes for the new section. To me it sounded like a dream job, but then suddenly Mr. Villard wound up his discourse on a note of doubt. He had heard, he said, that I had hopped from one job to another since I finished college. He would not want to employ a person who couldn't be counted on to stay put, accept routine, and in general become a part of the permanent establishment.

Alarmed and surprised that I had achieved a reputation of this sort in three brief years, I earnestly set forth the accidents of fate that had punctuated my professional life: one, the arrival of a baby, which had halted my career as reporter on the Morning Telegraph; two, the demise of the magazine, Every Week, on which I had served as an editorial assistant; and three, a wholesale firing at the New York Tribune that had cost me my job there clipping "fillers."

Perhaps this last item helped allay Mr. Villard's doubts. He knew the story, or part of it. It seems there had been a denunciation of the Tribune's distinguished managing editor, Dr. Ernest Gruening, because he had published in the Sunday rotogravure section a picture of a recent lynching in the South side by side with one of a parade of Negro troops, back from front-line duty in France, marching down Fifth Avenue. The furies of patriotic indignation had been loosed by this graphic reminder of one of the more glaring inconsistencies of our country's "fight for democracy." Dr. Gruening subsequently was sacked; but before that time, so was every employee who had come on the Tribune staff during his term of office—several of whom, like myself, had been hired by someone else and had never met him!

As far as the Tribune episode was concerned, Mr. Villard was obviously inclined to regard me as a sacrifice in a noble cause. He accepted me into the "NATION family"—as he loved to call his staff—and two years later Ernest Gruening himself became THE NATION's managing editor—one of the best it ever had.

WHEN MR. VILLARD sold the Evening Post and took over THE NATION, he made the weekly into something different and new—livelier, more controversial, more political; less erudite than in its long and influential past, but still authoritative and, occasionally, profound. At the same time, and quite inconsistently, he resisted the idea that any real "sea-change" had overtaken the publication. So deep-rooted was his feeling for the tradition and standards set by Godkin and Garrison that when an article or book review displeased him, he was apt to say, reprovingly, "That is really not up to NATION standards," and would summon up William James or Charles Eliot Norton as evidence and example. Or he would remark, "That's not THE NATION's position, you know," about some point he disagreed with in an editorial, forgetting pro tem the new positions his weekly was taking in almost every issue. Thus he always suffered from a division of mind and heart: old versus new, traditional attitudes versus a drive for radical change—political and social.

That the second set of values generally prevailed is proved by the staff Mr. Villard gradually assembled. It included several eminent people of his own generation. Henry Mussey had resigned from Barnard College, after a long and successful career there, in protest against President Nicholas Murray Butler's dismissal of several Columbia professors who opposed the war. (A particularly obnoxious act, since Butler had been before the war an outspoken pacifist, praised for his views in THE NATION itself!) William MacDonald came also from the academic world, having taught history and political science in several leading universities and published a number of studies and textbooks in his fields. Both men had been associated with THE NATION before its final separation from the Post, and both were militant liberals, whose ideas reached further leftward in some areas than those of their editor-in-chief. As for Emily Balch, a newcomer, she had eagerly accepted Mr. Villard's offer of a job on the new International Relations Section when she found that her pacifist views and writings had ended her long teaching career at Wellesley.

These were the elder statesmen of Mr. Villard's "new" NATION. But in selecting additional staff members, I think it fair to say that he favored young people, equipped with a flair for politics and a broadly liberal point of view, over older and more experienced journalists. He saw in them, and encouraged, possibilities of growth. He tried them out in new fields of work, and took chances editorially that would have horrified his colleagues of former days. It is true that when his new recruits upset him by straying too far off the old track he complained bitterly and concocted plans for tighter supervision and control. But as long as he remained with THE NATION, Villard never basically betrayed his own "revolution."

WHEN I JOINED the staff, the International Relations Section was housed in the "barn" —an area covering the entire fourth floor of a small loft building that adjoined the New York Post building in which THE NATION's main offices were located. You walked from the one into the other through a fire door, permanently latched open. The "barn" had no divisions except those marked off by desks and rows of filing and book cases. I think there was also a little fence between the I.R.S. area and the business departments at the back. The lighting was poor and the walls grimy.

However, none of us felt deprived or exiled. We shoved our desks to where the light was best and we worked hard. Our salaries were as modest as our surroundings. My own beginning pay was $25 a week. It was soon increased to $35 through the kind intervention of my friend, Alma Wertheim, who served as a volunteer in our department. (I should add that, when I succeeded Mr. MacDonald as editor of the I.R.S. a few months later, my weekly salary, covering my work for both sections of the paper, came to $65.)

Mr. MacDonald was in firm control of our small operation, and he kept things moving. As his general assistant, I read reports and documents in English from uncounted countries. I read newspapers in equal numbers. I also clipped and filed in high filing cases everything of possible editorial value from the whole English-language press, and woe to me if a cutting (we called them "cuttings" for some Anglophilic reason) needed by my boss or by any other editor could not be quickly exhumed.

Mr. MacDonald's desk was next to mine. Behind us and to one side sat Emily Balch, her spare figure and aquiline profile dark against the window. In spite of her deep commitment to the peace movement, which claimed her chief efforts to the end of her days, she gave long hours to THE NATION. I never saw a more concentrated worker: she read, she wrote, she absently nibbled raisins in the late afternoon and seemed unaware of her surroundings. Yet if one spoke to her she responded with a quick smile and friendly attention. I think she was the least self-conscious woman I have ever known.

I had immense respect for her, not only because she had lost her professorship for a cause I believed in, but because the light of genuine thought and knowledge illumined everything she wrote or said. And I nourished a suspicion that Mr. MacDonald regarded her with complete indifference. No doubt he recognized her scholarship, especially in areas such as Balkan politics where most of us were ill informed, but rarely did he speak to her or ask her opinion. And when, some months after I came, Mr. Villard put him in charge of the editorial pages of THE NATION and I became editor of the International Relations Section, I found in his desk, now mine, a thick pile of unpublished material written and turned in by Emily Balch! I was furious at MacDonald and filled with partisan sympathy for Miss Balch. But, fortunately, I discovered soon after that she had also been writing unsigned editorial articles and paragraphs which had duly appeared in the main section. So I felt better. And only recently in Mercedes M. Randall's excellent biography of Miss Balch, Improper Bostonian, I learned that my colleague had greatly enjoyed her stay on THE NATION. Of such stuff, I suppose, the saints were made.

In any case, I need not have worried about Miss Balch's lack of recognition. Shortly before she died, she won the Nobel Peace Prize.

In that first year the best part of my work was producing, out of endless cuttings and a consuming interest in the awful world around us, many of the notes and longer reports that made up the latter part of our sixteen-page fortnightly supplement. (Later the I.R.S. was published as a weekly eight-page section of THE NATION itself.) I have recently looked over those early issues and found myself astonished by the volume and range of their contents and by the excellence of the signed articles by outside experts or by Mr. MacDonald himself. The list of our contributors was almost a Who's Who of contemporary experience and scholarship in the wide area of international relations. Our first issue carried articles by John Bassett Moore and by Thomas G. Masaryk—later president of the newly born Czecho-Slovak Republic.

THE NATION published, first in the United States, the draft of a proposed League of Nations written by General J. C. Smuts, South Africa's liberal statesman who was then a member of the British War Cabinet. The General gave the document to Mr. Villard with full distribution rights, having turned down a number of requests for it from the Associated Press. Appearing as a special supplement in the I.R.S., and later as a pamphlet, the document was widely circulated and much of it—though not enough!—was incorporated in the actual League Covenant. For THE NATION it was a major scoop and did a lot to boost circulation. The I.R.S. was also the first to publish the Constitution of the new Socialist Soviet Republic, followed by a compilation of twenty-one basic Soviet decrees.

The table of contents during this period shows how assiduously THE NATION followed the course of revolution, in Russia but also in the rest of Europe, and tried to correlate that process with the war's dying convulsions. In Germany, especially, strikes were multiplying and the workers were swinging leftward. The coming collapse and the rise of the revolutionary Spartacus movement were already in sight. In March, 1919, the I.R.S. printed the text of the Spartacus Manifesto. The signers included Karl Liebknecht, Rosa Luxembourg, Franz Mehring, and Clara Zetkin. It was followed by a brief editorial note: "The first two have been murdered. Mehring has died."

ALTHOUGH VILLARD had denounced the war, on principle, and had strongly opposed American participation, THE NATION editorially backed the Allied cause and, toward the end, even acknowledged the critical need of powerful military help from the United States. In fact, several editorials emphasizing this need appeared during the crisis summer of 1918—before Villard's sale of the Post but after he had assumed full editorial control of THE NATION. The last one contained a few lines worth repeating here:

> This is not a time for closing our eyes to disagreeable facts. . . . Our people should realize that the military burden of winning the war rests squarely upon the United States, and that if we cannot bear it the war is lost. . . . We have become the stroke oar in a boat in which the rest of the crew are almost exhausted.

The editorial then pointed out the amount of help the United States had already provided, but said, "On the other hand, there is no adequate visualizing of the extent of the crisis, no understanding that we are suddenly become the Atlas bearing on our shoulders the whole Allied world and its hopes for defeating the worst aggregation of conscienceless militarists the world has produced. . . ."

I quote these lines not to charge THE NATION's editor with inconsistency, though I think he was deeply divided, like many of his colleagues, on the issue of America's total commitment. I quote them, rather, to indicate how little Villard deserved the pro-German label that was attached to him as a person, and also to THE NATION, not only during the war but even more persistently after the adoption of the Versailles Treaty.

What Villard hoped for was an Allied victory followed by a peace without reprisals—in fact, a peace based on Wilson's Fourteen Points. What he—and the world—got was a peace of vengeance that brought starvation, economic collapse, run-away inflation and the spread of revolution; a peace that led inexorably to Hitler, and thence to World War II.

THE NATION'S PAGES reflected faithfully the whole tedious process following the German defeat and surrender. Villard covered the Peace Conference in Paris with the able assistance of Lewis S. Gannett, who joined the staff soon after it was over. When the Conference reached its predestined end with the adoption of the Treaty, THE NATION's bitter, powerful editorial, "The Madness at Versailles"—though written by MacDonald rather than Villard—summed up exactly the editor's over-all attitude. On this issue, at least, the staff was unreservedly behind him. The editorial was widely reprinted, warmly praised, furiously attacked. But events at home as well as overseas were verifying THE NATION's position. Already the United States was sliding into a deep slough of reaction. Nothing perpetrated in recent years by McCarthy or McCarran or HUAC or the CIA has had uglier private and public consequences than the hysterical denunciations, the arrests, and the mass deportations that followed the war.

THE NATION and its editor were, naturally enough, the main targets of professional anti-Bolsheviks and super-patriots. Mr. Villard himself got the brunt of it, partly because of his German ancestry and partly for his outspoken pacifism. On one occasion he had to be rescued by the police when a meeting in Cincinnati, under the sober auspices of the City Club and the Women's City Club, was invaded by a mob of Legionnaires and other organized ruffians, prepared to tar and feather the speaker. There were many proper clubs and libraries where THE NATION itself was banned.

Once in a while an amusing episode would highlight the prevailing insanity—as when Ernest Gruening, who had recently joined the magazine, telephoned me at home to warn me that the Department of Justice was sending an agent over to look through my files. I hope it was a sign of the times and not of my gullibility that I believed him—and began a hasty search. What was in those files? Perhaps some documents on Soviet affairs that I'd saved for use in the I.R.S.?—perhaps a letter from our Moscow correspondent?—perhaps something, anything, that might conceivably be used against THE NATION? But presently my outrageous colleague called up to confess that the "agent" was his invention and I could quit my search. The point is that I had believed him and that—so fogged with suspicion was the air around us—I had some excuse to believe, and to worry, and look.

As the war fever subsided and prosperity increased, the atmosphere of hate and repression gradually cleared. But it was not wholly dissipated for it had seeped into the very marrow of America. When new difficulties arose—a wave of strikes, a rise in unemployment, or, later on, the economic slump that ended in collapse and brought Franklin D. Roosevelt to power—the immediate response of the Right was to try to silence discontent and clamp down on "agitation." Nor has the country ever recovered its former social or political balance.

A FEW WEEKS AGO I was assailed by a strong "here-is-where-I-came-in" sensation. It happened at a mass meeting in a high school auditorium on New York's West Side where I went to hear Ernest Gruening debate the Vietnam issue with William Bundy of the State Department. Sitting in the wings behind the platform and listening to the arguments for and against U.S. intervention, occupation and the rest, I was suddenly jerked back to those early twenties when Gruening was denouncing in the pages of THE NATION the same—exactly the same—acts; only then it was Haiti and Santo Domingo, with Vietnam still snugly under the rule of France. But, of course, I said to myself, it is Haiti and Santo Domingo now, too, as well as Vietnam, and the issues are the same, and the Marines are there today as they were in 1920.

It was an experience of sharp, retrospective anguish to realize that this was where Ernest Gruening also had "come in," and had done as much as one editor with one liberal weekly could to end the state of big-power domination in the island. And here Villard deserves another word of retrospective praise. His handling of THE NATION's finances had varied from extravagant to hard-fisted, depending on many changeable factors apart from the balance sheet. But one constant factor was his determination to send the best reporter he could find to get the story he wanted—and never mind the cost. In Haiti and Santo Domingo several specially qualified writers covered the U.S. intervention at different periods, including Herbert J. Seligmann, Lewis Gannett, James Weldon Johnson, Helena Hill Weed, and, of course, Ernest Gruening himself.

In addition, a committee was set up under the auspices of THE NATION, and hearings were held at which both experts and refugees from the occupied island gave testimony on the brutalities committed under the tough dictatorship of Col. Smedley D. Butler and his Marines. THE NATION's exposure of these facts shocked the country, led to protests in Congress, and eventually helped bring about some modification of the methods used. More important, perhaps, the very publication of facts generally suppressed or distorted had a healthy effect on the rest of the press. U.S. policy in the Caribbean could no longer be treated as "classified." And when the intervention ended and independence was restored, the leaders of both countries gave public credit to THE NATION, and its service was recognized throughout Latin America. Haiti, the special object of our concern, was so grateful after its freedom was assured that the government decided to place a statue of Ernest Gruening in the main square of Port-au-Prince. Only the modest protests of the hero himself prevented it from happening.

Less impressive, but clearly relevant, is the fact that the first time my husband and I visited the island, in 1940, we received special attentions, though we came only as tourists and unannounced. In Haiti, President Vincent entertained us at his official residence in the hills above the capital. He recalled with many expressions of gratitude THE NATION's share in the fight for Haitian freedom and presented us with five volumes of his writings.

Today, as I read the ugly, repetitious details of the current intervention, repression, and Marine rule, I hope that the voice of Ernest Gruening, in and out of the Senate chamber, will continue to sound with all its earlier effect—and still with the solid backing of THE NATION!

THE CAMPAIGN IN behalf of the two island republics was logically followed, late in the twenties, by a brief NATION foray into Nicaragua. There another typical Marine Corps occupation in support of U. S. financial interests had been expensively maintained since 1912. According to Mr. Villard's later reckoning, "by the time we began to evacuate, in 1932, our protection of the bankers' $15,648,700 had cost us $6,076,000." But, also, thousands of lives had been lost and hate of the northern "imperialists" had been spread throughout the Latin countries by the time a genuine native leader, Sandino, rose up to lead the resistance.

At this point, Mr. Villard dispatched an outstanding Latin American expert, Carleton Beals, to Nicaragua to get the story. Beals's reports of his trek through Guatemala, San Salvador, Honduras and half of Nicaragua, and finally straight into Sandino's army camp, made a series that read like a best-selling adventure novel [See page 83]. But they told facts that had not been published anywhere, and Beals brought home with him Sandino's peace terms —moderate and sensible but, of course, ignored by Washington.

Another tragic injustice, the Sacco-Vanzetti case, dragged through the twenties, poisoning the decade. Many noted people covered the trial in its various stages, but among the most impressive articles printed in THE NATION were those by a remarkable Boston woman—neither journalist nor lawyer, and no longer young—Elizabeth Glendower Evans. Her calm and deadly analysis of the flaws in the prosecution evidence helped to make their execution in 1927 appear the murder it undoubtedly was.

Other NATION correspondents, such as Paul Y. Anderson and Heywood Broun, contributed exposés of the trial at various points. As the execution date drew near, Mr. Villard and several other public persons formed the Citizens' National Committee for Sacco and Vanzetti. The eminence of the group helped force a review of the case by Governor Fuller of Massachusetts—all, it turned out, in vain.

In the summer of 1927, just after the executions, I went to Europe with my father and husband. Because my father was widely known as a criminologist and the former dean of Columbia Law School, he was besieged by reporters and public men, all asking how the horror could have occurred. He could only state his unqualified opposition to the verdict, and point out that his views were supported by many of the more liberal members of the American bar. Mr. Villard's moving editorial in THE NATION, "Massachusetts the Murderer," put in plainest terms the sense of shame that pervaded the country when Sacco and Vanzetti, bravely and calmly, went to the gallows.

ANOTHER QUESTION, this time a non-political one, that concerned THE NATION in the mid-twenties was the much discussed collapse of moral standards, especially among the young. Those who believe that the general loosening of sexual restraints today, at all social levels, is a new phenomenon either have forgotten or are too young to remember the "sex explosion" that horrified the older generation and engrossed almost everyone during the decade following World War I.

In the winter of 1924 I took on the task of assembling a number of articles on this broad theme. They were collectively headed "Our Changing Morality" and later appeared as a book under that title.* The series included contributions from such writers as Bertrand Russell, Alexander Goldenweiser, Beatrice K. Hinkle, M. Vaerting, Ludwig Lewisohn, Floyd Dell and Elsie Clews Parsons. One of them, on "Modern Love and Modern Fiction," was by Joseph Wood Krutch, who had recently joined the editorial board as drama critic.

Since the subject was challenging and the writers frank and sophisticated, these articles drew a flood of letters, both friendly and hostile. Because of the interest aroused, we held a public dinner discussion on the question, "Is Monogamy Feasible?" I presided, and the speakers, selected from the authors of the series, were Mrs. Parsons and Dr. Goldenweiser, both anthropologists and authors, and Floyd Dell, the novelist. All three gave talks that were serious and, at the same time, sharply provocative. The room was crowded, and the discussion following the speeches roamed over a wide field. It was so contentious that my powers as chairman were heavily taxed. I recall one question and answer among the dozens exchanged. Said a dignified woman to Dr. Goldenweiser: "You have advocated legalizing birth control. Now I would like to ask you, Doctor, whether you meant to suggest that information about birth-control methods should be made available to young, unmarried women." Said Dr. Goldenweiser, partly rising, "Oh, yes." "Pardon me," said the questioner, "I'm not sure I heard the answer." "The answer," I told her after a glance at the speaker, "was 'yes'." There was a pause, and then the audience broke into somewhat embarrassed laughter.

NO STORY ABOUT THE NATION's twenties could end without at least a glance at the key people who wrote and helped edit the paper, in addition to those whose role has already been touched upon. Automatically my mind turns first to the Van Doren dynasty—Carl, Irita, Mark, Dorothy. Under Carl, who joined the editorial board in 1920, the book section grew in authority and interest to a height it had never reached before—at least, not since Godkin's day. As a colleague and a friend, Carl was irreplaceable.

When he left, two years later, to become co-editor of Century, Irita took over the section and carried on in her husband's tradition. However, from the start, she was completely editor in her own right, and a most capable one, as was further demonstrated by her long and successful career as literary editor of the New York Herald Tribune, a post she accepted a couple of years after resigning from THE NATION.

Irita was succeeded by Mark. His scholarship was as substantial as Carl's, but since he was first and always a poet, and only second a critic, the tone and matter of the book section achieved a somewhat different quality. Mark also chose poetry for THE

---

*Published by Albert and Charles Boni, 1924.

NATION and occasionally contributed a poem of his own. If his taste was in vivid contrast to that of his editor-in-chief, one could not be surprised. A generation of changing styles and attitudes separated them; also Mr. Villard, as he often remarked a little wistfully, "had never been thoroughly grounded in the poets."

Dorothy joined THE NATION earlier than the rest—in 1919. Later she became a successful novelist, but her many years as associate editor were devoted to the miscellanies of editorial work. She had a flair for rather hard-boiled whimsy and wrote many columns for a weekly feature devised and introduced by Mr. Villard. It was hopefully intended to inject a light touch into the magazine's sober pages, and was called "In the Driftway." I must say that I never liked the feature as such, but there were two editors who could write sharp and amusing columns, and Dorothy Van Doren was one of them. Of course, she also wrote sober editorials and paragraphs and edited copy, and indeed could turn her hand to any chore around the office.

The other editor whose Drifter columns I liked was Arthur Warner. He had a quirky humor and a leisurely style, and nobody could do a better piece on the degeneration of apple pie in America or how to prepare a cheese soufflé. I suppose I needn't add that Arthur was a man with a poor digestion, who could seldom enjoy—except in his mind—the delights he wrote about so well.

Arthur was, besides, an experienced reporter who had spent much of the war period working for the Paris edition of the New York Herald and the London Daily Mail, as well as for the New York Post.

Arthur Warner's views were radical, lucid, and calmly expressed. When he died, in 1934, of a heart ailment, he was missed, and still is, by every one of his colleagues. I was asked to speak for the staff at Arthur's funeral service, and I have been sorry ever since that I could not get through my short tribute without weeping. Arthur would not have approved of those tears.

Joseph Wood Krutch might almost qualify as a member of the Van Doren dynasty were it not that he was too much a natural individualist to be assimilated to any group. He and Mark had been students together at Columbia, had enjoyed a year's traveling fellowship together in Europe, and had joined THE NATION staff in the same year, 1924, Joe as drama critic, succeeding the mercurial and brilliant Ludwig Lewisohn.

Joe's protean nature is well indicated by his many published works. Their themes range from Restoration comedy to the vast world of non-human nature. As THE NATION's drama critic he made a name for himself and the paper; his reviewing was shrewd, amusing, often profound. He also wrote "off" editorials (i.e. those not dealing with THE NATION's main interests); book reviews, of course; essays in a variety of areas. Once in a while he would take on a job of special reporting, as when Villard sent him to Europe to write about the theatre in Hungary.

Outstanding among Joe's non-literary articles was one on the famous Scopes trial at Dayton, in his native state of Tennessee. He covered the trial along with a star cast of reporters from every leading paper, and his article, "Where Cowards Rule," published in THE NATION on July 15, 1925, was in my view the sharpest and most discerning that appeared anywhere.

The editor who was probably most important to the paper as a whole was Lewis S. Gannett. He had come to THE NATION after acting as correspondent and assistant to Villard during the Peace Conference at Paris, and was a first-rate reporter as well as an effective editorial writer. In the office he was the editor's right hand. He could fill in anywhere. In fact, if you wanted to be lazy, Lewis could easily do your work and his own as well! It was a grievous loss to the paper when he quit in 1928 to become daily book columnist of the Herald Tribune. Mr. Villard said many times that he had always hoped to make Lewis Gannett his successor as editor.

MANY OF MY OTHER colleagues of that decade played less prominent roles simply because they remained with THE NATION a shorter time. Among them were Raymond Gram Swing who, after a brief term as member of the editorial board, left to become one of the most famous of radio news commentators; Lincoln Colcord, almost universal in his interests and writings, whose solid fame came from his sea stories, based on many years before many masts—real ones; Arthur Gleason, primarily an expert on labor and related subjects; Stuart Chase, who wrote on economic affairs in a vein too "modern" to please the editor. After he left THE NATION—to its great loss, in my view—his star rose fast.

There were Albert J. Nock, essentially a Single-Taxer, and a sharp, sardonic writer, who resigned after a rather short stay and founded his own journal, The Freeman, and Suzanne LaFollette, who left THE NATION to work with Mr. Nock in that distinguished venture. Briefly, Norman Thomas was a valued member of our board. So was George Soule, another excellent writer in the field of economics, who later, in partnership with Stuart Chase and Evans Clark, established the Labor Bureau, an agency providing economic services for labor organizations. For a short time William Hard acted as Washington correspondent, a post later inherited by Paul Y. Anderson, to whose vivid and provocative reports THE NATION recently devoted an article.

Before ending this roster I want to mention two people from the business side of THE NATION who stand out in my mind for special reasons. One is Miriam Walters, circulation manager during the first period of the Villard era. She was inventive and dynamic and certainly deserves a big share of credit for the paper's swift growth in those early years. The other is Adeline Henkel Fantozzi. Adeline served in the accounting department during the same remote era—and is THE NATION's accountant today. If she had not devoted a number of years to other duties, her term of service on THE NATION would outstrip that of any member of the staff—from the start of Villard's NATION until now! Strangely enough her age, to all appearances, has remained the same these forty-odd years.

A GOOD DEAL of semi-official and social life was intermingled with editorial duties in the early Villardian era: for instance, the staff luncheons at the Railroad Club, to which Mr. Villard invited outside guests as well as the editors. These affairs had a little of the aspect of a "royal command"; we attended unless some real obstacle got in the way. And since the guests were usually persons involved in public affairs with which THE NATION was directly concerned, the luncheons were professional as well as social.

Editors joked about them. Joe Krutch maintained that the Boss's guests were usually, if not always, members of the British Labor Party. But like the rest of us, he came. Actually I can recall some extreme variations from Joe's norm. For instance, the Bishop of Oxford, a good liberal as well as a most distinguished churchman, who happened to be guest at a NATION luncheon on the day of the "false armistice," when all of downtown New York poured into the streets pushing and shouting with hysterical joy, and to venture out was to risk injury at least. After lunch, the Bishop was escorted to safety, but I spent one of the most exciting hours of my life helplessly swept back and forth in the Broadway maelstrom.

Another variation was the great Nehru, for whose lunch we had to induce the club to provide the special dishes that our guest's vegetarian principles and frail digestion required. And, as a third, two young Negro girls from the deep South, brought to New York to tell their story, following a farm workers' strike which had recently been crushed with extreme brutality. In those days special arrangements had to be made with the Club to permit their attendance; but Mr. Villard made them, and seldom did we entertain brighter or more articulate guests.

But NATION luncheons could be regarded as part of the job. Entirely different were the mid-winter house parties at the Villard farm "Rockledge," in Thomaston, Connecticut. These were purely social get-togethers. Our host invited staff members of various ranks, along with husbands or wives, and presided over the festivities with the air of a genial pater familias who enjoyed joining the children in their sports—even if some of them were close to his age. We coasted if there was snow, walked in the woods, danced and sang songs in the evening; and I, for one, remember those weekend parties with pleasure.

I also recall an elaborately planned birthday party in honor of THE NATION's copy editor, George Schumm, who was known to young and old as "Papa Schumm." The affair was elaborately arranged by Mr. Villard himself and can best be described in his words, taken from a letter he wrote to Lewis Gannett, who was then in Europe. I should introduce it by explaining that Papa Schumm was the most modest man alive—besides being a philosophical anarchist and a passionate anti-militarist.

"We shall miss you," wrote the Boss, "at Schumm's 70th birthday celebration. Freda is lending her house, and THE NATION is blowing itself to a $100 silver coffee service and a collation for about twenty-five at which I shall confer upon him the decoration, Fourth Class of the Red Eagle, in the name of the Kaiser, and also pin an Iron Cross on him if we can find one in some pawn shop. . . ." And then, after the event: "Delightful party at Freda's. . . . Great surprise to Schumm. We all met in front of the house and marched in in lock-step. . . . William MacDonald and Van Loon were there, Van Loon bringing two violins on which he and Marian Tyler played while Carmen Reuben [Papa Schumm's daughter-in-law] sang. Wonderful birthday cake!"

Last winter I read these fragments to Papa Schumm's son Paul, for many years an engineer in the service of the Puerto Rican government. He remembered every detail of the party and said his father had been totally overcome with surprise, pleasure, and embarrassment. While such gala events were not frequent, I think this one well illustrated Villard's characteristic mixture of benevolence and rather juvenile, even "corny," humor.

MENTION OF Hendrik Willem Van Loon recalls another story that seems worth preserving. He was loosely attached to the staff in the early twenties and for a time regularly contributed cartoons and other drawings. His tall, lumbering figure, his wit and good nature, his odd neurotic quirks, and his wide acquaintance with persons and events, all created a pleasant ambience whenever he came to the office.

One day he stopped me and asked suddenly: "Who is this Alma Wertheim that's working here in the office?" "But you know her," I answered. "I've seen you talking to her." "I know I know her," said Hendrik, "but I don't know who she is. Now, I'll tell you what happened last evening. Then you'll tell me what I asked.

"You know how she looks, rather hollow-cheeked, rather poorly. I thought, well, why not ask her to dinner; she might like a real square meal."

So, Hendrik invited Alma and she agreed. Then, the day before, around the time to stop work, Alma said to him: "I wonder whether you'd mind having dinner with me at home? I have children, and it would be a little more convenient."

"Well," said Hendrik to me, "Of course I agreed, though I thought it a little odd, and I really did want to take her out. But we started uptown and got to her place, and it was a big apartment house on Central Park.

"Then I begin to wonder. We go up to her floor and in the door, and we are in a huge, very grand room which is two stories high, with a balcony around. Against one wall is a great organ, its pipes reaching to the ceiling. And in a moment, out come three little girls, and they are introduced and curtsy politely one by one.

"So I am lost! We enjoy an excellent dinner, most properly served. We chat of art and the war and THE NATION and much else. And now perhaps you know why I ask you, 'Who is Alma Wertheim?' "

I needn't describe my wonderful enjoyment of this story. "Alma," I told him, "to begin from the beginning, is the granddaughter of Henry Morgenthau, Sr., our Ambassador to Turkey during the war, where he also handled the interests of the Allied powers; he is a great philanthropist and a man of large affairs. Alma's husband, Maurice Wertheim, is himself now on a government mission in the Middle East. He's a good friend of Mr. Villard, and I think he helped finance THE NATION.

"Don't look so horrified, Hendrik, even if Alma is almost certainly not hungry! She's working on THE NATION out of interest and good will and because her husband is away, and I'm sure she'll be happy to dine with you any night when she has no home duties to attend to."

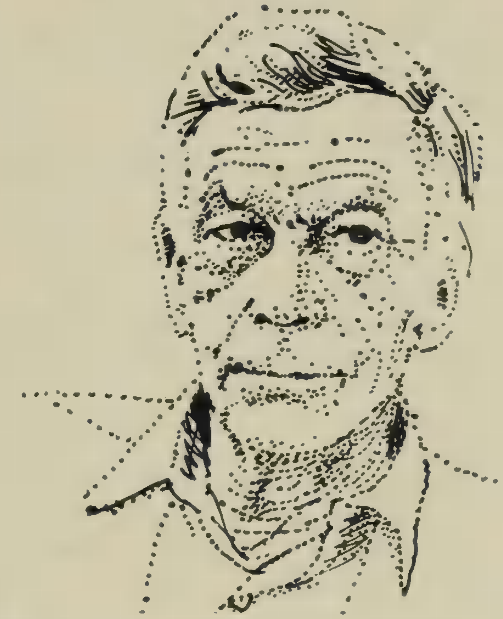
What I could not add to the story, for want of power to foresee future events, was that one of the little daughters Hendrik met, Barbara, would later join the NATION staff and, at a still more distant day, would write a book called The Guns of August; that a second daughter, Anne, would serve for a time as the NATION's film critic; that a third, Josephine, would contribute generously to THE NATION and become my friend and colleague in other activities.

Nor could I explain that Maurice himself would later buy THE NATION from Mr. Villard, publish it for several strenuous New Deal years, and ultimately—in 1937—sell it to me for a price so modest that I could not resist taking on a responsibility which, in the sober light of experience, was far beyond my financial capacity.

But that is another and a longer story!

MARK VAN DOREN

Literary Editor: 1924-1928



MY FOUR YEARS as literary editor of THE NATION (1924-1928) were years of excitement and anxiety: excitement because of all that went on around me, in and out of my office whose shelves were crowded with new books, and anxiety because I doubted that I could ever altogether please the editor-in-chief, Oswald Garrison Villard. In his mind, I continued to believe, there were at least three strikes against me: I was my predecessor's younger brother, I took my time getting books reviewed and often ignored certain ones supposed by everybody else to be important, and I had a queer taste in poetry. He and I got along well in most ways, but I still think he never forgave me these defects. I was not Carl Van Doren, whom he adored (as I did too); I refused to be timely; and the poets I printed bore no resemblance to those in whose works he once lamented he had been so poorly "drilled" at Harvard.

I shall never forget the morning when Laura Riding, then Laura Riding Gottschalk, dropped in on her way to England where she was to meet Robert Graves. I had printed several of her poems, sent to me from Kentucky, and now a new one was about to appear. Who then should come by, waving a proof of that poem, his face hot with fury because he couldn't understand it, but OGV? I managed, I thought, to maneuver Miss Riding out of the office before she heard the worst of what he had to say; then—as Lewis Gannett likes to remind me—I told him he didn't know a goddamned thing about poetry. He forgave me this, but I am sure he never forgot it, any more than Lewis and I have. Nor would he be likely to believe me now, were he alive to listen, if I told him I no longer consider myself the expert I then fancied myself to be. But no matter. THE NATION went on as if no blow had been struck it, and I got my own quiet satisfaction out of printing the early poems, say, of Allen Tate, my friendship with whom began in those years. Also, I listened one day to an older friend, James Rorty, who had come from California to ask why no reviews had appeared, in THE NATION or elsewhere, of a book by Robinson Jeffers —who was he?—called Tamar and Other Poems. He had several copies under his arm and insisted that I take one home to read that night. I did so; reviewed it (promptly, for once) with unrestrained enthusiasm; and saw similar reviews, similarly inspired, appear in other places almost on the same day. Mr. Villard was not aware of many such happenings in the course of my stay on his paper; but he shuddered annually over the poetry contest we held, lest every year we make the mistake he thought we made when we gave the prize to Eli Siegel for "Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana."

THE LITERARY section of THE NATION was then under two irreconcilable pressures: to continue in the austere and truly excellent tradition of Paul Elmer More, whose columns had educated me as a student under Stuart Sherman at the University of Illinois, and at the same time to recognize the many new strains, some of them shocking, in the literature of the twenties. The older tradition had of course to go; but meanwhile a weekly column I wrote, "First Glance," was conceived as a lifeline thrown back to the shores of erudition. I reviewed reprints, and in so doing showed off such scholarship as I possessed.

The book section was expected to be comprehensive, and tried its best to be so. And we had many superb reviewers, including Preserved Smith and H. L. Mencken. Mencken's copy was a joy to handle because nothing whatever had to be done to it: I often did not read it until it was in proof. Other contributors, some of them famous, wrote carelessly; though there was one whose care in composition was clearly so exquisite that he too needed no editorial attention. This was B. H. Haggin, who came one day to propose himself as music critic for THE NATION but with the stipulation that his copy never be changed or cut. Nor was it; and if he was grateful I was even more so, as any editor will understand. There was equal pleasure to be got from reading the dramatic reviews that came in, first from Ludwig Lewisohn and later from Joseph Wood Krutch, whom I had known intimately for ten years. These men were both serious and witty; the pleasure they gave me and their readers was intellectual in the richest sense of that great word.

As a member of THE NATION staff I of course attended conferences and had my share of editorials to write. And I took my turn being The Drifter, an imaginary fellow who weekly delivered himself of opinions or observations that could be as trivial as he pleased. Yet on the whole I was left to myself and the new books that poured in from the publishers. This was my life, at least on the days when I was not teaching at Columbia, and I liked it. The other editors —Villard himself, Lewis Gannett, Freda Kirchwey, Arthur Warner, and others who came and went— were seldom anything more than curious as to what I was doing. Their own concerns, with the society and the politics of the day, I left to them as they left mine to me; though naturally I learned much from them.

Once I learned something from Heywood Broun that had to do with writing—his writing—rather than the state of the world. Late one Friday afternoon, when I was the only editor in the office, the composing room called to say that Heywood's column, his weekly contribution, failed by 200 words to reach the bottom of the page. I got him on the phone, told him this, and inquired with some diffidence how soon the needed words might be expected. "Why not now?" he asked. And he proceeded to dictate a dozen or so perfect sentences. "Fine," I said, "but where should they be inserted?" "Anywhere you like," said Heywood, and hung up. I discovered that he was right. His method was to say one thing many times; a subject didn't advance for him, it simply spread in circles, like water into which a stone is dropped. The first place I tried his words, they fitted. A statement, rich already, was now richer. A statement about what? I must admit I don't remember.

ERNEST GRUENING

Managing Editor: 1920-1922

I HAD TWO TOURS of editorial service at THE NATION. My name first appeared on the masthead as managing editor on May 15, 1920, and remained there till November 1, 1922, when I left. I continued for another year as an associate editor, however.

In May, 1920, Oswald Garrison Villard, the magazine's owner, was listed as editor. Associate editors were: William MacDonald, Freda Kirchwey, Arthur Warner, Arthur Gleason and Lewis Gannett. Carl Van Doren was literary editor. Ludwig Lewisohn was writing dramatic criticism and book reviews and would shortly replace Gleason as an associate editor.

Ernest Gruening

We were a congenial group and our weekly staff meetings, when we would plan the next issue, were leavened by hilarity and wit. While our writing and editing talents were more or less interchangeable, each of us had one or more specialties. I had brought one with me.

While at Camp Zachary Taylor during World War I, I had picked up a newspaper in the "Y" and read an item recording the bombing of Haitian villages by U. S. Marines. This appeared so in conflict with the Wilsonian pronouncements of self-determination and rights of small nations, that I promised myself I would try to look further into the matter at the first opportunity. THE NATION furnished it admirably.

Herbert Seligmann's devastating article, "The Conquest of Haiti," appeared in the July 10 issue; "The Conquest of Santo Domingo," by Lewis Gannett, the week following. Editorials and pertinent documents on these flagrant episodes in U. S. gunboat diplomacy—which had been largely concealed from the world by a rigid censorship—followed, and I sent James Weldon Johnson to Haiti.

In August, THE NATION began publishing Johnson's four articles under the general heading: "Self-Determining Haiti." Our campaign resulted in a Congressional investigation. A select committee of four Senators, headed by Medill McCormick, went to Haiti and Santo Domingo—both victims of our Marine Corps conquest—and I was asked to precede and also to accompany the committee. Before his departure, Sen. McCormick wrote in THE NATION:

> The Haitian scandal is the fruit of that exquisite hypocrisy which had peculiarly characterized the present administration [Wilson's] and of the canting inefficiency which has marked the conduct of the Navy Department during the last several years. We subjugated the people of Haiti and of Santo Domingo by force of arms.

Warren G. Harding, the Republican Presidential candidate, likewise made a campaign issue of "the misuse of our gallant Marines."

But, after election and the return of Republicans to power, all acts of the Naval occupations and their fiscal concomitants were ratified. The Senatorial investigation produced a complete whitewash.

THE NATION, however, continued to campaign—including exposure and denunciation of U. S. arms-supported "dollar diplomacy" in Nicaragua. Related, also, was the United States policy toward Mexico, which was denying recognition to the post-revolutionary government of President Obregon because he declined Secretary of State Hughes's request to sign away in part the purposes and fruits of the Mexican Revolution when these seemed to our State Department to imperil American properties.

Independence for the Philippines was a related NATION "cause," as was revision of the canal treaty with Panama. Critical examination of U. S. Policies in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Samoa were "naturals."

Another island came in for intensive attention. The century-old English-Irish struggle was intensifying in bitterness and bloodshed and arousing hostility between Britain and the United States. THE NATION, initiating a series of full-page editorials headed "No War With England," sponsored an investigating committee of 100 leading Americans. The idea caught fire. Over 150 outstanding men and women in all walks of life responded. From among them a commission of five was elected. The hearings brought witnesses from overseas; the testimony was highlighted in THE NATION and received coverage in the press. It is fair to state that this undertaking was an important factor in securing Ireland's status as a "free state" and later as an independent republic.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—especially the new nations created by the Versailles Treaty—came in for much attention. So did Russia, the great controversial enigma. A major report by Bertrand Russell appeared in two successive issues. "I went to Russia believing myself a Communist," he wrote, "but contact with those who have no doubts has intensified a thousandfold my own doubts, not only of communism, but of every cult so firmly held that for its sake men are willing to inflict widespread misery"; and after further discussion of his experiences, Russell concluded: "I cannot accept the bolshevist philosophy or believe in abandoning the slower methods of democracy and popular agitation."

British affairs were ably presented by J. A. Hobson, Henry W. Nevinson, Harold Laski, J. Ramsay MacDonald and Herbert Horwill.

Villard was covering Germany as were Robert Dell, S. Miles Bouton and Dorothy Thompson. Paxten Hibben was writing on the Middle East; Nathaniel Peffer on the Far East. Lewis Gannett was keeping watch on France. Freda Kirchwey, directing that excellent documentary department, the "International Relations Section," was watchful of events in the Balkans, Africa and Asia.

The twenties were a sterile period politically and socio-economically. NATION editors could muster enthusiasm neither for the Harding-Coolidge regime nor for its Democratic alternatives. "Don't throw away your vote by voting either for Cox or Harding," adjured one leading editorial. Senators Borah and LaFollette were editorially encouraged to start a third party. The Farmer-Labor Party's convention, which nominated Parley P. Christensen for the Presidency, received full coverage and the Socialist Party's campaign was not neglected. (Norman Thomas, its oft-time leader, was welcomed as a contributing editor in October, 1921.)

The problems of Labor and the farmer received full attention editorially and in articles by Anne Martin, Frank P. Walsh, Mary Heaton Vorse, James H. Maurer and George Soule—one of THE NATION's steady contributors on economic subjects. J. P. Warbasse was a frequent contributor on cooperatives.

Villard wrote an excellent series analyzing the performance of the country's leading dailies; it was later published in book form. Suppression and distortion of news came in for frequent editorial comment. Obviously THE NATION was printing much the dailies did not.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST the Negro was treated by Villard, William E. Burghardt Du Bois, Walter White, William Pickens and—in a moving article titled "A Question to Democracy"—by my sister, Martha Gruening, under the pseudonym of Faith Adams. William Ellery Leonard's "The Lynching Bee" was an important contribution both poetically and polemically.

Anti-Semitism in the universities—particularly President A. Lawrence Lowell's proposal to establish a quota system at Harvard—were fully dissected. Palestinian problems received knowledgeable treatment from Judah L. Magnes, Louis Lipsky, Hiram Moderwell and Louis Weitzenkorn.

Social injustices and governmental performance on national, state and municipal levels were closely scrutinized. THE NATION was early involved in the Sacco-Vanzetti case and continued to try to obviate that tragic miscarriage of justice.

Conservation was dealt with by its foremost apostle, Gifford Pinchot, as well as by Robert Sterling Yard and in the editorial columns. Stuart Chase began his fruitful popularization of socially and economically vital subjects with an attack on waste.

The status of women was variously discussed by Florence Kelley, Elsie Hill, Harriet Stanton Blatch, Clara Mortenson Byer.

Belles-lettres in that era should receive retrospectively a hearty accolade. There were Ludwig Lewisohn's drama and book reviews, ever-penetrating and creative. There was Carl Van Doren's great series on contemporary American novelists, which ploughed new ground. The galaxy of book reviewers was unsurpassed. They included, besides our staff: Charles A. Beard, Robert Herrick, Thomas Reed Powell, Henry L. Mencken, J. Salwyn Shapiro, Frank Harris, Samuel C. Chew, Grant Showerman, Sidney B. Fay, Vernon Parrington, Edward Sapir, Hamilton Fish Armstrong, Mark Van Doren, Joseph Wood Krutch, Heywood Broun, Carleton Beals, Lewis Mumford, Preserved Smith, Carl Becker, Ludwell Denny, John Kenneth Turner, Franz Boas, Robert Morss Lovett, John Erskine, Robert Livingston Schuyler, Zechariah Chafee—the best talent in the academic and journalistic world was freely available to THE NATION for the asking, though the financial compensation was negligible.

Nor must we forget the contributions of Anatole France, who honored THE NATION with a notable series of "Opinions."

Much exceptionally good poetry appeared from the pens of Edward Arlington Robinson, Robert Frost, Elinor Wylie, Hartley Alexander, Alfred Kreymborg, Maxwell Bodenheim, Ben Ray Redman, Babette Deutsch, Grace Hazard Conkling, Hilda Conkling, Witter Bynner, Louis Untermeyer, Anne Herendeen, J. E. Spingarn and James Rorty, whose delightful "Children of the Sun" generated a small internal crisis in THE NATION's poetry selection policies.

ONE SERIES WHICH attracted a stellar cast of authors and corresponding interest dealt with the states. I presented no specific formula except a general purpose to bring out, in whatever way the author desired, the state's individuality. The first article, "Kansas: A Puritan Survival," by William Allen White, began with the pertinent sentence: "It is curious how State lines mark differences in Americans." Mencken followed with "Maryland: Apex of Normalcy," and the galaxy included Robert Herrick on Maine, Dorothy Canfield Fisher on Vermont, Zona Gale on Wisconsin, Douglas Southall Freeman on Virginia, Theodore Dreiser on Indiana, Sinclair Lewis on Minnesota, Sherwood Anderson on Ohio, Edmund Wilson on New Jersey, Willa Cather on Nebraska, Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant on New Mexico, Mary Austin on Arizona. Some of the articles by relatively unknown authors proved among the best, such as Easley Jones's Colorado, Johan J. Smertenko's Iowa, Charles H. Chapman's Oregon and Clement Wood's Alabama. Our staff was attracted by this assignment: Ludwig Lewisohn wrote on South Carolina, Arthur Warner on Delaware, Jack Macy (who succeeded Carl Van Doren as literary editor in October, 1922) on Massachusetts. I tackled New York City, dividing the Empire State into two parts; the rest of the state was handled by Charles W. Wood. The series was later published in two volumes. (I suggest that a similar series be written every fifty years!)

I left THE NATION to go to Mexico, assigned to write for it and also for Collier's Weekly, both of which published articles. THE NATION also published some reviews of Mexican books—forerunners of a great output on revolutionary and post-revolutionary Mexico, of which my Mexico and Its Heritage, published in 1928, was one.

The Great Depression was upon us and much change was impending when THE NATION's first issue in 1933 announced a new editorial board of Freda Kirchwey, Joseph Wood Krutch, Henry Hazlitt and Ernest Gruening, in whom editorial control was vested. Villard was to be a contributing editor with a weekly page headed: "Issues and Men."

Among the great changes that impended were the inauguration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and his "New Deal" on the home front and the emergence of Adolf Hitler abroad.

THE NATION welcomed many of the Rooseveltian reforms, for some of which it had contended for over a decade. It early exposed and inveighed against the horrors of Hitlerism.

DURING THIS ONE year's NATION editorship, I had occasion to visit Washington frequently to report on events there and was able to interest President Roosevelt and Secretary Cordell Hull in the need of a new policy toward Latin America. In the fall, I found myself appointed Advisor to the United States Delegation to the Seventh Inter-American Conference meeting in Montevideo in December. There we initiated a new policy of abjuring intervention in our neighbors' territory, making the Monroe Doctrine, in F.D.R.'s words, "a joint concern," and bringing to an end our era of imperialism and gunboat diplomacy. This was one of several battles for good causes for whose victory the foundation had been laid in THE NATION's editorial sanctum.

I shall ever be grateful for my years and the friendships formed there. They were among the most rewarding and stimulating experiences of my life, and taught me much that was helpful in my public service thereafter. Of no title could I be prouder than that of NATION alumnus.

ROBERT BENDINER

Managing Editor: 1937-1944

BY EVERY OBJECTIVE STANDARD the period when I first worked on THE NATION was surely the worst of times. In the last half of the thirties (I am jolted to realize that I was managing editor when the 75th Anniversary Issue came out) the depression was slowly dissolving, but it was dismally clear that it was melting under the heat of a growing rearmament; the fathers of Russian socialism were being shot weekly in the cells of Lubianka Prison; and the fetid tide of fascism was flooding, one by one, the capitals of Europe. Those were the years, a current jibe had it, when Hitler would take a country in the weekend while the British were taking a weekend in the country. As for Americans, they were still trying to make up their minds whether they belonged to the world or were operating on some independent planet.

Yet, grim as things were, there was an exhilaration, often a gaiety, sometimes even a giddiness, in the offices of THE NATION that wholly belied the times. In part, I have no doubt, the high spirits were a function of my youth—I was still in my twenties when I came to the antiquated offices on Vesey Street, overlooking the pleasant green of St. Paul's churchyard. No doubt, too, there was a natural headiness in the sudden and frequent exposure to the political and journalistic great of the day—a party to honor President Benes of Czechoslovakia, a lunch for the fast-talking Harold Laski or for Sir Stafford Cripps (who ate only carrots and watercress) or a dinner for retiring old Senator George Norris, who in spite of the spirited oratory alternately wept and slept throughout the long evening. Certainly a lightening influence was the spirit of Freda Kirchwey, whose warm and buoyant nature constantly surprised those who had assumed that anyone as steeped in the woes of the world as the editor of THE NATION could not fail to project an aura of doom. She laughed far more frequently and infectiously than was thought proper then, or is now, in official circles of reform. But beyond these personal elements, I think, was the fact that in response to its gothic horrors, like the response of fever to infection, the decade had developed an élan scarcely recognized by social historians.

Staff meetings on Friday morning were especially lively affairs. Usually presided over by Miss Kirchwey, they were attended by Margaret Marshall, literary editor, punster, and most ingenious deviser of article titles; Keith Hutchison, our genial English-born economist, myself as managing editor and later J. King Gordon and Harold Field, my successors in that slot; and a series of assistant editors who had a way of turning out to be the magazine's most famous and successful alumni, James A. Wechsler and Richard H. Rovere as prime examples.

OVER THE YEARS distinguished associate editors and Washington correspondents came and went, and they, too, would show up from time to time at these sessions—Paul Y. Anderson, who a decade before had cracked the Teapot Dome scandal, Joseph Wood Krutch, a superb dramatic critic before becoming the Thoreau of the Arizona desert, Max Lerner, Ralph Bates, Maxwell Stewart, I. F. Stone, and a dozen more. Foreign editors and correspondents like Robert Dell, Louis Fischer, and J. Alvarez Del Vayo, once the Foreign Minister of Spain, would sit in when they happened to be in the country and available, though often as not special evenings were set aside to hear their reports and analyses.

The Friday morning staff meetings had several purposes, the most entertaining of which was to wrangle over the cover line-up and titles. Hugo Van Arx, the whimsical Swiss business manager, was made welcome at these proceedings on the theory that the cover was the best sales promotion we had, but his proposals were usually shouted down as even more commercially improbable than those of the editors. One of his recurrent dreams for this magazine with a concentrated circulation in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles, I recall, was a cover with the screaming legend: "Save Our American Forests."

As with other periodicals, newsstand sales went up when the top of the cover touched on sex, insurance, animals, health, or Abraham Lincoln, all of which were for us unfortunately rare topics. But two of our most prophetic, if not commercially successful, titles had nothing to do with these matters. Both were mine, I am immodest enough to say—one "The Peace to End Peace," which ran the week following the Munich Pact, and "Don't Count Truman Out," which appeared in September, 1948. Other editors will no doubt recall better ones of their own.

Everyone worked hard, and for the editors, facing a Monday deadline, no weekend was ever free and clear. For all the brickbats we received, no one ever alleged that the magazine lacked earnestness and a very high specific gravity, although the injection of a satiric bit now and then must have troubled some of the oldtimers. The testy Oswald Garrison Villard, who enjoyed a kind of emeritus status in my early days on the paper, had so little relish for the light side of social criticism that for years he had flatly forbidden the use of political cartoons in the magazine. NATION readers, too, took to humor uncertainly, and some never acquired the ability to distinguish spoof from literal truth. In a column called "Beside the Point," in which Peggy Marshall and I collaborated after the war, I once took off on an outlandish charge by the Prague government that American airplanes were dropping beetles on the potato fields of Czechoslovakia. Offering what purported to be a transcript of a Cabinet meeting, I revealed the "plot," with the Secretary of Agriculture saying things like "Give me 5,000 Colorado beetles, Mr. President, and I will have the Czechs eating out of your hand—if at all." To my chagrin, letters came in expressing horror at the conduct of the Administration, congratulations on my journalistic enterprise in getting the inside story, and indignation that the rest of the press had chosen to bury it. It was plain that in the view of the letter writers we were dedicated people, and facetiousness was not for the likes of us.

YET IT WOULD HAVE been impossible to get through those yars, in that environment, without developing either a fond eye for the outré or a galloping neurosis, and both were common in the trade. To the natural concentration of eccentricity the stream of distinguished exiles added considerably, and few more delightfully than Rustem Vambery, Hungarian scholar and, for the short time he could stand it, Hungary's postwar ambassador to Washington. Professor Vambery, whom I cite simply as the first good example occurring to me, sported Edward VII whiskers, a twinkling eye, and an outsize gallantry, all supported by a height of hardly more than five feet. It was his happy notion that no minor difficulties in New York could fail to be smoothed out by a few pieces of hard and perfectly dreadful Esthonian candy, which he carried in a small tin for emergency purposes. These he would offer alike to ladies in a drawing room, as though they were exotic perfumed cigarettes, and to

Dead End kids on Tenth Avenue as payment for keeping a protective eye on his car. On one occasion, I remember, he extended the box to THE NATION'S switchboard girl, who had promised to convey a telephone message for him. "I have been many years in the Balkans," he murmured as we stepped into the elevator, "and I know the value of a bribe."

Another figure who stands out in a gallery of colorful individuals is Herbert Evatt, formerly Australia's Foreign Minister, who was very friendly to THE NATION when he served in New York as the UN Assembly's first president. Unaware at the time of his avid interest in sports (his other extracurricular passion was, and probably still is, the exoneration of Captain Bligh), I asked him whether there was anything to the talk that Philadelphia had been chosen for the permanent headquarters of the United Nations. "Wot," he said, "a city with two biseball clubs and both in lahst plice!" Lack of space, rather than material, precludes further anecdotage, but I should at least mention the debonair Baron von Munchausen, descendant of the classic liar, who came around to my apartment in June of 1939 to persuade me of the justice of Germany's rape of Czechoslovakia and to hint darkly that in two months "we" meaning the Nazis and what he thought to be the American Left, would be allies. Happily I was told several years later—whether accurately or not I can't say—that he wound up in an internment camp.

It was a luxury to write for THE NATION then, and it still is. But top people did write for it, for as little as $50, and a big name was no guarantee of acceptance. I don't think I was ever as tough as one of my predecessors, Ernest Gruening, now Senator from Alaska, who is said to have rejected assigned pieces by Carl Sandberg and Edgar Lee Masters. But I do recall getting two rewrites out of a Pulitzer-prize winner, at our customary rate of two cents a word, an incident I have hitherto concealed from my fellow-free lances in the Society of Magazine Writers.

Dick Rovere, who has long since become an adornment of The New Yorker, had a way of handling this particular aspect of an editor's work that was wholly his own. Empowered to reject manuscripts but not to give final acceptances, he would often find it so painful or difficult to explain a turndown that he would quietly stick the manuscript into a desk drawer instead, no doubt intending in some vague future to deal with it. One summer day when he was off on vacation, an editorial secretary looking for a lost article came across the Rovere cache, a collection of some forty to fifty manuscripts, together with a score of plaintive and indignant letters from authors attempting vainly to crash through the wall of editorial silence.

I WOULD NOT WANT to suggest that everything about THE NATION in those years was pleasantly eccentric, much less that all was courageous wisdom and good cheer. On the contrary, it was a period of fratricide, particularly the years from 1937 to 1941, from which American liberalism has yet to recover. For principled pacifists and not-so-principled isolationists THE NATION became a target, and many of its erstwhile supporters, mostly in the Midwestern tradition of La Follette and Wheeler (even O.G.V. was alienated) fell away—some as Socialists and pacifists, some as America Firsters, and some, alas, as apologists for Hitler Germany. (What were the Nazis doing, they kept asking, that was any worse than what the British had done for years in India?) At the same time, the Moscow purge trials, the persecution of Trotsky, Communist behavior in the Spanish war, and finally the Soviet-Nazi pact made a shambles of the Popular Front against fascism—not suddenly, which would have been better, but gradually, each step of the way leaving liberals fighting with other liberals over whether even a war against Facists could justify cooperation with such an ally. In this protracted agony, THE NATION'S judgments were as fallible as anyone's, its responsibilities greater, and the judgments against it proportionately bitter.

Yet it must be said that differences on the staff were freely aired and respected, and there were occasions when two editors, each under his own name, would set forth conflicting views in the same issue. Sad as these staff differences were, and significant, they were pursued freely and in good faith. Few other journals, whether left or right of THE NATION, could say any more. For this and for much else that was good and generous in her long editorial tenure, American liberalism owes a debt of gratitude to Freda Kirchwey. And beyond this, I happily acknowledge an even greater personal indebtedness, which I think an anniversary issue of THE NATION ideally suited to convey.

For one hundred years THE NATION has lent its voice to the causes of freedom and progress. Readers have looked to it for courageous leadership and forthright comment on current political and social issues.

I take great pleasure in congratulating you on this landmark anniversary, and in wishing that during the next hundred years THE NATION continue in this proud and honorable tradition. —Vice-Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey

THE NATION and its CENTURY

RICHARD CLARK STERNE

Mr. Sterne would appear to be particularly qualified to write a history of THE NATION; as a graduate student at Harvard University, his doctoral thesis was on "Political, Social and Literary Criticism in the New York NATION, 1865-1881." More recently, Mr. Sterne spent two years abroad lecturing on American literature under Fulbright grants. Since 1963, he has been Associate Professor of English at Simmons College.

I

Founders and Early Makers: 1865-1918

HOSANNAS MINGLED WITH tears that spring and summer of 1865. April was cruel to Confederates, kind to Unionists, then indifferently cruel: Lee's surrender to Grant at Appomattox was directly followed by the murder of Abraham Lincoln. The pungently scented lilacs evoked in Walt Whitman's elegy were faded by July, but even in the wilderness of ruins that was the South, the "sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands" was mourned, along with the hundreds of thousands who had died during the war. The slaves, however, were nominally free, and there was exultation in Fourth of July speeches, newspaper editorials, and poems like James Russell Lowell's Harvard Commemoration Ode:

> Bow down, dear Land, for thou hast found release!
>
> . . . .
>
> Bow down in prayer and praise!
> No poorest in thy borders but may now
> Lift to the juster skies a man's enfranchised brow,
> O Beautiful! my country! ours once more!

On July 6, the New York Evening Post announced that Ford's theater in Washington would shortly reopen with a play called The Octoroon; the Post also noted that three new weekly journals had just appeared in New York City: the frivolous Mrs. Grundy, the specialized Commercial and Financial Chronicle, and the intellectual NATION.

THE NATION had been conceived by Frederick Law Olmsted, who was the architect of Central Park, and Edwin Lawrence Godkin, a young Anglo-Irish Liberal on the New York Times editorial staff. The weekly's midwives were a Philadelphia Abolitionist named McKim, and a new England scholar, Charles Eliot Norton. In 1863 Olmsted had written to Godkin of plans to establish a weekly journal of opinion that would rival such English periodicals as the Saturday Review and the Spectator. Godkin was intensely interested, and when the versatile Olmsted—who had sent to The New York Times first-hand "classic" reports on the ante-bellum South, agreed to manage a mining enterprise in California, Godkin went ahead with the NATION project. Olmsted had introduced him to Charles Eliot Norton, Dante translator and one of the founders of the Atlantic Monthly. As a member of the New England cultural establishment, and as a friend of wealthy Boston Abolitionists, Norton was able to obtain both financial support and potential writers for the new journal. In Philadelphia, meanwhile, powerful help came from a veteran of the anti-slavery movement, James Miller McKim. He had been a co-founder, with William Lloyd Garrison, of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and in 1862 a generous supporter of an early experiment in Reconstruction at Port Royal, South Carolina. McKim wanted Emancipation to go far beyond the formal liberation of the Negroes. Garrison's Boston weekly, The Liberator, had been thundering against slavery since 1831, but McKim thought this journal needed an effective successor in the post-war period. He also hoped to further the career of Wendell Phillips Garrison, who in addition to being his friend's son was about to become his own son-in-law. This modest, industrious young man, a Harvard '61 graduate, justified McKim's nepotism. He became so valuable an assistant editor that Godkin threatened to "retire into a monastery" if "anything goes wrong with you."

Godkin's minacity was whimsical: when he was born in northern Ireland in 1831, his father was a Presbyterian minister. But like many other Anglo-Irish dissenters from the Anglican Church, James Godkin favored Home Rule. One of the newspapers he took was a Dublin-edited organ of "Young Ireland" called The Nation. Essentially middle-class and intellectual, this weekly was started by the mordantly eloquent John Mitchel, grandfather of a twentieth-century mayor of New York. Writers for the Dublin Nation were attuned to the liberal romanticism of Lamartine, and the journal published James Clarence Mangan's translations of republican German verse. The British government, fearing all this intelligent ardor in print, eventually broke up The Nation's presses. Concurrently, in 1848, James Godkin lost his pulpit for publishing "Repeal Essays," which urged the abrogation of the union between Ireland and England. Later he was to become an advisor of Liberal Party Prime Minister Gladstone who favored Home Rule. Young Edwin Lawrence Godkin, was determined to carry on in the Liberal tradition. After entering in 1849 the Queen's College of Belfast, newly established specifically for Presbyterians, he became president of a student debating society whose members, he later wrote,

> . . . were filled with the teachings of the laissez-faire school and had no doubt that its recent triumph in the abolition of the Corn Laws was sure to lead to wider ones in other countries.

Godkin added that while John Stuart Mill was their prophet, America was their "promised land" where —barring slavery—their schemes were already at work.

It was to this promised land that Louis Kossuth, brilliant leader of the unsuccessful Hungarian revolution of 1848-49, went in 1851 to propagandize for his cause. Young Godkin, then studying law in London, may have seen Kossuth when the Magyar stopped in England. In any case, Kossuth's high deeds in Hungary had captured his imagination, and he eagerly accepted a publisher's offer to write a history of that country. The book, which appeared in London, then New York, when Godkin was only twenty-two, has the vivid clarity of his later journalistic prose. He mentions an American traveler in Hungary—it was Charles Loring Brace, a future contributor to THE NATION—who had been arrested by the Austrian authorities, tried secretly and thrown into a dungeon before being expelled from the Austrian territories, and who bore witness to > . . . the utter prostration of the people under the grinding tyranny of military despotism, the extinction of literature, the daily and nightly terror caused by the spies who infested every corner of the land,—the streets, the cafes, the salons, the hotels, and even the family circle, watching and treasuring each word as it fell, and laboring with devilish ingenuity to twist innocent expressions into seditious or treasonable allusions. . . .

Godkin's libertarian pen won him a sword, a gift from grateful Hungarian revolutionists when he traveled through their country in 1854, on his way to cover the Crimean war for the London Daily News. It was this reporting experience that taught him the importance of good journalism. The appearance of special correspondents in the Crimea, he later wrote,

> . . . was a troubling of the waters which was a good thing for the British army and people. . . . It brought home to the War Office the fact that the public has something to say about the conduct of wars, and that they are not the concern exclusively, as that delightful old charlatan, Lord Beaconsfield, said, of "sovereigns and statesmen."

Godkin returned to England after his Crimean experience, but was determined to go to the land of his Liberal dreams. He arrived in New York in 1856, on the eve of the Presidential election. Hearing wildly applauded freedom songs a few days later, at a Frémont rally in the old Academy of Music, Godkin may have thought slavery was well on the way to extinction. But then, pursuing political education as one of a great throng at Tammany Hall, he heard a Southern Senator declare that every one present "would be the better of a good nigger to wait upon him." Shocked by what his British training led him to consider a breach of Senatorial dignity, and inspired by the example of Frederick Law Olmsted, whom he had just met, Godkin headed south on horseback. In a saddlebag were Olmsted's three volumes on the "cotton kingdom," taken along as a guide. Two years earlier the handsome, refined, delicate-looking Godkin had slogged through mud and been down with fever in the Crimea, but what he saw now in Dixie was more depressing. Writing to the London Daily News, which published his letters from the South, he described the poor whites of the slave states as despised by both Negroes and planters: they "chew, spit, 'loaf', and die, melancholy, taciturn, surly, and sickly."

> . . . In lightness of heart, in the joys of the mind, the Irish peasant is a king in comparison.

Of Negro slaves attending masters who were emigrating to the Southwest, Godkin said that their morale was low even in comparison with that of "the meanest Russian mujik that ever toiled along the steppes of Perekop." While he wrote of the generous hospitality and the courtesy of many Southerners, he found an obsessive concern with the "nigger," and a widespread desire to extend what he called the "foul and monstrous" wrong of slavery to Mexico, Cuba and Central America. Few Southerners, he wrote, could be made to see the wastefulness of the slave system: the small farmer had to tie up capital in the support of slaves which he could better use, if free labor were available, to buy and till a farm three times as large as the one he now owned.

His Southern trip of 1856-57 did not make him an Abolitionist à outrance. A few days before Thoreau called John Brown an "angel of light," Godkin was writing that the Harper's Ferry raid, if successful, could only have "bred massacre and desolation." But he went on, in a letter to the London Daily News,

> No one can see a gray-headed man, who has lost five sons in the cause of freedom, step in, with the last survivor of his family by his side, between the slave and his master, and with his thirteen other companions bid defiance to a whole State in the name of the Lord of Hosts, without more or less admiration. There is something grand in the old fellow's madness. . . .

While in England in 1861 with his wife, a New Haven girl he had married two years before, Godkin was annoyed by the "hostile and slightly contemptuous" attitude of Continental and English newspapers toward the Union cause in the Civil War. He wrote a piece defending so strongly the Union's seizure of the Confederate diplomats Mason and Slidell aboard the English steamship Trent that the London Daily News, his old outlet, published it as "an expression of American opinion and sentiment." Ironically, Godkin was later to be attacked in the United States as a "foreigner," and was even to be viciously accused of accepting "British gold."

His political and social outlook as editor of THE NATION is implicit in what he wrote during the fifties and sixties. Opposition to all "feudal" restraints, whether in Hungary or Mississippi, on men's freedom; belief in an independent press as a potent weapon against autocracy and secret government; "Manchester" faith in the "free market and "free trade"; hostility to government "interference," whether abroad in the form of colonialism or at home in the form of regulation of workers' hours and conditions—all these convictions, in addition to confidence in universal education as an agent of gradual reform, stamp him as the model of a British Liberal.

The prospectus for THE NATION [see text next page], which Godkin sent to Charles Eliot Norton

An anonymous Ohioan passing through Baton Rouge, describes life in the South immeadiately following the Civil War:

"You must understand," said he, "that in 1860 I was a strong Douglas man. I didn't like Lincoln, and the abolitionists I hated; but, of course, I was Union. As the war went on I began to believe in Lincoln, and, by the time the Emancipation Proclamation was issued, I had been educated up to it and endorsed it. As a war measure, I mean; that was how Mr. Lincoln regarded it, and so did I. Well, since the war ended I've been a conservative; I've considered Stevens and Sumner dangerous men, who did n't understand the South, wanted to humble it and so on, and were standing in the way of peace. I believed what we used to hear, that the North did n't understand the South. I believe it yet, but in a very different sense. This journey has been the greatest that I ever experienced. I came out with the kindest feelings for these people down here; I wanted to see it made easy; we had whipped them, and I wanted it to rest there. I thought the South wanted it to end there. But I was tremendously mistaken. They hate us and despise us and all belonging to us. They call us cut-throats, liars, thieves, vandals, cowards, and the very scum of the earth. They actually believe it. They won't even allow that we won our own battles. 'We were overpowered by numbers,' they say; 'of course we could n't fight all Europe.' They've said that to me more than fifty times within the last few weeks. And they say that they are the gentlemen; we are amalgamationists, mudsills, vandals, and so forth. And I've heard and seen more brag, and lying, and profanity, and cruelty, down here, than I even saw or heard before in all my life. The only people I find that a Northern man can make a friend of, the only ones that like the Government and believe in it, are the negroes. I'm convinced they can vote just as intelligently as the poor whites. A Southerner would knock me down if I said that to him; but it's true. I tell you I'm going home to be a radical. Fight the devil with fire. I've learned to hate Southerners as I find them, and they can hate me if they want to. I'm a Sumner man after I get back, and I shall write out my experience for some of our papers. Every man that's seen what I've seen ought to let it be known. . . . I wish every county in the North would send out two men, who have the confidence of their fellow-citizens, and make them travel through the South and report the true condition of things. They could n't make a true report without changing every honest administration man into a radical."

—John Richard Dennett, in the series,
"The South As It Is," THE NATION, 1866

Prospectus for The Nation (1865)

This Prospectus appeared in the first issue of THE NATION and is considered the official version. An earlier version, somewhat more elaborate, was circulated among potential readers in June, 1865, a month before the first issue appeared.

THE NATION

A Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art will be published July 6, 1865.

ITS MAIN OBJECTS WILL BE

First — The discussion of the topics of the day, and, above all, of legal, economical, and constitutional questions, with greater accuracy and moderation than are now to be found in the daily press.

Second—The maintenance and diffusion of true democratic principles in society and government, and the advocacy and illustration of whatever in legislation or in manners seems likely to promote a more equal distribution of the fruits of progress and civilization.

Third—The earnest and persistent consideration of the condition of the laboring class at the South, as a matter of vital interest to the nation at large, with a view to the removal of all artificial distinctions between them and the rest of the population, and the securing to them, as far as education and justice can do it, of an equal chance in the race of life.

Fourth—The enforcement and illustration of the doctrine that the whole community has the strongest interest, both moral, political, and material, in their elevation, and that there can be no real stability for the Republic so long as they are left in ignorance and degradation.

Fifth—The fixing of public attention upon the political importance of popular education, and the dangers which a system like ours runs from the neglect of it in any portion of our territory

Sixth—The collection and diffusion of trustworthy information as to the condition and prospects of the Southern States, the openings they offer to capital, the supply and kind of labor which can be obtained in them, and the progress made by the colored population in acquiring the habits and desires of civilized life.

Seventh—Sound and impartial criticism of books and works of art.

The Nation will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body. It will, on the contrary, make an earnest effort to bring to the discussion of political and social questions a really critical spirit, and to wage war upon the vices of violence, exaggeration, and misrepresentation by which so much of the political writing of the day is marred.

The criticism of books and works of art will form one of its most prominent features; and pains will be taken to have this task performed in every case by writers possessing special qualifications for it.

It is intended, in the interest of investors, as well as of the public generally, to have questions of trade and finance treated every week by a writer whose position and character will give his articles an exceptional value, and render them a safe and trustworthy guide.

A special correspondent, who has been selected for his work with some care, is about to start in a few days for a journey through the South. His letters will appear every week, and he is charged with the duty of simply reporting what he sees and hears, leaving the public as far as possible to draw its own inferences.

The following writers, among others, have been secured either as regular or occasional contributors:—

Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, John G. Whittier, Samuel Eliot (Ex-President Trin. College, Hartford), Professor Torrey (Harvard), Dr. Francis Lieber, Professor Child (Harvard), Charles E. Norton, Judge Bond (Baltimore), Edmund Quincy, Professor W. D. Whitney (Yale), Professor D. C. Gilman (Yale), Judge Daly, Professor Dwight (Columbia College), Judge Wayland, Frederick Law Olmsted, Rev. Dr. McClintock, Rev. Dr. Jos. P. Thompson, Rev. Phillips Brooks, Rev. Dr. Bellows, C. J. Stille, Henry T. Tuckerman, Bayard Taylor, C. A. Bristed, C. L. Brace, Richard Grant White, William Lloyd Garrison, Sydney George Fisher, Theodore Tilton, James Parton, Gail Hamilton, R. H. Stoddard.

Joseph H. Richards,
Publisher

130 Nassau Street, N. Y.

a month before the first number appeared, committed the weekly to treat topics of the day "with greater accuracy and moderation than are now to be found in the daily press" (it was not unusual in the sixties for one newspaper to call another "traitor"); to give special consideration to the freedmen's condition, in order to secure to them "as far as education and justice can do it . . . an equal chance in the race of life"; to emphasize the importance everywhere in the country of popular education; to diffuse trustworthy information about openings to capital in the Southern states; and finally, to provide sound and impartial criticism of books and works of art. Taken together with these "main objects" of the weekly, the declaration that THE NATION "will not be the organ of any party, sect, or body" indicates clearly what Godkin intended the journal to be: more illuminating than intense, but dedicated to the promotion of John Stuart Mill's cultivated individual in a prosperous capitalist society.

Listed in the prospectus among the "regular or occasional contributors" were Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, John Greenleaf Whittier and William Lloyd Garrison. Several writers now generally considered more noteworthy than any of these were not mentioned, probably because they were not yet widely known: Henry James, Jr., William James, Henry Adams. William Dean Howells, also not mentioned, was to write regularly on "Minor Topics" during the first year. Among other contributors to the early NATION, well known in their own time, more or less remembered today, were James Bryce, John W. DeForest, O. B. Frothingham, Asa Gray, Thomas Wentworth Higginson (leader of the first Negro regiment in the Civil War and later an editor of Emily Dickinson's poems), Michael Heilprin (polyglot expert on European literature and politics), Sir Leslie Stephen, Charles Sanders Peirce (who developed the principle of pragmatism, and influenced Josiah Royce and John Dewey), William Graham Sumner and Daniel Coit Gilman.

Since articles in the new journal were published anonymously—this 19th century practice presumably enabled contributions to be judged strictly on their own merits—only insiders knew who had written what. On one occasion Godkin joined Charles Francis Adams, Jr., in playing a schadenfreudian trick on the latter's brother, Henry Adams. Henry had just published his first major work, a biography of Albert Gallatin. THE NATION came out with a long two-part unsigned review, which mixed praise with harsh criticism of a book that "falls little short of being an outrage both on Albert Gallatin and on everyone who wishes to know anything about him." Charles Francis Adams, Jr. had written the review, and Godkin tried to discover his brother's reaction to it. According to Ernest Samuels, in Henry Adams: The Middle Years, the victim of this equivocal joke reproached Godkin "with forceful dignity" for publishing the review, but may never have learned who wrote it.

The young NATION's offices were on Nassau Street, then New York's newspaper row. Only a few months before its first number, dated July 6, 1865, appeared, the bulletin boards of James Gordon Bennett's lively Herald, at the northwest corner of Fulton Street, had been giving reports from the battlefields; on the opposite corner of Fulton was the New York Sun building, with a pigeon-house on the roof for the homing birds that brought news from ships far out at sea, before there was an Atlantic Cable. Farther down Nassau Street was William Cullen Bryant's Evening Post, the highly esteemed daily of which Godkin's NATION rapidly became a respected weekly colleague. A few blocks from this New York Fleet Street was Barnum's museum (until it burned down on July 13, 1865, with lions, tigers, whales, boa constrictors and monkeys dying in the flames). Barnum's, said the Daily Tribune's report of the disaster, had been the chief amusement resort for the common people, who could not afford seats at the more expensive theatres. Barnum's customers were not sufficiently well educated to read The Nation, even if they could spare three dollars a year for a subscription. But the Evening Post predicted, after examining the first number, that the new weekly "will be a boon to intelligent and thoughtful men in all parts of the country."

A rapid glance at that first number captures something of its quality. The first three pages are devoted to paragraphs, headed "The Week," which comment on current events; twelve or thirteen pages of articles follow—dealing with topics like Reconstruction, European problems, critics and criticism of the arts, and including an account of a volunteer clergyman's court-martial by General B. F. Butler. Then comes a poem, "The American Struggle" signed Aubrey De-Vere, which is followed by about three pages of book advertisements. The "back of the book" contains six pages of literary notes and reviews—among them pieces by Henry James, Sr. and Henry James, Jr.—and two and a half pages on the fine arts. Mammon has the last word, with four and a half pages of advertising for banks, insurance companies, clothing stores and household goods. Unlike Harper's Weekly and Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, The Nation contains no illustrations, but a light essay on "Club Life" indicates that the journal intends to appeal to gentlemen as well as scholars.

> To be young is surely the best, if the most precarious, gift of life; yet there are some of us who would hardly consent to be young again, if it were at the cost of our recollection of Mr. Emerson's first lectures during the consulate of Tyler. We used to walk in from the country to the Masonic Temple (I think it was), through the crisp winter night, and listen to that thrilling voice of his, so charged with subtle meaning and subtle music, as shipwrecked men on a raft to the hail of a ship that came with unhoped-for food and rescue. Cynics might say what they liked. Did our own imaginations transfigure dry remainder-biscuit into ambrosia? At any rate, he brought us life, which, on the whole, is no bad thing. Was it all transcendentalism? magic-lantern pictures, on mist? As you will. Those, then, were just what we wanted. But it was not so. The delight and the benefit were that he put us in communication with a larger style of thought, sharpened our wits with a more pungent phrase, gave us ravishing glimpses of an ideal under the dry husk of our New England; made us conscious of the supreme and everlasting originality of whatever bit of soul might be in any of us; freed us, in short, from the stocks of prose in which we had sate so long that we had grown well-nigh contented in our cramps.
>
> —James Russell Lowell, The Nation, 1868

GODKIN PAID HIS authors anywhere from $10 to $50 per contribution, rarely more during the early years. But he had no trouble attracting good writers, and the magazine rapidly acquired renown and influence out of all proportion to its circulation peak of 12,000. The first year, however, was rocky from a financial viewpoint. The largest single contribution to The Nation's $100,000 capitalization had been made by a Boston Abolitionist stockholder, George Luther Stearns. Stearns, and some of his stockholding colleagues, including Wendell Phillips, immediately found fault with the publication on several points, the most important of which was its alleged softness toward the South, its relative coolness in discussing the freedmen. Stearns, a successful lead-pipe manufacturer, had supplied John Brown with weapons that were used at Harper's Ferry; after the Civil War began he helped to recruit Negro regiments in Massachusetts and the South. He was apparently persuaded to think Godkin a good bet as editor of the nascent Nation because of their common interest in the Hungarians: Godkin had written a book about them, and Stearns had entertained and been friendly with Hungarian exiles in Boston. But while Stearns saw the new journal as a business he partly owned whose aim was to promote the Negro's cause, Godkin wanted to treat issues as rationally, as "scientifically," as possible. The conflict was classic: the single-minded "doer" versus the broad-gauged molder of opinion. Stearns thought Godkin had known who would be calling The Nation's tune, and publicly accused him of bad faith. The Bostonian also made it clear that if he had known from the beginning of their dealings about Godkin's Irish birth, he would have had nothing to do with him. Godkin's letters to Charles Eliot Norton reveal his concern about this whole episode, and also indicate that stockholder dissatisfaction with him was essentially confined to Boston. James Miller McKim and his Philadelphia friends held firm, although it is clear that some of them disagreed with Godkin's free-trade views. In June, 1866, their assistance enabled Godkin, McKim and Frederick Law Olmsted—whose California mining venture had not panned out, and who early in 1866 had become an associate editor of The Nation—to enter into a co-partnership, under the name of E. L. Godkin & Company. Briefly, during the spring, the experiment of twice-a-week publication was made, but the journal became a weekly again with its first issue of July, 1866.

Another problem—during the summer of 1865—was the appearance of a weekly rival, The Round Table. This New York paper had tried to get under way in 1863, with contributors like Thomas Bailey Aldrich (later an Atlantic Monthly editor), Daniel Coit Gilman, Moncure Conway and General George B. McClellan, but had failed in 1864 because of war conditions. Late in July, 1865, Godkin wrote to Norton about The Round Table's plan to come out in September:

> . . . I am told they rely for success as against us, on their freedom from any responsibility with regard to the Negro, and on being more sprightly. I think, I confess, The Nation is not quite as light as it ought to be, but I still preserve my faith in the American public. . . . Your article on the "Paradise of Mediocrities" excited a good deal of attention, and called out plenty of abuse, which is just what we want. . . .

If there is one thing more than another in regard to which the people of New York appear to be utterly indifferent, that thing is the sanitary condition of the great city in which they live, and die too, at a greater rate than the inhabitants of any other large city in Christendom. Without efficient hygienic regulations, with a thorough disregard of the imperfect system which exists, with the most shameful neglect and criminality in all matters which relate to the health of the population committed to their care, the authorities are allowed year after year to pursue a course which is hurrying thousands upon thousands to untimely graves. The wealthy, the educated, the respectable, in whom the real power resides to right these wrongs against the society to which they belong, are content to look out from the windows of their well-arranged high-stoop or English-basement houses, and to thank God that the street is clean, that the garbage is removed, and that there is no probability that the typhoid fever or small-pox, which exists in the tenement houses in the rear, will infect their own luxuriously equipped dwellings. Attention has again and again been called to the deplorable and wicked recklessness of those having the immediate charge of the sanitary condition of the city, and innumerable efforts have been made to rouse the people themselves from the apathy they have constantly evinced in regard to their own hygienic welfare. It has all been in vain. With a degree of composure and stolid unconcern which have either proceeded from the grossest ignorance or the most thorough indifference, they have turned a deaf ear to the arguments and the entreaties which have been made, and New York to-day is the filthiest and the most unhealthy city to be found within the limits of the civilized world.

—From an editorial review, The Nation, 1865

In August, The Round Table's advertisements began appearing in New York newspapers directly below The Nation's notices, and soon after hitting the streets in September, the former claimed to be "leading." But it was essentially a literary journal, and could not long compete with Godkin's paper, which intelligently covered the cultural and political waterfront from Matthew Arnold to the Tweed Ring. James Ford Rhodes, an American historian, recalled being devoted to The Round Table while a student at the University of Chicago in 1866, then of being introduced to The Nation by an English professor who found it decidedly superior. "The editors of The Round Table," Professor William Mathews had said,

> . . . seem to write for the sake of writing, while the men who are expressing themselves in The Nation do so because their hearts and minds are full of their matter.

Rhodes also made the significant comment that, as a man living in the Middle West between 1865 and 1890, he badly needed The Nation's literary columns—"our most important link between our practical life and the literary world."

Statements praising Godkin's journal and its editors are not hard to come by. Ralph Waldo Emerson, at first cold to the weekly, was soon telling James Russell Lowell that it was "superior to any other journal we have or have had" by reason of its "breadth, its variety . . . its admirable style of thought and expression." About three years after The Nation began, Samuel Bowles's distinguished daily, the Springfield Republican, called it a "permanent and proud addition to American journalism" which "may not ever be popular . . . as the New York Ledger, or the Boston Journal, or even the New York Tribune is . . . but it assuredly has been and will be most useful." Incidentally Franklin D. Roosevelt, sending seventy-fifth anniversary congratulations to The Nation in 1940, echoed this judgment:

> . . . No one would ever accuse The Nation of seeking to become a popular organ. It has, through its long history, often appeared to stand alone.

Praise from England came early. A London paper said in September, 1865, with the merest shade of British condescension, that in the new American weekly, "we recognize many of the qualities that distinguish our own press"; it was "the best newspaper we have seen yet from America." The Spectator referred to Godkin's journal, in January, 1866, as a "new Radical weekly paper of high aims," and Viscount Bryce, author of the classic American Commonwealth and later British Ambassador to the United States, recalled the early Nation as "the only weekly journal of political importance in the Atlantic States"—brilliantly written, witty, conspicuously independent.

There were varying degrees of dissent from these encomia. Henry Holt, while considering Godkin one of his "great teachers," perhaps "our greatest man since Lincoln," and an editor who had an enthusiastic group of adoring followers, also called him "one of the best hated men in the country" and found something "icy" at the bottom of his heart. Godkin, Holt thought, was inclined to settle all questions with the intellect alone. A partial defense against the charge of coldness is provided by W. C. Brownell, who in 1879 left the daily World to join THE NATION's editorial staff. After commenting on "the gentleness, the self-respect, the feeling of character, that pervaded the office," Brownell recalled working five days of the week in an almost Quakerish silence, broken only by Godkin's "hearty laugh" from the back office. But Lincoln Steffens, who was a news reporter on the Evening Post in the 1890s, recalled Godkin—by then editor of the Post—differently:

> Reporters were to report the news as it happened, like machines, without prejudice, color, and without style; all alike. Humor or any sign of personality in our reports was caught, rebuked, and, in time, suppressed. As a writer, I was permanently hurt by my years on the Post. . . . In general, the news reporters, supposed to have no concern with the editorial policy of the paper, were led somehow—not directly, but by the methods of trial and error . . . to gather ammunition for the editorial writers. Mr. Godkin was no hero to me. . . .

It is safe to call Godkin's character "complex." Such comments as those above, taken together with that of Charles Dudley Warner, who called the early NATION the "Weekly Judgment Day," or that of William James, who considered Godkin the "towering influence" of his time in public affairs, or that of the anonymous woman who found that Godkin as editor made virtue "odious," indicate that reactions varied to this witty, moralistic intellectual who combined gaiety with social snobbishness—or was it "reserve"?

To a degree, it seems clear, Godkin's personal faults were public benefits during the "gilded age": a society grown sleek needed intelligent chastisement more than "genial" criticism. Perhaps more regrettable than a lack of compassion was this talented editor's failure to transcend the conventional liberal wisdom of his day. Here, heart and head were both involved. He came to the United States, in his own words, as to a Promised Land. When our war against slavery was won, he thought that democracy had triumphed over a cruel, anachronistic feudalism. Then came the fiasco of Reconstruction, and the shame of corruption under Grant: not democracy, but the commercial spirit seemed to have triumphed. There came, too, the death of Godkin's infant son in 1868, of his eight-year-old daughter in 1873, and of his wife in 1875—blows inducing a depression that led him to move, with his remaining son, ten-year old Lawrence, to Cambridge. (His friend Norton lived there, and he had other friends at Harvard University, which had conferred an honorary degree on him in 1871.) For two years he edited THE NATION by making weekly trips to New York. He was resilient enough to keep on working hard and to become an influential editor of the New York Evening Post, after Henry Villard bought THE NATION from him in 1881 and began publishing it as the weekly edition of the Post. He even continued to dominate THE NATION, although Wendell Phillips Garrison, formerly the literary editor, officially succeeded him as editor-in-chief.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the diffusion of education and intelligence is at present acting against the free development of the highest education and intelligence. Many have hoped and still hope that by giving a partial teaching to great numbers of persons, a stimulus would be applied to the best minds among them, and a thirst for knowledge awakened which would lead to high results; but thus far these results have not equalled the expectation. There has been a vast expenditure of brick and mortar for educational purposes, and, what is more to the purpose, many excellent and faithful teachers of both sexes have labored diligently in their vocation; but the system of competitive cramming in our public schools has not borne fruits on which we have much cause to congratulate ourselves. It has produced an immense number of readers; but what thinkers are to be found may be said to exist in spite of it. The public school has put money in abundance into the pockets of the dealers in sensation stories, sensation illustrated papers, and all the swarm of trivial, sickly, and rascally literature. From this and cheap newspapers thousands—nay, millions—draw all their mental improvement, and pamper their mental stomachs with adulterated, not to say poisoned, sweetmeats, till they have neither desire nor digestion for strong and wholesome food.

—Francis Parkman, THE NATION, 1869

But Godkin's mood was far different from what it had been in the days of Kossuth's kudos, or in 1865. His Mugwump bolt from the Republican Party to Grover Cleveland in the 1884 Presidential campaign, his fight against Tammany Hall, his defense of gold against the bimetallists, his vehement attacks on "anarchists," even his anti-colonialism—were relatively conventional postures for an Eastern seaboard 19th century Liberal. In a sense, Godkin's intellectual economy contracted during the 1870s and although he remarried, and carried on as a courageous, respected publicist until a few years before his death in 1902, he became deeply pessimistic toward the end. In Paris in 1892, he talked to August Laugel who had been writing for THE NATION about French politics, society and literature since 1865. Laugel, he told Garrison, gave him a sad account of the increase of political corruption under the Third Republic. This, "according to his account, seems to be in the very warp and woof of democracy." A few years later, Godkin was writing to his old confidant, Norton:

> . . . I am not sanguine about the future of democracy. I think we shall have a long period of decline like that which followed the fall of the Roman Empire and then a recrudescence under some other form of society. Our present tendencies in that direction are concealed by great national progress.

He was plunged into deepest gloom by the United States's war with Spain, and by our emergence from that brief conflict as a colonial power. Gustave Le Bon's Psychologie des Foules, he wrote to Norton from Vichy in 1899, brilliantly explained the phenomenon of the war in terms of the "mental and moral apparatus of a crowd"; during that same summer of 1899, he wrote to a friend in Chicago:

> American ideals were the intellectual food of my youth, and to see America converted into a senseless, Old World conqueror, embitters my age. Don't despair, however.

The Adams brothers, Brooks and Henry, shared in their own fashion his fin de siècle nightmare of a Socialist "downfall of the west" (Godkin was much impressed by Le Bon's La Psychologie du Socialisme as well as by the book on crowds), and Henry James—a good friend of Godkin's—expressed a few years later, in The American Scene, an analogous if more squeamish distaste for democratic throngs. In fact, there was among many cultivated Americans at the turn of the century a marked falling away from the dreams of their youth. Godkin, who had given a vigorous start in 1865 to a distinguished intellectual enterprise, and who certainly maintained throughout his career a high standard of criticism in all domains, could not cope with the problems of a rapidly industrializing, mechanizing world. He saw the horror of "killing half a dozen Filipinos every week," but was unable to conceive a political and social program to provide William James's "moral equivalent for war." He feared the mob more than he cared for its members as human beings. When he resigned from the Evening Post because of ill health in 1899, he saw himself as a "disillusioned radical." But every radical whose ideas congeal when he is young is a conservative by middle age.

In 1903, a year after his death, a group of his Harvard friends turned over to the President and Fellows of the University a fund collected to establish an annual lectureship named after him. The only condition imposed was that the lectures, whose publication as well as delivery was thus endowed, should be devoted to "The Essentials of Free Government and the Duties of the Citizen," or to some part of that subject. Introducing the first Godkin Lecturer, James Bryce, in October, 1904, Harvard President Eliot remarked:

> The subscription list is one of the most interesting I have ever seen, not only because of the quality of the men and women who desired to contribute, but also because the list bore the names of many to whom Mr. Godkin's opinions were not acceptable, but who wished to show their profound respect for his character and high motives. . . . His was a strong, virile pen. His writings were often intensely irritating to his opponents. He died without seeing his ideals realized. . . .

The establishment of the Godkin Lectures at Harvard as a tribute to the journalist was matched in appropriateness by the naming of a British Liberal weekly, begun in 1907 by H. V. Massingham, after Godkin's NATION.

INEVITABLY IN GODKIN'S shadow as long as that strong personality was associated with the New York weekly, Wendell Phillips Garrison became editor-in-chief in fact as well as name in 1899. Since THE NATION, beginning in July, 1881, had been reprinting many of the editorial articles of the Evening Post, Garrison's heaviest responsibilities continued to be the weekly's literature and art department. He had established a reputation for excellent judgment in the choice of reviewers, many of whom were leading 19th century intellectuals: Henry and William James, Carl Schurz, Charles Sumner, Goldwin Smith, Chauncey Wright, Charles Eliot Norton, Bernard Berenson, Kenyon Cox, Russell Sturgis and Leslie Stephen, among others. If after Godkin's departure THE NATION lost much of its political punch, it continued to command respect in the humanistic departments of the universities. W. C. Brownell, who knew the late 19th and early 20th century NATION from the inside, remarked that Garrison's determination > . . . to treat every book as a trust, to be reviewed only by the most competent men in the United States, Canada, or England, without regard to any timeliness, was the despair of the business office and a source of deep irritation to publishers, who were furious when a review appeared three or six months after the publication of the book.

But even then a NATION review often "killed the volume or exalted it to the highest position."

Garrison was a much more tranquil man then his Abolitionist father, who had been, in the words of one of his friends, "in a state of chronic martyrdom for years"; but Wendell Phillips Garrison committed himself to THE NATION as intensely as William Lloyd Garrison had committed himself to the slaves. And while he lacked Godkin's ability to write Swift-like satiric prose, he did publish a fictional essay, "The New Gulliver" (1898), which ironically attacked imperialism.

During Wendell Phillips Garrison's editorial tenure his nephew Oswald Garrison Villard—son of the Evening Post-NATION's owner, Henry Villard—began to write for the weekly. Although the "modern" NATION emerged only when Oswald Garrison Villard became owner and editor in 1918, the gradual reliberalizing—in a 20th century sense—of the journal in the early 1900s was partly due to Villard's interest in the Negro's cause: he was one of the founders, in 1909, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In the June 28, 1906 issue, Garrison regretfully announced that he needed a prolonged rest "after forty-one years of unrelaxed application" in the weekly's service, and that the editorship would be assumed by Hammond Lamont. Like Garrison and John R. Dennett—a brilliant assistant editor and writer on a variety of topics for THE NATION until his early death in 1874—Lamont was a Harvard graduate. After taking his degree in 1886, he had done newspaper work in Albany and Seattle, and had made such a favorable impression on President Eliot of Harvard with a superbly written newspaper piece about him that Eliot had offered him an instructorship in English. From Harvard he went to a professorship at Brown, but was soon persuaded by Oswald Garrison Villard to become managing editor of the Evening Post. When Wendell Phillips Garrison was about to retire, he wanted to let THE NATION die because he could think of nobody "fit to carry it on who would respect it and its traditions." Whereupon Villard mentioned Hammond Lamont, whom Garrison immediately and happily accepted. Lamont was a noble, kindly, conservative gentleman. In 1902 he gave a speech at Tuskegee Institute, where George Washington Carver was doing his important agricultural work, in which he expressed essentially the views of Tuskegee's principal, Booker T. Washington, on "Negro self-help." Less than three years after becoming THE NATION's editor, he died during what had been expected to be a minor operation on his jaw.

The New York Times thinks our proposal that the South should be put into the hands of the Federal officers, with their will for law, and "the only law," something rather extravagant, and asks how the powers of military officers are to be regulated at all if, as we maintain, the attempts of the South to regulate them by constitutional precedents and doctrines are absurd. It ought not to be necessary to explain that when we advocate the subjection of the South to the absolute control of military officers, it is to their absolute control qua military officers. A man who uses armed force to execute his own will, as a man, is not a military officer, but either a chief of brigands or a despot. Federal officers cannot become absolutely free agents, so that no matter how large the powers that may be given them, they must exercise them under responsibility to their superiors—namely, the Northern people. . . . The South and Mr. Johnson have been trying for . . . two years to regulate the conduct of the Federal commanders by constitutional doctrines and precedents, to institute, in fact, a mixed system of their own, and we know what the result has been. Such a system might have been possible had Southerners had imagination enough to understand their situation; but they apparently have not. The sword has never been taken from their throats for one week that they have not rushed into some folly. They are allowed to hold courts, and they forthwith refuse negro testimony or acquit murderers or robbers of negroes. They are allowed to legislate, and they forthwith proceed to patch up a negro code or keep Harper's Weekly out of Alabama. The greatest kindness that can be done them now is to tie them up, hand and foot, till they are fairly in the Union. It is quite true, as The Times says, that the South is not in Russia. If it were in Russia, instead of having its rulers laboring might and main for two years, as the North has been doing, to get it to adopt and practise republican principles, to acknowledge the equality of men, to respect freedom of speech, most of the leading Southern "statesmen" would by this time be engaged in "practical mining" or other hard labor, with their backs a little stiff from knouting . . .

—Editorial, THE NATION, 1867

His successor, in May, 1909, was Paul Elmer

More. More's character and personality are brilliantly evoked in an essay written on the occasion of his death by Edmund Wilson; it is called "Mr. More and the Mithraic Bull," and it makes supererogatory any attempt here to suggest what this ascetic devotee of the "inner check" was like. Born in St. Louis, a frail child who one day was beaten to the pavement by a hail storm and had to be carried into a saloon until it passed, More did not immediately go to Harvard but rather steeped himself in German romanticism at Washington University in St. Louis. Then he went East, studied Sanskrit, Greek and Latin at Harvard, where he met the formidable Irving Babbitt, took an M.A. in 1893, and subsequently taught for a few years—first at Harvard, then at Bryn Mawr. Tired of teaching, wanting to write, and having no financial problems, he retired to a hut in the woods at Shelburne, New Hampshire. There he began composing the literary criticism which he published in fourteen volumes from 1904 to 1935 as the Shelburne Essays, and which led Ludwig Lewisohn to call him "one of the soundest of American prose stylists." His literary and other opinons seem to have become settled rather early in life. Upton Sinclair recalls being told by More, apropos of The Jungle (which stirred consciences along with other muckraking works, and was largely responsible for the Federal Meat Inspection Law of 1906): "Some time ago I made up my mind I was through with the realists." Dixit. The kind of stamp he placed upon THE NATION during the five years of his editorship may be suggested by quoting two of his essays. In "The Classics," published in the weekly (and in the Evening Post) in November, 1911, he distinguishes between humanism and humanitarianism,

> . . . between perception of the values of life in themselves and active sympathy for those who have missed these values. Without the former our sympathies are, after all, but treading in a blind circle, helping others to help others to we know not just what. And it is well to remember sometimes that the individual soul has its own claims. How much better shall we be if the nations are all at peace with one another, but there is no peace in our own hearts? How much happier shall we be if we settle all the grave questions of labor and capital, but ourselves lose the gracious art of living?

His piece on Disraeli, which appeared some years later in another journal, indicates More's antipathy to laissez-faire liberalism:

> It must be remembered that while the Manchester school was proclaiming its inhuman principles, which regarded men as no more than unconscious cogs in the grinding mechanism of trade, Disraeli was writing his Coningsby and Sybil. . . . He was thinking of that instinctive, unreasoned relation between man and man, which recognizes the dependences of the lower on the higher and the higher on the lower, together with that communism of the imagination which softens the asperities of fortune as no chilly abstraction of rights has ever yet succeeded in doing. There was nothing remote in [his] view of the Constitution, which he had learned from Burke; every citizen of the state was to feel his little part in life enhanced by the glamour of the whole.

More's "communism of the imagination" is closer to what might be called the poetry of the corporate state than it is to Marxist communism. More looked always for moral implications in literature. Dos Passos' Manhattan Transfer, which appeared some years after he had left THE NATION, More called an "explosion in a cesspool"—but he later conceded to Edmund Wilson that he saw "the element of protest in Dos Passos and Joyce." Wilson replied that although there was protest in Dos Passos, he didn't believe there was any in Joyce, and thus—said Wilson in his essay—

> . . . unfortunately deprived Mr. More of his only excuse for being polite about Ulysses.

Irving Babbitt, whom More had met at Harvard, began contributing to THE NATION when More became its literary editor in 1906. And one of Babbitt's students at Harvard in the early 1900s, Stuart Pratt Sherman, was given both an outlet in the weekly and important encouragement by More. It was these "professors" whom H. L. Mencken delighted in attacking, although his contempt for egalitarianism was as great as Babbitt's and More's.

More found editing THE NATION a "crushing grind." In 1910 he arranged for a kindred spirit, Harold deWolf Fuller, to join the staff as assistant editor; fairly often, after this, More was able to relax in what he called a "wild debauchery" of three-handed bridge and whiskey with Fuller and another assistant, Stanley Went. More and Villard were not on the same wavelength. But Villard came increasingly to determine the political policy of the Evening Post, and therefore of its weekly Siamese twin, THE NATION. In July, 1912, More wrote to his wife that he feared

> The Evening Post in its advocacy of Woodrow Wilson will run into greater and greater extravagances of radicalism until my position is intolerable.

This case of journalistic schizophrenia was exacerbated by More's absolute lack of interest in format and display, for the drab-appearing NATION was facing competition from more sprightly magazines. Tired and discouraged by an editorial job for which he was not temperamentally suited—his best work was in his literary essays—More hoped to see the publication remain humanistically conservative. He therefore wrote in September, 1913, to Stuart Pratt Sherman, asking him to carry the torch as editor. But Sherman declined as emphatically as General Sherman had declined to run for the Presidency. It was some satisfaction to More that, since he was determined to resign, the owners of the Evening Post decided to put Fuller in charge of The Nation—although "aided and supervised by Mr. Villard and Mr. Strunsky." Leaving the weekly early in 1914, More felt that eleven years of journalism lay "behind me like a nightmare." He had got out, he said, "just in time."

While fearing a "cheapening" of The Nation under Villard, More consented for a time to be listed as an "Advisory Editor." But this was a purely honorific title, and More's separation from the weekly was soon absolute. During his tenure the magazine was, more than it had ever been, more than it was to be, a literary and scholarly journal. It commands a certain interest on its own terms. But it would be an unusual reader who could admire equally More's Nation, and that of Villard or Kirchwey or McWilliams.

ALL AGES ARE in some sense ages of transition. However, the brief period of Harold deWolf Fuller's editorship was distinctly a bridge between past and present. Fuller's background was scholarly, like that of Lamont and More. He had written a Harvard Ph. D. thesis on the sources and authorship of Titus Andronicus, and had translated a 14th century Dutch legend into English. His world outlook, like More's, was that of post-Burkean conservatism. Along with his predecessor, Fuller represents a break with Godkin-Garrison liberalism—which stood for individual freedom from government control and monopoly control. The conservatism of Fuller and More symbolizes that longing for authority in a confusing world which gripped many upper-middle-class intellectuals early in the 20th century. T. S. Eliot was to become their drily moving voice. Oswald Garrison Villard respected Fuller's convictions, but was determined to give The Nation a new life. Significantly, the announcement in the issue of March 12, 1914, on four cream-colored pages (this venture into color undoubtedly struck Paul Elmer More as vulgar) of Fuller's assumption of the editorship, included the following sentence:

> The Nation proposes now to restore certain features of its earlier history and to devote more attention to some fields which have become of larger public interest while carefully maintaining its present scholarly and literary standards, all in the hope of continuing to exert its influence against dangerous tendencies of the day.

This is clearly a politic statement, designed to hold as many subscribers as possible, and the last phrase has a decidedly conservative ring. But in England the New Statesman had got under way in 1913, and here Herbert Croly was launching the liberal New Republic: Villard was champing at the bit. Contributions from a new generation of writers—Emory Holloway, Horace M. Kallen, Harold Laski, Allan Nevins—were beginning to appear in The Nation. Resurgence and renaissance were in the air. Unless one felt like Prufrock, one was for the new freedom, or the new nationalism, and one read or wrote for Harriet Monroe's recently established Poetry: a Magazine of Verse, which encouraged new talent. Villard had what many of his Evening Post-Nation colleagues regarded as disturbingly new ideas. He was strongly opposed to the "war madness," and by 1916 believed that Woodrow Wilson had "maneuvered us to a point

(Continued on page 241)

On Friday last two men, William King and Abram Owens, were hanged at Franklin, Ky., with formalities that give one a pleasant notion of that region. At nine o'clock in the morning five ministers visited the jail and exhorted the prisoners and prayed with them. Then the two men were taken down-stairs and dressed in black coats and trousers, lasting shoes, white gloves, and straw hats. Their hands were tied, a running noose of grass-rope three-quarters of an inch in diameter was put round the neck of each, lighted cigars were given them, and they set out for the gallows, which was at a little distance from the town. The local pride of the people of Franklin in their two murderers was exhibited in the arrangements for the procession. . . . First [there] came a brass band, next a military company, next the prisoners and sheriffs, next a wagon containing two coffins, next citizen guards, next the clergymen on foot, and finally "the citizens, male and female." The band played a funeral march all the way to the gallows, and the condemned men continually called to their friends in the crowd, and exhorted them to meet them in heaven. The number of spectators—men, women, and children—was very great. When the place of execution was reached "the sheriff introduced Captain King to the immense crowd," and he made a long speech. . . . "I am to die for the death of my brother. No one ever loved a brother better than I did. . . . Had I known his murderer, I should not have said yea or nay, but I should have killed him." He died protesting his innocence, and so did his companion, though doubtless both were guilty. King lived no less than twenty-two minutes after the drop fell, the complaisant sheriff having, at his request, so arranged the noose that the neck should not be broken. An account of a more revolting execution we do not at present remember, and the simple recital of occurrences like this one ought, we should think, to do more to increase the number of people who oppose capital punishment than all M. Victor Hugo's rhetoric, and the increase will be quite as legitimate in the one case as the other.

—Editorial, The Nation, 1867

1865: THE GREAT TRANSITION

ABRAHAM S. EISENSTADT

An Associate Professor of American History at Brooklyn College, Mr. Eisenstadt was a Fulbright Professor in Italy in 1962-63. He has written much on his chosen field, and is now doing an anthology on the writing of contemporary American history for Harper and Row.

> It is not simply the birth of the nation which we now commemorate but its regeneration. . . . It is not simply the triumph of American democracy that we rejoice over, but the triumph of democratic principles everywhere, for this is involved in the successful issue of our struggle with the rebellion. We need have little hesitation in predicting that the effects of the revolution through which we are now passing upon European politics will be still more marked than the effects of the revolution of 1776.

These sentences appeared in the first issue of The Nation, July 6, 1865. They spoke both victory and prophecy. Appomattox had come fewer than three months before, the formal end of hostilities less than one. Lincoln's assassination had given the victors a martyr and a cause. Principles and purpose took on a clarity they had not quite had before, right and wrong fell into a neat division, and morality clasped victory firmly by the hands. Martyrdom justified victory.

In July, 1865, the month The Nation appeared, the certain theme of victory was the triumph of democracy. The meaning of a democratic triumph was obvious in at least two respects: the empire of slaveholders had been defeated, and so too had been their European defenders. The slaveholders would be exposed to the dictates of the Northern arms; their defenders, to the dictates of Northern ideas. In the shaky condition of European thrones, ideas were no less powerful than arms. But if this much was certain about the triumph of the democratic idea, a good deal was not. How far would it be able to reshape the ideas and institutions of the South? Could it overcome the entrenched habits of decades, indeed centuries, of peace, and the bitter commitment of four years of war? Was the Negro to be given the vote, was suffrage to be universal? Could a slave of centuries at once assume the responsibilities of citizenship? Was democracy to be social as well as political? What would be the impact of Negro suffrage upon the whole social order, Northern and Southern, but especially Southern, where Negroes would, in many areas, predominate?

For decades after the War of 1812, both North and South had tapped the resources of an expanding domain, each trying to realize its own version of the American dream. Now that the Southern version of the dream had ended, with a rude awakening, how would the Northern version continue? If the South had hitherto stayed the North's project for America, what would the collapse of the South mean for the project's possible realization? And if it was far from clear what Northern triumph meant for the South, it was not really more clear what Northern triumph meant for the North. The war, like all great modern wars, had ended with much more than it began; like them too, it compassed only victory but achieved also revolution. What would be the domains of the revolution? This much was clear already, that the United States had been catapulted into a new era in the realms of industry, finance, agriculture and communications. But would not other areas of American life be altered too? If the American idea was that of equal advantage and opportunity, how would it be extended by the triumph of democracy? Into what new realms of territory and enterprise would the renewed tenet of equal opportunities lead?

What would the democratic triumph mean for Europe? Within each state and within each capital, a national civil war was active or brewing between the establishment and democracy. If the conflict had been irrepressible in America, it was no less so in Europe, and its issue in the New World was full of dire portents for the Old. The whole Western world, Europe and America, stood at a turn in the 1860s. All Western countries, cisatlantic and transatlantic, were responding to similar forces which were everywhere defining the conditions of modern life. The forces were legion, but among them some were more prominent than others: industrialization, nationalism, urbanization, secularism—and democracy.

July, 1865, marked the triumph of the democratic idea. The Republic in America had withstood the test of violent civil war. Elsewhere, civil wars had signaled the disruption of politics and the death of established ideas. In America, the conflict ended with the polity strengthened and the established idea affirmed. So massive had been the armies of the Republic, so great its productivity, so solid its victory, that its principal idea could no longer be denied. The first issue of THE NATION put the matter squarely: the whole Western world must face up to the full meaning of government by the people, of the people, and for the people.

I

The Americans of 1865 inherited this much of their Puritan legacy, that they too felt themselves to be moving under God's special providence, they too were latter-day Hebrews, divinely chosen and divinely protected. The war had been for them a moral war, a religious war. "Our cause, we love to think, is especially God's," said Horace Bushnell, Hartford's famous Congregational minister. At Plymouth Church, in Brooklyn, the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher declared that the South had been put to the scales and had been found wanting. "This continent is to be from this time forth governed by Northern men, with Northern ideas, and with a Northern gospel."

What God's will had made manifest, they felt, was the validity of Northern principle. The fact of it was that the war had come first, and the undying principle of the war second. If the North had begun merely by fighting against rebellion, to sustain the Constitution, it ended by fighting for equality, to fulfill the Declaration of Independence. Lincoln indeed had cited the Constitution as his responsibility, the Declaration as his creed. The principle which triumphed when the war ended had been proclaimed many times before the war began. It reduced the American idea to two component elements: liberty and equality. In his farewell address, Andrew Jackson had rested the American future on the planter, the farmer, the mechanic and the laborer: "men who love liberty and desire nothing but equal rights and equal laws. . . ." Shortly before the war began, Carl Schurz spelled out what the words meant: liberty was the right of a man to be himself, to pursue freely the road to attainable perfection; equality was the sharing of equal rights, "where the title of manhood is the title to citizenship." The union, affirmed THE NATION once more, in its very first issues, rests on the equal brotherhood of man, where "it is the equal right of all to attain that which is made attainable to any." No less significantly, said THE NATION, the very existence of a union of equality was also a propaganda of equality. Equality was not merely an American practice, it was a preachment to the world abroad.

To Northern opinion in July, 1865, it was clear that the Negro had to be brought within the pale of democracy, that he had to be given the vote. While it was not clear, by the end of the war, how far the capacity of the emancipated Negro extended, it was beyond question that he had it, and that whatever deficiencies he evidenced were because he had been a slave, not because he was a Negro. "What shall be done with the Negro?" asked THE NATION. "Make a man of him," it answered, "elevate him to true manhood, with attainment of all that belong to membership in one common humanity." Perhaps the Southern states, seeking now to re-enter the Union, might wish to restrict the suffrage on the basis of intelligence or education; but color was no basis.

If power were not to be abused by any single group in the South, government had to be democratic rather than restricted. For that reason the Negro must be represented and must be given the vote. Public order, wrote Chief Justice Chase in a letter to the freedmen of New Orleans, rests securely on the widest franchise. "Universal suffrage is the surest guaranty and most powerful stimulus of individual, social, and political progress." Moreover, argued E. P. Whipple, a popular journalist of the day, in the Atlantic Monthly, the largest justice to the Southern Negro might well serve as the basis for the widest clemency to the rebel white.

But the South seemed very far from democracy in the months that followed the war's end. True enough, the seceded states were complying with the conditions set down by President Johnson for resuming their legal position in the Union. But, to many Northerners, compliance was hardly proof of democracy, while the conditions themselves proved only Johnson's leniency. In what it had been and in what it was now, the South was a negation of the American idea. Tocqueville had pointed out the Southern dilemma at the time that the peculiar institution of Negro slavery was converting all of the South into a peculiar society. Built on slavery and therefore in conflict with the American idea of democratic liberty, the South could not abolish slavery without introducing a serious problem into the conduct of its social life. The Southern mind had been antagonistic to essential American principles. At the time of the European revolutions of 1848, Senator Calhoun of South Carolina, the South's most famous spokesman, attacked the doctrine that liberty and equality were basic to a sound republic: "It is this false conception that is upheaving Europe. . . . It is at the same time threatening our institutions." During the 1850s, George Fitzhugh, a Virginia journalist, came to the defense of the South with a violent assault on Western liberalism, the idea of equality and the movement for abolishing slavery.

IN THE EYES OF the victorious North, the South stood condemned. Had it not, noted THE NATION in Vol. I, No. 1, undertaken the defense, "in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, of one of the worst forms of barbarism. . . ."? Had it not, suggested the North American Review, begun the Civil War as a coup d'état, failing which it hoped to paralyze the economic life of the Free States to bring them to their knees? Had not, remarked E. P. Whipple in Atlantic Monthly, a Confederacy that began in the name of states' rights ended, under Jefferson Davis, in a military autocracy? And had not the dastardly assassination of President Lincoln, said C. C. Hazewell, another of the Atlantic Monthly's writers, proved the continuing spirit of aristocracy in the South, inasmuch as assassination was an essentially aristocratic practice?

Having turned its back on human progress for so long, where did the South now stand with the democratic idea? Had the Northern victory over Southern arms also been a victory over Southern minds? The evidence, said the Northern journals, seemed to be running the other way. The Southern press was rejecting the principles over which four bloody years of war had been fought: the Union, individual liberty, equal rights. The Southern spirit was obstinate, it was resisting in every way the full meaning of the abolition of slavery. Servitude in one form or another remained, and the Negroes were being confined to a subordinate caste. In America's mobile society, where success was a game for whites only, imprisoning the Negroes in a caste was in many ways worse than retaining them as slaves. It was a fallacy to assume that defeat had rehabilitated the South. Southern states were resuming operations with a minimal change of institutions. The rebel's hand had lost control of the sword, but had gained control of the ballot. "The South," summed up THE NATION, "is not a moral community." Despite the war, despite its outcome, there remained yet the deep and broad gulf "which had separated and still separates the slaveholders from the rest of the Christian world, in opinion, in feeling, and in practice, upon nearly all the great questions which civilized men have every day to submit to the decision of their conscience."

WHAT WAS TO BE done with the South? As victors, we have the right to do anything to insure our security, said Professor Theophilus Parsons of Harvard. The North forced Negro emancipation, and we are now bound to protect the freedman. Reconstructing the South could not be reduced to simple acts admitting the seceded states back into the union. The problem was to effect a social revolution, to convert eleven oligarchical states into democratic and free republics. "The conflict is not yet over . . . this war was a war of ideas. . . ." A moral union of states had to be effected no less than a physical one. The victors had to insist on political equality for all men. It was their moral duty to "subjugate" the South: "to reduce her from slavery to liberty, from injustice to justice, from oppressive privileges to equal rights and privileges, from barbarism to civilization." The sentiments were widely heard, in the press, in the Congress, from the pulpit. "The whole fabric of Southern society must be changed," thundered Thaddeus Stevens, the Republican leader of the House of Representatives. The South had been aristocratic, it must be made democratic. The time had come, James Russell Lowell asserted, for transplanting the South into the nineteenth century; the time had come for the "Americanization of all America." "The true way to prevent 'sectional feeling' and 'sectional agitation'," said THE NATION, "is to abolish sectional institutions, to make the bases of society and government the same in all parts of the Union, or in other words to render it more thoroughly democratic." The South had to be made safe for democracy.

But the real point of victory was that the North too could be made safe for democracy. The writ of equality was to run not merely through the South, but throughout the Union. And the concept of equality extended wide, including the citizen's position before the law, his possession of rights, his ability to advance. This surely was the concept Lincoln held when he described the Civil War as "a people's contest . . . whose leading object is, to elevate the condition of men . . . to afford all, an unfettered start, and a fair chance, in the race of life." The words recur repeatedly in all his public utterances. They are to be found in a speech he made, towards the end of his life, to a group of soldiers. The war was being fought to secure "an open field and a fair chance for your industry, enterprise, and intelligence; that you may all have equal privileges in the race of life. . . ." Just a few years after the war, Walt Whitman affirmed Lincoln's concept. It was democracy's rule, he said, that each man was "a separate and complete subject for freedom, worldly thrift and happiness, and for a fair chance for growth. . . ."

The fair chance and the race of life were the prime concerns of the self-made man. His prototype could be found in Franklin's Poor Richard, to whom industry and frugality were civic virtues; it could be found in Crèvecoeur's Andrew the Hebridean, who became an American in the process of becoming a landowner. In his annual message to Congress in 1832, Jackson specified both the terms of the American idea and the relation of civic to individual good: "The government should afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold." Visitors to ante-bellum America looked in amazement, not infrequently in distressed amazement, at the race of life in the United States, aware that in the arithmetic of our national character liberty plus equality added up to wealth. Charles Mackay, noting the bustling activity of the Northern states in the late 1850s, commented that "the free states are progressive, and, to use the regular Yankee word, 'go-a-head-ative.' "

EQUALITY HAD A NEW access during the war and after it, and so did opportunity, enterprise and self-made men. While the war was proceeding, without Southern opposition to block it, Congress enacted legislation that opened wide the race of life to all men of enterprise and ambition. The protective tariffs of 1861, 1862 and 1863; the Homestead Act of 1862; the laws of 1862 and 1864 creating, respectively, the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad companies; the National Bank Act of 1863: they were a collective tribute to the ideal of individual enterprise. The postwar years saw the widespread popularity of Herbert Spencer's teaching, with their support of individual enterprise and his plea for laissez faire. These were the years too of the great popularity of Horatio Alger, whose heroes overcame shabby beginnings, believed that everybody ought to have a chance, and uniformly availed themselves of their chance to achieve fame and fortune: "the fame of an honorable and enterprising man of business, and a fortune which promises to be very large." Charles Francis Adams, Jr. thought less but was no less aware of the new breed of self-made men. "Failure," he said of the new age that opened up with the war's end, "seems to be regarded as the one unpardonable crime, success as the all-redeeming virtue, the acquisition of wealth as the single worthy aim of life." In the newer American ethos, democracy walked hand in hand with success.

When peace came, in the spring of 1865, Wendell Phillips said he feared that "our old farming and reading republic" was at an end, and that it would be succeeded by a strong military and perhaps predatory one. Our triumph has its dangers, anticipated THE NATION, and one of them is the possibility of overcentralization. The fear and the anticipation were premature. The power and control that the federal government had amassed in war were rapidly dissipated in peace. Laissez faire became again the creed of the day. "In America," said the younger Charles Francis Adams, "the whole instinct of the people leads them to circumscribe rather than to enlarge the province of government. This policy is founded in wisdom." But government was very active in the democratic pursuit of wealth, not so much by controlling it as by laying down the legal conditions under which it could be freely practiced. Charters, franchises and cooperative political organizations were the steps on the way to wealth for the Poor Richards of the postwar years.

II

The American experience had rested at every turn on a dialogue with Europe. American identity had been simply a definition of values vis-à-vis Europe. The city upon a hill that the Puritans set up in 1630 was the first of a series of models that America devised for instructing Europe in the good society. But the model was then meant to be an immediate, working example of how best to solve the same problems, how best to realize common values. If the Puritan ethos had in 1630 been authoritarian, oligarchic, salvation-minded, and under God's special and direct Providence, it was, by 1776, libertarian, democratic, property-minded, and under God's ordinary and less direct Providence. The Declaration of Independence signified that, in pursuing with other Atlantic communities the common ideal of the better society, America would go its own way. The city upon a hill had become more ornate, its values more particular; yet it remained an example for others to contemplate, if not to duplicate entire. The period from 1776 to 1865 was a testing time for the American idea. If 1776 meant that America was to give up its European identity, 1865 meant that Europe must consider taking on an American identity. Up to 1865, nothing was so important for the success of the American idea as the course of Europe. After 1865, nothing was so important for the course of Europe as the success of the American idea.

When the European wars ended in 1815, the stream of visitors to America grew to a flood. A book on America was no longer, as it had been in earlier centuries, an excursion into exotica. It was immediately relevant to the European world. The grand tour of American democracy was getting to be a vital part of the European's education. Tocqueville better than anyone else set the meaning of America for Europe: ". . . The democracy which governs the American communities appears to be rapidly rising into power in Europe. . . . My wish has been to find there instruction by which we may ourselves profit. . . . I confess that, in America, I saw more than America: I sought there the image of democracy itself. . . ." There were many who came to praise America, and there were many who came to scoff and remained to scoff. Each went on extended travels, each made a descriptive list of key American institutions, each tabulated American virtues and vices, and each came out with a positive or negative rating of American life. John Stuart Mill summed up the whole literature of this period: "Every book of travels on America has been a party pamphlet."

THE CIVIL WAR, as its contemporaries clearly perceived it, was a war of ideas. Indeed, at least three sets of ideas were in conflict, each set related to the others certainly, but nonetheless individually distinguishable: nationalism versus localism; liberalism versus authoritarianism; and democracy versus aristocracy. Similar conflicts were raging in the principal Western countries. The war between the North and South diagrammed and exaggerated the undeclared wars being fought within the European powers. Each American section represented the extreme of its ideological position. Within the Civil War lay the choice of alternatives for Europe, clear, sharp, unmistakable; indeed, too sharp to make sensibly, too extreme to make readily.

If the established orders in Europe favored the South, the Westminster Review explained, it was not because they approved of slavery but because "The general triumph of slavery would not seem to them as dreadful as the general triumph of democracy." Related to the fear of a triumphant democracy was the fear of the tremendous power the triumphant democracy would have. France and Britain knew, certainly, that a victorious North would confront them in international politics as "a giant nationality" and that, in the light of America's fantastic rate of growth, the giant would rapidly dwarf them. They have seen, wrote a Northern journalist, how easily a republic which is armed with the ideas of liberty and equality "has raised men by the million and money by the billion" and they are afraid. "But they also fear that this nation will be an armed and aggressive democracy . . . impelled by a spirit of propagandism which will continually disturb the peace of Europe." Yet while the English classes hoped for the South, the English masses cheered for the North. They considered absurd Earl Russell's remark that "the North is fighting for power, the South for independence." The North was in fact fighting for democracy, and its victory would also be theirs.

THE VICTORY OF THE North over the South, Americans felt, was also a victory of the American idea over the European. In their mind, Europe represented feudalism, archaic customs, despotism, the repression of human aspiration. Every measure of praise for the Union was one of dispraise for Europe. European monarchs, Americans felt, had fought to repress foreign nationalities seeking independence, but the North had fought to insure and complete American nationality. In Europe, said Carl Schurz, "wars of great principles degenerated into wars of general devastation"; but in America they advanced "the reformatory age" and fulfilled "the idea mission of this country and of this people." James Russell Lowell's Commemoration Ode to Harvard, that July, 1865, hailed America as a "Promised Land/That flows with Freedom's honey and milk"; he gloried that there was

> Nothing of Europe here,
> Or, then, of Europe fronting mornward still,
> Ere any names of Serf and Peer
> Could Nature's equal scheme deface . . .
> Tell us not of Plantagenets,
> Hapsburgs, and Guelfs, whose thin bloods crawl
> Down from some victor in a border-brawl!
> How poor their outworn coronets,
> Matched with one leaf of that plain civic wreath
> Our brave for honor's blazon shall bequeath.

Hitherto the formula about the respective merits of the different types of government had been: "Democracies are the most patriotic; aristocracies the wisest; autocracies the strongest." But how, asked THE NATION, did it now stand with the formula? The outcome of the war had clearly disproven it, for not only had democracy shown itself to be wiser than aristocrats, who had misunderstood it and predicted its early demise, but no less powerful than the most absolute of monarchs, as its spectacular success on the battlefield had demonstrated. There remained but to consider Tocqueville's conviction that democratic culture, as compared to aristocratic, was mediocre and poor. Tocqueville had erred, thought Godkin, in pushing his thesis too far, in arguing that America's cultural shortcomings, like all other features of American life, expressed the democratic principle of social equality. The fact of it was that American culture had, after the Revolution, been the product of the American frontier, and to that source could be ascribed its practicality, its rough manners, its lack of excellence. Once the frontier influence had abated, democracy would achieve a higher culture, one to match all that aristocracy could offer. Thus the circle of the comparative advantages of democracy and aristocracy was complete: possessing many strengths, democracy had none of the shortcomings inherent in aristocracy; and the shortcomings that democracy seemed to have were in fact not inherent ones.

Tocqueville's prediction that the democrats would inherit the earth had been realized. "Europe would do well to realize that only democracy remains," said Walt Whitman. Appomattox was more than the North's military victory over its sibling; it was a justification of America's ways to Europe, a lesson taught by the progeny to the progenitor. At Harvard in July, 1865, Holmes spoke the meaning of Lincoln's death and of Northern victory for European monarchy:

> For on the pillar raised by martyr hands
> Burns the rekindled beacon of the right.
> Sowing its seeds of fire o'er all the lands, —
> Thrones look a century older in its light!

Victory, said the North American Review, taught us "that the best hopes of man for men might here find their accomplishment . . . that a perfect commonwealth might here become a reality."

America's lesson to Europe had yet another theme. The whole concept of nationality was undergoing profound change in Europe during the 1860s. Both in those countries (such as Britain and France) where a nation-state already existed, and in those (such as Italy and Germany) where a nation-state was in formation, the central question was what were to be the basis and forms of sovereignty. America had answered the question, said Godkin: "Sovereignty without centralization, consolidation without despotism, nationality under democratic forms, this is a fact now for the first time established in the history of government."

Mazzini summed up what triumphant democracy in America meant to Europe. "There is one great battle—to which all local battles are episodes—fought on both continents and everywhere, between liberty and tyranny, equality and privilege, right and might, justice and arbitrary rule, God and the Devil. . . . Your triumph is our triumph: the triumph of all, I hope, who are struggling for the advent of a republican era. . . . The abolition of slavery binds you to the onward march of mankind; and the admiration of all Europe calls you to take your rank—a leading one—in that onward march." Appeals were not lacking in the United States for translating Mazzini's call for American leadership into action. We must help the Poles who are fighting Russia for their independence. We must help the reform movement in England. We must propagandize democracy everywhere in the Old World. In sum, we must Americanize Europe.

III

In hailing the triumph of democracy and what it would mean for both the United States and Europe, THE NATION was not unaware, that July, 1865, "of the thousand sins that will assuredly beset us." Prominent on its list was "the portentous, irresponsible power of moneyed corporations and their corrupting power over legislatures." Godkin, with his eye constantly on British public life, was shocked by the immorality of the American business world. His indictment of it ran very close to George Fitzhugh's, both showing the alien sense with which the Southern and the British haut monde regarded Northern capitalism. Men live by their wits alone, said Godkin; tradition and authority have disappeared as a social force; we are living in "moral anarchy." In the arts of life, said George F. Hoar, the only one in which the United States "surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption." One could lament the bribing of Senators or one could satirize it, as Mark Twain and Charles Dudley Warner did in The Gilded Age.

Men who had once served the agrarian republic with Roman virtue could feel nothing but horror at the ways of the new democracy. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., with the family brilliance that reduced a civilization to a formula, if not quite to an absurdity, found that "trade now dominates the world, and railways dominate trade. . . ." From the railways and the men who controlled them spread the pernicious influence which corrupted public life. Bought legislators, hired proletariats, rings, lobbies, Caesars who ran corporations: these were the dramatis personae of the whole play of perversion and decay. Charles Francis Adams's younger brother, Henry, saw what he deemed to be the worst excesses of democracy during Grant's administration, and fled back to the refuge of Boston, where Puritan virtue had at least a decent ambience, if not a universal practice. In Henry Adams's early novel, Democracy, Mrs. Lee rejected the hand of Silas P. Ratcliffe, the powerful Senator from Illinois, "the high priest of American politics." Her understanding had been that public works should be public duty. His was that democracy is the government of the people, by the people, for the Senators. To her, his offer of marriage was an offer of the profits of vice. "I am not willing to be made a receiver of stolen goods," said Mrs. Lee finally, "or to be put in a position where I am perpetually obliged to maintain that immorality is a virtue!"

Materialism dominated the new democracy. From having been one aspect of our civilization, said Francis Parkman, it has become the only aspect. Progress and civilization were merely a catalogue of material pursuits: clearing lands, building cities, constructing railroads, steamboats and telegraph lines, making goods and selling them, erecting lavish houses and wearing extravagant clothes. Our intellectual interests were suffering, writing was second-rate, scholars were not wanted, "and today there are fewer serious and thoughtful readers than in the last decade." America, agreed THE NATION, was a paradise of mediocrities. Our thought and life were shallow, our work shoddy, our architecture inferior, our standards low. But standards were also mediocre in aristocratic countries. American democracy, when it had once satisfied the immediate wants of its citizens, would yet produce a superior culture. "A nation where men start on a level, where 'every man has a right to be equal with every other man,' where every man has 'a chance,' is not likely to remain for ever the 'Paradise of Mediocrities.' "

No indictment of the shortcomings of the new republic was more incisive or significant than that of Walt Whitman, himself the poet of democracy. Establishing free political institutions, said Whitman, did not insure democracy's success. Society, in every basic aspect, was "canker'd, crude, superstitious and rotten." The business classes were depraved; public servants were tainted and corrupt; the cities reeked with robbery and scoundrelism; our elite was "but a mob of fashionably dress'd speculators and vulgarians"; literature was second-rate; morality and religion were a "dry and flat Sahara . . . Democracy grows rankly up the thickest, noxious, deadliest plants and fruits of all. . . ."

THERE WAS A DIFFERENCE, however, between Whitman's indictment of the new democracy and that of the others—the group that, in another connection, Richard Hofstadter has so well described as the genteel reformers. Whitman's Democratic Vistas was not a despair for democracy, but a call to fulfill its promise; he hoped, indeed he expected, that the future would justify the triumph of 1865. The Brahmins of State Street, on the other hand, longed for a past they could not recapture, and for power they could never have.

Indeed, to contrast their criticism of the republic with those of an earlier Boston generation is to show something of the way the democracy had changed since the years before the war. Emerson's cohorts had preached a jeremiad against sin; his successors preached against incompetence. The first group arraigned American life on charges of moral bankruptcy: thinking in terms that were essentially nonpolitical, they were spurred by the image of a Heavenly City and by the hope of a reformation. The second group arraigned American life on charges simply of bankruptcy: thinking in terms that were essentially political, they had no vision of a Heavenly City, and hoped not for a reformation, but merely for reforms. In Theodore Parker's day, reform was posited in terms of morality and Christianity; in Godkin's age, it was posited in terms of bureaucratic efficiency. One group was at one with the times, the other out of joint with them. In the ante-bellum years, Puritan materialism was censured by Puritan conscience; in the postwar years, materialism became universal and conscience declined into condescension. 1865 marked a termination to the direct line of Puritan descent, to the laying on of hands by which the Puritan succession had been continued. By 1865, the moral and intellectual leadership over America which Boston had exercised for well over two hundred years was clearly at an end.

FOR HALF A CENTURY, two forces, Puritanism and democracy—antithetic in many respects, yet far from being mutually contradictory—had grappled with each other for ascendancy in the Northern states, shaping and reshaping each other in the contest. After 1865, Puritanism remained, but it was no longer dominant, and had been substantially transformed. Where Puritanism had generally resolved the differences between public good and private gain by supporting the public, the new age tended to see private gain as insuring public good. Where Puritanism had seen a difference between the morality of sound government and the soundness of popular government, the new age inclined to see the morality of popular government, so that vox populi and vox dei were virtually equivalent terms.

The important point to be made about the moral climate of the new democracy is not that immorality and materialism were so much less censured, but that they were so much more accepted. The prevalent sense, as Allan Nevins has pointed out, was not so much that democracy had failed, but that a golden age had opened up where wealth could be gotten by venture. Here is why, as our recent historians have been telling us, so many of the "robber barons" may have considered that they were barons but hardly robbers. In a way, the new access of wealth and the new ways of getting it were a fulfillment of democratic aspiration, offering infinite opportunities for poor men to rise. This, after all, Lincoln had considered the essential American idea, and it was to sustain the idea that the North had fought in the War of the Rebellion.

The men who stood poised on the brink of civil war in 1860 could hardly have anticipated the radical changes which the American idea would undergo. The clash of two massive armies became the clash of two massive ideas. The war became revolution. In 1865, a new American idea emerged.

IV

The democratic idea that triumphed in 1865, one could see in the years that followed, was not much more than a homily of proud intentions, a grand moral program designed to give reason to a great material victory. Equality became rapidly converted, in America, into an uncontrolled race for wealth of which the most conspicuous result was, paradoxically, inequality. In 1890, Howells' A Hazard of New Fortunes described an America where making money was "the ideal and ambition of most," where the money-makers were torn by their own sense of moral decay, where equality of opportunity was a failing social ideal and one whose failure not only showed how much the democratic idea had changed but asked, more pointedly, whether it was yet alive. In 1890, too, in a retrospective estimate of the quarter-century since 1865, THE NATION noted that the influence of the clergy and lawyers upon public affairs had declined and that businessmen controlled American politics: "The Senate has, in fact, become almost exclusively a capitalists' chamber. . . ."

Materialism and the pursuit of wealth have since remained significant, but the desire for money has, in recent decades, been tempered by the desire for security. For this reason, the laissez-faire role which the men of 1865 saw as a fitting one for the government has been increasingly abandoned. In a series of "deals"—Square, New and Fair—government has moved, with popular approval, into active control of American economic life. In this way, the democratic idea has been extended to insure security against failure in the race of life.

With regard to the South, the democratic idea had a double career. As an idea of wealth, it was enthusiastically embraced by the New South, and Southern industrial leaders welcomed the invasion of Yankee ideas and Yankee finance. But as an idea of equality for the Negroes, it failed dismally. Under Northern persuasion, indeed coercion, the South tried bi-racial politics and, in some respects, a bi-racial society, for about two decades. Then it abandoned the effort. THE NATION was among the first, in the years immediately after the war, to despair of the Negro and to abandon him to Southern care. By 1900, with general Northern acquiescence, Jim Crow was on Southern law books, and the Negro had been pushed into a subordinate caste. Only in 1965 does it seem that the idea of equality for the Negro which the North had considered so central to its victory may yet be fulfilled. One recalls Whitman's words: "History is long, long, long."

If the American democratic idea of 1865 was transformed at home, it was nowhere realized abroad. To say this is not to say that Europe did not share ideas with America. Bryce noted that there were larger parallel movements of taste and opinion in both England and America, and he attributed the correspondence to similar causes rather than to the reciprocal influence of one country upon the other. If Europe was not significantly shaped by the American democratic idea, it had come to live with it. The difference between Tocqueville and Bryce is the difference between anticipating an idea and acknowledging its realization; Tocqueville's Democracy in America is the demonstration of a principle, Bryce's American Commonwealth is the description of a practice. A meaningful change had occurred in books about the United States by foreign visitors: before the Civil War, they looked at American democracy from without, questioning its premises, considering it as a theory, a prospect, a possibility among other alternatives; after the Civil War, they looked at American democracy from within, tacitly accepting its premises, considering it as a reality, a fact of Western life.

DURING THE PERIOD from 1865 to 1940, the American presence was a factor in international politics, but the United States avoided deep involvement in European affairs, taking refuge in the notion of its own uniqueness and essential difference from Europe. Up to 1940, in the minds of most Americans, Europe and America were the terms of an ideological antithesis. World War II marked the true end of American innocence, for the national myth could no longer answer to international facts, and a projected vision about the world outside was no longer adequate because the world was no longer outside.

The important thing today is not that America sees much of the world as a home for tomorrow's liberal democracy, but that much of the world sees America as a remnant of yesterday's colonialist imperialism. The vital idea in 1965 is not the democracy of the highly developed Western countries, but the revolutionary upsurge of the highly under-developed countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. In 1865, making a necessity of virtue, we believed that our experience would teach a moral lesson to Europe; in 1965, making a virtue of necessity, we are learning from European experience that nations do not live by moral lessons alone, if indeed at all.

FASHIONS IN LIBERALISM

ROBERT LEKACHMAN

A native New Yorker, Robert Lekachman attended Columbia University where he has been teaching for the last eight years. He is the author of A History of Economic Ideas and a contributor to many journals, lay and learned.

Attempts to define liberalism are not likely to meet with success. . . . —Lionel Trilling

I

LIBERALISM IS EVEN more an attitude than it is a program. Liberals are critical of injustice, suspicious of vested interests, friendly to change, hopeful of peaceful improvement and convinced that reasoned argument ultimately overcomes selfish opposition. A society without liberals is in poor condition. Liberalism is relative to time and place. What sense can be made out of the complex record of liberal activity and liberal sentiment in the United States since the onset of the Great Depression? Until the Second World War transformed the political scene, the central intellectual issues which confronted the readers and the writers of The Nation and The New Republic were aspects of a bankrupt society apparently permanently blighted by rusting factories, spoiling crops and idle men. Nobody was prepared for such events. Although liberal journals had freely criticized the injustices and crudities of American life in the 1920s, they had been no more prescient than conservatives about the impending economic disaster.

When depression came and remained, liberals shared the general uncertainty both about cause and cure. Certainly they did not identify the Governor Roosevelt of 1932 as their savior. The Nation's July comment was representative: "In the confusion that besets the Democratic convention . . . one thing stands out clear and unchallengeable. That is the unashamed renunciation by Franklin D. Roosevelt of his last pretension to progressivism." In that year many liberals said things that they later repented. Louis Fischer, for example, put the choice of economic systems as between "capitalist dictatorship and white terror on the one hand and Soviet dictatorship on the other." Of course Franklin Roosevelt in the White House was a different affair and many liberal intellectuals, among them Adolf Berle, Lauchlin Currie, Rexford Tugwell, Leon Henderson and Benjamin Cohen, found not only solace but constructive employment in a New Deal which at the minimum imparted a sense of activity and movement to a stagnant society.

As the economy partially recovered from the depths of 1932 and 1933, liberals recovered as well a measure of their confidence and their volubility. However, to say the least of it, liberal trust in Roosevelt was a qualified sentiment. In 1936, the year of Roosevelt's greatest electoral triumph, The Nation assessed the President in these measured tones:

> Never has an American President so clearly attacked the finance-capitalists, the holding company wizards, the corporation lawyers, and the whole resplendent array of big-business statesmanship. His attack, coming at a period of capitalistic crisis, is the most significant Presidential utterance we have had on the concentration of financial power in a capitalist state. . . . But Mr. Roosevelt must go farther. If he has not entirely shot his bolt, if he is not more adept at showmanship than at statesmanship, he must affix to the speech a real legislative program. . . . By his references to taxation, the budget and relief, by his very pointed emphasis upon the New Deal as a finished achievement rather than a fragmentary incomplete program, he is serving notice that he will go no farther.

Six months later, at the end of June, The Nation declared firmly, "the only essential difference between Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Alfred Mossman Landon at the moment is that Roosevelt is in the White House and Landon is here." Apparently concurring, Walter Lippmann announced his intention of voting for Governor Landon.

The New Republic reached a scarcely more favorable conclusion. No doubt the New Deal compared favorably with anything the Republicans might offer the country, but "if one compares it with the measures necessary for a thorough renovation of our society, for creating an economy of abundance, it is sadly deficient, and even in some respects, reactionary." A trifle patronizingly, The New Republic concluded that "perhaps the most useful way to judge it is as a necessarily blundering, but well-intentioned attempt to find a way out of the enormous difficulties with which the nation was confronted, an attempt which may be of real educational value if its imperfections are clearly understood and if the groundwork is laid in thought and political organization for a sounder and more permanent advance in the future."

WHAT ELECTORAL ADVICE under the circumstances could the editors of The New Republic extend to their readers? "The Editors' Choice," a long September editorial, started with the assumption that the "era of capitalism is past its zenith" and argued that the ultimate solution "lies in the direction of a socialized organization of production and distribution." However, ultimate solutions infrequently define immediate tactics. In fact, The New Republic urged its followers "to vote for Labor and Socialist candidates in state, local, and Congressional elections, and for President Roosevelt nationally." Ballots split in this way, the editors judged, "will . . . be the clearest possible demonstration of the simultaneous demands for a national labor party in 1940, and for a progressive attitude toward labor in the next administration." The New Republic's informal poll of writers and intellectuals returned 44 for Roosevelt, 8 for Norman Thomas, 3 for Earl Browder and 1 for Alfred Landon. In 1936, Elmer Davis, Theodore Dreiser, Lloyd K. Garrison, Fannie Hurst, William Heard Kilpatrick and Harold Groves all supported Roosevelt, while John Dewey and Sidney Hook preferred Norman Thomas.

For many liberals, then, the best that could be said for the New Deal seemed to be that it had bought time during which an alliance of liberals, radicals, labor unions and intellectuals might effect a fundamental shift in the direction of social ownership and central economic planning. Hence the incessant speculation in liberal journals about third-party prospects. Hence also the implicit and explicit belief that reforms were no more than patches placed upon the leaking raft of American capitalism. The assimilation of Keynes by the American liberal community has a relevant connection with this attitude. Keynes's General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money appeared in this country early in 1936. Reaction was varied. Maxwell Stewart's NATION review took Keynes to task for his failure to stress redistributionist remedies for continuing depression and for his minimization of the role of monopolies. As Stewart read the General Theory, Keynes was advancing a largely conservative argument.

But the most influential American expositor of Keynesian ideas, Harvard's Alvin H. Hansen, perceived other meanings. Inspired by obiter dicta scattered through the General Theory, Hansen argued in a famous 1938 presidential address to the American Economic Association that the United States was suffering from secular stagnation—a long-run insufficiency of growth caused by the diminishing birth rate, the closing of internal geographical frontiers and the reduced rate of technological innovation. Although Hansen himself shrank from remedies more drastic than those of the New Deal (which he on occasion advised), some at least of his more radical followers identified secular stagnation as a convenient amplification of a Marxist analysis of American difficulties. In an obituary notice written in 1946, Paul Sweezy argued that Marxists had more to learn from this great bourgeois economist than the better trained Keynesians could derive from the technically clumsy Marxists.

IT IS PERFECTLY possible to believe in the fragility of capitalism on Keynesian or other grounds without becoming a Socialist. It is equally possible to become a Socialist without turning into an admirer of the Soviet Union. Many Americans adopted one or the other of these attitudes. Still, it is not astonishing that those who despaired of capitalism and embraced socialism yielded to the powerful attraction which emanated from the land where, as Lincoln Steffens believed, the future worked; where, as the Webbs became convinced, a new civilization was emerging; where, as so many eager visitors testified, social planning had vanquished the business cycle and terminated centuries of economic injustice.

Although liberals of this persuasion did not ignore Russian assaults upon civil liberties, they frequently argued in George Soule's fashion: "One should not take this great question of liberty lightly; there is much to be said about it that is out of place here. But it would be a theoretical discussion, not based on observation. What I can say, as a partially informed tourist, is that we saw no indication whatever that the Russian masses who had made the revolution, felt any lack of freedom, or were governed by fear." Moreover, 1936 was the year of the new Soviet constitution, which promised American liberties and more. As a Nation editorial put the matter, "Louis Fischer's article on the new Soviet constitution . . . is a journalistic scoop of the first order. While it has been known for some months that the new constitution would abolish the inequalities and discriminations which were necessary in a transitional period, no one expected changes as fundamental as those he describes. What we have . . . is a liquidation of the proletariat in the civil sphere and its replacement by constitutional democracy." The Nation seized the occasion to point the additional moral that "of course the Soviet system has always contained far more genuine democracy than outsiders have realized. It is true that the open ballot and indirect election made popular control over the governmental apparatus somewhat remote. But the essential power in the Soviet Union has never rested entirely with the government."

The great purge trials which followed hard upon the promulgation of the most democratic constitution in the world were a bewildering shock, for it appeared as difficult to believe that old Bolsheviks like Radek, Zinoviev and Bukharin were spies and traitors, as to accept the trials as deliberate frame-ups maneuvered by a crafty tyrant for his own obscure purposes. If argument split the intellectual and the liberal community in 1936, 1937 and 1938, as trial followed trial and incredible confession succeeded incredible confession, the confusion of the debaters accurately measured the substantial emotional and intellectual investment that liberals and Soviet well-wishers, nearly as much as Communists and fellow-travelers, had made in the Soviet example. Even the 1939 pact between the Soviets and the Nazis receded in significance in comparison with the trials.

II

The Second World War suspended several controversies of the 1930s. For one thing, wartime spending spectacularly demonstrated the accuracy of the Keynesian proposition that deficit spending of the right size would infallibly produce full employment. The wasteful public works of modern warfare rapidly eliminated unemployment which had persisted for a decade. Events gave a new turn to liberal estimates of Russia. After June, 1941, Russia became the last continental force in the field against German fascism and by the end of the year the Soviet Union was our ally in a common effort.

Inevitably, as victory neared in 1944 and 1945, liberals began to take thought of the postwar world. What afflicted them in particular was the threat of a massive postwar depression. The Harvard Keynesians—Alvin Hansen, Seymour Harris and Paul Samuelson—expressed themselves frequently in The New Republic, where they maintained that unless substantial postwar government spending policies were prepared while the war still bolstered employment and income, the cessation of hostilities would soon be followed by catastrophic unemployment. The legislative consequence of this line of reasoning was the introduction in 1945 of the Wagner-Murray Full Employment Bill. Although the Employment Act of 1946 which finally emerged was a drastically weakened version of the original proposals, an important point was made: the federal government did have a responsibility to prop up the economy and avert depression. No matter how feebly and reluctantly, Congress had conceded the principle.

BACK TO WORK
JOBS AND FREEDOM

In the event, the economy took care of itself somewhat unexpectedly and indeed somewhat embarrassingly for those economists who had predicted disaster. The accumulated wants of the postwar years, accompanied by the huge liquid assets accumulated in wartime savings, sparked an amazingly smooth reconversion of a wartime economy to peacetime production. For liberals, the 1950s took a quite different turn; as far as programs were concerned, they still depended heavily upon the heritage of the New Deal. As Robert Bendiner argued in Commentary, liberals failed to recognize just how many of the New Deal objectives were already achieved, among them progressive taxes, strong unions, public power and social security. For Bendiner, the liberals' love affair with Adlai Stevenson was a blatant demonstration of intellectual bankruptcy, for Stevenson had no new program to offer. The generally tired tenor of liberal comment on economic and social issues during the Eisenhower years did little to controvert Bendiner's evaluation.

Fresh intellectual impulses do not arrive upon demand. No doubt this is one of the reasons for liberal repetitions of old positions. But there is another. Liberals, like the rest of humanity, have a limited stock of psychic energy. During the early 1950s in particular, an inordinate share of liberal time and talent was addressed to the phenomenon of Joseph McCarthy, the reality of Communist infiltration into the government, the guilt or innocence of Alger Hiss, and the relation of anti-Communist legislation to civil liberties. The polemical wars of the 1950s divided liberals into contending camps.

In this internecine strife, Commentary emerged as a major organ of hard-line, anti-Communist liberalism. Fairly typical was Granville Hicks's blast, "The Liberals Who Haven't Learned." Hicks began with an attack upon the 85th Anniversary Issue of THE NATION. According to Hicks, writers like Freda Kirchwey, Del Vayo and Isaac Deutscher gave Russia the benefit of every doubt. Their behavior, Hicks believed, constituted an extension of the disastrous record of association between liberals and Communists in the 1920s and the 1930s. The Commentary position as it emerged during these years emphasized the number and the influence of Communists in the United States. Thus Irving Kristol's review of Carey McWilliams' Witch Hunt condemned the book above all because it failed to take the Communists seriously.

While never defending Senator McCarthy, Commentary tended to minimize the Senator's impact. Thus Robert Bendiner ("Has Communism Wrecked Our Liberties?") conceded the threat of McCarthyism but at the same time denied that "American liberals have surrendered to the forces of militarism and repression." His sharpest comments were reserved for those liberals who ignored the Hisses and the Rosenbergs and painted a one-sided picture of an America terrorized by reaction.

THE HISS CASE WAS an important divisive issue. In a celebrated essay, "Hiss, Chambers and the Age of Innocence," Leslie Fiedler, starting from the premise of Hiss' guilt, used the case as a chance to attack the naïveté of American liberals: "American liberalism has been reluctant to leave the garden of its illusion; but it can dally no longer; the age of innocence is dead." There were times when it appeared that Commentary could think of nothing except Communists, communism and Soviet Russia. The magazine's March, 1952 issue contained four articles in a row keyed to the magic words. Lionel Trilling's graceful tribute to "George Orwell and the Politics of Truth" contained many things, including praise of Homage to Catalonia, but one of Orwell's characteristics which won Trilling's special praise was his "disillusionment about Communism." Irving Kristol's "Civil Liberties—1952—A Study in Confusion" implied its theme in its subtitle, "Do We Defend Our Rights by Protecting Communists?" In the text, Kristol criticized such civil libertarians as Alan Barth, Henry Steele Commager, William O. Douglas and Zechariah Chafee for a "refusal to see Communism for what it is: a movement guided by conspiracy and aiming at totalitarianism."

Kristol set off a notable uproar, featuring a sharp exchange between him and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. Taking the position that Kristol had much overestimated the extent of liberal involvement with communism, Schlesinger pointed out that none of the prominent New Dealers had been either a Communist or a fellow-traveler. Kristol's emphasis upon conspiracy was echoed in Sidney Hook's "Does the Smith Act Threaten our Liberties?" Although Hook had many criticisms to make of the Smith Act, he opposed its repeal on the ground that "such repeal would give new life to an illusion whose widespread and pernicious character was partly responsible for the original enactment of the Act: namely, that the Communist party is a political party like any other on the American scene and therefore entitled to the same rights and privileges as all other American political parties." It was consistent with this estimate of Communist activity that Commentary took a hard line on the vexing question of how witnesses before hostile and prejudicial investigating committees should comport themselves. Although many civil libertarians argued that silence was often the only honorable course, Alan Westin in "Do Silent Witnesses Defend Civil Liberties?" advocated "complete responsiveness" and adjured the former Communist to "think twice before reserving to himself the decision as to whether his former comrades are presently dangerous to American society."

Although Commentary ran occasional articles critical of investigative excess, the magazine was much more interested in ridding liberalism entirely of the Communist virus. Liberalism did purge itself of communism. The CIO hunted its own witches and expelled them in a body. The ADA set itself up firmly as a non-Communist grouping of the exceedingly moderate Left. New York's Liberal Party was founded as an answer to an American Labor Party receptive to Communist influence.

PURITY TURNED OUT to be exhausting. Labor unions, once exalted by liberals as the natural allies of progressive action, lost their organizing zeal and their innovating edge. Increasingly they turned into economic pressure groups justifiably eager to improve their members' income and benefits. The ADA has played a larger role in the apprehensive dreams of conservatives than in the creative rethinking of liberal programs. After some initial displays of independence, the Liberal Party has settled down as a regular ally of the New York Democratic Party.

The Eisenhower years were intellectually flaccid not alone, or even importantly, because of the General's bland personality, muddled good will and whimsical syntax. What reasonable person expects original thought from a politician? The liberals who still subsisted on the slogans of the 1930s bear much more of the responsibility. The intellectual disarray of American liberalism continued into the Kennedy years. The Kennedy style, the glitter of the White House entourage and the prominence of such intellectual minstrels as W. W. Rostow, Carl Kaysen, McGeorge Bundy, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. and J. K. Galbraith seemed to convince a good many American liberals that their day had arrived. Although the liberal journals criticized Kennedy programs in detail, too few liberals grasped a central point—the Kennedy team of pragmatists and technicians was by its own boast unideological and by its works conservative.

The principal economic initiatives of the Kennedy administration were highly favorable to the business community—the investment tax credit, the liberalization of depreciation practices, the Trade Expansion Act and the general tax-reduction proposal. Kennedy's strategic decision, reinforced by the Johnson Administration, was a concentration upon tax reduction as the approved means of fiscal stimulation of a sluggish economy. Thus the progression of the tax system has been diminished, new loopholes have been added to old, and the opportunity to divide national output more sensibly between pressing public uses and frivolous private choices, the theme of Galbraith's Affluent Society, has been all but foreclosed. Keynesian remedies, once the exclusive property of liberals, have been reshaped as an element of a Great Society founded upon a consensus in which business is the senior party. The implicit treaty of peace ratified under Johnson auspices protects the established interests of business and organized labor and confines innovation to the fringes of the system. Some, at least, of the heirs of the New Deal have come to terms with a business community now sufficiently sophisticated to realize that a cooperative federal administration is an unsurpassed guarantor of high profits and continuing prosperity.

III

This is an exceedingly glum conclusion of a story which has its bright moments, even if most of them were concentrated in the early New Deal period. In 1965 there are some hopeful signs of liberal stirring. One is liberal involvement with the civil rights movement. If the movement's drive and momentum are maintained, liberals will find themselves allied with Negroes in an attempted transformation of American society. The necessary changes in attitudes and the essential disruptions of business and union habits constitute a challenge as substantial as the Great Depression itself.

Automation has produced some fresh liberal thought. The Manifesto of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Triple Revolution, debatable as is much of its analysis, is an imaginative document. Under the leadership of Michael Harrington, a revitalized League for Industrial Democracy is exploring the possibilities of renewed alliance among trade unions, intellectuals and civil rights leaders.

Yet a third source of liberal renewal is foreign policy. The Kennedy administration, in retrospect, appears to have been torn between the creative impulses which generated the Alliance for Progress and the cold war conservatism which shaped our unfortunate Cuban and Vietnamese policies. The Johnson Administration appears to have surrendered entirely to the second impulse. Although some hard-line anti-Communists such as Max Lerner, A. A. Berle and Max Ascoli support the Johnson foreign policy, the creative furor of the teach-ins, the national confrontation between Administration spokesmen and their critics, and the growing interest of college students, identify the type of concern and the quality of criticism which lend hope.

Liberalism is in better condition in 1965 than it was in 1953. If the bequest of the New Deal is finally spent, it is also true that the tedious war between hard and soft anti-Communists has ceased to dominate the liberal conscience. The major combatants are aging. A generation has grown up which contains no ex-Communists for the satisfying reason that it never contained any Communists to begin with. It is possible—it is better not to say probable—that liberalism stands on the threshold of another creative period. It is time.

On this the 100th birthday of THE NATION, I agree wholeheartedly with what Helen Rogers Reid, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, Dag Hammarskjold, Herbert Lehman, and Harry S. Truman said about THE NATION on the occasion of the 90th birthday 10 years ago. Your past 10 years have more than fulfilled the promise of the 90 preliminary years. Your occasional studies in depth have been quite amazing and important to the continuance of our democratic way of life.

—Henry A. Wallace

THE STAGGERED CULTURE

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Distinguished critic and essayist, Mr. Kronenberger was drama critic for PM (1940-48) and Time (1938-61), and now serves Brandeis University as Librarian and Professor of Theatre Arts. His latest book is The Cart and the Horse.

It won't be long till the walls of the Grand Canyon are covered with advertisements.

* * *

I refer to . . . the notion that the public has a right to intrude on private life as far as they like.

* * *

Western newspapers have a special column of astrologers' advertisements . . . the profession is as much honored in California today as it was in ancient Greece.

* * *

I was interested by a big Chicago business building opposite my hotel: at nine o'clock at night, work was still going on in thirty-eight offices.

THESE TIMELY COMMENTS on our culture were made, actually, between 1892 and 1920, and all of them by Englishmen. They indicate how much that we stigmatize in American life is of long standing; and going farther back, to where we start in the '60s, we find Anthony Trollope observing how spoiled are our children, how hurried our meals, how incessant our talk about money. If this, in one sense, is only to put a rubber band called Plus ça change around various clichés about America, in another it does indicate how early we developed some of our most noticed traits, and how hard it is, in a fairly short article, to date things accurately or even roughly. Take "Their very language seems to be in a hurry." We think of OK, TV, hifi, mike, tux, 'ex'; but the remark was made in 1830 by an Italian about the English.

For indeed as some things aren't new to our way of life, others aren't particularly national. Many changes in American manners and morals have been matters of period rather than place. At a certain point, in America and Europe alike, we find the upper and then the middle class—lower-class living cuts here too close to the bone—take up tennis or bridge, stop wearing corsets or start using wrist watches; or life in many places grows more informal, living more mechanized, language more downright. This is truer than ever today, when the speed of communication and transport has internationalized behavior and naturalizes ideas overnight; and it would be a good parlor game to spot the place of origin of, say, the electric razor, the cigarette lighter, color photography, the LP record, shaking for drinks, contact lenses and instant coffee.

As against this, and most strikingly a hundred years ago, there is the great diversity in manners and morals in the United States itself, with its disunited regional culture. A century ago, panties on piano legs were coeval with living-room cuspidors; as was that New England still life, the front parlor, with Nevada's rambunctious frontier. The contrast ran to morals as well: here, stringent blue laws; there, roaring red-light districts. In terms of geographical diversity, vast numbers of the best people in San Francisco around 1865 were upstarts, in Charleston were paupers, and in New Orleans did not speak English. During our hundred years, time often counts for less than the time-lag, for ours has been a staggered culture, with one region or city a decade or even a generation behind another.

What made 19th-century people immigrate to America, and afterwards migrate westward, was the prospect of material gain and, often, greater social equality. Hence the morality of our Age of Expansion rested on the idea of expansion, on an ethics not so much of moving upward as of forging ahead; on the young man's gospel of thrift, industriousness, self-reliance; on the middle-aged ideal of the solid citizen, with his Heaven-favored property rights. There was seldom a clearer separation of Church and State, God being notably inattentive and government, in many larger communities, painstakingly corrupt. Right on from those Abolitionists who were also heel-grinding mill owners, a morality had developed of men farsighted in one eye and stone blind in the other—which, rather than fostering anything humane, roused protest against something more and more hardfisted. Almost all our later nineteenth-century big capitalists and industrialists were Alger heroes rich in Alger-villain traits. Fortunately the morality that never gave an economic inch in the city world of tenements and sweatshops was offset by the still dominant small-town world, with its unpretentious social life, unpressured business life, family-owned trades and shops: here self-help was abetted by neighborly helpfulness and merchant-sized ambition (the rabidly ambitious left home). The American dream had not yet too greatly polluted America's waking life.

BETWEEN the lip-service morality that shielded or shut its eyes at rapaciousness, and the morality that sprang from moderation and fair dealing, there emerged our central, essentially worldly, morality of respectable appearances and Thou Shalt Not Be Found Out. Where gentility really governed, it was an age of maidenly lowered eyes and matronly lowered voices, and of standard-branded misconduct—the black sheep, the "fly" girl, the kept woman, the lady lying dead drunk "upstairs," the errant husband, the well-born syphilitic, the house of ill fame; but rarely, yet, any notice of divorce, homosexuality, dope, or even women who smoked.

The changing position of women provides, of course, one of the great chapters of the last hundred years. Their pre-Civil-War position was overwhelmingly domestic and restricted; poor girls worked in mills, genteel women might teach or do needlework. Even that new voice, the woman's magazine, stressed the proprieties (a young man who wiped his feet on the doormat would make a good husband, one who took the last griddle cake would not). Yet gates were everywhere opening. Various inventions—the sewing machine, cash register, telephone, typewriter—created vast female employment; the Feminist movement had already produced its Lucretia Motts and Susan B. Anthonys; the Women's College movement, from the founding of Vassar in 1861, went striding ahead—whether, like Wellesley and Smith, on the "nunnery" plan; or on the coeducational, like Syracuse and Cornell; or on the "coordinate," like the Harvard Annexe—later rechristened Radcliffe. Bearing out Tocqueville's dictum that wherever possible Americans hold meetings and organize, the Women's Club soon flanked the Women's College, and the Settlement and Suffrage movements followed. Women still had parlor problems—Chicago condemned bare arms and New York, bangs; and serious professional problems—women medical students visiting almshouses would suddenly be confronted, thanks to men doctors' malice, with stark-naked males. But by the end of the century women had footholds in both medicine and the law, and perhaps half a million women "belonged" to some kind of organization.

The Age of Plush

American living from 1870 till the turn of the century seems, if any one word can summarize, eminently unstreamlined. Using the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 as a touchstone, there is a sense of chronic and gimcrack too-muchness: too much furniture and food, too many ornaments and underclothes, things heavy and thick, things wadded and plush-covered. There were similarly too many euphemisms and taboos: wives were "expecting" and couples "retired" for the night. And if prudishness directly ordained too many garments and nice-nellyisms, indirectly it fostered other kinds of excess. With sex, hard liquor, tobacco, cosmetics, profanity, gambling and the gayer forms of entertainment so often frowned upon, Respectability consoled itself with being richly attired, ostentatiously domiciled and immoderately fed. Garish gentility bestrode the age, with decorum the boon companion of display.

The era suggests great comfort and great inconvenience alike: ample living space, overstuffed sofas and underpaid servants, eiderdowns and hot-water bottles and footrests. But relatively little by way of modern plumbing, or electrical appliances, or private phones, or proper refrigeration; or canned goods, detergents, deodorants. If invention was the child of necessity, it became in turn the mother of leisure and the aunt of feminism. As the sewing machine had already saved millions of stitches, now the telephone saved millions of steps; with electric light at home came the electric streetcar abroad; and a whole armory of gadgets—can openers and bottle openers, fountain pens and safety razors, lawn mowers and carpet sweepers, toilet paper and washing machines. Time savers could be taste-makers as well, for speed-up beckoned on toward streamlining. The Turkish corner made way for mission furniture and that male hideout, the "den"; the bustle had passed into the tailor-made, American-plan hotels were going European. Manners were freer, mothballs fewer. A younger generation led a far more outdoor life—school athletics, tennis, baseball on a city sandlot or a suburban field. For the suburb had arrived, as a culture no less than a locality: in its modernities, a sort of citified village; in its gabby compactness, a sort of glorified keyhole. Here conformity reached a well-tended full bloom, here Babbittry would take on Ivy-League flourishes, and the country club strike root. Suburbia had its enlightened side, its concern about good schools, hospitals, sewerage systems, clean local government; and though liberalism might be one kind of dirty word and art another, sex, via the suburb, made one of its most smashing breakthroughs, liquor discovered one of its natural strongholds, and business found in the country club its most profitable branch office.

Roughly from 1900 until the First World War, those future villains of society, mass production and the machine, rather proved to be its saviors. Along with all the labor-saving devices within the home, came all the time-and-money-saving services outside it. The Sears Roebuck catalogue brought the economy department store to every farm; installment-plan buying brightened every tight-budgeted household; the chainstore grocery, with its packaged foods, lent aid to every dinner table. And Advertising became Big Business in the very process of promoting it.

The Cultural Divide

The aftermath of the First World War looms larger, historically, than the war itself. The Post-War Era produced such new moral attitudes, and so changed the atmosphere of manners, as to seem a cultural divide. Yet, during the emancipating '20s, there was more in the air than had perhaps taken root. It is interesting to read a series of NATION articles, appearing in 1924, on Our Changing Morality. For there was still in 1924 an outcry that "the young girl of today . . . instead of raising men to her level, is descending to theirs." Again, from a statistical study among American undergraduates, Bertrand Russell found that Sabbath-breaking was judged worse than lying, and extra-marital sex more heinous than murder. And sexual equality was really subjoined to feminism, with articles like Sylvia Kopald's "Where Are the Female Geniuses?"; or non-sex was the problem, as in Floyd Dell's "Can Men and Women Be Friends?" Over it all was draped the mantle of Freud, and out of it was to emerge a century hailed as the century of women.

Their change in status, gains in opportunities, insistence on greater freedoms did decisively reorder society. The new college-bred woman of 1900 had within a generation become the new career woman and enfranchised woman both. Women now undertook, not just to educate your children or decorate your house, but to run big agencies and large businesses, set up model lodging houses, restrooms, convalescent homes, work for tenement inspection and birth control. They advised the ignorant, counseled the perplexed, instructed the needy; they meditated and met, they wrote and distributed, they invaded what would be called the behavioral sciences. And as time passed, they acquired more and more right of entry, even into men's grills and poker games.

Whether or not this was to be women's century, the '20s were peculiarly their decade. They were to profit by the "sanity" the '20s preached in terms of sex: Freud now made them men's equals in knowledge, teaching indeed what, earlier, men had known no more about than women. With the Oedipus complex becoming a household word, the mother-in-law became a new kind of household menace. But women profited from the madness of the '20s as well as from the sanity, and not least from Prohibition. The speakeasy became a coed drinking place where the saloon had been a male one; a bourgeois hangout where the saloon had seemed lowdown; and the speakeasy, being unlawful, fostered new illicit enjoyments in turn. A generation after the chaperon had vanished, the "male protector" largely did also: women now lived alone, traveled alone, went out at night alone, failed to come back alone. Sex before marriage, from being a scandalous risk, was now judged a wise precaution. With each edition, Emily Post further liberalized her Etiquette. For all its adherents, cultural conservatism was no longer in the saddle, but on the run.

Along with the mass flouting of the Volstead Act came the cracking and crumbling of much old empedestaled morality. During a shallowly skeptical age, theology—not helped by Monkey-Trial farces—lost ground, while almost every secular-ology gained it. Statistics loomed as the sermons of the future; and with woman holding her own against man, there went a decline, or at least decided relaxation, in manners. The genteel tradition and Mrs. Grundy could only have been routed, I suspect, through ▫ powerful argumentum ad feminam: women are largely prudes from being made resentful non-participants.

The 1930s enhanced women's strength through adding to their burdens. But the '30s were a whole new spin of the wheel: the earlier personal, quasi-Freudian, Prohibition outlook gave way to a social-minded, quasi-Marxian, depression one, with women's rights turning to human rights, and then to civil rights and social wrongs. Women were out of the kitchen for good. Since then their voice and vote have been central to American society; any woman today can say to any man: Whither thou goest, I will go. And in one old-fashioned way women now have a decided edge: it is not they but men who in their high-pressured forties and fifties suffer the strokes, the coronaries, the cerebral hemorrhages. At the better-income levels, ours is still a nation of widows —or divorcées—growing comfortably old on trust funds, settlements and insurance money.

OUR MAN-WOMAN relationship has tended to become bloatedly economic from being less sexual than conjugal. André Maurois has called successive marriages in America the counterpart of adultery elsewhere, and this has wrought far more complicating problems in manners, morals and family life than the husband, the wife and the lover. Multiple marriage today can literally make not just for broken homes, but for constantly broke ones. A man having to support two divorced wives and the children of three marriages is among the most frequent entrants and harassed contestants in the rat race. Statistically, the American family may still resemble the cereal-ad foursome; but the higher a man has climbed, the more spouses and offspring he is likely to gaze out upon. When a child says: "I don't want to go to that movie with Ellen, I saw it with Anne, and anyhow Joe wants me to go to the ball game," what foreigner would suppose that he is speaking of his ex-stepmother, current step-grandmother, and own mother's fourth husband?

Whatever the structure of family life today—among Catholics it is doubtless much different—its texture is a changing one. Problems of divorce and remarriage aside, children tend to know all about sex, about social problems, about their own problems; seem very conscious of status, not too much interested in caste. There is far less family goose-stepping: the young pursue their own interests, pick their own (often highbrow) amusements, go in summer to camp, then as teen-agers to summer schools or jobs, and at college age with other college kids abroad. Theirs is an ill-coordinated generation—on the one hand deeply committed, on the other quite unchanneled; negatively dropout, affirmatively Peace Corps. Parents' problems are now psychiatric, now sociological. Every parent who reads a magazine knows all the looming dilemmas, such as beware of not displaying enough love, beware of lavishing too much. And the era has dangerously upped the ante on children-problems, from cigarettes to marijuana, from loafing to delinquency and hipsterdom, and paradoxically from wild oats to immature marriage.

The Era of Simultaneity

Despite women's triumph, and the machine's as we once knew it, ours will hardly be the century of either, or of any other one thing. For the first half of it has already become historical; even, in a way, irrelevant. Trends in living, since World War II, have encountered virtual overturns; any planned operations we devise today can be "done in" tomorrow by scrapped techniques. Already, technology's gift to us of a century of speed has produced an era of simultaneity. In terms of motion, we breakfast in London, have lunch in New York and dinner in San Francisco; or decide between an afternoon of golf or circling the globe; or shiver at two and swelter at twenty past three; or, if our loved ones are scattered, can manage three or four Christmas dinners throughout the country on Christmas Day.

But the greatest global togetherness is achieved by complete immobility. Thanks to TV, everybody at once can see and hear anything anywhere; and not just plays but gala premières; not just mountain-climbing but life at the bottom of the ocean; not just weddings, but wedding nights. We see, indeed, by the hundred millions what earlier virtually no one could see at all—babies delivered, brain tumors removed, Presidents assassinated. And by the hundred millions we share the same gags, gossip items, fashion items, food items, parlor games. It may well be that mere conformity is ending and non-immunity looming up.

Radio was no mere milestone: it brought a new culture to birth. Besides dooming the press to perpetual news-lag, it carried encyclopaedic activity into the home, gave every one, not least the old, the sick, the rural, the scarcely solvent, a vast menu to feed off. But to compare radio with TV is to compare chronic nibbling with narcotics; and programs aside, to come upon not only more offensive commercials, but a far more pernicious commercialism. The big-money quizzes made spectator-venality a national sport; and the ins and outs, and ups and downs, of TV officials smack of government in Costa Rica. Nor can the programs be put aside—however rewarding at times, they are bossing our culture. Already one is not just an eccentric or poseur not to own a TV set; one is a kind of ignoramus. For, up to a point, the cultivated man without TV "knows" less than the steady watcher with one; just as, up to a point, what with businessmen flying all over the earth, the philistine is today's real cosmopolite. Thanks again to TV, news and picture magazines, and even newspapers, have been elevated from spot-coverage to learned analysis, from the flashbulb to the student lamp. And as all this deals with art and thought as well as facts and events, the adulteration of culture is yet such an exposure to it as to make blurred distinctions of mass and mid and highcult. Not only does masscult, today, sip and sample highbrow offerings; highbrow constantly studies and appraises masscult's, while midcult soars on Monday and on Tuesday slumps. They all absorb one another's jargon, adopt one another's gimmicks, leave fingermarks on one another's wares, wax prosperous taking in one another's wash. Were a highcult moral crusade involved, with infection a calculated risk of fumigation, much might be gained. But highcult posits an élite, not open to conscientious converts; and about all that is achieved, certainly in popular media, is to din into sows' ears the fact that they can never become silk purses.

THE CULTURAL MORALITY of a world subject to change-without-notice, must necessarily be rooted in shifting perspectives and unprecedented assumptions. If, inside a single generation, we may very well see total reversals of all we take for granted—such as trips to the moon, but no longer trains to the suburbs—what old certainties can we count on? Moreover, our mongrel culture seems to be moving toward a moral atmosphere in which the end-in-name-only justifies the means. Privacy is a martyr to the Freedom of the Press; home life is invaded with a psychiatric search warrant; and the polysyllabic third degree bears the title of Interviewing.

Our social morality, for the last hundred years, has made giant strides, leading to gigantic changes. And it is militant today (despite reactionary new blood) in an ever-broadening concern for the aged, the physically handicapped, the mentally disturbed, the youthfully delinquent, the economically underprivileged, the racially oppressed. At the same time, this is notoriously an age of violence, and of such sort as to override any such cultural approach as this. That urbanity is of all things most uncommon in today's highly urbanized culture, can easily seem piddling while violence and brutality infest it. Today, indeed, the merely social is engulfed in the sociological—in the awareness that as one stage of the Negro problem lessens, the next stage looms; that as a great Communist regime seems less intransigent, we have now a second one to reckon with; that as men are being processed into rats, the rats are being menaced by automation. Thanks to technology's mad genius, there is about everything, animate or inanimate today, a sense of impermanence—huge skyscrapers go up slated to be torn down in fifteen or twenty years. Impermanence has come to color our thinking, to turn even our cultural morality into fads. With intellectuals not least, morality, like art, must not grow trite or stale, must have fresh slants, unfamiliar frissons. Mass thinking, conformist living, rat races, academic dryrot, Madison Avenue are by now all crashing bores; what matter if they become worse and worse blights? Are there any grounds for hoping that such a climate of impermanence may be impermanent itself?

Gladly I join the legions who salute THE NATION on its Hundredth Anniversary. What a legacy and hope American journalism has in THE NATION! Born in a time of national disunion and war's desolation, it has served with effective courage even to this time of global disunion and possible war's universal annihilation.

The names of illustrious champions of the open mind and humane causes have distinguished its successive list of editors. America is freer because THE NATION has been open and free. —Frank Graham

AMERICAN JOURNALISM

From Essay to Assay

PENN KIMBALL

During a long career in journalism, Mr. Kimball has served in nearly all the media: newspapers, magazines, radio and TV. Now a professor at Columbia's School of Journalism, he was a contributor on journalism to the book, The Professions in America (Daedalus & Houghton, Mifflin Co., 1965).

THE FIRST CENTURY of THE NATION ends as it began—in an era of social, economic, political and cultural change. The cycle of change never ceases, and the news that spans the years from 1865 to 1965 is a running chronicle of restlessness and discovery, tension and strife, resistance and breakthrough—the ingredients of the process of social progress.

The character of the stories facing E. L. Godkin and his journalistic contemporaries differ more in degree than in substance from the events engaging the journalists of today. It is remarkable, indeed, how many of the concerns of the earliest pages of THE NATION persist into this age: the freedom of the Negro, the state of public education, the call for morality in politics and the aspirations for a national consensus.

Since the press is an agent as well as a recorder of change, the history of the last hundred years is also a record of the accomplishments and shortcomings of our journalistic institutions. The launching of THE NATION coincided with the transition of newspapers from small-circulation party organs, dominated often by a famous figure in the editor's chair, to large corporate enterprises catering to mass audiences. The centenary of THE NATION arrives amidst the marvels of electronic communication, in a time of shrinking competition among newspapers on the local scene and increasing competition among all media for advertising revenue to subsidize their editorial efforts.

The independent journal of opinion struggles now, as it did in Godkin's time, to keep its head above the deep waters of financial ruin. The voice of conscience or dissent, either from the Left or from the Right, is a necessary part of orderly social change. The economics of mass-media enterprises and the sheer volume of stories on the same subjects all weigh heavily on the side of conformity. Worthwhile opinion, however, is not formulated in a vacuum. A flow of reliable information about the changes taking place in society is the sine qua non for even the most independent editorialist.

Thus, the day-to-day reportorial function of the general press remains indispensable to democratic survival. When social change is neither anticipated nor understood, it often bursts upon society in the form of violence and crisis. A public uninformed about the content and direction of change, the quality of the continuing revolution of man in his environment, is poorly equipped to cope with their implications.

In order to evaluate the performance of the press in meeting this responsibility, it is necessary to take note of how concepts of social change have altered during the period in which the mass media were evolving their new techniques. The idea that man might significantly influence his own fate, apart from the interventions of a Supreme Being or of natural law, is a relatively modern proposition. And the impact upon a philosophy of the press has been profound.

Nineteenth-century thinkers such as Marx and Darwin believed that the forces propelling our society were moving it in some inevitable, irresistible direction—for better or for worse. Social change was a preordained movement in which the current generation was fated merely to go along for the ride. Whether the eventual outcome was to be the "survival of the fittest" or the triumph of the proletariat, the emphasis was more upon the formulation of absolute truths rather than a search for the relative truths of the moment.

SUCH CONCEPTS had their impact upon the discourse taking place in the press. Newspaper editorialists might lecture on the evolution of man from his primitive to civilized state and magazine writers extol the standing order, but the ways in which man might be the master of his own destiny tended to be ignored in favor of elaborate theses regarding the ultimate power of destiny itself.

By contrast, the social theorists of the present age are inclined to place more emphasis on the temporal consequences of interactions between human beings and their man-made institutions. Society is described as moving from one state of equilibrium to the next, and there is a strong tendency to be wary of value judgments of any absolute kind.

The old view encouraged a literature of exhortation and agitation; the new puts a premium on study and analysis, the so-called "scientific" method with its empirical, skeptical approach to the mysteries of life. It is no accident that a corresponding shift in emphasis has been reflected in communications.

The most conspicuous press development from Godkin's day to this has been the elevation of the straight reportorial function, whether through the college-trained specialist permanently assigned to an intricate beat or through the technological miracle of a TV camera equipped with the capability for instant replay of important action. Correspondents and photographers in the field began to attract notice during the Civil War; Godkin himself covered the hostilities for the English press. But when Godkin started THE NATION, reporters and the newsgathering function of the press were still in a marginal stage. It was an era of editorialists rather than investigators, of strong-willed personalities as opposed to relatively self-effacing fact-finders. Giants like Bennett of The World, Raymond of The Times and Greeley of The Tribune put their own stamp upon events. William James could say of Godkin:

> To my generation, his was certainly the towering influence in all thought concerning public affairs, and indirectly his influence has assuredly been more pervasive than that of any other writer of the generation, for he influenced other writers who never quoted him, and determined the whole current of discussion.

It is taking nothing away from the abilities of Godkin's modern counterparts with vastly larger resources at their disposal—a Walter Lippman or an Eric Sevareid, say—to point out that their efforts pale by such a comparison. They work in a different environment, for a different sort of press, speaking to new constituencies. Godkin practiced a journalism for the elite, an elite not far removed from the power structure of its time. The style was well suited to a nation still largely homogeneous and rural, where the church and handful of colleges dominated discourse. Government, as differentiated from politics, was a comparatively minor force in the daily affairs of the citizen. Finance and industry, relative to the behemoths formed by the end of the century, were still in human scale.

In this context, the Jeffersonian ideal of a free marketplace of ideas, one where the competition of all points of view could engage the attention of the public, was a congenial possibility. "The modern newspaper," wrote Godkin in 1865,

> . . . is the equivalent of the Greek agora, the only means possessed by the citizens of interchanging thought and concerting action. . . . "The facts" are not always before the public, it is true; but principles are; the experience of past ages is; and whenever government shows itself forgetful of these things, it is the duty of every editor, as at least representing his readers, to remind it of them.

The primary function of today's journalists is to get "the facts" before the public. Indeed, so far has the pendulum swung that now we worry about an information glut. And we grow increasingly concerned about our ability to draw the line between supposedly objective facts and opinions cloaked in the guise of facts. The readers' representative, nevertheless, is more and more the reporter out gathering information on the spot and seeking to make the meaning of his facts so clear that the public can make up its own mind and speak for itself. This is the end line of the trend that was only just beginning when Godkin was writing his editor's creed.

Charles A. Dana, taking over the stewardship of The Sun three years after Godkin founded THE NATION, promised that his paper would "study condensation, clearness, point" in order to attract readers and would "endeavor to present its daily photograph of the whole world's doings in the most luminous and lively manner." The leverage for more readable and exciting coverage was provided by the masses of new potential newspaper readers thronging to the swiftly growing cities of post-bellum America. The development of telegraph and cable communication made on-the-spot reporting quickly available to the reader. The perfection of high-speed printing apparatus made the distribution of cheap, large-circulation dailies economically feasible. Between the Civil War and the First World War the circulation of the country's newspapers expanded four times as fast as its burgeoning population.

The newspaper explosion was both cause and effect of an increased emphasis on first-hand reporting of all the raw and often sordid aspects of a rapidly changing society. Vice and crime in the new urban centers, wholesale corruption in politics, the extravagant style of living among the entrepreneurs of America's Gilded Age provided zesty material for newspaper writers. The realism and excitement of their stories, in turn, whetted the appetites of a population eager to share new experiences, hungry for education about a strange environment and thrilled by stories of expanding frontiers and material opportunities. Freedom to report on a whole new range of news fronts was encouraged by the liberation of newspapers from their former political subsidies and the importance of growing circulation to a press now geared to advertising and subscription revenues.

The 19th-century NATION, which did not share in these new forms of prosperity, took a dim view of the cultural effects of popular journalism. Observed its editors a hundred years ago:

> We are ready to make proper allowances for the rapidity with which newspapers must be manufactured, but it becomes their managers seriously to consider the influence, good or bad, upon the public taste which they inevitably exert, and to remember that the repetition in their columns of colloquial vulgarities, of cant phrases, and of verbal absurdities, give to such enormities a certain respectability, and, by making them familiar, ensures their general adoption.

The warning was well taken. As this stricture is being copied from THE NATION's yellowed page, the TV set in the next room is blaring: "Winstons taste good like a cigarette should."

The innovations in journalism likewise raised problems of press responsibility, most of which are still being furiously debated. Yellow journalism—in Godkin's words, "silly, scandalous, indecent"—is the Devil's temptation to publishers who see human curiosity as something to titillate rather than edify. A professional ethic demanding the cultivation of the better instincts of the public, rather than catering to the worst, is a necessary counterweight to the ingenuity and technical skills of eager reporters. Ethics, however, did not loom large in the other power spheres of American life during the formative years of mass communication, and the consequences have not yet ended.

Yet it was realism in the news columns, plus the crusading spirit of the new press lords like Joseph Pulitzer, that awakened the American public to the economic and social excesses that marked the era. Zeal for reporting spread to magazines, and the muckrakers turned loose by McClure's and Collier's dug up mountains of documentation on exploitation by businessmen and politicians. The philosophy of the pragmatists who argued that investigation, not some fixed system of belief, is the key to truth was an appropriate backdrop for an investigative press laying bare the social consequences of a changing technology that tended to concentrate economic power.

THE REPORTING OF social change was itself buffeted by the forces that were putting new strains on society. The substitution of advertising for political subsidies exacerbated the problems of a press relying on loyalties other than those of its readers. The dilemma reached its ultimate form when first radio, then television adopted an economic structure in which the audience pays nothing directly for the communications it receives. The indirect costs sometimes run high. In the 20th century, the battles of reporters have been as much with their own managers or sponsors as with the sources of news.

The First World War caught the American press, like the nation, in a state of deep provincialism. Very little of the energies poured into covering the American scene had been harnessed to probe the world beyond the Atlantic and Pacific moats. After the forays of Hearst and Pulitzer to make circulation capital out of war in Cuba, the cost of foreign reportage seemed prohibitive and the returns less than promising from a public suspicious of Europe and blissfully unaware of even more distant parts of the world. The isolationism which survived far into the era of Hitler and Mussolini is an illustration of the power of the press to compound by its omissions the dangers of complacency.

Yet once more it was the reportorial activities of a small but talented band of correspondents roaming the foreign capitals of the thirties which sounded the first alarms of the Second World War. Their dispatches and their books, by going beyond diplomatic banalities and political routine, set the style for the analysis of personalities and interpretation of significant trends that some years later came to characterize all first-class foreign correspondence.

LOOKING BACK at the century, from E. L. Godkin's thundering moralisms to the more antiseptic tone of today's journalistic craftsmen, one sees the consistent pattern in the news: social upheavals, technological innovations, economic reorganization and political adjustment. Historians view such movement with the penetrating powers of hindsight. But journalists, whatever their medium, race against their deadlines in the fog of the here and now.

In monitoring the elusive passing scene, the press is committed to its hour-to-hour, day-by-day, week-to-week schedules. The focus of attention has expanded in one hundred years from the consolidation of the American continent to the pacification of the planet and even to probes of the cosmos. The scale grows larger, but the tyranny of time remains fixed. The journalist is often like a child building a sand castle on the fringe of an incoming tide; the task is hopeless, but irresistible. And the pressure of deadlines is only the most immediate of his problems.

In reporting change, one is easily trapped into exaggerating it. To a supporter of the status quo, change casts a frightening shadow. To the discontented, any promise of relief shines with hope. The observer who seeks to interpret these reactions walks in worlds of dark pessimism or false optimism, blacks and whites obscuring the grey of truth.

There is a disposition, too, among mortals to view the achievements or disasters of their particular period with special urgency. While the fault is only human, it accounts for the impression spread by the press that it is continually a quarter to midnight for some highly prized value. Crime in the streets, to cite one example, has been the object of newspaper crusades from the inception of urban living. We have grown more efficient in our collection of statistics, though the ability of the layman to interpret them has progressed less spectacularly. The gap between reality and the appearance of reality is often lost in our personal outrage with the only life we shall ever know at first hand.

This myopia works in an opposite direction as well. Ushering the dawn of a new year on January 4, 1866, THE NATION could peer into the future in a mood of exhilaration not untypical of far less critical publications:

> There has probably been no year since the first of the present era which the civilized world will have hereafter so much reason to remember as that which closed last Sunday night. . . . The guns that announced the downfall of the Confederacy announced not only that the civil war was over, but that modern society had entered on a new path; that the future of modern society was to be democratic and not monarchial or oligarchic; that the existing divisions of society were conventional and evanescent; that, in short, an opportunity had at last offered itself, and a people had been found to use it, to prove beyond question that Christian principles could be successfully applied to the solution of political problems not only without injury, but with immense advantage to material progress.

These sanguine prophecies were immediately followed by a financial panic, wholesale corruption in Washington, the agonies of Reconstruction, the rise of city slums and the organization of industrial oligarchies that seemed to defy all powers of control. A century and two World Wars later, editorial writers would mark the year of the atom bomb as surely no less memorable to the civilized world, although their prophecies tended to dwell on an immiment epoch of annihilation rather than vistas of human progress. The triumph or even the pertinence to the solution of political problems of "Christian principles" is less self-evident on today's Egyptian-Israeli border, or in the Congo, or amidst the ancient civilizations of Southeast Asia.

THE REPORTER slogging through the quicksands of social change must allow not only for the prejudices of his own deeply held convictions, but also for the special pleadings of each to whom he talks. The ability to stand outside one's own biases and to weigh the natural predilections of others is the mark of the professionally disciplined correspondent. But he is always the target of criticism from those who see the sweep of the story through their own particular filters.

Those who dig most aggressively for their stories tread a perilous line between the public's right to know and an individual's, or even a government's, right to privacy under certain circumstances. Godkin, himself, took a negative view of the personal interview as a source of news. He was worried not only by invasions of privacy, but by the possibility that a clever man interviewed by a less clever reporter might manipulate the occasion to his own advantage. The latter concern has been amply illustrated by the use and misuse of the calculated "leak" to the press. And as recently as the tragic events of President Kennedy's assassination the practice of television reporters sticking their microphones under the noses of the bereaved stimulated a great deal of justified revulsion.

It has become a bromide of journalism that one cannot appreciate the content of news apart from the persons who make it. Time revolutionized news coverage by its discovery that there was more to the individual's place in a story than a middle initial and street address; it also demonstrated that public reputations can be destroyed by the brush of descriptive adjectives. It is a technique especially tempting to a writer struggling with a story where editorial opinion runs high—and facts are running low.

At the opposite pole is the rigor mortis of blandness. The disappearance of newspaper competition during the most recent half-century has resulted, surprisingly, not so much in vigorous one-sidedness as in pallid no-sidedness about many of the issues plaguing local communities. Modern monopolists fear to offend anyone publicly, lest their own privileges be questioned. The reporter straining to correct injustice is frequently advised against rocking the boat and encouraged to water down his findings for family consumption. Since the stories crying loudest for exposure are also likely to irritate the "important" elements in local society, the effect is often to dampen the dialogue of change until it is too late for the voices of reason to be heard.

THESE OCCUPATIONAL hazards of reporting the new frontiers of the news are intensified by the growing complexity of what a reporter needs to know. When one pauses to consider that the contents of our university libraries are doubling themselves every twenty years or less, that a single invention such as the transistor can remake an entire industrial field in less than ten years, that today's wisps of news from abroad can be tomorrow's cataclysm, one begins to comprehend the scope of the reporter's problem.

What we have come to define as "news," in reality, is most often only the outward symptom of change. Even so-called "spot" news is usually the momentary manifestation of long-range basic forces. A tenement fire can be the spectacular consequence of unspectacular social conditions. A race riot erupts out of deep-seated tensions.

Good reporting deals increasingly with the underpart of the iceberg. The emphasis is increasingly on investigation, background, explanation. In years past a story about the problems of cities was likely to dwell on such relatively simple targets as the corruption of politicians or the greed of contractors. To write intelligently today on urban renewal, for example, involves the interrelationships of land utilization, transportation patterns, school policies, race relations, buying habits, recreational facilities, employment opportunities, etc., etc.

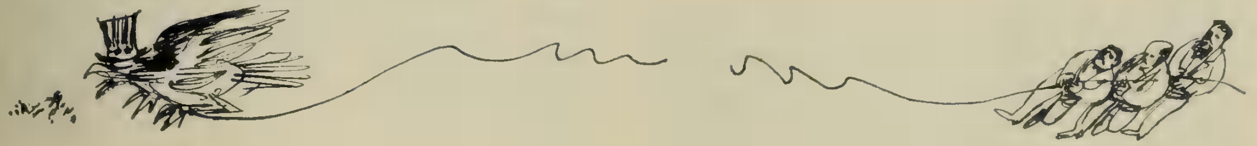
Reporters are only being human when they blanch at the magnitude and intricacies of some of their most important assignments. The herd instincts of the Washington press corps, for example, are a form of self-preservation. There is just too much to be covered, and so little time to do it. Often the result is a single story "line" that spreads through the press, the wire services, the networks, the columns. Then it reappears in the news magazines and newsletters and all the other secondary outlets of our massive communications apparatus.

A press speaking with one voice at a moment of a crisis may gladden the hearts of bureaucrats, but it is of doubtful benefit to a nation trying to clear its head for difficult decisions. When the decisions may be unprecedented, when the problems are not susceptible to simple solutions, that is the very moment for painful reappraisal. The nature of modern mass media invites monolithic attitudes when what is most needed is debate.

FORTUNATELY, OUR PRESS institutions have somehow managed to surmount all predictions that they would degenerate into bastions of the status quo. Controversy still sparks a glint in a city editor's eye. Perhaps it is only because we have an oppressive fear, as a people, of being thought dull. The run of the news sometimes seems almost excessively full of gloom and doom. As James Reston has pointed out, the most neglected stories are quiet accounts of unspectacular successes in meeting our daily problems.

Television, despite the soporific effects of mass doses of escape entertainment, has also lifted millions of Americans straight into the bulls-eye of vivid experience. It is impossible to estimate the impact of live coverage of the civil rights story, for example, on the shape of actual events. TV cameras turn even the most complacent into first-hand witnesses to both the brutality and beauty of human struggle. Such encounters write their own editorials. Popular magazines, breaking the taboos of our fathers, probe the most painful of our social tensions. Authors in the tradition of protest and dissent appear regularly in the periodical press, and paperbacks have given many of them enormous new audiences. America, in such circumstances, has developed a penchant for self-criticism. The levers of social change are grasped by politicians today almost as a matter of course—and not to thrust them into reverse. College professors stand up to statesmen in the very corridors of power; students picket their elders. The whole mix of American life, in spite of incredible problems at home and abroad, manages to maintain a bubbling ferment.

We are less dogmatic about change than any other nation on earth. By coincidence, the press of no other nation devotes such a major share of its substance to reporting the minute details of everyday life. The major news fronts for this press—education, poverty, race, health, automation, the developing societies of Asia, Africa and Latin America—are all deeply involved with social change. For all its limitations, the American press of 1965 provides its public the best documented and most up-to-date chronicle of its own society that the world has ever known.



BARBARA W. TUCHMAN

THE FIRST ANTI-IMPERIALISTS

Journalist and historian, Mrs. Tuchman was at one time an editorial assistant on THE NATION and a correspondent for the British New Statesman and Nation. Her most recent book, The Guns of August (1962), was a best-seller.

ALTHOUGH IN 1895 the name Anti-Imperialist had not yet come into use, President Cleveland was one in principle. Robustly opposed to expansion by America, he was no less ready to resist it by any other country. His Venezuela Message of 1895 emphatically asserting the Monroe Doctrine in defiance of Britain, touched off a burst of chauvinism and jingoism that revealed America in a mood of startling pugnacity. No question of gain, territorial or otherwise was involved in Venezuela; it was simply a question, as it seemed to Cleveland, of asserting an American right.

The surge of militancy evoked by the Venezuela Message shocked people who still thought of the United States in the terms of its founders, as a nation opposed to militarism, conquest, standing armies and all the other bad habits associated with the monarchies of the old world. This tradition was strongest in New England and stronger among the older generation—roughly those who were over 50 in 1890—than among the new. They were closer to Jefferson who had said, "If there is one principle more deeply rooted in the mind of every American, it is that we should have nothing to do with conquest." They took seriously the Declaration of Independence and its principle of just power deriving from the consent of the governed. They regarded the extension of American rule over foreign soil and foreign peoples as a violation of this principle and a desecration of the American purpose. The original American democracy was to them a torch, an ideal, an example of a brave new world that had set its face against the old. They wanted nothing to do with titles of rank and nobility, knee breeches, orders or any of the other insidious trappings of monarchy and when in the Navy the title of Admiral was first proposed, an officer fumed, "Call them Admirals? Never! They will be wanting to be Dukes next."

First-generation immigrants who had come to the United States beckoned by the American dream were as deeply devoted to the founding principles as those in whom they had been bred for generations. Some came out of the balked revolution of 1848, seeking Liberty, like Governor Altgeld's father and like Carl Schurz, now 66, who as journalist, editor, cabinet minister and senator, had been a power and reformer ever since Lincoln's administration. Some came to escape oppression or poverty and to seek opportunity, like the Scottish weaver who arrived in 1848 with his twelve-year-old son, Andrew Carnegie, or like the Dutch-Jewish cigar maker who came from a London slum in 1863 with his thirteen-year-old son, Samuel Gompers. Some came like E. L. Godkin, editor of THE NATION and the New York Evening Post, not as a refugee from oppression but as a voluntary exile from the old world, lured by America as a living demonstration of the democratic ideal. To them, as to men whose ancestors had come in the 1630s, America was a new principle and they saw the new militancy as its betrayal.

---

This article is condensed from a chapter in Mrs. Tuchman's forthcoming book The Proud Tower; A Portrait of the World before the War, 1890-1914, to be published at the end of the year.

GODKIN, FILLED WITH "anxiety about the country," determined to oppose the Cleveland message even at the risk of jeopardizing his paper with the "half-crazed public." Son of an English family settled since the 12th century in Ireland where he had been born and brought up, he had served as correspondent for English papers during the Crimean War and the American Civil War. He became editor of THE NATION when it was founded in 1865 by a group of forty stockholders who supplied $100,000 with the stated purpose of championing the laboring class, the Negro, the cause of popular education and "true democratic principles in society and government." In 1883, while remaining at THE NATION, he succeeded Carl Schurz as editor of the Evening Post and through the medium of these two organs made himself, as William James said, "a towering influence on all thought concerning public affairs."

He was a handsome, bearded, hot-tempered Celt, delighting in combat, brooding in melancholy, vivacious, pugnacious and a muckraker before Roosevelt invented the name. So unrelenting was his pursuit of corrupt practices by Tammany politicians that on one occasion they had him arrested for criminal libel three times in one day. James Russell Lowell agreed with the opinion of an English journalist that Godkin had made THE NATION "the best periodical in the world" and James Bryce, already famous as the author of The American Commonwealth, declared the Evening Post to be "the best paper printed in the English language." Closer to home opinion was hotter. Governor Hill of New York said he did not care about "the handful of mugwumps" who read the Post in New York City. "The trouble with the damned sheet is that every editor in New York State reads it." This was what accounted for Godkin's pervasive influence; that other makers of opinion took their opinions from him—though not, to be sure, all. "What fearful mental degeneracy results from reading it or THE NATION as a steady thing," wrote Theodore Roosevelt to Captain Mahan in 1893. Roosevelt tended to confuse the desire for peace with physical cowardice and harped curiously on this subject: "I abhor men like [Edward Everett] Hale and papers like the Evening Post and THE NATION in all of whom there exists absolute physical dread of danger and hardship and who therefore tend to hysterical denunciation and fear of war."

In 1895 Godkin was 64 and feared the future. The United States, he wrote to a friend, "finds itself in possession of enormous power and is eager to use it in brutal fashion against anyone who comes along without knowing how to do so and is therefore constantly on the brink of some frightful catastrophe." Indeed, as the United States had at this moment exactly one battleship in commission, Godkin was not unwarranted in thinking the Jingoes "absolutely crazy." He believed the new spirit of "ferocious optimism," as he strikingly described it, would lead to eventual disaster.

WILLIAM JAMES, Professor of Philosophy at Harvard, was equally disquieted. "It is instructive to find," he wrote apropos of Venezuela, "how near the surface in all of us the old fighting spirit lies and how slight an appeal will wake it up. Once really waked, there is no retreat." More outspoken was his colleague at Harvard, Charles Eliot Norton, Professor of Fine Arts and one of the forty stockholders who founded THE NATION. Regarded as the exponent and arbiter of culture in American life, Norton protested the war spirit at a meeting in the Shepard Memorial Church in Cambridge. "The shout of brutal applause, which has gone up from every part of this nation," he said, makes every rational lover of his country feel the "greatest apprehension" for the future.

The white-haired, slender, stoop-shouldered figure, the husky yet musical voice speaking in its Boston Brahmin accent, the charm of that "supremely urbane and gentle presence" was never so at home as when against the herd. Born in 1827, only a year after Jefferson and John Adams died, Norton represented the puritan and militantly liberal conscience of an older generation. He was the son of Andrews Norton, "Unitarian Pope" of New England and Professor of Sacred Literature at Harvard, who had married Catherine Eliot, daughter of a wealthy Boston merchant, and was himself descended through a long line of ministers from John Norton, a Puritan divine who had emigrated to America in 1635.

Norton believed in the dominance of an aristocratic class which to him meant a class founded not in land-owning but in a common background of culture, refinement, learning and manners. He saw it disappearing and protested regularly against encroaching vulgarity in his lectures. In parody of his manner a student said, "I propose this afternoon to make a few remarks on the hor-ri-ble vul-gar-ity of EVERYTHING." One of his students at Radcliffe in her diary for 1895 described him looking "so mildly happy and benignant . . . while he gently tells us it were better for us had we never been born in this degenerate and unhappy age."

Writing to Godkin about the Venezuela Message, Norton thought it made "a miserable end for this century" and had done much to increase the "worst spirit in our democracy . . . a barbaric spirit of arrogance and unreasonable self-assertion." What disturbed him more bitterly was the "deeper consideration" that the rise of democracy was not proving, after all, "a safeguard of peace and civilization" because it brought with it "the rise of the uncivilized whom no school education can suffice to provide with intelligence and reason." Norton felt the bitterness of a man who discovers his beloved to be not as beautiful—nor as pure—as he had believed. "I fear that America," he wrote to an English friend, "is beginning a long course of error and wrong and is likely to become more and more a power for disturbance and barbarism. . . . It looks as if the world were entering on a new stage of experience in which there must be a new discipline of suffering to fit men for the new conditions."

OCCASIONALLY, HOWEVER, Norton would allow himself moments of optimism when he suspected that the loss of the values he loved might be the cost of a compensating gain in human welfare. "There are far more human beings materially well off today than ever before in the history of the world," he wrote in 1896 and he could not resist the thought, "How interesting our times have been and still are!"

Thomas B. Reed of Maine, formerly Speaker of the House and now Republican Minority Leader, belonged to the same tradition. During the Venezuela crisis he said little publicly, kept the Republicans in the House under firm control and trusted to Cleveland's basic antipathy for foreign adventure which he shared, to withstand the Jingoes' eagerness to annex this and that. Reed believed that American greatness lay at home and was to be achieved by improving living conditions and raising political intelligence among Americans rather than by extending American rule over half-civilized peoples difficult to assimilate. To him the Republican Party was the guardian of this principle and expansion was "a policy no Republican ought to excuse much less adopt."

Following the Republican victory and election of McKinley, supported by THE NATION, in 1896, "Czar" Reed resumed the Speakership. Still firm in command of the Republican members, he could subdue any unhealthy lust among them for annexation but as Speaker he was bound to pilot Administration policy through the House. The question was, what was Administration policy: the soft reluctance of McKinley or the "outward" drive of Lodge and Roosevelt powered by the ideas of Mahan and the persuasions of the Sugar Trust? The answer came in June when a treaty of annexation was concluded with the Hawaiian Government, signed by McKinley and sent to the Senate for ratification. Although there was little likelihood of assembling two-thirds of the Senate in favor of it, the anti-expansionists were worried. Carl Schurz, whom McKinley, always anxious to please, had earlier assured of his lack of interest in Hawaii, faced him with the issue after dinner in the White House, over cigars. Very uncomfortable, McKinley pleaded that he had sent the treaty to the Senate only to get an expression of opinion. Nevertheless Schurz left with a heart "heavy with evil forebodings." In England the Spectator said somewhat nervously that the treaty marked "an end to the historic policy of the Republic since its foundation . . . and will mean its gradual evolution into a less peaceful and possibly militant power."

WITH THE SHRIEKS of the newspapers mounting over the "butcheries" of Spain and over the spirit of '76 reborn in the cry Cuba Libre!, the country was becoming increasingly excited. Reed regarded the Hearst-fabricated furor over Spain's oppression of Cuba with contempt and Republican espousal of Cuba's cause as hypocrisy. He saw his party losing its moral integrity and becoming a party of political expediency in response to the ignorant clamor of the mob. Without compunction he suppressed a resolution recognizing the belligerence of the "Republic" of Cuba. He took to the magazines to argue against expansion in an article whose title, "Empire Can Wait," became a rallying cry for the opponents of Hawaii's annexation. It spoke the awful name; as yet the outright words "empire" and "imperialism," which connoted the scramble for Africa then at its peak among the European powers, were not being used in the United States. James Bryce, perhaps the only Englishman who could have been allowed to give advice, urged Americans to have nothing to do with a policy of annexation. America's remote position and immense power, he wrote in the Forum, freed her from the burden of armaments crushing the European powers. Her mission in the world was "to show the older peoples and states an example of abstention from the quarrels and wars and conquests that make up so large and lamentable a part of the annals of Europe." To yield to the "earth-hunger" now raging among the European states would be "a complete departure from the maxims of the illustrious founders of the republic."

On February 15, 1898, the United States armored cruiser Maine blew up and sank in the harbor of Havana with the loss of 260 lives. Although the cause of the explosion was never ascertained, it was impossible in the mood of the time to assume other than a dastardly Spanish plot. The proponents of war burst into hysteria; the peace-minded were outshouted. McKinley hung back, but fearful of a split in his party, soon gave way to clamor. Speaker Reed did not. During the two months while negotiations aimed at forcing Spain into war were being pursued, he did his best to hold back the wave, limiting time for debate and quashing resolutions recognizing Cuban independence. When Senator Proctor who owned marble quarries in Vermont made a strong speech for war, Speaker Reed commented, "Proctor's position might have been expected. A war will make a large market for gravestones." He was attacked by the pro-war press and his rulings aroused resentment in the House which, on the whole, like the country, wanted war. "Ambition, interest, land-hunger, pride, the mere joy of fighting, whatever it may be," acknowledged the Washington Post, "we are animated by a new sensation. . . . The taste of Empire is in the mouth of the people even as the taste of blood in the jungle." War on Spain was declared on April 25.

On April 30 Admiral Dewey's squadron of four cruisers and two gunboats steamed into Manila Bay and with a day's bombardment, loosed by the classic order, "You may fire when ready, Gridley," destroyed or put out of action all ten ships of the Spanish squadron as well as the shore batteries. Never had the country felt such a thrill of pride. "Greatest Naval Engagement of Modern Times" was one headline. People went wild with excitement and hero-worship.

A NEW PROBLEM suddenly faced the country which none but a few had thought of: what to do about the Philippines. The American people on the whole, as Mr. Dooley said, did not know whether they were islands or canned goods and even McKinley confessed "he could not have told where those darned islands were within 2,000 miles." The disciples of Mahan knew well enough where they were and what must become of them. Within four days of Dewey's victory Lodge wrote, "We must on no account let the islands go. . . . The American flag is up and it must stay." Since there had been a Filipino independence movement in existence for thirty years for which many had fought and suffered prison, exile and death, Senator Lodge's simple solution took little account of the consent of the governed.

In America the outbreak of a war to be carried to the enemy and posing no danger to the homeland, did not silence but galvanized the war's opponents. Suddenly they became an entity with a name: the Anti-Imperialists. Professor Norton, now over 70, brought upon himself torrents of abuse and threats of violence to his house and person by urging his students not to enlist in a war in which "we jettison all that was most precious of our national cargo." Although an Irish politician of Boston proposed to send a lynching party for him and the press called him a "traitor" and even Senator Hoar denounced him, Norton's grief at his country's course was too great to be contained. At a meeting of the Congregational Church in Cambridge he spoke of how bitter it was that now, at the end of a century which had seen the greatest advance in knowledge and the hope of peace, America should be turning against her ideals and "plunging into an unrighteous war."

OTHERS IN BOSTON spoke out. Moorfield Storey, President of the Massachusetts Reform Club and Civil Service Reform League, and a former President of the American Bar Association, was one; Gamaliel Bradford, a rampant critic of government known for his one-man crusades through a flow of letters to newspapers, was another. The first Story (minus the "e") had settled in Massachusetts in 1635 and Bradford was descended from the first Governor of the Plymouth Colony. Together they assembled a meeting of protest as Faneuil Hall and here on June 15, 1898, three days after Aguinaldo in the Philippines issued a declaration of independence, the Anti-Imperialist League was founded. Its president was the 80-year-old Republican George S. Boutwell, former Senator from Massachusetts and former Secretary of the Treasury under President Grant. Its stated purpose was not to oppose the war as such but to insist that having been undertaken as a war of liberation, it not be turned into one for empire. The quest for power, money and glory abroad, the League maintained, would distract from reform at home and bring in its train a strong central government destructive of traditional states' rights and local liberties. Americans had enough to do to solve the problems of municipal corruption, war between capital and labor, disordered currency, unjust taxation, the use of public office for spoils, the rights of the colored people in the South and of the Indians in the West, before taking alien peoples under their rule.

These were the problems that absorbed reformers many of whom, together with independents and dissenters of various kinds and distinguished Democrats who had perforce become the anti-expansion party, now banded together under the banner of the League. Its 41 vice-presidents soon included ex-President Cleveland, his former Secretary of War William Endicott and former Secretary of the Treasury, Speaker Carlisle, Senator "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman, President David Starr Jordan of Stanford, President James B. Angell of the University of Michigan, Jane Addams, Andrew Carnegie, William James, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and numbers of other congressmen, clergymen, professors, lawyers and writers. The novelist William Dean Howells thought the war "an abominable business" and when his friend Mark Twain came home from an extended trip abroad, he became a member of the league.

On the side of the Anti-Imperialists was a strong sentiment, growing out of the troubles with the Negroes after the Civil War, of reluctance to take on new colored populations. Nothing but more trouble would accrue, said Godkin harshly in THE NATION, from "dependencies inhabited by ignorant and inferior races" with whom Americans had no union "other than would be necessary for purposes of carpet-baggery and corruption." Carl Schurz used the same argument against the Isthmian Canal, saying that "once fairly started on a career of aggrandizement" the imperialists would insist that the canal be bordered on both sides by American territory and would want to annex countries "with a population of 13,000,000 Spanish-Americans mixed with Indian blood" who would flood Congress with 20 Senators and 50 or 60 Representatives. Hawaii, where orientals greatly outnumbered the whites, posed the same threat.

THE ANTI-IMPERIALISTS did not sweep up with them the Populists and followers of William Jennings Bryan and those soon to be known as Progressives. While these groups opposed standing armies, big navies and foreign entanglements and were in theory anti-imperialist, anti-militarist and anti-European, they were simultaneously imbued with a fever to fight Spain as a cruel European tryant stamping out liberty at America's doorstep. Bryan called for war as loudly as Theodore Roosevelt and in sincere flattery, if less promptly, had himself appointed Colonel of the Third Nebraska Volunteers, too late to see action in Cuba.

The Battle of Santiago in July brought the war in Cuba to an end. Since it had been undertaken with the stated purpose of "liberating" the Cubans from Spanish rule, annexation would have been awkward. But as fruit of conquest Puerto Rico, at least, was available. Required to renounce Cuba and cede the smaller neighbor, Spain was eliminated from the Western Hemisphere. Preliminary peace terms were signed in Washington on August 12 leaving the more troublesome question of the Philippines to be negotiated by peace commissioners who were to meet in Paris to conclude a final settlement.

At home the Anti-Imperialists through meetings, protests, speeches, articles, petitions and public conferences were attempting to hold their country back from plucking the archipelago in the Pacific which seemed to glow with the fatal evil of the apple in the Garden of Eden. Carl Schurz urged McKinley to turn the Philippines over as a mandate to a small power such as Belgium or Holland so that the United States could remain "the great neutral power of the world." In France it was the "Dreyfus summer" and Americans, too, in those months felt that their country had reached a moment critical for its character and future. In public and private the debate raged whether to keep the Philippines or turn them back to self-government by the Filipinos. A three-day conference on foreign policy to consider "some of the most momentous problems in the history of the Republic" was convened at Saratoga in August by leaders in public life both for and against expansion. The favored theme of the expansionists which called forth their most energetic arguments was a vision of the vast untapped markets of the Orient with their limitless opportunities for American enterprise. Speaking for the Anti-Imperialists, Henry Wade Rogers, President of Northwestern University and Chairman of the Conference on opening day, forcefully made the point that it was not necessary to annex territory in order to trade with it. But he could not summon passion equal to Judge Grosscup, notorious as the man who had issued the injunction in the Pullman strike, who delivered an exuberant paean to "the new career of commercial activity upon which I trust we are about to enter." The Philippines must be retained, in addition to Puerto Rico and Hawaii, so that the United States would have "clear across the Pacific a line of naval stations and home ports in every sense our own," leading to Asia, a whole continent with "doors swinging inward that will lead us to one half the desirable territory and one third the population of the earth." Samuel Gompers spoke against conquest of foreign lands not only as a betrayal of American principles but as a danger to the standards of American wage-earners. Strange combinations were wrought in the cause of Anti-Imperialism. When at a later meeting in Chicago Gompers declared that retention of the Philippines would show that "our war was without just cause," Andrew Carnegie sent him a telegram of congratulations saying, "Let us stand together to save the Republic."

THE ANNEXATIONIST tide was too strong. At Paris the United States demanded "cession of the whole Archipelago," coupled with offer of a token payment to Spain of $20,000,000 to grease the acceptance of the inevitable. On December 10 the Treaty of Paris was signed transferring sovereignty of the Philippines to the United States with the $20,000,000 to follow upon ratification. "We have bought ten million Malays at $2.00 a head unpicked," remarked Reed acidly, and in the most prescient comment made by anyone at the time, he added, "and nobody knows what it will cost to pick them."

That winter in the Senate's battle over ratification of the Treaty of Paris, the Republicans needed every vote they could collect to muster the necessary two-thirds majority. In the delicate balance that prevailed, the most important issue since Secession depended on the votes of one or two vacillating Senators. Suddenly Bryan arrived in Washington and to the amazement of his followers urged them to vote for the treaty. Preparing to run again for President in 1900 he realized he could not win on a repetition of the silver issue and was perfectly prepared to give it up in favor of Imperialism, a new crown of thorns. To make acquisition of the Philippines a raging issue, it had to be consummated first. Consequently, he told his party, it would not do to defeat the treaty. Besides, he argued comfortingly, to ratify the treaty would end the war.

At this moment the Filipinos rose in their own war of independence. Their forces attacked the American lines outside Manila on the night of February 4. In Washington the news intensified the frenzied speculation over the vote on the treaty but no one could be certain what effect it would have. A last-minute petition signed by ex-President Cleveland, President Eliot of Harvard and twenty-two other men of national prominence was addressed to the Senate, protesting the treaty unless it included a provision against annexing the Philippines and Puerto Rico. "In accordance with the principles upon which our Republic was founded we are in duty bound to recognize the rights of the inhabitants . . . to independence and self-government," it said, and pointed out that if, as McKinley had once declared, the forcible annexation of Cuba would be "criminal aggression by our code of morals, annexation of the Philippines would be no less so."

When the Senate voted on February 6 Bryan's work told: the treaty won by a one-vote margin. "The way the country puked up its ancient principles at the first touch of temptation was sickening," wrote William James in a private letter. The saddest thing for such men was the parting with the American dream. "We are false to all we have believed in," wrote Moorfield Storey. "This great free land which for more than a century has been a refuge to the oppressed of every land, has now turned to oppression."

Hearing the sound of "ignoble battle" coming "sullenly over the Pacific seas," William Vaughn Moody wrote his "Ode in a Time of Hesitation" which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in May, 1900. Are we still the "eagle nation" he asked, or > Shall some less lordly bird be set apart?

> Some gross-billed wader where the swamps are fat?
> Some gorger in the sun? Some prowler with the bat?

This was the conscience of the few, felt too by Godkin who in his disillusion said a strange and clairvoyant thing at this time. "The military spirit," he wrote to Moorfield Storey in January, 1900, "has taken possession of the masses to whom power has passed."

In the election of 1900 the Anti-Imperialists were caught in an agonizing dilemma. McKinley represented the party of imperialism; Bryan, in Carl Schurz's words, was "the evil genius of the anti-imperialist cause." Nevertheless his reasoning had succeeded and as he was necessarily the champion of the Philippine cause, the Anti-Imperialists had nowhere else to go. They were called the "Hold-your-nose-and-vote" group but even by this technique Bryan could not be made acceptable to THE NATION. Opposed to McKinley because of imperialism and to Bryan as irresponsible, it scolded both and supported neither.

The campaign represented the zenith of the Anti-Imperialists' effort but they were hampered by a tarnished candidate and a cause out of joint with the time. What a people thinks at any given time can best be measured by what they do. McKinley and Roosevelt were elected by 53 per cent of the votes cast and with a greater margin over Bryan than in 1896. Expansion and conquest were accepted and the break with the American past confirmed. Still at war in the Philippines, America moved into the 20th century.

Professor Norton voiced the elegy of the Anti-Imperialists. "I reach one conclusion," he wrote to a friend, "that I have been too much of an idealist about America, had set my hopes too high, had formed too fair an image of what she might become. Never had a nation such an opportunity; she was the hope of the world. Never again will any nation have her chance to raise the standard of civilization."

IN QUEST OF SANDINO

Imperialism Still Rides

CARLETON BEALS

Stalwart anti-imperialist and adventurous journalist, the author made and found news for THE NATION and other publications in Spain, Italy and Latin America. His fortieth book, War Within a War, will be published shortly.

I

THROUGHOUT the vast Latin-American world, this century's outstanding popular hero is Augusto C. Sandino who for six years (1927-33) fought for the independence of Nicaragua against foreign invasion by the most powerful military nation in history—the United States. His David-Goliath exploits are the theme of song and ballads. He is celebrated in articles, biographies and novels. His ghost has haunted every Pan American reunion and every good-will emissary from Hoover to Nixon.

His fame reaches far beyond Latin America. Humble folk from Capetown to Jakarta know his name and its meaning, though few know the name of the American President or the carpet-bag generals who carried on undeclared war against him and were ultimately responsible for the massacres perpetrated by American aviators which made the names of Chinandega and Ocotal bywords of infamy all over the world—except in the United States.

Indeed, at the time, the people of the United States were less informed about what was really going on in Nicaragua than were Chinese coolies. Not till much later did the U.S. Senate investigate the cesspool of dishonesty, bribery, State Department collusion, and wholesale murder which lay at the bottom of our intervention.

The American press, echoing the official Washington propaganda line, was unaware that our bayonet-and-dollar diplomacy was facing up to its first real challenge. How could events in a despicable little banana republic affect our national destinies? The press branded Sandino as "a bandit" and "an outlaw," and made no attempt to get his side of the story.

The dilemma of the American press was stated bluntly by the Review of Reviews in April, 1928: "The American public had no information about the Nicaraguan chief [Sandino] except what came from government sources. The State Department and Marine officials call him a bandit and outlaw, and many newspapers have accepted those terms . . . What sort of a man is he? What actually is he trying to do? The first effort to answer this question has been made by the Nation [which] . . . commissioned Carleton Beals to interview him."

On January 5, 1928 (Thursday) eight months after Sandino began his heroic struggle, on entering the cable office on San Juan de Letran Street in Mexico City at 4:40 P.M. I was handed a wire from Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of THE NATION:

CAN YOU PROCEED IMMEDIATELY NICARAGUA FOR NATION SENDING EXCLUSIVE STORIES AMERICAN POLICY MARINE RULE POPULAR FEELING ETCETERA, REACHING SANDINO IF POSSIBLE. TRIP POSSIBLY OCCUPY A MONTH. CAN OFFER A HUNDRED A WEEK AND EXPENSES. WIRE COLLECT.

II

It was high time that somebody obtained Sandino's side of the story. Either his accusations should be disproved, or American policy should be rectified. In any case, the traditional American respect for free access to news and its free dissemination needed to be restored. Official news handouts, even if well-intentioned, are never the whole truth, regardless of what government puts them forth.

My one question on receiving Villard's cable was whether I had any chance of carrying out the assignment successfully. I sat down at one of the cable office desks and did some hard thinking. Then I stuffed the message into my pocket and walked around the block.

Two years before this I had been through part of Central America and knew my way around, though I had seen only one corner of that wondrously beautiful land known as Nicaragua (after its early Indian inhabitants), considerably larger than England, yet with only 700,000 people. Even before getting Villard's wire, I had put out feelers about going there and had all but been told to keep out. Would I be permitted to land? If I were, could I get my information out? Also I knew something about the obstacles in adjacent countries. The dangers of travel in difficult country and in a war zone where American planes were bombing indiscriminately did not particularly preoccupy me. The one big question was whether Sandino would receive me. He had little reason to love Americans, and if half the stories about him were true, he would shoot me.

I returned to the cable office. By five o'clock my reply to Villard was winging north: WILL GLADLY GO LEAVING HERE SATURDAY VIA GUATEMALA. GATES TO SANDINO OPEN BUT UNADVISABLE ANNOUNCE THIS PARTICULAR FACT BEFOREHAND FOR IT WOULD INCREASE RISK SPOIL CHANCES. EYE ESTIMATE FIVE WEEKS NECESSARY. ADVISABLE WIRE ME FIVE HUNDRED TOMORROW.

I realized that charges of disloyalty would be leveled against me. Later a few brickbats did come, but mostly from the Mississippi mud bottoms and the slums of white Texas women's clubs. My firm belief was that the disloyal people were those who prevented the public from learning the facts and had caused the good name of the country to be damaged by using their powerful official positions to promote improper ideals and collect unsavory loans. I believed that the real enemies of the United States were those endangering our friendship with the whole vast region of Latin America.

And so, rightly or wrongly, far from considering myself disloyal, I looked upon myself as a true patriot. Furthermore it was not a crime—as it is now—for a citizen or newspaper man to visit a country considered out of bounds by the State Department and try to provide the public with reliable non-official information.

After getting Villard's wire, I had dinner at Prendes with my friend Howard Phillips, editor of Mexican Life, then saw Dr. León. About sixty, with spiky close-cropped hair and a boyish freckled face, he had been a Venezuelan diplomat and educator. Years ago, he had been asked by Dictator Vicente Gómez to be Minister of Education. He declined and the next day a policeman took him off to the dreadful Rotunda torture chamber, where he had been held at hard labor for nine years with a seventy-pound ball and chain. In spite of this ordeal, he looked and acted like a man in his early thirties.

Enthusiastic over my mission, at once he prepared letters for Sandino and others and gave me credentials.

He warned me of the difficulties I might have even before I reached Nicaragua. It filled me with some incredulity that all the obstacles should come from the American side, not that of the enemy. The occupation forces should be the first to wish the truth to get out if our cause were so holy. Why the frantic effort to clamp down on all information?

The best route I believed—and León agreed—was to go through the lines from the Honduras side. I might be unable to get through the American lines, an effort would be made to stop me, and Sandino would be suspicious of anybody arriving directly from the American camp. I would then return to Honduras, file my stories, and go to Nicaragua, not by the regular ports, but across the Gulf of Fonseca and through Chinandega, one of the bombed cities. I had seen the photographs of mangled bodies in the debris of that town, and wished to check on things.

III

Augusto C. Sandino was born in May, 1893, in Niquinohomo, son of Gregorio Sandino, a well-to-do coffee-grower, and Margarita Calderón, a girl of the people. He was raised by a girl of his own social status, America Tifer—whom his father subsequently married—along with his half-brother Socrates. Between Augusto and Socrates there was always an imperishable bond of deep love.

Augusto was put through what went for high school in Nicaragua, then took up farming. He organized the local farmers into a cooperative to make them independent of commission merchants and loan sharks and thereby came into conflict with the dominant and ruthless loan agent of the region—José María Moncado.

Augusto was forced out and went north to New Segovia where he worked in British and American mines. Saving his money, he went to Mexico in 1923, where he worked for three years in the Tampico oil fields and apparently for a short time in the United States. He attracted some attention because he was a vegetarian, and did not smoke or drink. It was untrue, as Stimson had given out, that he had been a member of Pancho Villa's band and had participated in the attack on Columbus, New Mexico. By 1923 Villa had long since laid down his arms.

Sandino returned to Nicaragua in July, 1926, and joined the revolt against the illegal Chamorro-Díaz dictatorship. The U.S. Marines landed and stalemated every success. When Sacasa, the ousted Vice-President, who now had the only legal claim to the presidency of the country, landed in Puerto Cabezas early in December, with several boatloads of military supplies secretly supplied by the Mexican government, and set up constitutional government, Sandino asked him for guns and ammunition, claiming he could rally the farmers and miners of New Segovia to the Sacasa cause. Moncado opposed this, but Sacasa gave Sandino what he wanted and appointed him northern army chief, though Sandino was then only thirty-one.

On December 23, Admiral J. H. Latimer, in charge of the U.S. battleships on the Atlantic side, landed Marines and bluejackets in Puerto Cabezas and began disarming Sacasa's men and the police. Sacasa was ordered to get out of the port, which was declared a "neutral zone." He refused to budge, and he and his cabinet were held virtually incommunicado until the Tipitapa betrayal.

Sandino, however, slipped out with his men and arms into the swamps and made his way, suffering great ordeals and several disastrous attacks, up the great Coca River (Segovia River) to the northern mountains. Gradually he cleared the Conservative forces out of the area and took over Jinotega, the coffee center, about the time Moncada appeared to the south close to Managua.

Sacasa was allowed to send delegates to the Tipitapa conferences. They refused to sign the agreement drawn up by Stimson, which was accepted May 4 by Moncado and his "generals," all except Sandino who slipped back to Jinotega. On May 7, Sacasa deplored "the fact that the government of the United States, departing from the principles of justice and forgetting the true interests of a weak country in order . . . to sustain a regime born of a coup d'état, has not only violated and broken into pieces the constitution of the Republic but also the Central American Treaty signed in Washington, D.C."

The manner of disarming the Liberal army was agreed upon May 11. Sacasa, from his capital and Marine prison, still refused to accept the surrender; he never did, but on May 23 rather ignominiously folded up his tents after being secretly promised $30,000 and the ambassadorship in Washington. This would probably never have been known had he not later complained bitterly that he got only $6000 of the money.

In any event, as early as May 15, Stimson cabled the State Department that the objections of the constitutional government didn't matter, since its members had done no actual fighting, and would not fight. By then figurehead president Adolfo Díaz had dutifully turned the Nicaraguan constabulary over to a Marine official. The entire country was, apparently, now in the hands of the United States, and Stimson began his wire to Secretary of State Kellogg, "The Civil War in Nicaragua is now definitely ended."

Moncado had not told Stimson that he expected Sandino to deliver his weapons separately in Jinotega. Stimson would have had to have seen inside Sandino's head to have known that though the civil war was ended, the war of national independence had just begun. Indeed the following day, May 16, 800 Liberals under Juan Cabulla attacked the Marines, not the Conservative forces, near Chinandega, causing deaths and casualties. Cabulla soon offered to surrender and was killed by a Marine officer when he did. Within two months (July 16) Sandino answered an insulting ultimatum from Captain G. D. Hatfield, Marine commandant of strongly fortified Ocotal, by attacking and occupying the entire town except the barracks after fifteen hours of continuous fighting. Five U.S. planes came over and pretty well smashed up the place. The killing of between two hundred and three hundred was claimed. Ocotal became a byword of infamy throughout the continent, and from then on the name of Sandino fired the imagination of the world. His mountain fortress of El Chipote, which he managed to hold for eight months, became as much a symbol of bravery and human liberty as Bunker Hill and Chapultepec.

IT WAS TOWARD that stronghold I was headed when I set out from Mexico City that Saturday night of January 7, 1928.

The manager of the cable office had kindly promised to see that I got my money from THE NATION that afternoon. He counted out five hundred dollars in $20 American gold pieces, which I stowed away in the leather belt against my skin which I had bought to hold my money and documents, for it was then too late to get the gold pieces changed. But I had enough to pay my fare to Cordoba, the junction point of a branch rail line connecting up at Tierra Blanca with the Vera Cruz-Central American line.

I was routed out of the Pullman at Cordova at an ungodly hour. A tousle-headed Indian boy seized my bags. I gave him a $20 gold piece, told him to get it changed at the best rate when the offices opened, buy me a ticket to Suchiate on the Guatemala frontier, and have my bags on board the train before it left. I went to the hotel and had a leisurely breakfast, then wandered around the city for several hours.

There was another long wait for connections in Tierra Blanca in the jungles, a hot Mexican meal in a little oilcloth restaurant. Our train crawled down the east coast, we crossed the Isthmus, then down the semi-arid Pacific coast. Two days later, the emerald-green wall of jungle and the steep roofs of Ayutla loomed on the far side of the Suchiate River —so sharp is the division between the rain-forest magnificence of Guatemala and the almost rainless flat-roofed dreariness of the Mexican Chiapas littoral.

IV

The courier taking me to Sandino's camp, General Rivas, was a roughneck who inspired me with scant confidence. On our train trip to La Union in eastern Salvador, we were shadowed by a Nicaraguan police spy, and at the port we were seized and searched. I saved my credentials by a ruse and my money-belt was not found, but I lost Zamora's letters, my notes and loose money. We expected more trouble in Honduras.

The Gulf of Fonseca, which we crossed by launch, is one of the world's finest harbors, a true prize of empire, dotted with fair islands and fringed by lofty densely wooded mountains. By numerous treaties, rights in the gulf are held by three countries, Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua. But by armed invasion of Nicaragua and an imposed government, the United States now held a dubious ninety-nine year military lease. But the long ride for hours across that purple-green sea, after the mauling in La Union, was a gorgeous inspiration. Then in Amapala, the Honduran port of entry, General Rivas was arrested.

I was in no position to help him, and he was deported to Nicaragua where, to avoid being shot, he divulged all he knew about the Sandino underground and my plans. But by the time the Chief of Police of Tegucigalpa, the highland capital, came to arrest me, I was well on my way to the frontier.

My new guide, provided by Froylán Turcios, was another general, Santos Siqueiros, a marked man later executed. Years before he had been put on an American battleship and dumped in Guatemala. Arrogant and fiery, he was a difficult traveling companion, but resourceful and energetic. We holed up in the servants' quarters of a friendly third-class hotel, sewed our credentials in our saddle-blankets, and slipped out of the capital on Sunday, January 21, two weeks after I had left Mexico. We rode through rain and mud, snatching a few hours' sleep each night in half-open Indian huts. Sometimes our hosts had food. In the end, we had to abandon our horses and belongings and flounder ahead on foot. From the coffee town of Danlí, avoiding frontier patrols, we moved on toward the Depilto Cordillera.

We went on south, presently were escorted by forces rejoining Sandino. Though sometimes the Marines were on the opposite ridge, the Sandinistas camped unconcernedly. Guitars thrummed. In one settlement we danced. It would require a day or more to hack through the intervening valley jungle. Riding within a few miles of the Marine stronghold of Jinotega, I reached San Rafael on a warm star-studded night. Sandino agreed to see me at 4 A.M.

Most of the night I spent with Sandino's staff. Several officers were rude, tough guerrilleros who had fought all their lives, but most were cultivated men, several with extensive European military training, who had held responsible positions. One was a prominent writer. Our talk was about the occupation, international affairs, Paris, literature, poetry, art. A surprising entourage for a "bandit."

I talked with Sandino most of the morning and left at noon, escorted toward the American lines by a young colonel, a member of the chamber of deputies not allowed to take his seat. The following day we rode through Darío, birthplace of the great poet, along the main highway to Sebaco, a few hours by car from the capital. I was unable to get transportation until the following noon, for every car was jammed with people fleeing from Matagalpa and Jinotega, fearing a Sandino attack. Most were well-dressed upper-class people.

In Managua, which I entered unchallenged, I bought clean clothes and put up at the Hotel Lupone. That was February 5. I cabled Freda Kirchwey, borrowed the hotel-keeper's typewriter and set to work pounding out my stories. Two days later an army intelligence officer tried to browbeat me. How had I gotten into Nicaragua? He warned me not to try to see Sandino. I got rid of him with a cock-and-bull story and worked all night.

In the morning I mailed my articles to THE NATION, duplicates to my parents in California to be forwarded, and deposited a third set and the record of my talk with the highhanded Army Intelligence with a small storekeeper whose name had been given me as a Sandino sympathizer.

My wire to Freda gave a few words about my trip. FIRST AND ONLY AMERICAN ONLY FOREIGN CORRESPONDENT EVER SECURING INTERVIEW. GREAT STORY. ANNOUNCEMENT IN ORDER. In the morning, Freda cabled back: STAFF DELIGHTED SUCCESS YOUR GRAND ADVENTURE EAGERLY AWAITING STORIES. CABLE PROBABLE TITLES NUMBER MAILING DATE OF FIRST.

Through THE NATION, Sandino sent a reply to an ultimatum from Admiral Sellers (never made known to the public) that Sandino surrender or be destroyed. Sandino addressed him: "Mr. D. F. Sellers, Representative of American Imperialism in Nicaragua. . . . The only way this struggle can be ended is by the immediate withdrawal of the invading forces from our territory." He demanded a non-political provisional president and supervision of elections not by Marines but by Latin American representatives. He was already pledged to lay down his arms the day the Marines withdrew, never to participate in any civil war, and never to accept any public office. To the United States Senate, he protested against "continued barbarism . . . such as the recent total destruction of Quilali," one of the ninety towns, villages and settlements reportedly destroyed, chiefly by air bombardment. I found Sandino intimately conversant with the financial deals of the invaders, and he advocated a transoceanic canal built on a just basis safeguarding the rights of the Nicaraguan people and the other defrauded Central American countries.

My first article appeared February 22. The series was reprinted by the Herald Tribune of New York and other large papers elsewhere; by leading journals all over Europe, including El Sol in Madrid; by nearly every newspaper throughout the continent, even small country journals and in most weekly and monthly magazines, also in most countries in the Orient. It was translated into Japanese, Chinese, Arabic, Russian, Polish, Italian, nearly all languages. The only country where it was not allowed to appear was Nicaragua.

The dreary struggle went on for years longer. In Managua, the hand-picked congress gagged at adopting the McCoy election law which set aside the Nicaraguan constitution, so Adolfo Díaz put it into effect by decree, giving McCoy full military powers. Under such illegal conditions, Moncado was duly inducted into office. Four years later, after similar elections, Sacasa, who since being kicked out of Puerto Cabezas had been a good boy, was put into the presidency. That was January 1, 1933. The next day the last Marine embarked.

At once Sandino laid down his arms. He was allowed to retain a guard of 100 men and his followers were granted virgin lands on the Coco River. There they cleared the jungle, built houses, planted crops and started industries. Though provocative raids, killing peaceful citizens, were made by the National Guard, headed by General Anastasio Somoza (a ruffian groomed by Marine officials to uphold the constitution and democracy) Sandino refused to retaliate, telling his followers he preferred to leave the country rather than engage in civil strife.

A year later he was invited to the capital by President Sacasa. After dining at the National Palace, he and two aides were taken out of the car of the Minister of Agriculture by national guard members, rushed to the airfield and shot, along with a small boy who had the bad luck to witness the murders. Another group machine-gunned the minister's home, murdering Socrates Sandino. The five bodies were dumped in an unknown grave.

The orders for the seizure of Sandino had been given at a meeting of Somoza and his staff a few hours earlier. Though the names of the actual assassins were well-known, and they gleefully displayed their trophies, the gold teeth, hair and trinkets of the victim, around Managua, no effort was made to punish them.

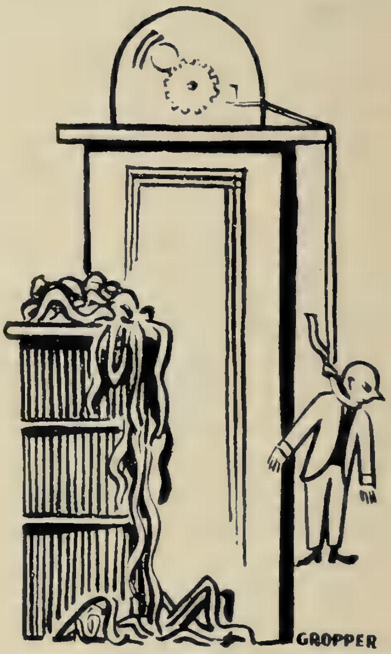
Three years later, Somoza turned his guns on the National Palace, drove Sacasa out, installed a provisional president just long enough to receive the Cross of Valor, the Medal of Distinction, and the Presidential Medal of Merit, then took over the country for twenty-five years of brutal dictatorship during which time he gathered in a large share of the country's wealth. So ended the quarter century of Marine training in democracy—destroyed by the chief pupil.

But if Sandino failed to bring the freedom to his people which he hoped would result from independence, the world-wide condemnation of American military invasion influenced the withdrawal of Marines and customs collectors from Nicaragua, Haiti and the Dominican Republic, a change of policy that paved the way for the Good Neighbor era and the cooperation of Latin America during World War II. In that struggle Latin America made tremendous sacrifices, sending us raw materials at pre-war prices, holding the wage line in spite of fantastic inflation that brought misery to millions. Without those materials sent north in friendly cooperation, the war would have been prolonged for years, the final issue in doubt. And had it not been for the new policy in the Western Hemisphere that grew out of Sandino's resistance, we could not have embarked on that war against Nazism with clean hands.

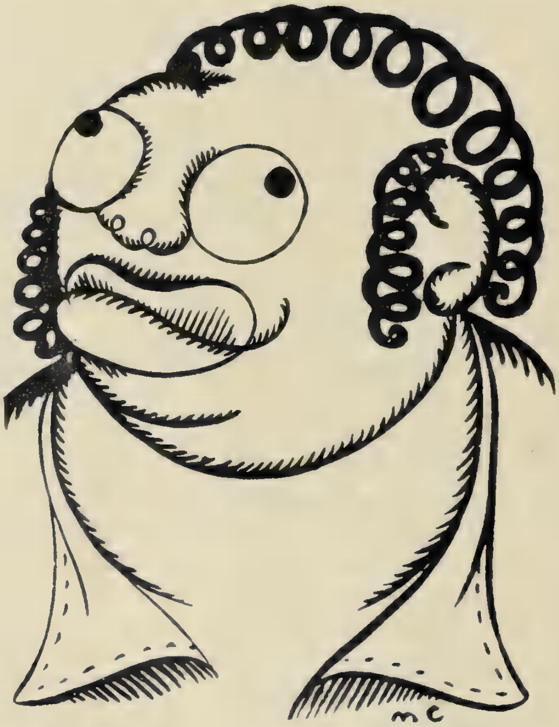
For Sandino's resistance was instrumental in bringing about an outlawing of unilateral armed intervention in the Western Hemisphere, more liberal treaties with Panama and other countries, and the creation of one of the most enlightened international systems in the history of man. If that system has been violated in spirit many times both by the United States and some other countries of the hemisphere, it set a pattern of international conduct superior to that which prevailed in much of the world. Thus his resistance led to a new awareness of the rights of colonial peoples everywhere. The aspiration for national freedom is still the most powerful force of our day. We learned all about freedom fighters in Nicaragua long before Hungary. Sandino was one of the architects of the free world, and a genuine hero of the Americas.

A NATION GALLERY

On this and the following pages are shown a representative selection of cartoons and caricatures that have appeared in THE NATION during the last thirty-odd years (prior to 1920, the magazine used almost no art).

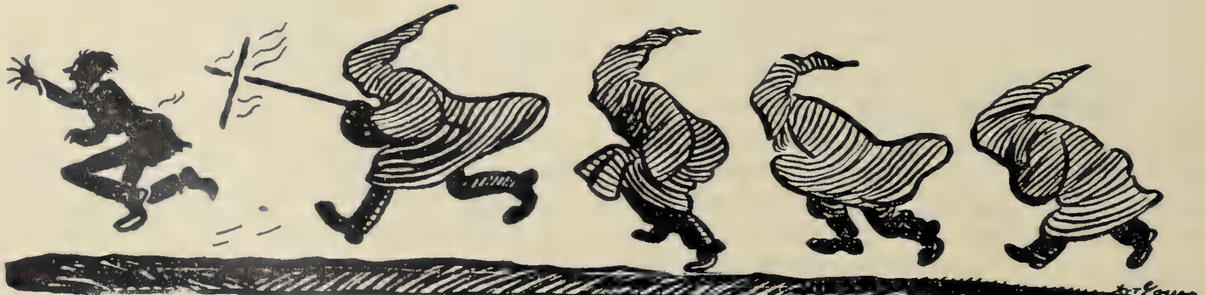


Gropper: 1929

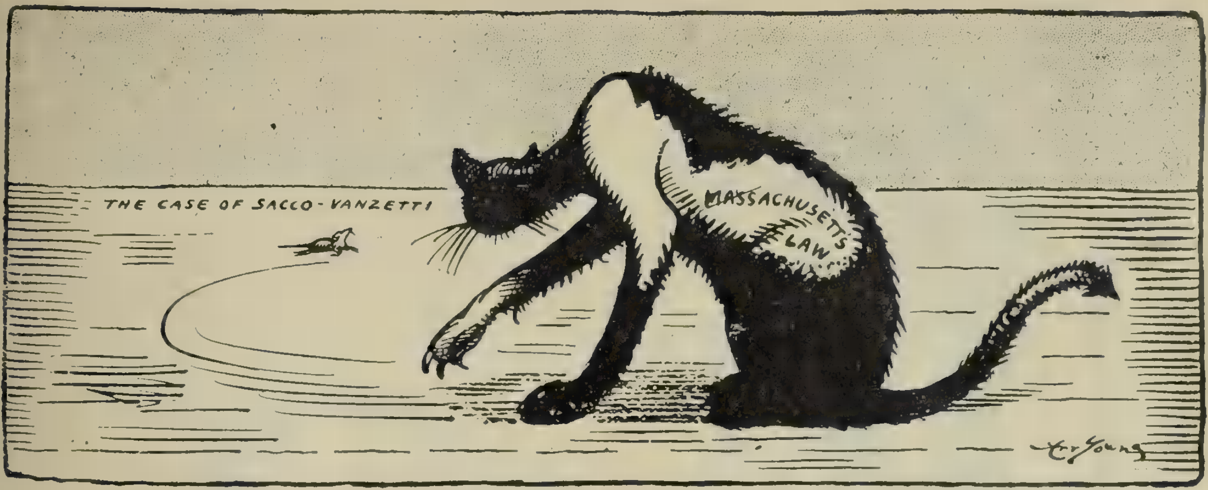


Diego Rivera

Covarrubias: 1924

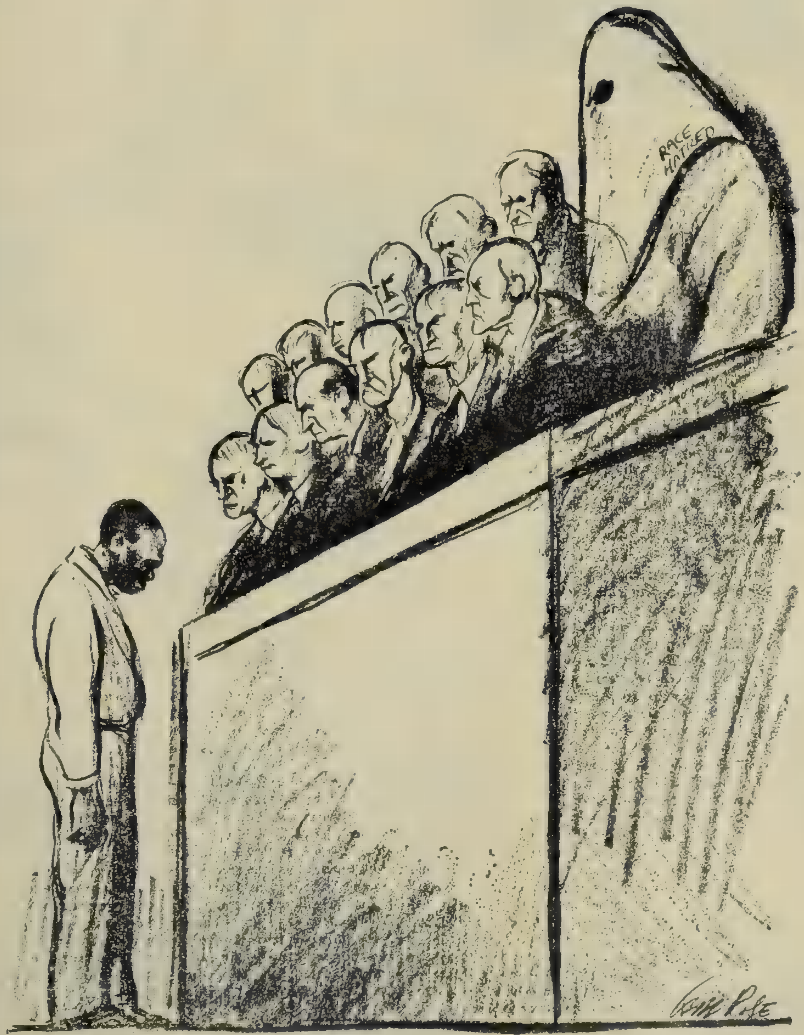


Art Young: 1925



THE CASE OF SACCO-VANZETTI
MASSACHUSETTS LAW
Art Young

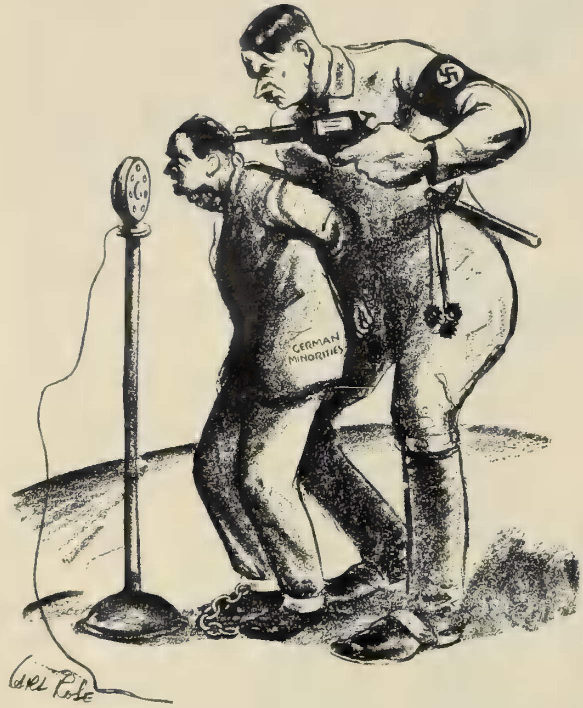
Art Young: 1927



RACE HATRED
Carl Rose

The Thirteenth Juror

Carl Rose: 1933



GERMAN MINORITIES
Carl Rose

"Tell the world how well
← you are being treated!"

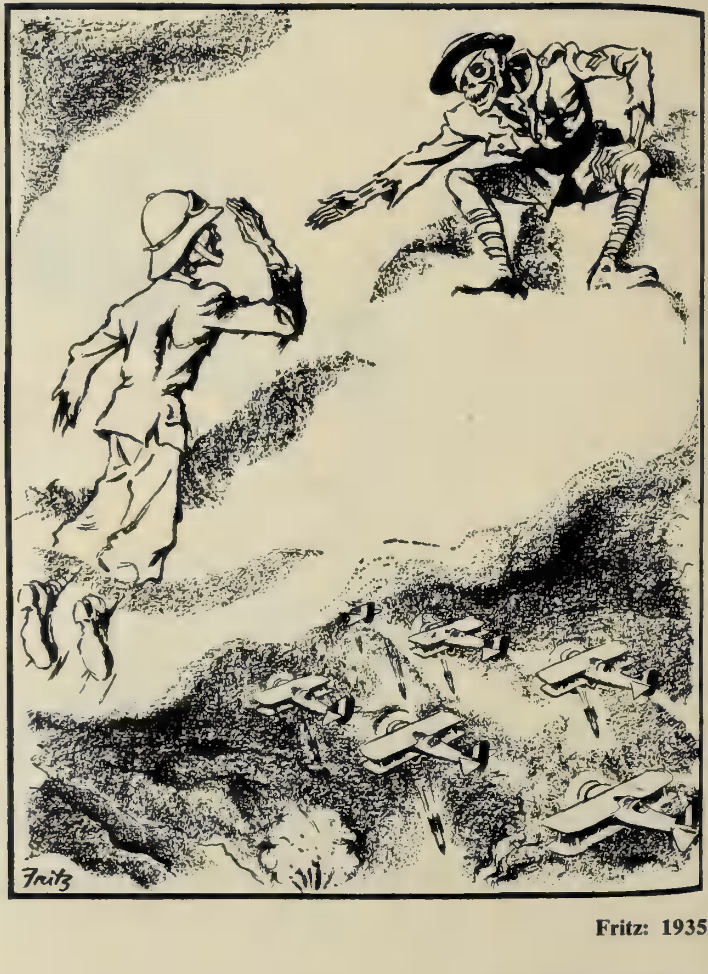
Carl Rose: 1933

Ethiopian soldier: "I just died for civilization!"
Doughboy: "Fine, buddy, I made the world safe for democracy!" →



Fritz: 1935

Sacco and Vanzetti Ben Shahn: 1952

Huey Long Eva Hermann: 1935

Senator McCarthy Ben Shahn: 1952

WAITING FOR REALTY

Death of a Small Town

DAN WAKEFIELD

Mr. Wakefield is the author of Island in the City, Revolt in the South, and a forthcoming book, Between the Lines. He has been contributing to THE NATION since 1955, and has also written for other publications.

> "Down the east coast from Bangor to Miami, down the west coast from Santa Rosa to San Diego, and outward from every metropolitan industrial center, both the small towns and the countryside have been overrun. We no longer need the words 'town' and 'country;' we can call ourselves conurbia, suburbia, or exurbia. In what a few years ago were orchards and cabbage fields and crossroads settlements, citizens resistant to Progress pack the meetings of their supervisors and selectmen. . . . Or they hunt for places to live that are less exposed to the forces creating Megalopolis, and in hunting them expand the forces that they hope to escape. Hence the nostalgia of those who knew the towns before they ceased to be places, and hence the yearning of many who did not."
>
> Wallace Stegner, from his introduction to
> A Vanishing America:
> The Life and Times of the Small Town

THE TOWN OF HUNTINGTON is actually a valley with three small villages and isolated farms scattered up in the hills along dirt roads. It is roughly twenty-five miles southeast of Burlington, in northern Vermont, and the drab grey mountain landscape of winter and early spring is very much like the Appalachian region in eastern Kentucky. So is the man-made landscape, for here, as in the mountains of Appalachia, are tar-paper shacks surrounded by gardens growing junk; dark, weather-beaten barns with caving roofs and leaning silos; graveyards of mutilated automobiles—all signs of a used-up land. Driving along the road that connects the town's three villages—Huntington, Huntington Center and Hanksville—one also sees neat and fresh-painted white houses, but they are the exception to the rule of tumbled shacks, trailers moored in seas of mud, and overturned, rusting automobiles. In the villages only two stores are still operating—both groceries, in the village of Huntington—and on the main street of each village are dead, abandoned stores with broken, soaped windows and stray cats prowling in the refuse inside. There is the sense, driving through, that the area has been the scene of some battle and was looted in a random, haphazard way by a passing army. This is one small town in America in 1965. Its condition and its future seem common to many such places throughout the country.

The decline of Huntington roughly parallels the decline of the small-town life of rural America, which has dwindled steadily throughout the last century. Our urban (defined as any community of more than 2,500 people) population rose from 15.3 per cent of the total in 1850 to nearly half the population in 1910, and around the time of that turning point to a mainly urban society we began to be concerned about what we were leaving behind, and encouraged a return to rural life in the "Back to the Farm" movement. In 1913 THE NATION remarked, with irony, on our anti-city bias, and noted that most Americans still held fast to "the hereditary faith that man was made for the land and lives in cities for his sins." Yet our "sins," in the form of city life, continue to grow in spite of our sentiments, and the urban population is still moving upward from the 69.9 per cent of the population it comprised in 1960.

But as the small town passes into history and myth, we celebrate its virtues and entertain ourselves with its vices all the more. Peyton Place has become our national soap opera, and last year a less dramatic view of small-town life was presented in an hour-long television documentary whose only conclusion seemed to be that the small town was passing, and that it was sad. In the recently-published anthology, A Vanishing America, twelve authors wrote about small-town life in America with an attitude that is typical of our response to the subject. In his introduction Wallace Stegner frankly admitted that the book was "an unabashed invitation to nostalgia," a "hymn to lost simplicity," and that running through each of the essays was "a distaste for the present that amounts to a confession of national cultural failure."

I DID NOT go to Huntington, Vermont, in search of an answer to the problems of American culture, but simply to get a view of the passing phenomenon of small-town life by looking at one particular town that had not yet been swallowed up in the spread of suburbia. When I first saw Huntington, in November of 1963, it struck me as one of the more isolated spots I had seen in this country, and at least superficially it seemed unmarked by the insignia of modern life; in all the town there is not one trace of neon. I had gone there to visit Richard Moore, a poet who teaches English at a Catholic girls' college in Burlington and lives with his wife and two daughters in a remodeled farmhouse in Huntington. I went to visit the Moores several times in the past year, and got to know a little more about the town, met some of the people and heard some of the gossip—a small-town commodity that not even television has replaced. But it seemed the best way to get a broader view of the town would be to go up for what amounts to the most important community occasion, the annual town meeting. These meetings are held by every town in Vermont, and are perhaps the last vestige of the kind of small-town tradition that is brought to mind by the tall New England church spires and the postcard memories of Pilgrim Fathers.

I arrived in Huntington the day before the town meeting, and Moore suggested that evening after dinner that we call on Sandy Paton, a man active in local affairs who would be up for re-election as one of three school directors in the next day's voting. Paton's election to the post two years ago had come as a great surprise, because at the time he had only lived two years in this town where nothing less than native birth can insure a man against the stigma of being considered an "outsider."

Paton lives with his wife and two young sons in Hanksville, the southernmost of the town's three villages, in an old farm house that he had rebuilt from its ramshackle state (dutifully recorded in the "before" photograph that is part of the ritual of renovation) to a freshly white-painted country house with modern kitchen, for efficiency, and a spinning wheel in the living room, for nostalgia. Paton is a folk-singer by profession, and a partner in Folk Legacy Records, Inc., which records the work of obscure or "noncommercial" musicians discovered in byways and backwaters, who perform with instruments such as the homemade fret-less banjo and the autoharp. The office of Folk Legacy Records is a large room on the second floor of Paton's house, and it constitutes the only remaining "industry" in Huntington.

When Moore and I arrived at the Patons, Sandy had just come in from collecting donations for the town's Volunteer Fire Department, of which he is an active member. He was accompanied by his friend and partner in Folk Legacy, a tall, bearded man named Lee Haggerty, who moved to Huntington when the Patons did and lives down the road. Haggerty later mentioned that he had once been a follower of Zen Buddhism, a way of life that he had seemingly replaced with that of the Small Town, which for newcomers from the city is itself a kind of philosophy as well as a place of residence.

PATON, a personable man in his early thirties, wore a checked flannel shirt and faded levis. He told me that before coming to Huntington he and his family had been living in his wife's home town of Whiting, Indiana, in the heart of the steel district south of Chicago, an area he described as "the armpit of America." Like many city-defectors, he had moved to a rural small town in search of fresh air and the benefits of the outdoors. In the past few years a small but growing number of city people have happened onto Huntington and purchased "remodelable" houses, either for year-round residence or for use as a ski lodge. (The town is within easy driving range of two popular ski areas.) The first commercial ski-vacation lodge is now being built in Huntington, and Paton, as well as other residents, believes the town will be developed as a ski-lodge headquarters as well as a residential area for commuters to Burlington and other near-by small cities.

"A lot of the old townspeople who have seen Huntington's population decrease for fifty years can't believe that the trend will be reversed," Paton said, "but I'm sure the town will grow now, both as a residential and a vacation area."

Dick Moore turned toward me and said, "In other words, this is a dying town about to be turned into Real Estate."

Paton more loyally insisted "No! This is a dying town about to revive."

Paton's own efforts to help the revival have been met with a mixture of appreciation, skepticism, and outright hostility by the townspeople.

"I have been called," he told me, "a 'newcomer-radical-Socialist-troublemaker.' In the past few years I've been blamed for everything possible in the town, and in this election there have been a lot of vicious rumors in the campaign to defeat me. And I expect to lose tomorrow." (His expectation was fulfilled, 109-70.)

Such words as "radical" and "Socialist" are indeed bad names to be called in this town which is the very definition of rock-ribbed Republican, as are most of the towns in this GOP-stronghold state. Though Huntington (narrowly), as well as Vermont, upset tradition by going Democratic in the last presidential election, a veteran local politico told me that in ordinary times, out of the town's two-hundred-and-some voters, "if more than fifty vote Democratic we know there's been some switching over."

Paton said that the charges about his "radicalism" included his being a "spendthrift" (he had succeeded in raising the salary of two local teachers $200 above the state minimum) and his unsuccessful campaign for "zoning laws," which he said most people regarded as something that would "change the town," in spite of all his efforts to convince them that it would help keep the town as it is.

Despite the attacks on him, and the fact that he would probably lose his school-director post the next day, Paton assured me when we left that he would still go on participating in the life of the town.

"It gives me a sense of belonging," he said. "You get that here—even though you're rejected."

The next morning, before going off to the meeting, I looked through some of the recent "Annual Reports" of the town—records of the past year's getting (taxes) and spending (roads, schools, the poor). They are surprisingly personal, rather like a statistical Peyton Place. (I learned, for instance, from reading the report of the "Overseer of the Poor" that in 1963 the town had paid $540 to Flora Tomlinson for the care of Myrtie Johns, and $166 for the delivery of Audrey Haskins' baby.)

I was especially interested to read that in 1963 the town of Huntington had celebrated its bicentennial with a parade of floats, a beer and beef barbecue, and a dance in the Town Hall. President Kennedy had sent a message of congratulations to the "People of Huntington, Vermont," which said, "As you commemorate this historic event, you may recall with pride your long record of progress and achievement. May your future success reflect your past accomplishment."

This message was no doubt the standard Presidential blessing for bicentennials, and yet I imagine it was as ironic for that occasion in many small towns as it was in Huntington, whose "progress and achievement" seem to have reached their peak about a century ago. From the time that Jehiel Johns, the hardy first settler, "proceeded, with axe on shoulder" to clear a space in the wilderness of Huntington, the place grew in population and in the economic development afforded by farming, timber, and the trades attendant to those activities. The Vermont Historical Gazetteer of 1867 records that in 1860 the town of Huntington could boast seven sawmills, a grist-mill, a shingle factory, a manufactory of cheese boxes, four blacksmith shops, and two carriage-makers.

NONE OF THAT remains today, except in the form of a few relics, like the tumble-down blacksmith shop by the road going into the village of Huntington. As the principal natural resource of timber was exploited, the sawmills went out one by one, and the last one, employing thirty-five men, folded up about eight years ago. A few farmers still cut timber from their land, like Burt White, who hauls his logs to near-by Jonesville to sell. But that will soon be gone, and White and others like him will be left to spend more time tinkering with the dead automobiles in the mechanical graveyard by the side of his house, taking usable parts into Burlington to sell for a few dollars. Old-timers estimate that there were over 100 operating farms in the town at the turn of the century, but today there are only fifteen. As more expensive and elaborate machinery was required to operate profitable dairy farms, many small farmers were eliminated; some have kept a few cows and chickens for their own families' use, but found jobs in Burlington or near-by towns.

These former loggers and farmers are now unskilled workers, many of whom commute to work in garages, department stores and restaurants in Burlington. Some have found employment at a new IBM manufacturing center at Essex Junction, about twenty-five miles away. Others take high-paying construction jobs in the summer and then lay off in the winter, sustained by unemployment compensation. Almost everyone is able to find work in the summer, but one town official estimated that about thirty-five to forty families receive unemployment benefits during the winter months. Some people simply move on to other towns or the city. The population of Huntington was 882 in 1860, and the current Town Representative to the State Legislature, Fay Shattuck, said it reached about a thousand in the early years of this century. But it began to go down after the First World War, and slowly dropped to 601 in 1957 and to a present total of 504. As in the dying towns of Appalachia, many of those who stay are older people (there are only twenty students of high school age in the town) and are thought to be the less enterprising residents. As they say of the small town exodus in eastern Kentucky, "Those with get up and go, got up and went." Or, as Sandy Paton more delicately observed of the situation in Huntington, "Those who stayed were not the optimum citizenry."

NEARLY 200 OF Huntington's remaining "citizenry" turned up for the 1965 town meeting. From small children to housewives to white-maned men who resembled craggy variations of Robert Frost, they packed the hall, sitting on folding chairs, leaning against the walls, and perching on the edge of the stage at the back. The hall itself is a relic of Huntington's past, for it was built by the Modern Woodmen of America, a lumbermen's lodge that flourished here when the sawmills were in full swing. After the last mill closed down the Woodmen membership had dwindled to a handful, and those remaining voted to give the hall to the town about six or seven years ago. It still bears the Woodmen insignia ("Camp No. 9967"), and on one wall a faded Woodmen pennant bears the inscription "Love Hope Charity."

The moderator of this year's meeting was Carlyle Taft, an old-timer who is one of the school directors, and an opponent of the "radical" Paton. A thin, neat man in a zip-up sweater, Taft quietly led the deliberations, holding a cigarette in one hand and the head of a broken gavel in the other. He occasionally rapped the gavel head for order on a two-by-four which lay across two sawhorses as a kind of railing between the audience and the officials. The day was warm and the big, crowded room rather stuffy. A man standing at the side of the hall pushed up one of the windows, and a pane shattered. I had the feeling that the whole brittle hall, with its potbellied stove and rickety, stray furniture would break at any point if pressed very hard.

Throughout the discussions, on taxes, schools, roads, there ran the highly personal strain that makes such "issues" identifiable with faces, a phenomenon that is always impressive to the city-bred outsider who is accustomed to the anonymity of political decisions. There was also the strain of the kind of small-town conservatism that sniffs suspiciously at any sort of change, and which perhaps is understandable in a town whose better days can be seen by looking backward.

Some of the citizens had even been suspicious of using the gift of Grace Pierce, who ran a grocery store in Huntington Center and left $70,000 to be used for the building of a new central school for the town to replace the old one-room schools in each of the villages. The estate was left in the late fifties, but it was not until last year that the town got around to building the new school, which is not only a boon to local education but the only modern building in the whole town. But in discussing how transportation would be worked out for the new central school, some of the citizens at the meeting seemed to feel that adjusting to the new system was more trouble than it was worth. One father stood up and said, "I don't know why we needed a new school anyway. My daughter went to the old one-room school in the Village and she's going to high school over at Richmond now and making her grades just fine. The old school was good enough for her."

THERE IS PLENTY of personal antagonism in democracy at work, and there is nothing inhibited about the town meeting. When discussion came up about taxes for roads, a woman in the back of the room raised her voice with righteous wrath, saying:

"I move that we make the road commissioner hire local help. At least make him see if local help is available before hiring 'outsiders.' Why, last year they had a man working on our roads who lives over in South Starksboro!"

Fay Shattuck, who is Road Commissioner as well as Town Representative to the State Legislature and also a Justice of the Peace (in the small town, the man who holds any office usually holds, at one time or other, a whole handful of offices), moved to the front of the room to answer the charge. Shattuck is a husky, grey-haired man who has lived in Huntington all his sixty-five years, and probably knows it and its people as well as anyone. He spoke with quiet authority, and a noticeable edge of impatience:

"Now Rita," he said to the woman who had made the charge, "You just don't understand what's involved. You have to get help wherever you can, and when you order in equipment you have to take the men who go with it."

"That's not what I mean, and you know it!" said Rita.

"Well, you don't know what you're talking about. I suggest you be made Road Commissioner, Rita. You've failed at everything else in this town, you might as well try that."

There was a wave of talk and laughter, and a woman toward the front said, "Now Fay, don't get excited."

"I'll tell you what I'm talking about," said Rita, undaunted. "Many's the time my husband's been available for work on the roads—you don't have to go to South Starksboro to hire!"

Carlyle Taft pounded his broken gavel for order, and the town passed on to other business, leaving poor Rita with her failures.

AFTER THE meeting, Moore introduced me to Phillip Brace, an English major at the Johnson State College who is coming back next year to teach at the new Huntington elementary school. Phillip was a crew-cut young man, immaculately dressed in a dark-blue blazer, blue button-down shirt and thin black tie. He was standing with his father, Millard Brace, one of the few farmers who are still holding on in Huntington. Millard Brace, whom I had noticed in the meeting because of his bright red-and-black plaid flannel trousers, clapped a hand on Philip's shoulder, smiled a proud if largely toothless grin, and said, "He's my oldest of ten." I had heard about Phillip's plans to return to teach in his home town, and wanted to ask him about it.

We went down to the basement of the hall, where local ladies were still serving the home-made sandwiches, cake, potato salad and coffee that had been on sale for lunch before the meeting. The meeting is a social as well as a political event in a town where such occasions are scarce. Phillip Brace told me that the only regular social function is the Friday Night Barn Dance held every week from the first of May through the first of November, attended by local people beginning at age eight and going on up to the sixties and anyone beyond that who can still do the dances. The town has no drugstore any more, much less a drive-in, and the local teen-agers' social life is mainly confined to hanging around the IGA grocery store at Huntington Village and drinking Cokes. Phillip estimated that more than half the young people leave town by the time they reach twenty-one. He was the only one of his class of twenty in the one-room village school to go on to college. The town hardly sounded like the most attractive place for a young college graduate to return to, and I asked him why he was coming back.

"Devotion," he answered at once. "The town doesn't have a high school of its own and they pay tuition for us to go to one of the high schools in the area. The town paid for my education, and I'd like to pay them back. I'll devote two or three years to teaching here, and then go on. I'd eventually like to get my Ph.D. in English literature and teach in college."

Brace is returning to teach in his home town in the spirit that other young men go into the Peace Corps. In many ways his own small town will be a more difficult place to serve than a strange foreign country, and Brace is well aware of the pressures involved.

"I realize I'll be criticized here," he said. "You know, it's sort of like Peyton Place, when someone who's been away comes back to town and everyone's watching him."

Like many others, Brace sees the town's future as "more of a playground than a farming area. The Governor has been down to look over my grandfather's farm and is interested in buying it as a place to come for skiing."

JUST AS IN THE dying towns of Appalachia, many of the residents of Huntington look to tourism as the salvation of the future, but at least in Vermont, with its skiing facilities, the prospect seems more likely than it does in Kentucky. I was assured a few years ago after visiting Hazard, Kentucky, by an official of the Area Redevelopment Administration in Washington that "In five years, tourism will be a bigger industry than agriculture in this country." That curious transformation from farm-land to play-land is taking place in Huntington.

The hope of recreational development seemed to be the main interest of one of the town's oldest and most important citizens, P. C. Jacques, whom Moore and I visited the evening after the meeting. Jacques is the biggest property owner in town, and owns the IGA store in the village of Huntington. At the meeting he was re-elected without opposition as one of the town's three selectmen, but last year he had been unexpectedly defeated as town clerk by a younger and newer citizen, an accountant who was backed by Paton and many of the younger people who felt Jacques had "been in too long." Jacques's daughter-in-law Nellie ran for the post at this year's meeting but lost that as well as the post she had held as treasurer of the town, in what many people interpreted as an "anti-Jacques" vote. Others attributed the winning of both these posts by the young accountant, Sheridan Coveau, more as a sign of the popularity Coveau gained by starting a weekly bingo night at the Town Hall to raise money for equipment for the new school. The bingo night was the first new social event in town since the barn dance, and as one resident said, "It's about the only thing that gets people away from TV."

But none of these local political matters seemed of much concern to Jacques. He winters in Florida now, returning in time for the town meeting in the spring, and lives in a small modern one-story house with adjoining garage, probably the prototype of the houses that will sprout here when the town "develops." We sat around a formica table in the dining alcove of the house just off the standard modern kitchen, and while Jacques looked with nostalgia on the past—"Everything's a rat race today"—he seemed more interested in the future of recreation and realty.

"I'm trying to get the IBM people over at Essex interested in buying my farm for a recreation area," he said. "They'll be wanting a golf course, I imagine, and room for a lot of facilities. Most of the farmers who're still holding on are just waiting for the value of the land to go up in the next few years. Even right now, offers are twice what the land is worth for farming."

The town itself is looking to this sort of development, and hopes to sell its old one-room schools for ski-lodges. There will no doubt soon be motels and drive-ins and all the other neon clutter of suburban sprawl. Vacationers will come to ski, and commuters will come to find a home away from the daily grind of the city. The town, in other words, like so many others, will be, as Wallace Stegner put it, eventually "over-run" by the spreading Megalopolis. Now it simply waits for the neon future, while its farms turn into real estate and its residents turn into commuters. The present state of the town, and so many others like it, could be no better described than by its own accidentally-resident poet, Richard Moore, who captured its spirit in this Huntington-inspired sonnet:

It took TV to civilize our village and bring our stubbled codgers up to date.
Up skyscrapers new notions percolate;
into our channelled valley drips the spillage
where junkyards cover fields once used for tillage.
Our means are modest, but the needs are great which softly sung commercials can create.
Some call it enterprise; I call it pillage.

When every crank and far-flung solipsist knows about Prell and Dristan Nasal Mist, who doubts the unity of Western Culture?
Tuned to elections, watching babies kissed,
viewing with awe the murdered anarchist,
what lone Promethean liver needs a vulture?

All hail to THE NATION as it begins its second century. If you care to measure what THE NATION has meant to our country, imagine American life without it. After a generation magazines usually suffer a kind of arterio-sclerosis. Not THE NATION. It has continued to expose and expound, infallibly finding its substance with such successors of its first leaders as Freda Kirchwey and Carey McWilliams.

God save THE NATION.—Waldo Frank

WAITING FOR REALITY

Birth of the Megalopolis

SCOTT GREER

Mr. Greer is a poet (Via Urbana and Other Poems: Alan Swallow) and political scientist (The Emerging City: Myth and Reality and other books). Teacher and Director of The Center for Metropolitan Studies at Northwestern University, his newest book, Urban Renewal and American Cities, will be published next year by Bobbs-Merrill.

THE AMERICAN CITY has always been a problem of some sort to somebody. From Jefferson's worries about the corruption of the urban masses to Johnson's concern with "renewing" our cities, there has been a presumption of failure in our urban communities. This kind of belief, however stated, has really rested upon the classical problem of social change—the dramatic disjunction between what we think we wanted, on one hand, and what we have cooperatively produced on the other.

What we have made is a society which became increasingly urban in each decade (but one) since the Revolution. We know the story but the statistics bear repeating: from less than 5 per cent urban during Washington's presidency to over 70 per cent during Johnson's. But all the time we were building an urban nation, we continued to measure it against images derived from an earlier age. The discrepancy led to moral and political efforts to reshape what was emerging in the image of that golden time.

It is conventional to attribute much of the increase in urban growth to the Civil War and its stimulation of manufacturing. However, it is important to remember that the single greatest proportionate increase of the urban population was between 1840 and 1850, when the proportion living in cities increased by nearly half. A consistent increase continued to the present, with the urban proportion rising around five per cent each decade.

The underlying cause was the increasing scale of the society. By this I mean two things: first, the increasing application of non-human energy and machines to every aspect of human work, beginning with agriculture (today our most mechanized industry); second, the increasing organization of work in large, formal structures which demand and allow spatial concentration of the factors of production and places of exchange. Increasing material wealth and increasing control over space, both resulting from the revolution in energy resources, allowed for the development of regional and national producers and markets. Around the sites of these enterprises grew the cities.

The increase of energy resources included both the development of techniques for using petrochemicals and the increase in productive lands. These latter in turn fed both national and international trade, and tended to dominate certain world markets with their produce. One result was the competitive decline in European agriculture and the movement of peasants to the cities and, in many cases, to the cities of the United States. This massive in-migration shaped the basic character of American cities—differentiating them from both the cities of other nations and the remainder of American society. All cities are polyglot and heterogeneous, but American cities had more people from further and more various origins than any in history save possibly Rome.

The cities of the latter 19th century were preeminently cities of the railroad. This major breakthrough in the use of new energies, allowing the cheap movement of heavy materials across the continental nation, increased the span of productive enterprise and of the markets. However, it did little to alleviate the problem of movement within the city, where animal muscles (human and equine) completed the journey of goods from distant places. Movement within the city was expensive and slow; the solution was a sharp increase in density of the increasing population. This meant crowded tenements for the poor, town houses for the rich, high-rise offices, factories, and loft buildings for work. Near the terminal stood the plants and warehouses handling the heavy goods and, near them, the dwellings of the workers.

The workers were, predominantly, poor. Over the last half of the 19th century their wages rose very slowly, while they bore the brunt of "the business cycle" in unemployment without benefit of unions. Poorly educated if at all, chained to the job, polyglot and in many cases strangers from a simpler world, they constituted a majority of the people in the rapidly growing cities. Their jerry-built neighborhoods were poorly maintained (it was a sellers' market in cheap housing, as always), and they quickly deteriorated into the generic "slums." The concentration of the poorest coincided with the concentration of the criminal, the dependent, the diseased and, as a partial consequence, the revolutionary.

THE AMERICAN IMAGE of these cities was ambivalent. On the one hand, those who were in revolt from the village and the isolated farms looked to the city as liberator. But many others viewed it as a pit of iniquity. Anselm Strauss (in his study, Images of the American City) documents the intense revulsion felt for the city among those whose basic ideal was the small town life described by Riley. The Jeffersonian myth "that the country was the source of moral integrity and vigor" survived, even as millions of country boys went to the cities to gamble their futures.

These counter-images of the city are most harshly presented in the novels of Dreiser. In his series based on the career of Yerkes, the brilliant opportunities and the terrible risks of urban existence are evoked as interwoven aspects of the same whole. More important, his naturalism illuminates the weakness of public order and the free rein of chicanery and violence. Underlying this at a deeper level is a commitment on Dreiser's part to the dominant myth of American business enterprise—that social Darwinism which saw conflict, competition and survival as the "real" facts and the moral order as a mere epiphenomenon. It was "natural" that the City Council of Chicago could be controlled through bribe, as it was natural that economic aggrandizement in the person of Yerkes should integrate the transit system and thus improve the purchasing power of the worker's nickel. It amounts to saying that whatever has resulted justifies the process from which it came.

This point of view is equally evident in the first school of American urban studies, that of the "human ecologists." Having separated the moral order from the spatially-evident community, these scholars then ignored the former to concentrate upon a description of the latter. Implicit was a social determinism which derived the existing city from the struggle for Lebensraum among contending interest groups of every sort. Neither moral norms nor the structure of government exerted any real influence upon the course of life in the city.

AND INDEED, THERE was much truth in such an assumption. Lincoln Steffens and his fellow muckrakers had dug up shattering evidence of corruption and compliance in City Halls throughout the nation. Politicians were handmaidens of the highest bidders among the businessmen. Plunkitt of Tammany Hall seemed a better guide to practical politics than were professors of government; his fine distinctions between honest and dishonest graft seemed at least congruent with the real rules of the game, unlike the charters, statutes and homilies of the textbooks. Nor was there anything "unnatural" about it. The irrelevant images of a small-town and rural America were held in common by those who had drafted the democratic charters. These architects assumed the farmer, the independent producer, had both the ability and the interest to govern himself through the ballot or through taking office. The reality was the mass of new urbanites, employees, entrepreneurs, hucksters from every part of the earth, often illiterate but anxious to make their way in a frightening and promising environment.

The result was the invention of the city "machines" —networks of party clubs which sold favors wholesale at the top and distributed the rewards downward at retail. When such machines coincided with ethnic groups or coalitions (and this was almost always the case), the basis was laid for a politics which succeeded in relating numbers to wealth, after a fashion. It was, however, a fashion calculated to minimize the independent effect of "the public purpose" upon the business of running the city. The public treasury, the transportation system, the use of urban lands, the administration of justice—all levers capable of controlling the development of the city—were co-opted by private enterprise. The public purpose had markedly little to do with the developing layout of American cities.

Under such circumstances the energies of reformers were focused upon the creation of integrity in government. Drawn overwhelmingly from the middle-class old Americans, civic reformers were concerned with separating public purpose and private enterprise at the level of the boss, who lined his pockets, and of the voters, who bought ethnic identity and trivial privileges. The "Good Government League" fought for the short ballot, non-partisan elections, proportional representation, initiative, referendum, recall, the city manager system, and so on through a laundry list of nostrums. Their aims were "to take government out of politics."

And there were other urban reform movements. Those who could not accept with equanimity the Spencerian dictum that the weak and ignorant should perish developed the settlement-house movement, cultural missions to the poor. Those whose eyes were shocked at the urban scene resulting from the free play of the market—the maximization of profit for those with capital to invest—began to urge the creation of the "city beautiful." So pervasive, however, was the ideological climate that reformers and unregenerate exploiters alike shared a core of basic values. For those who would take government out of politics dreamed mostly of an honest administrative government, forgetting that politics is the collective determination of the future, demanding the representation of divergent interests. Those who were on missions to the poor forgot that under the national credo, unemployment is part of the divine scheme of free enterprise and mass poverty certain for any city. Those who planned the city beautiful ignored the dictum that nothing capable of earning a dollar should be left to government—a rule whose practical consequence was the domination of urban patterns by the money and real estate markets.

Within such limits the achievements of reformers were limited indeed. To be sure, localized planning occurred in the centers of some cities; parks were bequeathed by the wealthy; some control over new building was instituted (becoming a new source of income for the "machines"). Meanwhile, the older urban centers were flooded with new buildings throughout the latter half of the century, with huge new systems of streets and sewers accompanying them and leading to the growth of huge new fortunes. The rapid building of the urban plant used the political machine—and fed it at the same time. Yet Seth Low, Mayor of Brooklyn, in rebuttal to Lord Bryce's condemnation of our municipal government, underscored a major point: when was so much built so rapidly for so many? The antique machinery of local government provided many opportunities to stall and stalemate; it was oiled by the flow of transactions between builders, machines and officials. The society rewarded those who "got things done"—with few questions about ultimate costs.

And indeed, as the nation moved deeper into the 20th century, a determined attack on civic government as a problem began to have some successes. As the worst abuses became rare, as voting machines began to replace political machines, the image of the local official as a trained professional became increasingly applicable. Many interlinked trends underlay the change. With cessation of immigration in the early 1920s, the population became increasingly native and acclimated to American norms and beliefs; it also became better educated, more prosperous and more highly skilled as the society increased in scale. The petty rewards of the machines shrank in value along with toleration of fraud. At the same time, the sheer growth of the cities resulted in the building of huge bureaucracies having a momentum, an order, and complex problems of their own—problems requiring a level of technical competence not to be found at random among "friends of the party." With the depression and the increasing scope of the national government these bureaucracies became intricately interdependent with the larger system: the terms of federal grants gave added leverage to the emerging cadres of professional civic bureaucrats.

IRONICALLY, THE VERY trends which aided in the solution of older problems produced a new and equally difficult set. The increase in scale which resulted in a wealthier and better educated citizenry on one hand, and large bureaucracies producing public goods and services on the other, also increased the average citizen's control over space. Automobiles and electronic communications decreased the dependence of the population upon the small area and dense structures of the central city.

The automobile allowed residence and workplace to be separated further in space and yet remain as close in time as before. The truck allowed enterprises to locate far from the old terminals. Increasing income decreased the marginal cost of private transportation to the citizens, while vast new areas available for development on the peripheries lowered the cost of land. Spatial freedom, along with the development of lifetime mortgages, permitted the vast bulk of the population a free choice between the old high-rise city and the horizontal neighborhoods of suburbia. Their option has been overwhelmingly for the latter.

The decentralization of urban sites was not accompanied by an expansion in the jurisdiction of the older city. For one reason or another (lack of services from the city, unwillingness to be governed and identified with it), the new settlements tended to incorporate as separate municipalities. Thus the typical American metropolis became a large central city surrounded by dozens or hundreds of small suburban towns. Today over half the total population of our metropolitan area lives outside the central city.

This situation has been defined by many as a major problem—"the metropolitan problem." There is no longer any general government for the urban area as a whole. Though it produces problems due to its interdependence—problems of transportation, housing, race relations, drainage and sewerage, land use and so on (almost) indefinitely—there is no capability to act for the public welfare of the region. (Here the title of Robert Woods's book on metropolitan New York, 1400 Governments, is a dramatic summary.) There is no decision-making body which has the fiscal and the police power to maintain an order referring to the interdependent population. There is no way the resident, as citizen of a metropolis, can have a say in the collective fate of the vast urban fabric.

The voices which have dramatized the problem have been, predominantly, those who speak for the older central city. They are the ones who tell us that our cities are increasingly "blighted," increasingly inhabited by the segregated, the unemployed, the poor. They emphasize the increased public services necessary for such populations while the prosperous are leaving the city and industry and commerce locating in the industrial parks and shopping centers of the suburbs. The tax base is declining, while the demands for service increase.

And the older urban center deteriorates. The proud neighborhoods of the rich become converted into tenements for the poor and the segregated, great buildings and public monuments deteriorate and no new ones spring up to replace them, civic leaders and patrons of the arts move to the suburbs, leaching purpose and will from the city. The very cradle and core of civilization, the city, is deteriorating even as we become an urbanized society. This is another aspect of the metropolitan problem.

MAJOR CAMPAIGNS have been mounted for the purpose of re-establishing the cohesion of the city. Many efforts have been made to devise and put into being a new metropolitan government which could include the entire interdependent population of the great complexes. With only minor exceptions they have failed, sunk on the rock of the referendum. For, in our political culture inherited from an earlier era, the municipal corporation is virtually sacrosanct and can be changed only at the will of the citizens. And they, by and large, are not interested in one big government for the metropolis. The opposition, organized and led by the incumbent officials of the various sub-jurisdictions (including those of the central city) almost always has its way.

A second major effort addressed to the plight of the city is the national program of urban renewal. Growing out of the slum clearance and public housing programs of the depression, it has been expanded to a program to renew the cities—to do away with slums and replace them with new growth into the indefinite future. It is, then, a radical program—one aimed at controlling the growth and form of American cities in a way they have never been controlled before.

Unfortunately, the program is severely limited by the political culture and the legal structure. It is forced to share power with many agencies not necessarily committed to its goals. Thus, programs are initiated and guaranteed, indeed executed, by local government; the federal agency must deal with whatever interests the local political process has hoisted into office. The programs are also rigorously limited in what they can do; they can buy land and clear it, but aside from public buildings they cannot redevelop. All that must be undertaken by the private real estate industry. This means that the urban renewal effort can be applied only where local officials want it and where the local real estate market decrees that profits can be made. These sites may or may not be the ones most in need of redevelopment and the resulting structures may contribute as much to aesthetic blight as the ones they replaced.

AN EQUALLY IMPORTANT limit on the program is the result of governmental fragmentation. Because the program must be a municipal effort, it cannot plan and act for the metropolitan area as a whole. Yet in respect to housing markets, industrial location, transportation and retail markets, the majority of the population outside the central city is critically important to central city developments. What happens, however, is the development of a myopic, city-focused program which ignores the major wave of metropolitan growth and development, the burgeoning suburbs, in order to fixate upon the old, second-hand acres of the central city. Here the chief effects thus far have been the destruction of low-cost housing and replacement with business and public office buildings or luxury apartments. (It is not at all certain that such buildings would not have been built anyway, without public subsidy.)

Both urban renewal and metropolitan government are programs derived from another lag between what we think we want and what we have created. Now the nostalgia is not for the small town and country, but for the imagined central city of another era. People dream of the older part of the city as "hub and symbolic center" for the metropolitan area. They decry the homogeneity of the suburbs, speak of the richness of life in the urban milieu, the heterogeneity of people and cultural experiences easily available. They point then to the "decay" at the urban core. The metropolitan problem is a problem, then, of heart's desire.

But whose heart, and whose problem? Those who set up housekeeping in the suburbs were not usually refugees from the city; they were newly formed families who chose the broad, horizontal acres as most appropriate for the style of life they wanted. It is a life centered in family, home, neighborhood, local community. They do not miss the cultural opportunities of center city, for when they and their kind lived in the center they did not take advantage of them. And besides, with television and stereo they have more access to high culture than any lot of average citizens ever had before. As for tolerance of ethnic differences —segregation of the unlike even in proximity is as possible in a central city as in the South, and has long been practiced in both milieus. In truth, tolerance is most powerfully a function of formal education and it is in the middle-class suburbs that we find the most tolerant populations—not in the polyethnic slums.

As for the "decay" of the city, it is largely an optical illusion. If we insist on seeing only the older half of the metropolis, the proportion of substandard housing, poverty, dependency, et al, has certainly increased in recent decades. But the reason is simply the concentration of certain types of population in certain residential areas in a city whose government, not having expanded its jurisdiction, now applies only to a minority of the total population. If we take the metropolitan population as a whole, substandard housing has decreased enormously since the 1950s. The reason is precisely the rapid building of enormous stocks of new housing in the suburbs. The increase in the Negro population is similarly explained: the concentration of the oldest (therefore cheapest) housing in the center, and the proximity of lower status and unskilled jobs, makes center-city housing inevitable for most Negroes. To be sure, formal and informal segregation forces a senseless and uneconomical concentration and density; for this, however, the major remedy is likely to come through the continual increase in vacancies among the older, but still decent, housing of the middle wards—brought about in turn by the movement of white households to the suburbs.

Our slums are products of income shortage, not housing shortage. The cure lies in education, jobs and the resulting increase in the power to control one's destiny. In the same way, participation in high culture and ethnic tolerance are products of a specific kind of experience—education—and we all do not need to move into Manhattan or the Loop in order to have such experience. (In both respects, recent national policy changes seem to result in more realistic programs.) Indeed, the spatial metaphor which leads us to focus upon the hallowed ground of "the city" probably produces more confusion than anything else.

For the city as we reconstruct it from the past no longer exists. Small towns, yes; isolation from the national network and the sharp bounds of farm land leave a tangible reality in the smaller settlements. But when we reach populations large enough to support what we think of as metropolitan functions (the arts and sciences, the specialized markets) we typically find, not an urban form, but an urban texture. Megalopolis, the strip of urban development down the Middle Atlantic seaboard, is in part an artifact of spot maps. It has little unity except contiguity. Yet that is the probable pattern of our emerging regional conurbations.

Most basic to this development is the radical change in the meaning of space. Our technologies have so developed that the entire nation can participate in moments of high solemnity more easily than could the residents of a fairly small town in the recent past; television is the new public forum. At the same time, for some actors in some organizations, the entire nation is one city—Megalopolis is Main Street, the airport the major crossroads. As for the average citizen, it is likely that high significance resides, for the most part, either in a realm below that of the public (i.e., the household) or above that of the city (i.e., the national Big Screen).

If we are to exert control over the shape of our cities we must begin with a candid examination of the real nature of urban civilization today. We must take into account what John Friedman has called "interactional space," rendering the metaphors derived from maps into a useful form for this United States today. We must accept the basis in value and choice of widespread decentralization, developing an aesthetic appropriate to it—a view of "the city of a thousand places, the city on wheels," as David Crane has phrased it. Most of the difficulties of our past civic policies derived from their inappropriateness to the total round and rhythm of life in a radically changing and expanding society. With a more accurate map of what is, a more adequate explanation of why it is, we may begin to approach the major question: What do we want with enough consistency and vigor to pay the price?

Or: Do we really care about our cities?

THE FAT CATS of LABOR

A. H. RASKIN

Twenty-seven years of labor reporting for The New York Times won Mr. Raskin many prizes and a national reputation in his field. He has been on the Times Editorial Board since 1961 and assistant editor of the editorial page since last fall.

JUST AFTER WORLD WAR II, when labor in the mass-production industries was battling for employer-financed health and pension benefits as the foundation of a broad new system of social security under the union label, Walter P. Reuther used to delight union audiences by describing the reluctant employers as men driving down the highway to abundance with a giant rear-view mirror where their windshield should be. Today the same image would be dismayingly apt for most top union leaders; they are piloting their organizations through a period of revolutionary technological and social change with concepts fashioned in the depression years of the nineteen thirties.

Born of discontent, the American labor movement has overcome many of its traditional enemies in the century since the founding of THE NATION. The blacklist and the yellow-dog contract have been banished, along with the scab-herder and the old coal-and-iron police; the great citadels of the open shop in steel, auto and other basic industries have come under union agreement; the average factory wage is over $100 a week; union financial statements read, in George Meany's words, like the report of the Federal Reserve Bank and their glass-and-marble headquarters rival the embassies of great powers in opulence. The question now is how well labor can cope with the newest and most insidious of its foes—complacency. The restlessness has gone out of the movement; it is facing dynamic new challenges with old leaders and old ideas.

But if too many leaders are smug about the state of the unions there are increasing signs that many workers are not. No tidal wave of rank-and-file rebellion is sweeping out labor's men of power; yet, for the first time, unrest is sufficiently widespread to make job security a worry for the union president in the same direct sense that it always has been for the dues-payers. The "no vacancy" sign is coming off the door of union executive suites, and officials who thought that only the undertaker could cancel their lease are moving into well-upholstered retirement.

David J. McDonald, who always seemed more at home at "21" than he did in a union hall, was voted out of the presidency of the million-member United Steelworkers of America last February after almost 35 years of sitting on or next to the throne. A similar fate—under even more galling circumstances—befell James B. Carey, whose palace retainers in the International Union of Electrical Workers tried unsuccessfuly to count him in for another term as president by stealing 25,000 of his opponent's votes. A third member of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. high command—O. A. Knight of the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union—decided he would not stand for re-election at its 1965 convention after preliminary soundings made it plain he had no chance to win.

In general, the upheavals that forced these changes were primarily a product of alliances among satraps to force out the emperor, a revolution of the professionals; but they owed much of their force to a latent discontent among the membership over the emptiness of most union programs for coping with the problems of automation and corporate gigantism. This discontent reflected itself even more explosively in other unions, in which no move was made—or seems anywhere in prospect—to dislodge the international leadership.

A notable example is Reuther's United Automobile Workers, a union that has worked harder than most at building rapport with its rank and file. Its serenity was rocked in 1961 by a runaway strike over local grievances that shut down General Motors after all details of a company-wide agreement had been worked out to the parent union's satisfaction. The same thing happened all over again last year, except that this time the union avoided discomfiture by meekly following in the train of the embattled locals. What was, in effect, a wildcat strike on a national basis kept the world's largest corporation shut for a month with full union sanction.

The most basic—and most sedulously disregarded—fact about these mass strikes over grass-roots issues at G.M., Ford and other mammoth corporations is that they reflect a back-to-the-womb phase in unionism. They stem from tens of thousands of unresolved day-to-day irritants at the plant level, and they cover the gamut from the right of workers to smoke in the toilets to why the blue-collar parking lot is unpaved when the white-collar parking lot is paved. These are all reflections of the workers' sense of being robbed of dignity by submersion in the mass mold of factory life; it was precisely this feeling that prompted millions of workers to pour into industrial unions in the early years of the New Deal.

IN THAT SENSE, UNIONISM has come full circle. Its members are better paid and better protected than any workers in history. A thick cushion of supplementary benefits surrounds their paychecks; an elaborate grievance machinery, with arbitration as its final step, puts a curb on industrial autocracy; the catalogue of what workers can do and what the boss can't do runs to hundreds of pages in every big company. Yet, the persistence of broad-scale insurgence within the framework of industry-wide bargaining provides notice that the man with a union button still feels himself the expendable element in a society of bigness. The strikes are an attempt to remind union leaders as well as company executives that the worker is a man, not an increasingly irrelevant appendage to an automated assembly line.

Equally arresting as a sign of the sterility of the current union approaches, even in a period when labor enjoys maximum political favor, is the standstill character of total union enrollment. Since V-J Day the number of people with nonfarm jobs has grown from 44 million to 66 million. But the labor movement has remained frozen at something under 17 million. That means a present ratio of three workers outside union ranks for every one inside.

Automation is drying up the historic sources of union strength. The roster of blue-collar workers in manufacturing, mining and transportation is shrinking and unions have found no persuasive appeal to the white-collar workers and technicians who are the wave of the future in all branches of industry. The one exception is in civil-service agencies, where labor has been able to capitalize on its increased political influence to win bargaining codes and pick up substantial numbers of new recruits. The total among teachers and other public employees remains small in relative terms, but the headway is important because nearly 10 million workers now have jobs in federal, state and municipal government.

Elsewhere new organizing campaigns have been sporadic and generally ineffective; the concentration is often on having the employer do the organizing through the automatic extension of union recognition in new plants and processes. A kind of pushbutton unionism has developed in many industries out of the union shop, employers' dues checkoffs and other devices for insulating unions against either competition or any necessity for direct contact with their members.

THE MERGER OF THE A.F.L. and C.I.O. ten years ago was itself in important measure an expression of tired blood, rather than of crusading determination to build a more vigorous labor movement. The talk at the merger convention was all of organizing the unorganized—some even dreamed of doubling total union membership by 1965—but a much more specific impetus to ending the twenty years of civil war was the desire of most union chiefs on both sides to be immune from raids by rival organizations in either camp.

The no-raiding pact that had previously been signed by many A.F.L. and C.I.O. unions was the foundation stone of the combined organization. Its constitution solemnly proclaimed that no union should have the right to take members away from any other, but even after the merger it took a long time to make the principle really work. In fact, until the constitution was revised at the end of 1961 to vest more authority in the central federation, the probability seemed strong that interunion piracy would wreck the marriage.

From the standpoint of stability in labor-management relations, the no-raiding principle is a highly salutary one. So is the idea that unions should not expend their energies on disorganizing the organized when they could be applying them much more usefully in the neglected task of organizing the unorganized. Unfortunately, however, the practical effect of the ban on interunion competition has been to accentuate the vested-interest concept that, once a group of workers is organized, they become the property of the union that has organized them. This concept hardly operates as a spur to union zeal or enterprise, or even to minimal concern with developing new avenues of service.

Few union leaders are reaching out for new worlds to conquer; they are content with the world they have and they rely on the no-raid pact, plus their very substantial accomplishments at the bargaining table, to keep that world secure. The difficulty is that automation is undermining their world in ways for which collective bargaining provides no adequate answers.

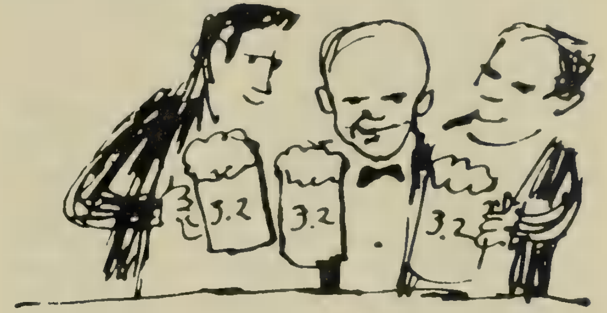
The most visible of these ways, of course, is the erosion of membership through the over-all decline of blue-collar forces and the increasing ascendancy of hard-to-organize clerical and professional groups. The potentialities of technology for erasing production jobs remain largely untapped. Within a generation robots almost certainly will have replaced three-quarters of the workers in what are now labor's strongholds, and even this may prove an underestimate.

ALONG WITH THIS decline goes an atrophy in labor's ability to paralyze the productive process or to hold large sections of the economy in thrall through strikes. Automation already has made several key industries invulnerable to strike stoppage, and the list will grow as manless processes become more universal. Twenty years ago the threat of a national telephone strike caused widespread apprehension. Even then dial service and automatic interconnections were sufficiently widespread to make the actuality of a strike only a minor inconvenience. Today nothing short of mass sabotage could make a phone strike effective in cutting off communications.

Electric utilities and oil refineries enjoy the same imperviousness to strike harassment. In other industries, where unions still have the capacity to halt operations, public policy has made the strike an all but unusable weapon. Thus, in the railroads, Congress passed a compulsory arbitration law rather than expose the country to the hardships of a national transportation tie-up. In the construction of missile sites and the operation of atomic-energy installations, the unions involved voluntarily accepted permanent no-strike plans out of recognition that Congress would pass a law outlawing walkouts if they did not agree, under intense government urging, not to have any.

Public policy also is putting a lid on the horizons of union expectation in collective bargaining. The leapfrogging of wages and prices in the immediate postwar period, with steel as the most persistent offender, brought what amounted to a national decision that the wage-price spiral had to end. This was articulated in the 1959 steel negotiations by that otherwise resolute practitioner of noninterventionism, President Eisenhower, and it represented almost his only contribution in eight years to national economic education.

He got his message across so well that Presidents Kennedy and Johnson institutionalized it, to the vast dismay of their partisans in organized labor. The Gospel According to St. Ike is that the total rise in labor costs each year should not exceed the long-term rise in industrial productivity of roughly 3.2 per cent. Thus far, the formula has not been applied with slide-rule precision, but it has driven bargaining into a more mechanistic mold. The end result will be an assumption on the part of most unionists that they are automatically entitled to 3.2 per cent more each year; the union leader will earn few kudos for bringing back the expected and none at all for bringing back less. "We could do just as well if we sent a computer to the negotiating table," is already the complaint in many unions.



That adds up to three strikes against the man running a union—a diminished membership potential; a diminished capacity to call effective strikes and a diminished prospect for bringing back big slabs of bacon to a rank and file schooled in the notion of "more" as a union's chief reason for being.

Critical as all these adverse factors may prove, they are less worrisome than one which union leaders are even more helpless to reverse through any channel of labor-management relations. This is the fact that the best answers unions can give to automation are those that have the unintended but nevertheless unavoidable effect of erecting walls of exclusion around the work place. In a period when youngsters are cascading into the job market in unprecedented numbers, the protective arrangements unions are making for their own members may become objects of hatred for those outside the job wall clamoring to get in.

The paradox for unions is that the more effectively they do the task they were set up to perform, the greater their danger of community alienation. The contracts that stem from automation provide a growing range of benefits for a shrinking number of workers; inevitably, as the jobs get more attractive, less onerous and fewer in number, the irritation of the have-nots increases. That is exactly what is happening under the most advanced and most universally applauded of the agreements, through which unions and employers have tried to adjust to the problems of changing technology.

The central element in all these pacts is the concept of attrition—no regular employee is to be jolted out of his job by a machine; he stays on the payroll until he retires, dies or quits of his own accord. Along with that guarantee of job security goes some attempt to give the worker a share of the tangible benefits automation brings.

At the big Kaiser Steel mill in Fontana, Calif., one-third of every dollar the company saves through increased efficiency goes into a fund to be divided among the workers every month. Longshoremen on both the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts have a guaranteed annual wage as part of their automation plan. On the railroads the attrition principle has been extended to rule out layoffs because of a slump in traffic as well as because of new equipment or operating techniques. In many other industries, joint labor-management committees are at work on a year-round basis to try to evolve programs for safeguarding jobs and giving workers a cash stake in scientific progress.

THE HEARTBREAK THAT ATTENDED the shakeout of manpower in coal is ample indication of the value of such endeavors in every field in which automation makes it possible to produce much more with many fewer workers. But attrition arrangements, consoling as they are for those already on the job, are no help at all to those looking for jobs. On the contrary, they mean that the man inside will move from one vacancy to another as the total number of jobs in the enterprise contracts. The youth without a job and the millions of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans and others who for a century have found the gates of opportunity padlocked against them discover that the "Keep Out" sign is just as firmly in place as ever.

The young are coming out of school to seek work at a rate that necessitates the creation of 1,350,000 new jobs every year for the next decade, without any allowance for the jobs being wiped out by automation or for those needed to sop up the nearly 4 million workers already idle. The newcomers have no memories of the Depression or the sit-down strikes; they take the standards unions have fought to build as matters of course, or worse, as the fruits of a narrow interest group preying on the total society. Their image of unions was formed largely by three years of televised testimony before the McClellan Committee on the seamy side of unionism. To this image is now being added a conviction that union seniority systems and attrition programs are conspiratorial devices foisted on industry by labor organizations, whose sole concern is to guard their own dwindling empires.

The civil-rights movement is now the repository of the enthusiasm many youthful idealists once invested in organized labor. And here again the prospect is for a widening breach, even though labor worked unremittingly for passage of a strong Civil Rights Act and insisted on broadening it, over President Kennedy's original objections, to include a comprehensive fair employment practices section.

ONCE AGAIN THE explanation for the prospect of trouble lies in the inadequacy of attrition as a social response to the challenges presented by the technological revolution, especially for the unskilled and under-educated.

The man most completely shut out will be the man who never could get in, the Negro. It will not be enough to tell him, in the traditionally lily-white building and printing trades, that he must take his place at the end of the line for admission to apprenticeship training. Or that there can be no new journeymen because there is not enough work for those already in the union. And, by the same token, it will not be adequate to say in a steel mill or machine shop that he must wait forever for a chance to get in because attrition gives priority to those who were there before him.

The solution does not lie in having the black worker get a job by ousting the white worker, or by the son pushing aside his father. It lies in a workable program for full employment, and that means a much more thoroughgoing involvement in politics than labor ever has had before. George Meany, the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., delights in proclaiming that the Federation is the spokesman for all the country's "little men and women." But, in truth, it is ill-equipped to be the voice of America's disinherited.

Its members and its officers have too substantial a stake to protect. They will not—and they cannot be expected to—move out of their own security to provide security for those who have none. They will adopt all the right resolutions about civil rights, abolishing poverty, protecting migratory farm workers and expanding public services. But they initiate almost nothing. Their political role consists of almost ritualistic support for Administration proposals in both foreign and domestic affairs.

But it will take much more than labor's brand of "me tooism" to translate into actuality the promise of full employment that has theoretically been a fundamental part of federal law and federal economic obligation since the passage of the Full Employment Act of 1946. It will entail a particularly difficult readjustment for a movement that has always prided itself on its abhorrence of ideology. Even in Great Britain, with the Labor party in power and a heritage of Socialist orientation in many unions, the shaping of policy is almost totally outside labor's hands.

For American unions the task is made more difficult still by the static leadership. Meany is himself past 70; the average age of the Federation's Executive Council is close to 65. And the new men coming to power are as pallid as those they are replacing. A college man is still under a handicap in rising to union eminence; the best training ground, in the estimation of labor's chieftains, remains the shop and the picket line. When Cornell University opened its School of Industrial and Labor Relations just after World War II, some of its conservative trustees objected on the ground that it would merely be a training institute for union agitators. They need not have worried. Unions have taken only 1.4 per cent of the graduates. Seventy per cent went into personnel and labor relations jobs in industry, and most of the rest into government.

There are still no counterparts in labor of the executive training programs, on which corporations spend many millions of dollars each year. The U.A.W. is almost alone in maintaining a school to provide refresher training for its organizers; most other unions are content with summer institutes or no training at all. The election campaign in steel focused largely on charges that McDonald had turned over too much authority to technicians—this in a union that must deal with multibillion-dollar corporations in a period when everything about the steelmaking process is as fluid as molten steel.

Labor has no more urgent assignment in the last third of this century than the focusing of its political energies on the realization of the limitless promise of this scientific Golden Age. Without a new consciousness of mission, it will drift into a steadily reducing role as either a ward of government or of industry, stripped of any real influence as a force for democratic vitality or economic balance. Thus far, it has only one answer for joblessness, a shorter work week—and this at a time when 30 million members are classed as living below minimum standards of decency, and want is epidemic in most parts of the world.

This is a policy of despair. Until we at least make a stab at abundance, we should not settle for a policy of sharing the misery. What is needed from labor is a degree of independent leadership that will give substance to the concept of direct political action for jobs and an expanding economy.

I hail and salute THE NATION on its one hundredth anniversary of life and labor in a world of challenge and change of the human condition. It has consistently borne aloft the torch of ever dangerous dissent and courageous criticism as a condition of a free, just and creative society.

Born during the rising and bitter winds of the Confederate Counter-revolution, THE NATION never faltered in its fight for the freedom of the freedmen.

Now THE NATION is in the midst of another revolution—the Human Rights Revolution of America, Africa and Asia—the most important event of the twentieth century.

Forward, with your glorious heritage! —A. Philip Randolph

WHAT'S LEFT OF THE LEFT?

HARVEY SWADOS

Mr. Swados' novels and short stories have won him many awards and fellowships. He has two books slated for publication this year: A Story for Teddy—and Others (short stories) and The American Writer and The Great Depression (an anthology). Mr. Swados teaches literature at Sarah Lawrence College.

IF YOU WANT TO LEARN about the Left in the United States today, you must climb stairways in old buildings—and talk to young people. To be sure, a number of men past forty still run the affairs of the "official" political organizations of one or another variety of Socialist persuasion, and some of them are accessible by elevator; but by and large, he who seeks out the official Trotskyists in their crumbling Greenwich Village quarters, the pro-Mao Harlem Defense Council upstairs in Harlem, the Wobbly "hiring hall" in a San Francisco alley loft, or the Free University (formerly Free Speech Movement) students in their Berkeley attic quarters, leaves behind the world of receptionists, switchboards, buzzers, and men worried about their waistlines.

Any assessment of the situation of socialism in the United States today must start from the simple fact that its record has been one of failure. The Weekly People, organ of the Socialist Labor Party (Organized 1890), is well into Volume LXXIV, with no indication that DeLeonism finds any more support among laboring people now than it did half a century ago. The same might be said of the Socialist Party; while the Communists—still relative newcomers after more than 40 years—can hardly have 10 per cent of the effective members and supporters that they did two decades ago, during the Soviet-American alliance. This is not the place to enter into a discussion of the reasons for Socialist failure in the world's most "successful" capitalist country, particularly since we are here concerned with an opposite phenomenon, the persistence of Socialist ideas and ideals among American youth. Suffice it to say that the Socialist Party never did recover from the shock of World War I and its consequent split, from the hysterical oppression visited upon it and the IWW, from the emergence of the Communist Party as a more militant alternative. Later, the Communist Party itself never did recover, not only from police penetration, but from the gradual realization on the part of its ranks that its leaders were a cynical and corrupted lot.

Nonetheless, there is today more excitement about socialism in this country than there has been for perhaps as long as thirty years. No one can estimate closely the numerical increase in committed Socialists of one kind or another; but it is perfectly obvious that those who consider themselves Socialists are not only out in the open, but aggressively confident in promoting their beliefs as they were not during the McCarthy era, the war, or even in the thirties. Socialists are active in the AFL-CIO and as consultants to the social welfare programs of the Johnson Administration; Communist "spokesmen" tour the campuses; Trotskyists defend their right to employment at public jobs. Particularly among young people, the fear of being labeled radical, leftist, or subversive seems to have all but disappeared.

If we say that the Communist Party remains, as it has been for many years, the largest political organization dedicated to socialism, it should not be deduced therefrom that leftism in the United States is moribund, or as meaningless as it was, say, in the fifties. The fact is that the radical ferment in this country is not contained by the existing leftist groupings (much to their discomfiture), but spills over into other circles—student organizations, ad hoc committees for or against this or that, unaffiliated but influential individuals, and non-party but left-oriented periodicals, a number of which sponsor forums, symposiums, and on occasion limited political actions. Still, it is only logical to begin with the parties themselves.

ONE BITTER COLD night last winter, I entered the Statler-Hilton to join the 80th Birthday Party for Alexander Trachtenberg, founder and retired head of International Publishers, which was also celebrating its 40th Anniversary. A wretched handful of freezing American Nationalists, outnumbered by the police, picketed at the corner of 34th Street and 7th Avenue. COMMUNISTS DINE WHILE OUR BOYS DIE, announced one of their signs somewhat inaccurately, since this was an after-dinner rally; but it was true that in the warm and comfortable twenty-eighth floor salon, the six or seven hundred Communists and friends of Alexander Trachtenberg and his publishing house looked better nourished than those picketing them.

During the reception I was introduced to the Communist brass, or at least to those of the older generation whose names I still recalled. When the formalities began, the audience, flattered by the presence of Socialist Norman Thomas, who had come to salute an old friend but not his politics, laughed dutifully, even at his barbed comments on the way The Worker had reported his addresses on previous occasions. "He's old and feeble," a matron behind me remarked to her companion, "but he talks with real power. A wonderful man." To which the other lady replied, "And we've got a wonderful attendance too. It's just too bad we don't draw a young crowd any more."

She had a point. The well-dressed, well-mannered men and women enthusiastically greeting Gus Hall as he strode to the podium and launched into his prepared address, were well into middle age. Hall paid tribute to the great octogenarians—linking Trachtenberg with Norman Thomas, Clarence Pickett, Roger Baldwin, and A. J. Muste—as well as to such recently deceased elder statesmen as William Z. Foster and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn. At which a man seated to my left muttered in a stage whisper, "Yeah, and J. V. Stalin."

The spokesman for the youth on the dais was not Paul Robeson, either, despite the fact that the singer, looking robust once again, was greeted with a standing ovation—to which he responded, à la Russe, by clapping back at his listeners. The new generation was represented by Jarvis Tyner, Eastern Regional Coordinator, no less, of the W. E. B. DuBois Clubs, a diffident and rather Ivy League young Negro roundly cheered by the handful of his coevals in the back of the house who were serving as ushers. As I tiptoed past them to the exit while Rev. William Howard Melish was exhorting the assemblage for contributions (the collection is a sacred rite at left-wing rallies just as it is in churches of a Sunday), it struck me that they were as innocently middle-class as their elders—whose children they may very well have been. I felt, as I left the Statler-Hilton, that I might have been departing from a rather tiresome Zionist conclave attended by comfortable greying folk more nostalgic than militant. ("Great Neck Communists," they were savagely characterized for me by a writer who had been very deep in the party for many years, leaving only after Budapest. These suburbanites, including the "Croton Communist" wing, are mainly business and professional men who still reach for their checkbooks, if not their picket signs, in order to prove that they have not betrayed the allegiances of their youth; indeed, many of them, according to my writer friend, had been urged to go into business or accountancy in the first instance by party officials who recognized that their capabilities for making money were greater than their potential as revolutionaries.)

SOME TIME LATER I had the opportunity to discuss these and other matters with such Communists as Dr. Herbert Aptheker, the historian and editor of the party's theoretical journal, Political Affairs, and Gus Hall. In the pleasant office where he functions as National Director of the American Institute for Marxist Studies (a newish scholarly body with oldish names, some "non-Marxist" but none of the DeLeonist, Trotskyist, or Maoist persuasions), Dr. Aptheker speaks in a voice free of cant phrases. He has obviously suffered deeply in the last few years—far more, one may be permitted to infer, from the corruption of his own comrades than from police harassment or political persecution.

Indeed, he was frank to admit that the Communist Party has been badly hurt among the youth of America "because it was compromised where it hurts most—ethically and morally." If a radical does not have this, he asked rhetorically, what does he have left? And if the party has gotten over it—to a degree—it has been only because "there are no alternatives."

Dr. Aptheker was speaking to me as the American Communist more in touch with young people than any other: he has been engaged in "serious conversations" with college students on about 60 campuses in the last two years alone, and he agrees that the activists have been shopping around among the Maoists, the Trotskyists, the Communists; what is more, he sees this competitive marketplace as all to the good. One of Aptheker's odder reasons for pride in the brand name of his particular product is an inversion of one of the charges commonly made against it—that in the last 40 years perhaps two million Americans have passed through the revolving doors of the C. P. "That's not bad," he remarks reflectively, "to have introduced Marxism-Leninism into the lives of that many people."

Between my discussions with Aptheker and with Gus Hall I read some of their literature and talked with young people here and there. It would seem that, contrary to the impression I gained at the birthday party, the Communists are beginning once again to make some small headway among college students, for the first time in many years; at least, the DuBois Clubs seem firmly established on a number of campuses. The reasons for this development are interesting. First is the easier rein held on the youth by their Marxist elders. It seems commonly agreed that discipline is loose, with considerable deviation not merely allowed, but necessary if the clubs are to continue to function and grow. Second, the ethical collapse of American communism is all but a dead issue to young people today, as dead an issue as the crimes of Joseph Stalin and his kept men. (Indeed, it is precisely this debonair indifference to recent history which frustrates and infuriates anti-totalitarian Socialists—and which can be regarded as perhaps giving the Communists yet another chance.)

GUS HALL, too, is pleased with his reception among young people. This bulky, affable Minnesota Finn, whom I found at ease in his open plaid shirt, seated at the head of the conference room table on the top floor of the Communist Party's national offices (the building is one of their older parcels of real estate and was formerly used for other purposes), claims that about 85 per cent of his party's recent growth—whatever that may be—has been among young people. They are more interested in his notions of how socialism would work here, he says, than they are in what has been going on in the Soviet Union—about which, he agrees, they couldn't care less. If he is not grateful for this, he might well be, although Mr. Hall is one of those who has found it relatively easy to adjust to changes in the line. "When I got out of Leavenworth Penitentiary after the 'Stalin revelation,' " he said to me, "and people asked me, 'What next?' I said, 'Stalin didn't recruit me. I joined because of my convictions about socialism.' "

Those convictions aside, Gus Hall is in most ways a very average American, and he prefers talking with average American students to arguing Russia or Marxism with the avant-garde among them. "I'd rather start two or three hundred kids thinking in the right direction than influence a handful of radicals. In a crowd, invariably a student will complain that I wasn't radical enough or specific enough, but I wouldn't say that such a kid was typical."

When Hall, in response to my question as to whether he still subscribed to such Leninist concepts as the vanguard party or democratic centralism, said yes, but went on to speak of a "greater latitude of experimentation with practical problems," I was reminded of a comment made recently in another context by J. W. Fulbright. "Men do not repudiate the doctrines and dogmas to which they have sworn their loyalty," observed the Senator, but they do "rationalize, revise and reinterpret them to meet new needs and new circumstances, all the while protesting that their heresy is purest orthodoxy."

IN THE COURSE of a long chat with Farrell Dobbs, Presidential candidate of the Socialist Workers' Party (Trotskyists) in the 1948, 1952, 1956 and 1960 campaigns, I had the almost uncanny feeling that I was listening to someone very like his political enemy, Gus Hall. Both are middle-aged middle-westerners, genial by disposition, and given to slipping comfortably into the well-worn Leninist ruts of "tactics flowing into struggles," and convinced—each in his musty, seedy office—of the other's corruption and sectarianism and of his own organization's attractiveness to American youth as the vanguard party of revolutionary socialism.

The Trotskyists, claiming a readership for their press in the neighborhood of 10,000, are encouraged by what Dobbs calls the biggest and best response ever to their 1964 Presidential campaign—mass meetings on more campuses than ever before, larger meetings, deeper discussions, and more direct inquiries from students across the country than ever before. Those who do not belong, however, including those who have dropped out or been expelled (the Trotskyists are continually plagued by the proliferation of splinter groups, such as those with a different position on Castro—some of the Cuban Trotskyists are now political prisoners, and are not supported by the SWP), have no such sanguine vision, and on balance incline to view the party as stagnant, faction-ridden, and intellectually mediocre. In an effort to break out of its isolation, the SWP had devoted considerable effort to effecting a rapprochement with the late Malcolm X, whom Dobbs characterized for me as "one of those in the vanguard of the Negro struggle in this country against colonial movements throughout the world." Be that as it may, I am convinced, although my personal contact with him had been limited to a telephone conversation, that Malcolm did have a remarkable capacity for political growth (which many white liberals refused to recognize, perhaps because it is a capacity that is foreign to them); and it is fruitless to speculate, now that he has been struck down, what the impact of association with the Trotskyists might have done for that courageous and charismatic man or for his followers.

Nevertheless, there are indications that, as with the DuBois Clubs, Trotskyist Young Socialist Alliance chapters are growing on the college campuses (even though a soapbox meeting of the Columbia University chapter that I dropped in on attracted only a handful of passersby). It seems doubtful, however, that this growth can be attributed so much to the "correctness" of their line—a combination of traditional Trotskyism, Fidelismo, and an effort to latch on to the civil rights issue—as to the increasing receptivity of college students to radical groups with an activist rather than a theoretical orientation.

THE COMMUNISTS' rivals on the Left to whom Gus Hall had returned more than once (almost compulsively, it seemed to me), were not so much the Trotskyists as those Communists cast out or who voluntarily departed as pro-Chinese some four years ago. These sectarians, he had insisted, attract the irresponsible, fly-by-night rebels, and the youth among them are, he hinted, a shiftless and immoral lot. The ones with whom I spoke, in their Harlem office and downtown at their national headquarters, did not impress me exactly that way.

The average age of the members of the Progressive Labor Movement, as the pro-Peking Communists have been calling themselves, is in the twenties, in New York City as low as 25, and hardly any of them are over 40. So I was informed by Fred Jerome (son of V. J. Jerome, for many years cultural commissar of the Communist Party), editor of their weekly paper, and a very likeable young man, who indicated that his group of some hundreds—this year organizing itself into a political party—is growing because it is out propagandizing among previously non-political Americans instead of concentrating on the recruitment of disillusioned Communists.

Jerome hooted at Gus Hall's willingness to have me accept the FBI estimate of CP membership as somewhere around 10,000—a figure which the PLM as well as other ex-Communists with whom I spoke regarded as preposterously inflated by both the FBI and the CP. And PLM has devoted lengthy articles, not in the bilingual weekly Challenge-Desafio, but in its monthly magazine, Progressive Labor, and its MLQ (Marxist Leninist Quarterly), to attacking Moscow (for revisionism) and the American CP (for being a do-nothing adjunct to the Democratic Party). The free and easy atmosphere around the PL downtown offices contrasts strikingly with the beleaguered quality of CP headquarters, where switchboard ladies will press buzzers to open doors only after you have been identified. But it must be remembered that, if some Maoists have been indicted for criminal anarchy and some Trotskyist youth for "advocating force and violence," the Communists have borne the brunt of police harassment. Gus Hall, followed wherever he goes by a covey of FBI agents, vowed to me that if the restrictions of the McCarran Act were lifted, "I could go to Minnesota and recruit a thousand people into the Communist Party in two weeks."

Others have already pointed out, however, that throughout the entire McCarthy era a grand total of less than 300 Americans actually went to prison for political reasons. There seems little question but that the waiting thousands, if they are such, in Hall's native Minnesota, are most likely old Communists who would like to renew their associations if it could be done without legal risk—just as it seems obvious that the new recruits to Progressive Labor are young people (many of them Negro) who have never before been involved with the Left. The reasons for this have to do, it seems to me, with the qualities that we customarily attribute to youth—impetuousness, fearlessness, willingness to enter previously uncharted areas.

"The CP and the Trotskyists could be doing what we're trying to do, organize in the neighborhoods and among the Negroes," says Jerome, "but they're just not there—the only place we bump into them is on the campuses."

NOT ONLY are the PL people out talking socialism—and ultimate revolution—to Puerto Rican housewives, Negro dockworkers, unemployed coal miners, and declassed youths on the bum, but they are reaching the farther-out elements of the college crowd and the post-college Villagers in Manhattan. They are aided by: money from wealthy young angels for regular publications; an absence of left-wing stuffiness (Progressive Labor is, in layout and art work, the first funny radical periodical since the Masses); and an eagerness for high visibility—"Yes of course we are Communists, yes of course we are revolutionists"—that is foreign to the traditions of Stalinists and Trotskyists alike, and is no doubt confusing to police infiltrators on the prowl for undercover names and secret meetings where none exist. And instead of wailing about the State Department's ban on American travel to Cuba, they simply pack up and go there anyway, openly, defiantly, and in high spirits.

Something similar can be said of the uptown branch of PL, described by its leader, Bill Epton, as "the only functioning organization of the Left in Harlem." My first date with Epton, a poised, handsome, and articulate Negro in his thirties who came up through the Labor Youth League and the Communist Party, was postponed because of a tragic occurrence: A depressed young man, a drifter off Lenox Avenue, and an occasional visitor to PL meetings, had suddenly whipped out a knife for no reason and stabbed to death a young white member of the organization who, with his bride of a few months, was running off a leaflet aimed at arousing black militancy. The hall of the Harlem Defense Council (next door to Sister Conchita, Reader & Adviser) was turned into a bloody shambles. Epton, who had been home at the time, was questioned all night by the police, and I arrived, unaware, shortly after the blood had been mopped up, but before the story had broken in the papers. When I remarked, after being told the reason for Epton's absence, that the mentally disturbed killer (who was then being sought, but was later taken into custody) sounded oddly like Lee Harvey Oswald, the young man who was holding down the fort replied solemnly that for those who were socially aware, there were explanations other than the official ones for both seemingly unmotivated crimes.

BUT WHEN I DID get together with Epton, I found him not at all ponderous, quite unruffled, and as relaxed with me as his comrades had been downtown. Epton regards his native Harlem as an all-but-autonomous community, almost separated from New York and the rest of the country, but well placed to digest information not only from Negro America, but from the United Nations as well. The mood of its people is militant, anti-imperialist, and nationalistic, and partly in consequence it is a leader in political thought: "The Harlem uprising gave the green light to other ghettoes across the country." It was at the tail end of that uprising that Epton defied a police ban as well as the pleas of other Negro leaders, and attempted to organize a march through Harlem, which had no sooner gotten started than he and his attorney, Conrad Lynn, were picked up by the police and separated from his handful of followers.

It is not only Lynn—whose testimony might be regarded as suspect since he is not only an old-time revolutionist himself, but something of a sympathizer with black nationalism—but such Negro leaders of opposing philosophies as the pacifist Bayard Rustin, who express an unstinted respect for Epton's personal courage and his burning desire to improve the lot of his people through political organization.

What is peculiar about Epton and his Maoist comrades—and the same might be said of other Socialists whom we shall consider in a moment—is not how they feel, but how they think. And for this I suspect that the Communist movement, which systematically miseducated them and their parents, must take a heavy share of the responsibility. Thus, Epton believes that there is today no possibility of an alliance between American Negroes and the liberal-labor movement, primarily because of the "fantastic" mistrust of blacks for whites. What he does foresee is a coast-to-coast black revolutionary front that will put forth class as well as nationalist demands and that will then be able to negotiate on a basis of equality for an alliance with liberal and labor white America. Why at that point blacks should stop mistrusting whites, or why at that point the 90 per cent majority of white America should be willing for the first time to negotiate on the basis of "equality" with a 10 per cent minority black revolutionary front, even if it should come miraculously to speak for all twenty million American blacks—these are questions that Epton does not seem to have confronted.

The full flavor of this kind of thinking can best be experienced in the Discussion Bulletins of the PLM, taken from tapes. Those of an older generation may remember the hideously wearisome and seemingly endless theses, counter-theses, polemics and counter-polemics that used to (and apparently still do) characterize the internal bulletins and so enrich the leisure hours of Stalinists, Trotskyists, and their respective splinters. Only thanks to the tape recorder, however, can we appreciate in all of its murky splendor, unadulterated by reflection or editing, the word-for-word intellectual confusion of these engagingly modest but nonetheless appallingly ignorant young men who garble the little they have read and reveal the lot that they have not.

It is difficult to comment seriously on these discussions, which border, when they do not actually trespass, on the ridiculous. More important, however, is how intellectual inadequacy can lead to ethical chaos and worse: These young men, whose knowledge of the Russian Revolution, for example, is obviously limited to what they learned in the Communist Party, are capable of quoting with all solemnity, in support of their present positions, the so-called Marxist utterances of Joseph Stalin composed during the late dictator's final years of senile dementia; small wonder that they can characterize as "errors," no more, the savage anti-Semitism, the turning over to the Gestapo of anti-Nazi refugees, the butchery of entire populations, the starvation of the peasantry and exploitation of the proletariat, the terrorizing of the intelligentsia and the exile to slave camps of uncounted millions.

SMALL WONDER, too, that they can make common cause—in their press and in such one-purpose outfits as the student anti-war "May 2nd Movement"—with Jews turned Moslem to repudiate their parents and anti-Semitic to repudiate themselves, with Negroes turned racist to outflank James Baldwin and also to evade the responsibility for hard and frustrating day-to-day work in the Negro revolution, with Americans turned professionally anti-American and irrationally pro-Nkrumah, -Nasser, or -Babu because they really do not believe (despite their protestations) in the possibility of progresss toward socialism in America. (LeRoi Jones, uncontradicted in Progressive Labor, Nov.-Dec. 1964: "If America is not stopped in its tracks it will destroy the world . . . The majority of American white men are evil . . . there is no sense in your pleading with American society. There is no sense in your praying-in, or laying-in or standing-in or sitting-in . . . America has to be stopped I mean stopped now like a big machine . . .")

One example of the rich, succulent, Socialist prose devoted to the hero-worshipping of anti-colonialist leaders should suffice. The following tone poem on Major Ernesto Che Guevara appeared on the front page of The Worker on December 20, 1964 in the guise of an interview:

> Guevara is of the proportion of a football quarterback: under six feet and less than 200 pounds. His bearing is athletically erect but lithe and relaxed. He has a handsome face with each of its parts well defined and classically proportioned.
>
> At rest, his brown eyes are set in wide open lids shaded by heavy lashes, but when his features shift in a shy smile—which is often, in conversation—they become narrow slits, each one holding a tiny sparkling diamond of light.
>
> His speech is full-throated but gently-modulated as the soft musical sounds of the Spanish tongue slightly glide up and down on the crest of the emotional variables in his speech.
>
> When concentrating upon a point his brows become corrugated with ranks of gentle furrows. At a moment of angry emphasis one could see the glow of pink flushing and darkening the skin of his cheeks beneath the thinly distributed growth of sideburns and chin whiskers. . . .

That passage, which reads like nothing so much as a portrait of one of the studs in Fanny Hill, really should be interpreted for us by its subject, for Dr. Guevara was trained in psychoanalysis before he turned to politics. But while we await such a happy day, we had better turn to a brief consideration of the democratic Socialists as distinguished from those Communists of one variety or another about whom we have been speaking.

The Socialist Party itself is in its usual state of decrepitude, and its Young Peoples Socialist League dissolved not long ago, the members turning to one variety or another of the campus groups already mentioned above. What makes it more worthy of discussion than, say, the SLP is the genuine intellectual and moral distinction, and the social importance, of the men who have chosen to affiliate themselves with it, men in their seventies and eighties (Norman Thomas and A. Philip Randolph), in their forties and fifties (Bayard Rustin and Erich Fromm), in their thirties (Michael Harrington), and their twenties (Tom Kahn). The line separating these Socialists from those discussed earlier is no longer simply programmatic: it is in fact difficult to detect major political differences between the CP's Worker and the SP's New America. Nor could it be said simply that these are "reformist" as opposed to "revolutionary" Socialists—many of them are far more radical in approach and activity than the Marxist-Leninists of one kind or another. The basic distinction seems rather to stem from their rejection not only of the Leninist concept of the vanguard party (for even some Communists are edging away from this), but also of the Marxist concept of the increasing immiseration of a growing working class; they see the American future rather as one marked by political multiplicity, and by automation, rationalization, and a shrinking working class.

PARTLY AS A consequence of their genuine radicalism, however, and partly because young Americans today, while increasingly radical and political, are wary of the old parties, the fastest-growing left-oriented youth organization in the country, with over 40 groups in some 30 states, is Students for a Democratic Society. SDS, junior offshoot of the elderly Fabian Socialist League for Industrial Democracy, is somewhat influenced by Socialist intellectuals like Harrington and Kahn of LID; but as an activist and anti-ideological organization, it also serves as a kind of umbrella for impatient young people eager for involvement in SDS slum neighborhood projects and at the same time attracted to the more far-out enthusiasms of one or another of the Marxist groups.

What one detects in conversation with people like Rustin, Harrington, and Kahn, is a kind of ruefulness. Their very success in arousing various publics, and thereby gaining the attention of the powerful, has been rendering them suspect even in their own ranks to those more anxious for activity than analysis, and vulnerable to those apocalyptic agitators who cry up extreme nationalism and decry the Socialist commitment to the building of an alliance among Negroes, liberals, and a resurgent trade union movement. What is more, they are under attack from a Left section of their own Socialist movement for not repudiating Johnson, Reuther, Wilkins, and such, and for allowing themselves as a result to be outflanked by the nationalists and the totalitarian radicals. Such seems to be the thrust not only of the attack on Rustin in New Politics (a Socialist quarterly of which Rustin used to be a contributing editor), but also of the American Socialist Organizing Committee in Chicago, and the Independent Socialist Club at Berkeley, dominated by Hal Draper (who played a leading advisory role in the Berkeley student revolt late in 1964): these people would seem to be the core of those "Third Camp" Socialists who are "opposed to both of the reactionary systems of exploitation of man by man which now divide the world: capitalism and communism," and would, we may assume, solidarize with, for example, the Vietnamese Buddhists, whose manifesto of March, 1965, stated: "The Vietnamese people do not wish their nation to become one of the Sino-Russian satellites or a colony of the Western imperialists."

The new ferment cannot be contained, as I have indicated, within the old leftist parties or circumscribed within traditional orbits of leftist thought. Much of what Bayard Rustin has called "The Spontaneous Left" tends to identify not with an organization but with a publication or an individual: M. S. Arnoni and his Minority of One, Irving Howe and his Dissent, Julius Jacobson and his New Politics, James Aronson and his National Guardian, I. F. Stone and his I. F. Stone's Weekly, Paul Sweezy and Leo Huberman and their Monthly Review, or even with the Village Voice or The Realist. For this reason as well as others (the resistance of young radicals to serious reading or sustained thought, the pique of their elders at not being listened to, and their suspicion of the blind activism of the young), the rebirth of leftism, particularly among college students, has been described by Professor Lewis Feuer, himself a former Marxist, as "prolonged adolescence and repetitive re-enactment from year to year of a rebellion against their father." In an analysis of the Berkeley student revolt for the New Leader of December 21, 1964, he speaks of "generational animus," "generational revolt," "generational solidarity" (twice) and "generational uprising" (three times).

THERE MAY very well be an element of truth in this, but it must also be borne in mind that the Berkeley collegians were not in revolt against such of their elders as Hal Draper, Paul Goodman, or Paul Jacobs—none of whom will ever see forty-five again. It seems to me that it would be equally useful—and equally limiting—to think of the new leftism as a conflict not between old and young but between urban and suburban. If it is conceivable that suburban young people would dig the incantation, BIRD LIVES! chalked on a Manhattan billboard, and even that they might inscribe such a statement of faith on their high school walls, it is much less likely that they would scratch on the sides of their public telephones what the New Yorker etches on his : KILL COPS!

But this, while it does imply something about the conversion of our cities into smoldering jungles of laborers, servants, and lumpen surrounding the policed compounds of their leisured oppressors, and the conversion of much of our countryside into WASPs' nests, is also inadequate in that it does not account, for example, for the immersion of thousands of young white suburbanites in the civil rights movement and the peace protests: in short, in the new radicalism.

What has happened in the sixties is that a door has opened. What lies beyond that door will be profoundly affected by what goes on in Africa and Asia, to be sure; but we can hope that it will also be affected by what we have learned and absorbed here at home of our native traditions of skepticism, rebelliousness, and affirmation.

THE NATION has consistently followed the most relevant method for preserving freedom of speech; it has spoken freely, reasonably, and courageously about matters pertaining to justice and the common good. —Stringfellow Barr

DEVIANCE AND DEVIATES

HOWARD S. BECKER

Widely known for his research on deviants, the author is Professor of Sociology at Northwestern University and President of the Society for the Study of Social Problems. He is the author of Outsiders: Studies in the Sociology of Deviance.

WHAT IS INTERESTING about deviance is not what it is, but what people think it is. To be sure, there are such things as drug addiction and homosexuality, and they pose interesting problems for the physiologist, the biochemist and the psychologist. But interesting scientific problems do not create public concern. The still unexplained physiological mechanisms that produce heroin addiction do not generate newspaper headlines. What arouses the government, the press and the public is the crime attributed to addicts, the fear of attack by a drug-crazed kid on a lonely street, even though addicts engage mainly in shoplifting and other kinds of petty theft; the stories of high school students using marijuana, though there is no evidence that marijuana will harm them as much as the alcohol their parents allow them to drink; the fear even, for some, that the Chinese Communists are using narcotics to weaken the will of the American people.

Deviance, in general, as opposed to concrete forms of behavior like drug use or homosexuality, is a creation of the public imagination. The act of injecting heroin into a vein is not inherently deviant. If a nurse gives a patient drugs under a doctor's orders, it is perfectly proper. It is when it is done in a way that is not publicly defined as proper that it becomes deviant. The act's deviant character lies in the way it is defined in the public mind.

The public definition of an act as deviant has, of course, drastic consequences for the person who commits it. Under one definition, he may continue to live as an ordinary citizen. Under another definition, he may become a hounded criminal. A consideration of deviance in America over the last one hundred years must inevitably focus on what people have thought of deviance and how public thinking about it has changed, and must interpret what deviants do as a reaction to the way society reacts to them.

We have had drug addicts for a long time. Before the turn of the century, as a number of early studies show, many older people were addicted to patent medicines that were liberally laced with opium. Women helped themselves through menopause with the aid of opiates, and men and women alike alleviated their minor ills with such remedies. They came to depend on their "medicine" and were addicts without knowing it. We also had more self-conscious addicts: jockeys, gamblers, pimps, whores and others in the "sporting life," who smoked opium and became addicted.

Prostitution is, of course, the oldest profession. But prostitutes in earlier times were fallen women, fenced off (in red-light districts) from more respectable people.

Homosexuality is one of the oldest vices. Homosexual literature delights in naming the famous homosexuals of early times, from Nero to the present. But it seems likely that homosexual activity in an earlier day was usually practiced as a secret vice by those who lived in the conventional world.

The examples indicate the range of possibilities, in an earlier period, in the relations between respectable people and those they considered deviant. People who engaged in practices thought to be morally repellent either did not know that they were "doing wrong," like the patent medicine addicts; knew what they were doing, but did it secretly and despised themselves for it, as they would have been despised by others if their sin were known; or lived in a separate part of society, like the sporting world, segregated and isolated from the conventional society.

Have things changed? Yes and no. The same relationships can be observed today between some kinds of deviants and the rest of society. Large numbers of people are addicted to sleeping pills and tranquilizers; since the public has not yet been persuaded that these are dangerous drugs, they do not think of themselves, and are not thought of, as deviant. Yet the observation I heard attributed to a Kansas City tavern owner—"Everybody who doesn't drink takes pills"—becomes more true every day.

The practitioners of secret vices are still around, though the catalogue of vices involved has been enlarged. There are still secret addicts and "closet queens" who hide their homosexuality. There are, in addition, secret transvestites, secret devotees of sadomasochistic thrills, secret fetishists, and others whose kicks are mailed to them in plain brown envelopes with no return address.

But the analogue of the old red-light district, in which the deviant lived walled off from a society that might otherwise be contaminated by contact with him, is harder to find. Prostitutes inhabit most of the public places people go to for entertainment—bars, night clubs and hotels—at every level of society. Their way of life is not so different from that of other people as to mark them off as a special breed. It is difficult to think of any class of deviants so segregated and marked today.

THOUGH SOME of the relations between deviants and respectable society characteristic of an earlier era can still be found, much has changed. Not only are deviants less segregated, but they have come, in increasing measure, to take a different view of themselves and of how they ought to be treated by others.

One component of the change is an increasing tolerance of deviance by respectable society. The deviant is no longer branded as a sinner whose consignment to hell is a foregone conclusion. Instead, ordinary people are willing to see extenuating circumstances that might account for the deviance, are willing to believe that deviants can be reformed, and are increasingly unwilling to take harsh punitive action toward deviants. Public beliefs have changed in this way, in part, because high court decisions have made it more difficult for the police to "roust" deviants in what used to be their customary fashion. Police habitually control deviance not by actually convicting people of crimes on the basis of evidence, but rather by harassing them with illegal and quasi-legal arrests that deviants are not disposed to fight because they cannot come into court with clean hands. But increasingly strict judicial interpretations of the search and seizure rule, and other decisions affecting civil rights in the area of vice and obscenity, have handcuffed the police so that these means are less available to them. (They have not, of course, given up completely; the nationwide harassment of Lenny Bruce, in clear contravention of Supreme Court decisions on obscenity, is a case in point.)

With the gradual lessening of police harassment, other influences have been at work. The rise of dime-store psychoanalysis—the easy explanation of deviant or odd behavior as the product of childhood traumas that might have happened to anyone—has helped the public to absolve deviants of responsibility for what they do. And, perhaps more important, it has helped deviants themselves to decide that what they do, right or wrong, is not their fault and, indeed, that it might not even be wrong. It is unlikely that any deviant believes this so completely that he never has a qualm about his deviant acts, but it provides the moral basis on which he can demand to be let alone.

Finally, various kinds of popular philosophical positions—the Eastern philosophies, psychological doctrines of self-development, and so on—have brought some people to see the means of salvation in what were formerly thought to be deviant practices. In particular, the use of drugs—both old-fashioned marijuana and heroin and such newer discoveries as peyote and LSD—has been seen as a way of expanding the consciousness and achieving higher levels of human experience. From this point of view, what ordinary people think deviant is not deviant at all; it is all a mistake and they need to be enlightened if they are capable of it and fought against if they attempt to interfere with one's own enlightenment.

In any case, for any or all of these reasons, deviants have become more self-conscious, more organized, more willing to fight with conventional society than ever before. They are more open in their deviance, prouder of what they are and less willing to be treated as others want to treat them without having some voice in the matter.

HOMOSEXUALS have organized what can only be called "defense groups," very much on the model of such ethnic defense organizations as the Anti-Defamation League or the NAACP. The Mattachine Society (for male homosexuals) and the Daughters of Bilitis (for Lesbians) have branches in several large cities and publish magazines (The Mattachine Review and The Ladder); they hold annual conventions at which panels of experts and members discuss the biological, psychological, sociological and legal problems of homosexuality. Their magazines are filled with discussions of famous homosexuals in history, of civil rights cases and decisions involving them or applicable to their problem, and other matters justifying their right to be homosexual.

When I addressed a Lesbian group not long ago, I was surprised (a sign of how much I accepted conventional stereotypes) at how much the group looked like a middle-class women's club having a meeting to decide how to run the next charity bazaar. Since they were conventionally dressed, not in the least "butchy," I found myself amused by the disparity between my conception of them and the reality. But I stopped smiling when I realized the aggressiveness and courage it took to identify oneself publicly as the officer of a Lesbian organization and the risk these women were taking in doing so.

Homosexual organizations have won support from "straight" scientists, psychologists, lawyers and, most recently, the clergy. A group of San Francisco clergymen sponsored a homosexual New Year's Eve dance, a gesture deliberately designed to make the affair publicly respectable. Though the police had not bothered a Halloween dance at the Hilton (to which the guests came "in drag," to the great delight of news photographers), they saw a threat in this legitimately sponsored affair and moved in, taking pictures of everyone there. Lawyers, on hand to protest such maneuvers, were the only ones arrested. But the police, undoubtedly motivated by a wish to "keep them in their place," will not prevent homosexual defense groups from winning further allies in the respectable world and pressing their fight for equal rights. The militancy of the homosexual organizations has provoked a frightened warning from a committee of the New York Academy of Medicine.

ANOTHER VERSION of the new self-conscious deviant organization is found in Synanon, a self-help organization of heroin addicts now more or less permanently settled in several places around the country, from Santa Monica and Marin County in the West to Westport in the East. The characteristic feature of Synanon is not that it thinks addicts ought to be allowed to take drugs in peace, even though many experts feel this is the most efficient and humane solution to the drug problem, but that it thinks addicts ought to break the habit with the help of ex-addicts rather than being cured forcibly by police or psychiatrists. With merciless discipline, Synanon forces the addicts who join to toe the line or get out. Since no professional group has very much success curing addicts, Synanon (whose successes are not yet reliably measured, if indeed there is any reliable measure) stands on solid ground when it demands that its members be given the right to help themselves. It has, of course, provoked strong reactions from many professionals in the drug-cure field, who cannot believe that any good can come of ex-addicts associating with one another. On the other hand, it has won strong support from many legislators and a few of the professionals who have had an opportunity to inspect its establishments.

LSD ALL THE WAY

SYNANON IS A GRIM operation. Not so the short-lived International Foundation for Internal Freedom (IFIF), headed by Timothy Leary and Richard Alpert, the psychologists who left Harvard after an extended battle over whether their experimental use of LSD and other psychedelic (mind-expanding) drugs with students was a proper professional activity. IFIF, in contrast to Synanon and the homosexual groups, is a frankly utopian organization. It looks forward to a radically changed society, in which people will see through the games of life they now play in deadly earnest—the family game, the work game, etc.—and, freed by the use of LSD, live in happier forms of human association, realizing at last the as yet untapped resources of the human mind and spirit.

Leary and Alpert attempted to found a colony embodying these ideas in Zihuatanejo, but the Mexican government drove them out. They are now giving seminars and lectures designed to let others in on the good news, and Leary has just published a book, based on the Tibetan Book of the Dead, of ritual and instruction to be used to enhance the LSD experience. They have had a fair amount of success, most of it with well-educated people, including many engineers and "hard" scientists, who seem especially drawn by the appeal of new kinds of mystical experience. Their success has been clouded, however, by the hostility with which officialdom greets them everywhere from Massachusetts to Mexico.

The LSD movement (if it is really big enough to merit being called a movement) differs from the organizations of drug addicts and homosexuals in being composed of people who were not, prior to their involvement with LSD, deviant in any sense. But all three groups exemplify the increasing militancy, organization and self-consciousness of deviant worlds and their growing unwillingness to let respectable society have its own way with them unchallenged.

A sense of what this might lead to (if every group engaged in deviant practices became self-consciously aggressive) comes from the recent lighthearted attempt in San Francisco to have marijuana legalized. One man staged a "puff-in" at the Hall of Justice, lighting up a marijuana cigarette in front of police officers so that he could become a test case. A local attorney has become interested in testing the legality of the law. A group of forty or fifty paraded around Union Square every Sunday for a month (some of the paraders were mothers pushing baby carriages) carrying signs advocating legalization. And when President Johnson spoke, during the campaign, in front of St. Peter and Paul's Church in North Beach, scattered among the "LBJ All the Way" signs that greeted him were a few that said, "Make Marijuana Legal."

Perhaps more interesting than the organization of deviant groups, though much harder to document, is the possibility that practices and beliefs formerly labeled deviant have spread to broad segments of the "normal" population. This possibility first became known to the public, I think, with the publication of the Kinsey Report, which reported surprisingly high percentages of men who had engaged in various abnormal forms of sex behavior. Although substantial questions have been raised about Kinsey's sampling and techniques, the figures were so much higher than anyone had suspected that it is a worthwhile hypothesis that there is a lot more deviance around than meets the eye and that Americans, while not advertising the fact, are by no means as straitlaced as we had thought.

WITH THE Kinsey findings to point the way, a good deal more evidence, most of it quite impressionistic, can be cited in favor of such conclusions. As a simple example, note the mammoth sales of works like Candy, Fanny Hill and the Tropics, which had been smuggled in from France as pornography only a few years ago. Once the legal restraints were removed, there turned out to be a good many pornography fans around.

Other evidence is not hard to come by. Not long ago, police discovered that some sixty high school students in Woodside, an affluent suburb of San Francisco, were smoking marijuana supplied by a recent graduate. Similar stories could no doubt be told about hundreds of other communities. Marijuana use is not confined to Negroes, Puerto Ricans, musicians and show people. I know of no profession which does not have at least a few members who are at least occasional marijuana users. As an example, far out enough to make the point, one user I know was first offered marijuana by a clergyman, who himself saw nothing wrong with it, though he made sure that his congregation did not find out his views. (Perhaps because I have studied marijuana use and published on the subject, similar cases are constantly brought to my attention.)

Somewhat less direct evidence comes from a survey recently conducted by Paul Verden and Harold Hodges in Santa Clara County. They asked people a number of questions designed to measure "cultural orthodoxy," the tendency to be conservative in areas ranging from political and economic attitudes to attitudes toward sex. The results are somewhat surprising. There are a great many more people who are culturally unorthodox than one might have expected. In addition, the unorthodox are scattered uniformly through all the social classes of the community. In other words, this kind of deviance—and let us grant that asking people whether or not they agree with a number of unorthodox statements is at best a weak measure of actual deviant practice—is not the monopoly of any group in the community. People of all kinds, rich and poor, feel restive under the constraints of our Victorian public morality.

GIVEN THE growing underground of practicing deviants and adherents to the culturally unorthodox, what can we make of our official morality? Why does it receive overwhelming public support, even though many, probably a growing number, no longer believe in it or allow it to restrain their activity? The most likely answer is, of course, that official morality—preached by leading public figures, embodied in laws and enforced sporadically by police—is a political product. Politicians make laws embodying its precepts, or refuse to repeal laws which embody them, because organized pressure groups make that a wise course. Those in favor of a more relaxed official morality seldom organize in a way that makes them politically effective, although ministers, physicians or lawyers may occasionally act on their behalf, as when a New York county medical society issued a report advocating less punitive narcotics laws.

Public morality must, of course, keep itself in some sort of relation to "the times," to the slow drift of opinion and practice in the country. If it gets too far out of step, it creates the kind of situation we had during Prohibition; and public leaders do not care for the widespread disrespect for law such a situation engenders and soon put an end to it. But as long as some sizable and politically influential group demands a particular official morality, state legislatures and others are likely to bow to the demand, even if the consequence is simply a public affirmation of a way of life many no longer follow. If the laws embodying the morality are not enforced too strictly and if deviants do not mind being somewhat secretive in their activities, an accommodation can be worked out more or less to everyone's satisfaction.

But our public morality may have gotten too far out of step. Recent reports on college students indicate that a vast number of college girls, whatever their private beliefs and whatever their practice, simply no longer believe in chastity, virginity and the sexual double standard that once was the American way. Whether they "do" or "don't" they do not feel that they can successfully argue—either with the boys who pursue them or with other girls—that premarital intercourse is wrong in and of itself. In the same way, it seems likely that the general public is now prepared to accept revisions of our extremely punitive laws on homosexuality and addiction.

IT IS HARD TO SAY what things will be like if the trend toward relaxation of older standards of morality continues. We can get a clue, perhaps, from a look at the "swingers" of Los Angeles. Los Angeles is probably the most unorganized city in the country. It has a vast number of new migrants every year, no well-organized elites to absorb and tame the newcomers (as does the San Francisco Bay Area, which also has a large in-migration), and nearly perpetual summer. With none of the constraints that might be imposed by tightly organized neighborhoods, the presence of extended families close by, or even by a seasonal change that would get people off the beach, new kinds of manners and morals seem to have grown up.

A long-time resident of the Los Angeles beach communities told me the following tale. When he moved into a house already inhabited by three other bachelors, one of them handed him a pack of calling cards that had just a phone number, the number of the house phone, printed on them. He was told to hand the cards out to likely girls wherever he met them—on the beach, in bars, in department stores, wherever—and wait for the response. And, just as he had been told, within a week the phone started ringing and never stopped. Girls who couldn't even remember who had given them the card, girls he had thought attractive but unlikely to be intrigued, old ones, young ones—they all called and they all wanted to go to bed. Neither he nor his housemates have ever wanted for companionship.

While few Angelenos are so enterprising as to have cards printed up, and while such a story is a slim basis for generalization, a community where such a gimmick will work must surely be something new in American life. Though no one has really done a thorough investigation of the matter, the casualness about sex indicated by the story is said to permeate large segments of Los Angeles society. (This in a town whose police harass Lenny Bruce as efficiently and conscientiously as those of more puritanical eastern cities!)

David Boroff has suggested that sex is the politics of the sixties, and I think he is right, though perhaps not in the sense he meant. Sex of the Los Angeles variety, drugs (both the hipster's marijuana and the more intellectual drugs like LSD), and other varieties of exotic behavior may well come to be thought of as inalienable rights, not to be interfered with by either the police or self-appointed censors of family, neighborhood or community. Whether proponents take the low road of quiet evasion of existing moralities (like the quiet coteries of marijuana users found everywhere) or the high road of principled defiance (best exemplified by Leary and Alpert's open conflict with their Harvard colleagues), they will contribute to a growing tension between themselves and those who are not ready to countenance the new ways.

THE NEWLY organized deviant groups are making use of the potential for revolutionary change contained in our cultural emphasis on egalitarianism and our legal emphasis on due process. Our institutions can, when they are spurred into action by determined men, protect minorities of whatever kind from the restraints of cultural tradition and local prejudice. The civil rights movement has shown that. The techniques, legal and extra-legal, used by opponents of racial segregation, will probably be used more and more frequently by deviant groups in the years ahead. Recent events in Berkeley have shown that political freedoms and less conventional freedoms go hand in hand; the same powers use the same means to stifle both. As the indivisible nature of freedom becomes clear, even those who do not engage in forbidden activities will be drawn into the battle, just as physicians, lawyers and ministers have already been drawn into the fight for more humane and rational treatment of addicts and homosexuals. The seeds of independence planted in 1776 will yet bear some strange fruit.

THE NEW IMPROVED DRUG SCENE

JEREMY LARNER

Mr. Larner's first novel, Drive, He Said, won the Delta Prize last year. He has done stories, essays and political reporting for many magazines and this year co-authored, with Ralph Tefferteller, The Addict in the Street, a book of interviews with heroin addicts (Grove Press).

Back!
Back!
Retreat, you fool.
Bar the doors, you are not meant for this world.
Now quietly, crawl into a small crevice in the corner of your innermost mind.
Here I sit alone, seeking sanctuary in opaque blackness.
Though it is dark and dreary,
I am not afraid, for only mortals are afraid.
And I, I am no longer of that world.
The sounds are loud and slow, the colors have all been muted,
But my thoughts are clear.
And I finally realize,
I have finally found peace of mind and rid myself of all internal tortures.

THE ABOVE POEM was written by a fifteen-year-old boy under the influence of a heavy dose of barbiturates. Bobby, as we shall call him, was in school at the time, "and afterwards it frightened me. Because I saw I wasn't paying any attention . . . to anything."

Bobby lives in a small city less than an hour from New York. His high school has a good reputation and a high percentage of college placements. Its student body includes youngsters both from traditional high-income Westchester County families and from families whose fathers supply the labor for an increasing number of decentralized industries. Recently some law enforcement officers came to school with a film about "the dangers of drugs." Bobby reports that "the entire school laughed at them. The whole auditorium never stopped laughing." The kids laughed because they knew more about drugs than the cops did. They laughed because the film was typically melodramatic and full of flagrant errors—calling marijuana smokers "addicts," for instance. They paused, however, on their way out, for a careful study of the police display of implements for drug-taking.

Westchester's teen-age drug problem began at about the same time that youngsters in New York were first exposed to drugs on a large scale—in the early 1950s. Back then, the use of narcotics seemed confined to the most delinquent youngsters. Later, an alarming number of slum-area teen-agers were caught up in heroin addiction. But it now appears that the use of drugs is not purely an economic matter; for the latest customers in the American drug market are legions of urban and suburban middle-class kids, girls included, many of them good students, college-bound, who regard drugs as the sine qua non of modern experience.

In August, 1964, the Yonkers police announced that they had cracked a heroin ring which supplied 140 addicts, one-third of whom were girls and many of whom lived in $100,000 homes lining the Hudson River. The police estimated that 800 more Yonkers teen-agers used "lighter" narcotics. It's common knowledge among Westchester youngsters that White Plains is a center for the distribution of all kinds of narcotics. Many of them can rattle off the names of drugstores in White Plains which sell opiate-based cough syrup without registering the buyer—for twice the standard retail price. Talking to a young man at an Ivy League college who has been arrested several times for selling narcotics, I was assured that at his high school—one of the most highly regarded private prep schools in New York—almost everyone had a chance to "fool around" with various drugs and at least two girls had become addicted to heroin.

Bobby's city is smaller than Yonkers or White Plains, and heroin is not very popular there. Bobby estimates that a majority of the kids at his school occasionally smoke marijuana. This is not as bad as the press would have it; for marijuana is a non-addicting stimulant, and its effects are usually (though not always) pleasant and sociable. Marijuana in itself creates no appetite for heroin. Illegality aside, teen-age pot-smoking is no more (or less) serious than the inevitable teen-age drinking. Since marijuana is illegal, however, its continued use will probably bring a teen-ager into contact with users of other illegal drugs. In Bobby's town, this contact occurs at the sandwich shops and pizza parlors where the kids hang out after school. There the high school kids get together with dropouts and with hangers-on in their twenties who still need the company of younger people. Some of the hangers-on have drugs to sell. Before long the teen-age user learns the stores where he may buy cough syrup or pills; with his friends he begins to seek out connections in Harlem, the Village, or "a place on Long Island."

Bobby says that about 150 of the 800 kids in his school smoke marijuana regularly. About 75 of these also use cough syrup, amphetamine ("pep pills"), barbiturates ("goof balls"), and an occasional sniff or shot of heroin. Cocaine and strong hallucinogens—peyote, mescaline, LSD—are highly valued but hard to come by. Only a handful of kids in Bobby's school have ever gotten hooked on heroin. It is marijuana, alcohol, cough syrup, pep pills, goof balls, and random exotics that form the staple of the high school drug diet. Young users, however, are always on the alert for something new. Recently Bobby's friends discovered that a brand of nasal inhaler contained wyamine; when taken orally, the cotton inside a 59-cent inhaler is enough, they say, to keep three or four people high for 36 hours. The wyamine high especially appealed to them because "it helps you to go to school and work efficiently. Also we like to use benzedrine to take Regents exams."

"The idea is not to get hooked. Your friends stand by you and tell you when to cool it. And it works, with a group. The kids here who use drugs don't use it as an escape—they use it for pleasure and enjoyment, working, listening to music, etc. They realize that if they use it for escape that's bad, and that's gonna be their downfall. When you use drugs you feel you're all to yourself—you're in your own little world. But kids are afraid of this, too—that's why they try to stay together, listen to music and so forth. Except with the depressants—that's why I was scared when I wrote that poem."

Bobby had reason to be frightened. The day he talked to me, a sixteen-year-old friend of his had been hospitalized for an overdose of barbiturates. Barbiturates have been found to be addicting, with severe and even fatal withdrawal symptoms. No one knows, furthermore, the long-term effects of taking heavy doses of amphetamines. In the short run, a heavy dose can cause cerebral hemorrhage, berserk acts, unpredictable violence and hallucinations. A mild dose of dexedrine or benzedrine would stimulate alertness and probably pass undetected in school. But the amphetamines can be at least psychologically habituating, and some teen-agers are taking them in doses far larger than medical science has tested. Almost any drug has its side-effects, and these effects are magnified when drugs are taken at boosted dosages and in random, untested combinations. Tranquilizers, for instance, constantly embarrass their manufacturers by displaying results which have eluded the testers, including, in some cases, habit-forming properties. And the hallucinogens can touch off psychotic episodes from which some people never regain mental balance.

ACCORDING TO BOBBY, drugs are no longer a specialty of the anti-social loner—they've been absorbed into the social scene. "Three years ago, guys would pull away from society. There were no girls involved. Now there are more and more girls every day. It's not a sexual thing—there's not much desire for sex. Girls take depressants and just sit around."

Bobby described a Christmas Eve party held in a cellar apartment. In the middle of the room stood a refrigerator filled with pills, cough syrup, rum and wine. There had to be a lot of codeine syrup, because the opium content is so low that a user will on occasion drink eight to twelve bottles. The pills were a barbiturate sedative called "Tuinal," an overdose of which, according to one textbook, "results in stupor, lowered body temperature, feeble heart action, depression or paralysis of respiratory centers." The host at the party had evidently had a good number of pills, because every time he let somebody in the door he fell down the cellar steps and crashed into the jukebox. "At 4 A.M.," says Bobby, "the boiler exploded. And no one moved. They were floating around in the water. A guy who knew karate went around knocking bricks from the wall. I left and went to church. When I came back they were still there."

What do the parents think of this? As little as possible, apparently. Suburban doctors tell me parents are angry when told their children use drugs—angry at the doctor. They will believe the youngster's denial as long as circumstances permit. Their general attitude is that they've got troubles enough of their own. They're willing to abide by what sociologist Kenneth Keniston calls a "gentlemen's agreement": they won't bother their children if their children don't bother them.

There is a trend among contemporary social scientists to speak of the lack of ego-conflict in the modern middle-class family. Ego strength arises when you pit yourself against others, the theory has it; when there is no conflict the ego will be untested, undeveloped. A weak ego "can't take it"— it tends to withdraw from stress rather than to fight things out, to choose disaffection rather than revolt. The young drug users I've talked to are indeed withdrawn and disaffected. It's interesting that the kids active in athletics or politics usually don't take drugs—and are regarded as "squares." The drug users as a rule were raised by evasive or absent parents who gave their kids equipment instead of values. Values, of course, can be rejected—but the young drug users feel no passion one way or another about their parents. For the drug user, sex is not in fashion—both depressants and the amphetamines impede sexuality. Far from competing with their parents or defying them, the kids seem to want to avoid that uninspiring scene altogether.

IT IS RATHER startling to ask these kids whom they respect and find them hard put to come up with a single name. Contrary to the stereotype of teen-agers as idol-worshippers, the cool ones simply do not look to the adult world for models. That world is seen as a hostile and artificial place, full of squares who make pointless distinctions of class and race, who work at useless jobs, who give themselves pompous airs, and who try to make you as unhappy as they are themselves. Says Bobby, "It's the parents who have the problems, not the kids. With things changing so fast, it's the people between 35 and 45 who are confused. The kids can figure it out."

What the kids "figure out" is that it's easier to go along with the game, to perform as one is expected to perform. It's not hip to take the grown-up world seriously. It's hip to put up with it passively, and to use one's private time in search of experience which will make one inwardly superior. And putting up with it passively is easier with the judicious use of drugs. "About two years ago," says Bobby, "I'd say police and adults were wrong all the time. Now kids do try and contend—with drugs. But there's no respect."

Whom do you respect then? The question drew a blank. Finally Bobby said, "Someone who's been put down all his life and can still get hold of something and say 'fuck you' and make it." His example of "making it" was listening with heightened enjoyment to music. Most of the young drug users are inclined to art, music, or literature—but in a passive way. "On drugs you see something and you study it and you try to comprehend it." It is in a similar spirit that the devotees of hallucinogens insist that their visions are "creative experiences."

This attitude is utterly consistent with the inner values of our consumer society. We live in a country that is devoted to the concept of health and happiness through consumption. The dominating idea in middle-class child-rearing has been to give your child the right properties and experiences—toys, medicines, lessons, neighborhood, education, social contacts, etc.—so that the child grows up anxious to resolve all anxieties by adding something magic from outside himself. Drug manufacturers and indeed all advertisers foster this attitude of yearning dependence. The prime object of American business is to create false needs, since our economic system, like the heroin system, is based on the consumer craving more and more products indefinitely. In a nation of suckers, it's only logical that a man who "needs," say, a bulky, over-decorated, inefficient American car with built-in obsolescence, should have a son who "needs" drugs. James Mills, in a pious essay in Life magazine, claims that "Rarely is a heroin user found who did not come to the drug by way of marijuana." He might more accurately have said, "Rarely is a heroin user found who did not come to the addictive mentality by way of the advertisements in Life." In fact, Mills's article itself offered Life readers the vicarious consumption of heroin in much the same manner that Life's recently added book, music and art reviews offer the passive consumption of culture.

THERE IS NO rigid dividing line between the mentality of the young drug user and the mentality of other American consumers. Consider the mountains of unnecessary vitamin pills which anxious mothers push into their children. Consider that alcohol addicts in this country number 5 million and that nicotine addicts consume over 500 billion cigarettes each year. Consider that Americans spend over $146 million a year for cathartics and laxatives, in the belief that even their bowels can't move without external stimulation. Consider that of the 7000 penicillin reactions in the U.S. every year, doctors estimate that only about 10 per cent occur in cases where application of the drug was necessary. Consider the TV ads for relaxants, bringing us the happy message that it is no longer necessary to feel "tension" or "conflict" or "worry"—just add a pill to your system. Consider the ads for sleeping pills which suggest that we can't go to sleep until a pill "turns off the wake center." Consider the 500 tons of barbiturates manufactured in the U.S. each year—enough to put to sleep 10 million people seven nights per week, fifty-two weeks per annum. Consider that children now walk the streets wearing buttons which say "Come Alive!"—a feat to be accomplished by drinking Pepsi Cola. Consider that a New York radio station advertises, "WMCA turns you on." It seems not a bit inconsistent that The Psychedelic Review should push "professional subscriptions" with the teaser that "LSD subjects" have found "that their religious experience is an ecstatic and incontrovertibly certain discovery penetrating a barrier heretofore closed to ordinary men."

Bobby tells a significant story. In an effort to get at the psychological roots of his need for drugs, he had been seeing someone who called himself a "psychiatrist." After about six months, the "psychiatrist" observed one day that Bobby was nervous and fidgety. He offered to prescribe a tranquilizer. Bobby laughed contemptuously. "I don't need you to get me drugs!" His comment: "That's how well he understood what I was talking about for six months!"

IT SHOULDN'T surprise us that Bobby and his friends suffer from a gnawing sense of incompleteness. "There's no one to fall back on but yourself. And this is a bad feeling. There has to be someone to go to." They resent the social forms of an increasingly atomized society in which adults don't bother each other or care about each other. They speak sometimes of "transcending" their surroundings; they are ripe for advertisements of self-proclaimed saintliness. Banding together, they form a fellowship of hip Holden Caulfields, in this world yet not of it. Their desire is to slide by in worldly terms; they have no impulse toward social, economic or political change. They take drugs to dig the music that is given them, or to learn the material their school offers—without complaint, denying frustration. The "transcendence" comes from being high—and knowing you have gone the squares one better. You may conform to whatever standards, whatever routines they lay down, because when you're high you're out of reach.

"The greatest thing in the world is to cool it, cool it, to get high and not have anyone know it. It's not hip to get hooked any more. The big thing is to cool it—to stay cool and just look out your window at the others."

To look out your window—feeling superior to what you see. What you see are human beings desiring, striving; but you have taken in something extra that puts you beyond desire or strife. You're cool.

Traditionally, coolness and superiority over "ordinary men" were signalled in America by the consumption of material products clearly graded to reveal the caste of the user. But now the ante has been raised. Due to time buying, the liberal extension of credit, a general increase in income-level, and mass production, it is no longer so easy to judge an individual by the car he drives, the clothes he wears, etc. Thus style and taste take on a new importance. To be "in" is more important than to be "up"; instead of wealth one displays elite knowledge: the latest way of dressing, the newest "in" slang, fashionable opinions about fashionable art. But mere fashion isn't enough, because with a little instruction, any square can masquerade. The new media are full of hipsters who will bring them up to date faster than ever. The would-be Holdens are panicky: some measure of commitment must be found, or else the whole concept of deep-souled superiority is threatened with collapse.

What must now be consumed is experience itself—experience measured by quantity. This is the ultimate in hip. And yet the ante raises itself even here: what can the hipster do that a modern insurance salesman might not do on his vacation, with the latest copy of Playboy in hand to guide him? As the hungry masses press nearer and nearer, the moment of truth is narrowed down to the instant when one takes drugs. And even here the masses follow. (Or have they been there already? In 1914, before the clamp-down on patent medicines containing opium, the national rate of addiction was ten times what it is today, involving one person in 400. And most of the addicts, galling to the hipster, were middle-aged housewives.) When the series on junkies appeared in Life, I heard a plaintive moan: "Is nothing sacred any more?"

For Bobby's friends, the use of drugs is their only real commitment. They can pride themselves that they've gone all the way. Any disapproval in their direction will be viewed as a joke on the disapprover. People who don't use drugs are squares; they're not hip—which is to say, they haven't kept up with the new Joneses. Therefore, the logic goes, everyone outside our fellowship is a hypocrite—by his own middle-class definition. Our parents are hypocrites, say Bobby and his friends in effect, because they teach us to seek happiness through consumption, and then warn us not to consume certain things because we'll get too happy.

THE DRUG-USING teen-ager is a perfect candidate for the coolest of compromises, an adult life of hip conformity. Lacking in self-determination, he is not likely to develop a personality oriented toward hard thought or hard work. He knows, however, that to "make it" in the modern adult world he may have to undergo considerable training and specialization. For the "taking-in" youngster, such training is identified with the constriction of his personal "freedom." Nevertheless, he may decide to endure training, so that he can use it as a front. Thus the "hip" use of stimulants in school to improve one's concentration. Transcendence is easier when one plays the game—and a truly disaffected hipster would like to think that everything is a game. He considers himself above involvement, above getting "hung-up," but the irony of his position is that he is above independence. His most limiting dependency is his need for someone to use, i.e., to "take in." To be hipper than thou is his version of conspicuous consumption. The epithet "middle class" serves him as an elite term to indicate contempt for the less edified consumer.

To the drug user, people who stick with things or take things seriously are a threat. They are squares, and he will use them, he thinks, just as he "used" his parents. He makes suckers of them by getting them to give him things without giving of himself. He thinks he will surpass them by adding whatever they have to offer to his own reserve of privileged pleasures.

If he is still unhappy, that is because the big people are persecuting him. He insists on the model of a world in which a saintly few battle for existence against the incursions of a brutish majority. His great fear is betrayal ("no one to fall back on"), and the more he tests the more he finds himself betrayed. Searching desperately for the authority he never had, he is an easy victim of mystic ideology, fake science and saintly rhetoric. "There has to be someone to go to"—and so he may become a cultist. But the cult itself is likely to betray him. For in addition to the shared cult mystique, the in-language, etc., each cultist cherishes a conception of his own destined role. When others cease to value his uniqueness, he may have to add one more betrayal to his collection. The letdown will intensify his lostness, his dependency, his need for submission. He rushes to new drugs, new cults, new authorities.

When life doesn't work out somehow, he again looks outside himself for the explanation. He finds magic against him: the curse of the squares, the grown-ups, the outsiders—all of whom are alike to him. He sees them in conscious or unconscious conspiracy. If one should question his magic, he fights back with the one challenge he can count on to set himself apart: "Have you ever tried Drug X, Drug Y, Drug Z?" He can't hear in his voice the pathetic parody of all the commercials that have swum into his soul and fastened there.

Although many high school kids try drugs only occasionally, others—though most are not addicts—are already victims of the tendency to center their lives around drug-taking. The worst thing that can happen to a drug user is to grow older without grabbing on to some honorable work, to slip instead into a jaded narcissism and grandeur ("only mortals are afraid"). His mood may deteriorate beyond human reach, into a bitterness and paranoia desperate for the manic lift of stimulants, or into a shell of tension softened only by the chemical twilight of depressants. The drug life is consecrated to The Vision—at the expense of the richness, complication, and ambiguity of "ordinary" human experience. Drugs nowadays are an ever-more-available retreat from uncertainty. If one needs magic badly, narcotics will make it all the easier to embark upon a sterile search for The Answer, a desperate flight from questions.

Young drug users, of course, are no less complicated than anyone else. Bobby, for one, is not without a streak of stubborn independence. If he could, he'd like to control his impulse toward drugs without giving them up. That's one more reason why he, and others, try to stay together when they take drugs, and to focus their attention on people, music, reading, schoolwork. Bobby is fighting against himself not to slip away, struggling not to give in to the demons who inspired the last poem he wrote while on barbiturates:

> The night is supposedly a dark and dreary mood, but this is a misconception, for the night is filled with nocturnal creatures, who travel incognito and upright on two legs. These things can corrupt and destroy all morale. They lurk everywhere, but nest and grow in poverty. They can seduce a being of strong will into a state of no reasoning.

How can we help Bobby know that the "nocturnal creatures" are summoned by his own desire? What can we offer him to help fend them away?

One hundred years of facing the difficult and frightening issues of the times! THE NATION has pushed us to think and face realities and situations from which we might ordinarily run. I am grateful to have so often been challenged in my thinking by this publication. —The Rt. Rev. James A. Pike

HILDA SIDNEY KRECH

THE IDENTITY of MODERN WOMAN

Author of two novels and co-author with her mother, Sidonie M. Gruenberg, of The Many Lives of Modern Woman (non-fiction), Mrs. Krech is now at work on another book on women, Beyond the Mulberry Bush, to be published next spring by Doubleday.

THE MODERN AMERICAN WOMAN has received an enormous amount of publicity—most of it bad. Books, TV programs, learned and not-so-learned journals have addressed themselves to her problems. Criticism has usually been aimed at her efforts to expand her horizons, to get beyond the daily round described in the old nursery rhyme: This is the way we wash our clothes/ This is the way we iron our clothes / This is the way we sweep the floor/ This is the way we bake our bread.

It's surprising, really, that the subject and its debaters aren't exhausted, especially in view of the fact that, in many respects, modern woman is less modern than the "new woman" who was emerging a hundred years ago. The period 1865-1885 saw the opening of four of our finest women's colleges: Vassar, Smith, Wellesley and Bryn Mawr. Women were stirring, something was in the air. In those days, when education for women was new, when woman suffrage had not yet been achieved, modern woman wanted desperately to take her place as a human being in the world outside her home.

Today that desperation is gone, which is doubtless a good thing. But it is not good when, along with the desperation, women lose all sense of purpose and of personal identity, as though they had no meaning as individuals apart from husband and children. In that first generation of moderns, most women who were "privileged" felt an obligation to "use" constructively their leisure, their intelligence, their special capacities. Their counterparts today lack the same sense of obligation or purpose. Though they live in more convenient houses, many spend all their time homemaking; though they tend to have fewer children, they spend more time "mothering."

The real working woman, who works not for "self-fulfillment" but simply because her family needs the money, may be the most truly modern woman. Both on the job and at home, she is better off than her old-fashioned forebear, who kept house under primitive conditions and worked long hours at pitifully low wages. She is also spared the guilt, self-questioning and criticism that have pained many "lucky" women who seem to have a choice—yet feel that the choices before them aren't real.

George Gallup and Evan Hill made a survey of "the typical American woman" and wrote an article for The Saturday Evening Post "refuting the charges against her." She is not "lonely, bored, lazy, sexually inept, frigid, superficial, harried, militant, overworked," they tell us. "She is happy, she is content; she wants only the simple pleasures; her family is her whole life." Their typical wife sums up her situation by saying: "If I don't want to do the dishes or laundry right now, I can do them later. My only deadline is when my husband comes home. I'm much more free than when I was single and working. A married woman has it made."

Such a woman knows neither the nagging worry of poverty nor the nagging pull to be part of the activity and thought of a world that extends beyond her eventually made bed. She may be happy and content. She may even be typical. But she is not the modern American woman that commentators have in mind when they speak of "frustration" and of a Radcliffe diploma mildewing over the kitchen sink.

The Saturday Evening Post woman is often pictured as leading the modern equivalent of the traditional homemaker's life. Compared to the old-fashioned housewife, however—one who was part of a large, multi-generation household, who helped her husband on the farm or in a small shop, who played an active role in her community—she leads a barren, restricted, undisciplined and vicarious existence.

As for today's college-age generation, it is the least modern of all compared with the co-eds of the thirties or the bluestockings of two generations back. What is disturbing is not that these girls want marriage and motherhood above all else, but that they expect to live merely through their husbands and children; even those who have had college, travel and other advantages, have no goals or aspirations other than marriage.

Nobody seems happy about the present situation. At a Vassar symposium on "The College Woman in Today's World," the consensus was: "If the performance of college women from 1920 through World War II has been somewhat disappointing, the mental attitudes of young women since World War II are alarming." Not only do girls drop out or break down; those who stay in college often wonder why they are there. As one student put it, "We have been striving for excellence. But, without a commitment, a goal, excellence in a vacuum is meaningless. Excellence for what?"

THIS STRANGE, NEW old-fashioned attitude has been a long time coming. Perhaps it started as a reaction to the feminists, for with many of the original goals achieved, there was no motivation for young women to mount the ramparts and fight for more. By the time my own college generation came along in the 1930s, we took the hard-won gains of the past for granted; we were, in fact, embarrassed by feminists who seemed out to prove themselves a little more equal than men.

The college-age girls of the '30s must have been the most mixed-up of all, for few wanted to be career women (aggressive, masculine and, worst of all, old maids), yet many wanted to be "career girls" (lively, appealing, glamorous). Not only college girls, but all kinds were planning on careers in those days. When one found herself married, holding a baby in her arms for the first time—her own child—she threw over what she called her career, partly because it was hard both to work and to keep house, but also because, as a matter of brutal fact, there was not usually a great deal to throw over. She turned her full attention on her little family and shut the door on the world.

Many such young women, though happy with husbands and children, found housework and child care both too much and too little—too much in that, though no one task was very difficult, it all seemed so unending; too little in that they had been led to believe they would be spending their time, their energy and their talents quite differently. This was a time of sad little jokes about college being the place where girls who are above cleaning and cooking go to meet boys so that they can spend the rest of their lives cleaning and cooking.

It was also the time when advice and scoldings started coming at them at an ever increasing rate. Modern Woman: The Lost Sex, by Ferdinand Lundberg and Marynia Farnham, was published in 1947. In essence, it argued: "Close down the commercial bakeries and canning factories today, and women will start being happier tomorrow." Dorothy Thompson said in 1949 that instead of apologizing for being "just a housewife," each woman should boast that she is a "business manager, cook, nurse, chauffeur, dressmaker, interior decorator, accountant, caterer, teacher, private secretary" all rolled into one. The following year, Agnes E. Meyer elaborated further: "Women must boldly announce that no job is more exacting, more necessary, or more rewarding than that of housewife and mother. . . . There have never been so many women who . . . neglect their children because they find some trivial job more interesting." Even when writers did not scold, but spoke gently, like Dr. Spock, the theme was the same: If it's a career you want, make a career out of motherhood.

This was the beginning of what Betty Friedan calls "the feminine mystique." Psychologists and journalists found allies in advertisers who simply wanted to keep women home and buying. While bakeries and canning factories did not close down, women started baking their own bread, making their own clothes, putting up endless little jellies. Do-it-yourselfism reached a point where women found themselves upholstering their furniture, laying brick patios (at least in California) and papering walls. But instead of being content, as predicted, they felt—to use a word of Anne Lindbergh made popular in Gift From The Sea—"fragmented."

MORE RECENT WRITINGS give the impression that the mothers of America are now climbing their lovingly papered walls in frustration. Some, with nearly grown sons and daughters who no longer need them so much, now feel like has-beens who have never really quite been. Even the young matrons, who never wanted careers, who now have just what they always did want, find that for some reason, it is not enough. This makes them unhappy, and their husbands as well, for frequently the men feel a sense of guilt because their wives are shut out from the world in which they spend so much of their time.

Writers who describe the feminine condition also help to shape it. The noises some of them are making today are disturbingly reminiscent of the old-time feminists.

"Why are women always the lab technicians?" Eve Merriam asks in After Nora Slammed the Door. "Why is a woman never the director of the laboratory?" "Why must women always be content with second-level careers?" asks Betty Friedan. Alice Ros-si, writing in Daedalus, puts it on the line with the title of her thoughtful article, "Equality Between The Sexes: An Immodest Proposal."

The pendulum has completed its arc. Where do we women go from here? We could, of course, continue foolishly to swing back and forth: "On to careers!" and "Back to the hearth!" But let women and their work become needed and we will see the problem in a different way. There is already something of this in the air. The New York Times runs articles called "A Huge Waste: Educated Womanpower" and "Tapping a U. S. National Resource." Max Lerner, recognizing that women are needed in hospitals, schools and other vital community services, pleads "Let's Draft Our Girls." People are gradually coming to see that each semi-wasted life is not simply a private sorrow, but something that concerns society.

BUT IF WOMEN are to spend their lives more wisely, they must first stop being so bewildered—and so bewildering.

Once women were told that being a wife and mother was a career. Women were not persuaded, yet they aren't sure why; indeed in many a woman there still remains an uneasy feeling that what was good enough for Grandma ought, at least, to be good enough for her. But it is not good enough—for the simple reason that life has changed drastically for all of us, whatever our economic position.

Isolation of the American woman within the bosom of her own small family nucleus is the most striking change. Starting with the Industrial Revolution, which first took men out of the home, her isolation has increased with the growing mobility of her husband (today the professional or organization man is nearly as migratory as the migratory worker). To this feeling of isolation has been added a sense of futility: the appliances, products and services which have taken away from her so many tasks and functions, took away also a feeling of accomplishment. And even if a woman wants, and is capable of, doing things the old-fashioned way, living a reasonable facsimile of Grandma's life, what would this do to her marriage? And to her relationship with her children? Does it make sense for her to live a horse-and-buggy life while her husband lives in a dacron-and-jet world, her children in an age of viscose-acrilan and rockets?

In any case, we have reached the point where motherhood as a career no longer lasts a lifetime. Girls are marrying younger, having their children sooner (and having fewer of them), so that they suddenly find themselves, at middle age, with their "career" at an end. What does a woman do who has half her life to live after her youngest child leaves home?

Interestingly, the Women's Bureau estimates that of the girls now in high school (most of whom see only motherhood ahead), eight out of ten will at some period find gainful employment. It is becoming fashionable to speak of a woman having "a second career" after her children are grown. According to this formula, she is generally unprepared for the second career; her skills have become rusty and so she must polish them off or take some refresher courses.

It seems to me that more than a course or two and a little rust-removing is required. If, since girlhood, she has not used her skills, organizational ability or other talents, she is in no condition to present herself to prospective employers at the age of forty or so. If only it were taken for granted that, once a woman's children no longer needed her full time, she would be expected to be useful, productive or needed in some other way, she would put to better use the little scraps of time available during her busiest years. As it is now, the scraps are frittered away—not only during the hectic nursery years, when she needs them for sheer relief, but all along the line. Just as expenses rise to meet rising income, so chores, errands, self-perpetuating puttering, and what Veblen called "ceremonial futility," increase as women's home duties grow lighter.

What should women do with their time? What should they take as their goals?

It used to amuse me, and lately it has distressed me, that most men make do with "jobs," but whenever women are discussed, the word is always "careers." If the notion is pushed that middle-aged women can embark on "instant" careers, with no more than a refresher course or a little brushing up, they will soon find this impossible and they'll go back to "nothing"—like the ex-career girls of the thirties. If, instead, we recognized that relatively few men have "careers," and that women, who have carried responsibilities as wives and mothers, are even less likely to have them, we would be nearer to a practical solution for the problem we are discussing.

For one thing, women must stop looking for one all-purpose formula, be it "Back to the Spinning Wheel!" or "Back to Sarah Lawrence for Continuing Education!" Most women, actually, will find some place between these two points. Sarah Lawrence, Barnard, Radcliffe, the University of Minnesota and the University of Michigan are pioneering in this field in imaginative, intelligent ways. Some of their projects are designed for women who left college to get married and who now want to finish their interrupted educations. Some provide refresher courses and some are for women with B.A., M.A. or Ph.D. degrees who now want to go further in their own or different fields. But the academic approach does not answer the needs of all women; nor, in fact, does it answer all the needs of any one woman.

We must recognize how absurd it is to expect the same work, the same activity, the same goals of all women. Like men, they differ in temperament, intelligence, training and ability. Like men, they differ in their early opportunity for education and training; and, even more than men, in their later opportunity to use their abilities. For in a woman's case, opportunity depends not only on herself but on her family—on how many children she has, when they were born, whether one or more is handicapped in some way, and where her husband's work takes the family to live.

However equally we consider men and women, the work plans for husbands and wives cannot be given equal weight. A woman should not aim for "a second-level career" because she is a woman; from girlhood on she should recognize that, if she is also going to be a wife and mother, she will not be able to give as much to her work as she would if single. That is, she should not feel that she cannot aspire to directing the laboratory simply because she is a woman, but rather because she is also a wife and mother; as such, her work as lab technician (or the equivalent in another field) should bring both satisfaction and the knowledge that, through it, she is fulfilling an additional role, making an additional contribution.

When they become mothers, young women must be helped to keep and to use something of what they gained through their education or special training or early work experience. We must not leave each one to battle her way alone; if it is assumed that mothers, at some point, will become participating members of society, society should provide ways to help them. Diaper service is an undebatable example of a help that is new and that all mothers need. Nursery schools—now enjoyed by privileged children (and their mothers) and, more recently, by the so-called culturally deprived (and their mothers), will someday bring joy and benefit to all children (and their mothers).

But progress will be slow if services are added piecemeal, haphazardly, as businessmen or educators find partial answers to existing needs. Many families need more fundamental help in freeing women from their daily chores. Tract developers, for example, might take this into account and provide for young families the recreational facilities and some of the medical, educational and maintenance services now provided for older people in the retirement communities springing up across the country.

Then, as women become more free, they must become clearer about their goals and more purposeful in pursuing them. Different women, of course, have different goals; the goal of each must be flexible because, as a mother, a woman is more subject than her husband to change of plan without notice. But flexibility (currently regarded as the most desirable feminine trait among some educators of women) must not be confused with sheer aimlessness!

Finally, recognizing that automation will affect employment opportunities for women as well as for men, eventually giving everyone a shorter work week and perhaps an earlier retirement age, we must examine meaningful uses of time, talent and energy outside of jobs. Men, as well as women, will have to find truly satisfying uses of their leisure time—occupations that can be continued and developed into the retirement years (years which, incidentally, I hope will not be spent segregated from the rest of the human family). It could be that the woman who adapts well and functions effectively in the world of today (not, for her, a "full-time" work-world) will serve as a model for man in the automated tomorrow.

THE NATION has survived a hundred years of critics and detractors on a diet of controversy and stimulating—but often exceedingly unpopular—causes. It has survived and grown because there has continued to be a vital need for its voice—in 1965 as in 1865. (On occasion, I have disagreed with a particular article or editorial in THE NATION, but I have always had admiration for the courage and integrity of its editors. Then and now, THE NATION is needed.) I hope its voice is around to be heard for another hundred years.—Sen. Jacob K. Javits

'TELL IT LIKE IT IS, BABY'

RALPH ELLISON

The publication of Invisible Man, which won the National Book Award in 1953, launched Mr. Ellison on a writing and teaching career which has earned him many further awards. His latest book is Shadow and Act, a collection of essays (Random House, 1964).

> Dear Uncle Raf:
> . . . What are you doing over there in Rome with all those Italians? What do you think about over there? Are you keeping up with what's happening here at home? Have you read about those cracker senators cussing out the Supreme Court and all that mess? Let me hear what a home-boy done gone intellectual thinks when he's away from the Apple and all the righteous studs. . . . How's the writing going? Do you find it makes a difference being over there? Tell a man how it is. . . .

VIRGIL B., WHO WROTE the above excerpt in 1956 after the Southern Congressmen had drawn up their manifesto against the Supreme Court, is a childhood friend who is now a cook and baker on merchant ships. Inevitably his letters contain a trace of mockery, directed at my odd metamorphosis into a writer, which is meant to remind me whence I come. Nor is he merely amused; he seriously expects insight and eloquence and a certain quality of attention to the reality experienced by our group—demands which, since that experience is often bafflingly complex, I am not always able to meet. After answering his letter, however, I was led to make an attempt at an essay which, perhaps because too many things were happening to me at the time, I was unable to complete. My wife and I were living the dormitory life of the American Academy in Rome and I was much preoccupied: with writing a novel, with literary concepts, with reviewing my own life's resources for literary creation; with the experience of discovering a foreign culture in which the old structures and guides that sustained my thoughts, emotions and conduct at home were so relaxed, whether awake or sleeping, that it was as though I was living in a barely controlled chaos.

So the essay failed. I simply could not organize the various elements—literary, political, psychological, personal—into the complex, meaningful whole which my sense of reality and my concern with fiction demanded. But I could not forget the essay, or at least not the dream which was its core; for in its way it seemed to symbolize my state of diffusion, my concerns, conscious and unconscious. Therefore the following attempt at salvage (made at the suggestion of the late David Boroff) represents, if nothing more, a further episode in my discovery that for me it was by no means a simple task to "tell it like it is"—even when the subject was desegregation and the Southern Congressmen's defiance of the Supreme Court. I was outraged and angered by the event, but the anger was not isolated or shallowly focused, rather it suffused my most non-political preoccupations. More unsettling, I discovered that there lay deeply within me a great deal of the horror generated by the Civil War and the tragic incident which marked the reversal of the North's "victory," and which foreshadowed the tenor of the ninety years to follow.

Since I attempted the essay, some nine years ago now, the power of the Southern Congressmen has been broken and the reconstruction of the South is once more under way. Nevertheless, the hooded horrors parading, murdering and shouting defiance in the South today suggest that the psychic forces with which I tried to deal (in both dream and essay) are still there to be dispersed or humanized; the individual white Southerner's task of reconciling himself to the new political reality remains. In retrospect, then, it was perhaps not too naïve after all to have tried to approach the problem consciously through the insights made available by the wisdom of tragedy. One thing is certain, the mind in sleep will have its way, and I had fallen asleep while reading Gilbert Murray's The Classical Tradition in Poetry, puzzling over how its insights might possibly be useful to a writer who is American, a Negro, and most eager to discover a more artful, more broadly significant approach to those centers of stress within our national life wherein he finds his task and being.

—New York, June 1965

LET ME BEGIN WITH a personal dream—for with what are we concerned, the moment we try to think about the problem of desegregation, but the clash between the American dream and everyday American reality; between the ideal of equality and the actuality of our society in which social, educational, and economic inequalities are enforced explicitly on the irremediable ground of race? And even in so practical and (until recently) so far removed an area as that of foreign policy, does not this clash, especially when we regard Asia and Africa, make for an atmosphere of dream-like irrationality?

Perhaps more to the point, when a Negro American novelist tries to write about desegregation he must regard, in all its tortuous ambiguity, the South. And here immediately he confronts three clusters of conflicting images: the myth-image propagated by orthodox White Southern spokesmen, by costume movies and popular novels of the Civil War; the image, almost completely negative, held by self-righteous white Northerners—and not a few Negroes—who have never known the South; and the more heavily qualified image (far more than a simple synthesis of the others) held by his black Southern relatives and their fellow Negroes. Among these images (none absolutely true or false) there is a great clashing, with the exponents of each set making scapegoats of the others: Northerners for Southerners, the South for the North, the black for the white and the white for the black, and when we try to find stable points of reality in this whirling nightmare of terms and attitudes, they change constantly into their opposites.

If we honestly say "Southerner," then we must, since most Negroes are also Southerners, immediately add white Southerner. If we say "white South" our recognition that the "white South" is far from solid compels us to specify which white South we mean. And so on for the North and for the Negro until even the word "democracy"—the ground-term of our concept of justice, the basis of our scheme of social rationality, the rock upon which our society was built—changes into its opposite, depending upon who is using it, upon his color, racial identity, or in what section of the country he happened to have been born, or where and with whom he happens to be at the moment of utterance. These circumstances have, for me at least, all of the elements of a social nightmare, a state of civil war, an impersonal and dreamlike chaos. To what then, and in his own terms, does a Negro writer turn when confronting such chaos—to politics, history, sociology, anthropology, art? War, it has been said, is a hellish state; and so, too, is equivocation, that state (born of the Hayes-Tilden Compromise of 1877 and faintly illumined by the candle of liberty) in which we live. It is the candle alone which guides us through our chaos and when the candle flickers we're in the dark. And so in the Roman dark I dreamed.

IT WAS A BRIGHT spring morning and I was walking along Classen Boulevard in Oklahoma City. Birds sang high in the trees that lined the walk and I could see the flash of wings and the quick, downward swoop ending in a nervous run along the walk, where, with alerted heads and flipping tails, they busily harvested a horde of catalpa worms. The worms were everywhere, the walk smeared green and white with their pulp and skin. But they were relentless. They kept dropping from the trees to the walk and moving over the curb and into the street in a steady wave, providing an ambulatory feast for the birds. Trying to avoid both worms and smears, I moved past the well-trimmed walks that led through handsome lawns to the distant houses, showing bright and gay with awnings. There were flowers too, and a clarinet running arpeggios in middle register, and the call of a huckster sounding hoarse-voiced in the limpid distance. I was filled with the expectation of some pleasantness, some long looked-for reward. Then it came over me that I was going to see my father.

I hurried now and almost immediately I saw in the distance under the high archway of worm-damaged leaves a tall, familiar man coming toward me. We were approaching an intersection, which he reached ahead of me, and stood looking steadily toward me and I felt a certain joy.

But then, as I drew closer, he was no longer familiar, but a stranger wearing a dull black and gray diamond-checked suit, his face narrow as he watched me out of small, staring eyes. I didn't know him at all, was even uncertain of his race. Standing quite still now, feeling a cold sensation along the ridge of my spine, I looked across the empty street, trying to interpret his accusatory look. We stared for a breathless time, then he turned away, retreating quickly beyond a privet hedge and out of sight, just as a mirror or window pane nearby sent the sun glaring into my eyes. It was odd.

I moved again, feeling now as though I had lost something precious. Who was this man, and what was the meaning of his staring accusation? What had I done—what had I failed to do? Had I been mistaken for someone else? But who?

The weather had changed and the city become strange. I was walking through an arcade lined with shops and on into an old street-car terminal covered with dirty glass through which the light filtered gloomily down. Passengers stood about in little groups, silently waiting for the long, yellow cars that came and went with a groaning and grinding, the motormen retracting and shifting the trolley poles with a great showering of sparks. An old man in a white apron and yellow paper cap was selling popcorn and peanuts from a stand topped by a whistle which sent forth a thin plume of steam each time a little mechanical clown, wearing a white, polka-dotted suit and peaked hat with a red pompon, turned the crank of a glass drum containing unshelled peanuts. The man smiled, holding out a paper cone of popcorn, gleaming with butter, as I moved past and out into a great public square, in the center of which I saw a tall, equestrian statue standing level with the second story of the surrounding buildings. The rider, poised in full gallop, stood high in the stirrups flourishing a broad military hat with plume. An expression of victory showed on his bronze face, despite the fact that his saber had lost three-fourths of its blade. Gazing upward past his head, I saw on the balcony of a building across the square the man who had stared; now, accompanied by a mysterious woman, he was looking toward me. They leaned forward, gripping the rail, staring at me intensely. Then a clock struck three with a mournful sound, followed by the creaking of cogs and pendulum—an ancient, dirty, cobwebbed sound. Then a flock of pigeons flew up, casting a shadow between us as they rustled the light with their wings and a voice spoke from a hidden loudspeaker.

"Is he the one?" it said.

"He's the one," a woman's voice answered, "truly."

"Is he the one? I say is he the one!"

"He's young, too young; he's not the one. It's been too long."

"Then he's the one," the male voice said, "Strength is not a requirement."

Then I became aware of a crowd standing behind me, before a building decorated with flags and bunting. It was quite hostile and I had the hot feeling that it was capable of almost anything. I moved away, aware that the crowd was following and feeling that somehow I had fallen from a high place, from a cliff or high protecting wall; and now I was running down a hill on which the tracks of a trolley line gleamed, and the air, suddenly breathless, was portentous.

I ran desperately, until, somehow, I was in a dark, colonial alley in Washington. And as I emerged into a crowded thoroughfare it was as though a book of 19th-century photographs had erupted into vivid life. The street was full of rubber-tired carriages—broughams, phaetons, landaus—and I could hear the creak-snap-jangle and thud of wall-eyed pacing horses. Gas lamps flickered the shadows with a chill white light, revealing a relentless crowd moving with sweating excitement, and as I moved out into the crush I became aware of the strangely sinister, high-frequency swishing of women's skirts. All around me people were rushing swiftly past to gather before a building from which, looking past their bobbing heads, I could see a sheet-covered form being removed on a litter.

It was a man, I could see now, his body having lost its covering as his litter-bearers jolted him roughly about. It was a tall man who seemed familiar: there was something about the way the disarranged sheet draped the toes of his shoes. Then it was now and yet another time, and I moved forward with a feeling of dread, thinking, "It's happening again."

We had said good-by and he had made me a present of the tiny pink and yellow wild flowers that had stood in the vase on the window sill, had put a blue cornflower in my lapel. Then a nurse and two attendants had wheeled in the table and put him on it. He was quite tall and I could see the pain in his face as they moved him. But when they got him covered his feet made little tents of the sheet and he made me a joke about it, just as he had many times before. He smiled then and said good-by once more, and I had watched, holding on to the cold white metal of the hospital bed as they wheeled him away. The white door closed quietly and I just stood there, looking at nothing at all. Near by I could hear my mother talking quietly with the physician. He was explaining and she was asking questions. They didn't talk long, and when they finished we went out of the room for the last time. Holding on to my wrist as I clutched my flowers in my fist, my mother led me down the silent corridor heavy with the fumes of chloroform. She hurried me along. Ahead of us I saw a door swing ajar and watched it, but no one came out, then as we passed I looked inside to see him, lying in a great tub-like basin, waiting to be prepared for his last surgery. I could see his long legs, his knees propped up and his toes flexing as he rested there with his arms folded over his chest, looking at me quite calmly, like a kindly king in his bath. I had only a glimpse, then we were past. We had taken the elevator then and the nurse had allowed me to hold the control and she had laughed and talked with me as we went down to the street. Outside, as we moved along the winding drive into the blazing sun, I had told my mother but she wouldn't believe that I had seen him. I had though, and he had looked at me and smiled. It was the last time I saw my father alive. Years later, while telling me who he was and what he had been and what it meant to be his fatherless child, my mother had said that difficulties with money and the weather caused his body to be withheld from burial until it stank in the dark back room of the funeral parlor. Such was her respect for the naked reality of the human condition. . . . But what quality of love sustains us in our orphan's loneliness; and how much is thus required of fatherly love to give us strength for all our life thereafter? And what statistics, what lines on whose graphs can ever convince me that by his death I was fatally flawed and doomed —afraid of women, derelict of duty, sad in the sack, cold in the crotch, a rolling stone in social space, a spiritual delinquent, a hater of self—me in whose face his image shows? My mother loved him through all the years, cherished his memory until she died, apotheosized his vital years. For in effect he only perished, he did not pass away. His strength became my mother's strength and my brother and I the confused, sometimes bitter, but most often proud, recipients of their values and their love. . . .

BUT AS I MOVED CLOSER NOW it was Washington again and I could see the man's head snap suddenly back to reveal a short, carefully trimmed beard and I was confused, thinking: But he didn't wear a beard. As I pressed forward to get a better look, the crowd came between and I thought: He's either drunk or sick—but why aren't they more careful? Some were even laughing.

"What are they laughing at?" I asked a man going past.

"At our American cousin, fool."

"What? Whose—"

Then there came over me an inexpressible anguish, like a great weight suspended on a blunt hook driven through that part of my throat, the region of the thyroid gland, where grief and anguish collect, bearing down like doom.

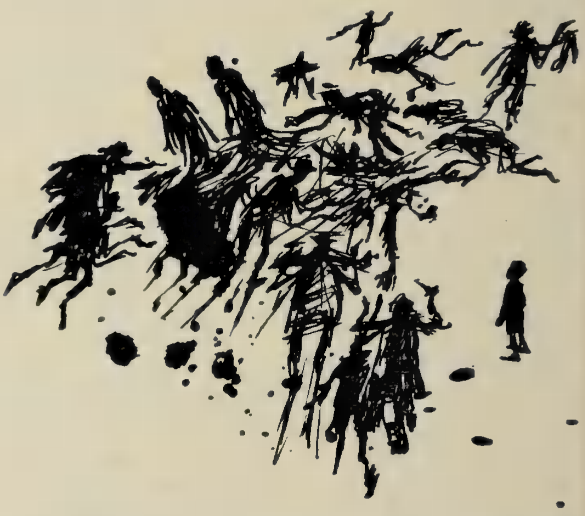
For now, looking at the balustraded steps I recognized the building, and recognizing the building I knew the man; and knowing the man I wanted to cry, but could not cry. I wanted to scream, but could not scream. And suddenly the air resounded with the obscene melodramatics of the assassin's "Sic semper tyrannis!" and the night was filled with a great weeping and a great laughter.

And yet I was still unsure.

"What are they laughing at?" I said.

"Are you kidding, boy?" came the reply. "Face the facts!"

I knew now, even in the dream, that I had fallen out of time into chaos, and although the sight of the body filled me with horror, there was still room for personal embarrassment. And an embarrassment over the embarrassment—a chattering, degenerating echo of vanity before sad public events. For suddenly I discovered that I, whose grandparents were quite young at the time of Emancipation, had become a child again and was dressed in the one-piece garment of a young slave. I had no pants, nor shoes nor underwear; and when I tried in my dual shame to leave the street I was swept forward by the crowd, forced to follow after the litter which was now being moved along the street in what had suddenly become a funeral cortege. And now, though barefoot and quite young, I discovered that nevertheless I was literate, a slave who could read.



For as I was swept along, history-book descriptions of the event flickered through my mind in visual counterpoint and I kept trying to anticipate the route which the crowd would take through the dim and shadowed streets. But nothing was going as it was written. Instead of an escort of grieving high dignitaries, military men and weeping gentlewomen following a flag-draped camion, and with a crowd of weeping, recently freed slaves forming an anguished second line (perhaps the archetype of all such lines, joyful or sad, associated today with their descendants), the slain man, lanky and not yet cold, the complexion darker than I'd ever imagined, and with an ironic yet benign expression on the transcendent features, was being conveyed by a mob.

In a flash it became a carnival, an Oktoberfest, a Mardi Gras, with the corpse become the butt of obscene jokes. In the light of the hissing street lamps I saw a burly, bald-headed man waving his arms about, announcing in stentorian tones, "We've caught the old coon at last! Haven't we now!" Then as he broke into a fit of wheezing laughter the others responded, "COON! COON! COON! Hep-hep- Hep-john-step COON-COON!" And it quickly became a wild marching chant that filled me with a special terror. For hearing this epithet applied to the slain leader warned me that something terrible was about to occur, that some further support was to be torn from the foundation of that which I had thought was reality, from that which I held most sacred.

And how can I be me, if Old Abe be a "coon," I thought. Yes, and how can I be a slave or even human? And I looked down at my hands, fully prepared to see them turn into hairy paws.

Just then I saw a squat man with a toothbrush mustache shoot out of the crowd flashing a knife in the lamplight, yelling, "Make way! Make way!"

Please, not that, please not that! I thought, striking out about me as he bent low over the litter, the knife poised. Then I was spun around and when I looked again, he held a black piece of cloth, a wedge-shaped lapel, its lining gutted, yelling, "Hey! For my grandbaby boy, a souvenir for little Joey!" And this triggered the mob to a frenzy.

They rushed in to rip at the black coat with their fingers, they hacked it with pieces of broken bottle. One elegant man produced a straight-edged razor from the folds of his rich purple cravat and went to work distributing delicate bits of cloth among those unable to share directly in the dismemberment. Bits of cloth flittered down like blackened snow. And the coat swiftly disappearing, they went to work on his trousers.

Someone tugged off a homely gaiter. I saw several men and women, squawking like carrion crows, close in, fighting to take it away. A bent little old woman wearing a poke bonnet like that of the "Old Dutch Cleanser" woman grabbed the gaiter's mate and disappeared. Two small boys snatched off the socks, slashing them to shreds between them with nails astonishingly sharp.

They were insatiable. They ripped up the slain Lincoln's tie. His collar was seized, his white shirt ripped away, his vest torn to surreal tatters.

"Peace, Peace," a thin voice cried. "Remember the old buzzard's advice to its young: Hit a dead head-horse in the eye and move straight up through his vastness. I say: Remember, Find the place, Strike!"

This enthusiastic elegante in Edwardian suit and with sauve Eliotonian stoop was knocked aside by a rough-looking man who produced the President's stovepipe hat, and I saw him sail it curving through the air and into a second-story window—in which a wrathful woman promptly appeared and sailed it down again, dusting her hands indignantly as the high hat hovered above us like a battered Saturn with its radiant rings turned gray. A man grabbed it as it fell and, turning on his toes like a ballet dancer, jammed it on the head of a floozy, cotton-topped blonde, who wiggling wobbly a few steps, shook her head of cotton-candy hair to the crowd's applause. She wore a feather boa and a skin-tight satin dress, and flouncing about on unsteady legs she showed off a pair of monstrous, heavily-powdered breasts which, as she stumbled and lurched on shoes with vicious heels, kept flipping out of her low-cut bodice and tossing about like two bloated, moon-mad, oxygen-starved flounders. For a fitful moment she caught the crowd's attention by cutting a clumsy cakewalk as she waved the hat and weaved, singing in a tinny little-lost-girl voice,

Come on boys
And name your play
We put the last clean shirt
On Abe today . . .,

punctuated with a suggestion of bump and grind.

WE MOVED AGAIN, the crowd growing with every step, the heat oppressive, the noise expanding in hysterical volume. Suddenly I noticed that the body was now being carried by four ragged Negro men who, kicked and pummeled as they stumbled along, held grimly to their burden, their stolid black faces disapproving.

"Get on. Get on!" the crowd cried. But hardly had they gone a dozen feet than they were beaten to a halt and rested the litter high on their shoulders while the crowd jeered at the slain President. He lay now in his underwear, his bony railsplitter's wrists hanging awkward and bare, his thin ankles sticking from the bottom of his underdrawers much as the rapidly growing Uncle Sam of the 19th-century cartoons had stuck from his outgrown heel-strapped britches.

"Stars, stripes and nigger minstrels!" someone called. "Now he's Happy Hooligan!" At which, to the crowd's wild delight, a short, fat man wearing a long, gray coat, and who resembled Edmund Wilson, turned from drinking beer from a tin bucket and shook his head as with sudden revelation. Taking a final sip, he dashed the remains into the street and with an inspired, slow-mushrooming belch, jammed the "growler" on the Great Emancipator's head, clamping the wire handle beneath the bearded chin.

"Beautiful" someone said, "Beautiful!"

The applause was like the shattering of great sheets of glass. Whereupon the inspired fat man completed the Happy Hooligan transformation by pushing the stem of a corncob pipe between the once so eloquent lips, twisting the bowl so that its contents spilled upon the shrunken chest. Then a group of men labored up with a railway baggage wagon and the Negroes were forced to put the body upon it and then made to pull it through the cursing, flailing crowd.

"Push dat barge, boys!" a joker commanded in a thick foreign accent. "Push dat dar ole cotton-picking barge!"

I wanted to kill him along with all the callous crowd, but was too powerless and too fascinated, too held by horror and the anguished need to see it ended.

We were rushing through wide streets now, with broad lawns and stately buildings on either side. The ragged Negroes strained away, conveying now, beside the President, a number of women in tacky Sunday dresses, whose high-laced shoes dangled contentedly as they fluttered beside the body, joking and laughing and plying their little lace, mother-of-pearl-embellished fans. Then straight ahead I saw the Washington Monument, seeming to break through the floor of a barren plain like a periscope from the sea, rushing to meet us. Then we were there, at the base of the austere shaft, where the four Negroes were again beaten to a halt and made to lay their burden on the grass, then sent fleeing into the darkness. I tried to follow them, but was quickly restrained.

But why not me, I thought. Why not me as well? For I wished to join them in their forced detachment, I envied them their anonymity, their freedom to not participate. But my brown skin and slave's garment notwithstanding, I was held and forced to the front of the crowd.

I FOUND MYSELF standing near a tall, thin grandame who was laughing hysterically, screaming like a great tropical bird. Then she stopped and sniffed solemnly at a bottle of smelling salts, an expression of utmost complacency settling over her thin, aristocratic face, while the others joked, cursed, and made obscene remarks about the President until abruptly the composure of her face broke apart like the shattering of rock, and she laughed to put my teeth on edge. She bent double, then back, her stiff black garments snapping visibly with the motion and enveloping me in the rank fumes of female senility laced with threat and mystery.

Squeezing around her, and against an invisible hand that now seemed to hold me, I looked down at the lanky figure sprawled at the base of the marble shaft, thinking, Now it's all over, they'll leave him alone, it's over.

But not yet. I looked up to see a man wearing a voluminous opera cape, and who looked oddly like Mr. Justice Holmes, skipping slowly forward, decorous and tall, and with the toe of his elegant high-button shoe, flipping the corpse into a grotesque attitude. Then, throwing open his cape, he shouted, "Look at these! I say, look at these!" sticking a long finger through a series of bullet holes.

"Poor noble man!" they cried. "Poor betrayed innocent!"

"That dirty coon!"

"He did him wrong, the clod! He swindled him!"

"He wasted his land! He spoiled the cream! Get him!" This initiated a contest. Now they pushed one another about as they tried to see who could kick the corpse into the most fantastic positions, standing it on its head, doubling it over, twisting it in the cordwood postures of Dachau, shouting and cursing all the while.

"He's all to blame!"

"Give it to him good. There, there, how about that!"

"Yeah, but now you just watch this."

"That was a good one!"

"Look at ole Abe, he's dead but he won't lie down!"

"Watch it there, McDuffy, turn him over easy—but turn him!" I wanted to cry, my throat feeling as though it would burst apart, but no tears would flow to bring relief.

I closed my eyes as they knocked me about. And I now realized an odd thing. Up to this point, such is the contradiction of the dream, that I had not felt the President was actually dead. He isn't dead: I wouldn't have it so. It was a pitiful denial born of horror, a wish born of an anguished need to deny the hegemony of terrible fact—an attitude with which I had been familiar since childhood, when I had been bemused by a recurring fantasy in which, on my way to school of a late winter day I would emerge from a cold side street into the warm spring sun and there see my father, dead since I was three, rushing toward me with a smile of recognition and outstretched arms. And I would run proudly to greet him, his son grown tall. And then I could awake at last from the tortuous and extended dream that was my childhood with my father gone. So urgent had been my need for a sense of familial completeness, to have our family whole and happy as it had been until shortly before I saw him placed at last into the earth, that this thin fantasy had been made to serve for the man of flesh and blood, the man of the tales, the ghost stories, the gifts and strength and love. From the age of three to thirteen, the processes of time and the cold facts of death alike were—in this special area of my mind, for I understood death and was eager for change and for my own manhood's attainment—held off by this recurring day-dream.

So I could not believe Mr. Lincoln dead. Thus, so, in the dislocated, is-and-isn't world of dream, I felt that the President bore his indignities out of a temporary weakness incurred by his wound or out of war weariness—even out of a saint-like patience, out of a hero's grace before the mob's wild human need. It was as though the noisy desecration of his body was being accepted as he had accepted the tragic duty of keeping the country unified even through an act of fratricidal war. Or as later it had been his task to seek reconciliation of the sundered parts. Yes, it was no less an act of duty than that of receiving the assassin's bullet in his brain. He is not dead, I told myself in the dream; he is not tolerating the mob's outrages out of the insensitivity of death, but submitting willingly to them out of the most sublime and tragic awareness of the requirements of his fated role. For we must take our heroes where we find them, and in all their wisdom and their guile, and in all their frustrating enigmas as in their bright lucidities.

For in him at least, there was a man who, having taken the oath, would do, and did, all that it was necessary for him to do, even before his own foreboding dream of obliteration.

But now in the suddenly accelerated tempo of the dream the corpse rebelled. I saw it grow rigid, then swell, transformed before my eyes into an advanced state of putrefaction. So inflated was the corpse becoming that soon the underwear resembled the series of inner tubes that form the body of the figure in the Michelin trademark. Death undeniable looked out at me, the sublime mocking its earthly shell.

"Now it is over," I thought. "At last they can see what they've done and I'll awaken."

But not even the ultimate protest of decomposing flesh could halt them. A man reached down and grasped the inflated underwear, trying to tear it away—and it was then that a sound like a fusillade of shots ripped the air and a dense cloud of gray, slime-drenched birds burst up from the earth on swift metallic wings and attacked the onlookers with feet of fire.

Screaming with pain, they burst apart like an exploding grenade, turning to claw at one another as they milled wildly about. And in the confusion I was pinned against the monument, burned by the flying slime. The four Negroes had returned now, and they stood silently, looking first at me and then down at Mr. Lincoln. They grasped with one hand the handles of a black box; in their free hands they carried gleaming spades. There was some cryptic exchange among them, then they looked at me, and now I was no longer a child. The scene became a scene on a movie screen, which I was watching from a distance and with a feeling of utmost clarity, as though I grasped the mystery of all experience. Then, just as suddenly, I was in the scene again, only now the mysterious Negroes were resting on their spades around a great hole. They motioned for me to look over the edge. Approaching fearfully, I looked down, seeing the crowd transported there, a multitude, some black faces among them, sitting at table making a ghoulish meal of some frightful thing that a white sheet hid from view. Then as I saw something stirring and expanding beneath the sheet, the earth seemed to crumble, plunging me screaming into a terrible wakefulness. . . .

* * *

I LAY THERE IN the hushed Roman night, aware of a nightingale singing somewhere beyond the venetian blinds, the lonely play of the fountain in the gravel-strewn cortile below. The air was breathlessly hot, yet I lay in a cold sweat, trying now, by way of exorcizing the dream, to recall some of Mr. Lincoln's eloquent words—grasping desperately for the Gettysburg Address. I had known it most of my life, had been moved by it even before its implications had become meaningful; had memorized its stately lines as a class assignment back in an old high school named Frederick Douglass; had studied it on my own in Sherwin Cody's little booklet on composition and rhetoric, where it was grouped with passages from Ecclesiastes and Benjamin Franklin; had pondered its themes of sectional reconciliation and national rebirth many times long since, as the awareness grew that there was little about it that was simple and that it was profoundly implicated both in my life and in the failure of my promised freedom.

But now, although I could feel the mood of its noble rhythms as physically as the pounding of my heart, the words had hidden themselves, become mute before the vivid mist of nightmare. I sat up abruptly, seeing the dim bars of moonlight seeping through the blinds as the rhythms called forth a swirl of imagery. Then scenes of Charles Laughton performing the title role of the movie, Ruggles of Red Gap, suddenly reeled through my mind. Once more he was the much put-upon immigrant English butler, enduring the jibes and abuses of his nouveau riche American employers, whose vulgar "Gilded Age" materialism mocked all that is ideal in the American tradition. And once more, at the high point, he drew himself up proudly to recite the compassionate words uttered by Lincoln at Gettysburg, becoming in their measured flow transformed into a most resonant image of the American's post-Civil War imperative of conscience and consciousness achieved.

So here at last, in remembered art, the words of hope and reconciliation born of war and bloodshed rejoined the hallowed rhythms to dispel the nightmare images of the great man defiled. I was, though badly shaken, at last awakened.

THANK GOD IT was only a dream! But as I became more fully awake it struck me that more dismaying than having such events erupt in one's dream life was that no living hero or surrogate had appeared to play Anthony to Lincoln's Caesar. Even the villains were less than individualized, the figure who looked like Mr. Justice Holmes only resembling him and the man in the long, gray coat only looking like Mr. Edmund Wilson (but with no aura of scholarly eminence). And so the women. None struck me as mother-figures, neither the rump-sprung blonde, the poke-bonneted granny, nor the tall boom-and-bust figure in the stiff black dress—though I'm sure that some critic expert in the interior life of writers could write a fascinating essay on these ladies as three phases of the same personage—say: "The Woman as Earth-Mother, as Matron, and as Scold." Seriously, I could not ignore the fact that no one tried to stop the mob, nor that I myself was but a trapped and impotent observer—in fact, most infantile, my mind become an incongruous scene for historical horrors horribly personalized.

But enough, let me not pretend objectivity; my dream, being a dream, was absurd. For how else describe its mixture of obscene, historical and mythical elements? During the bright Roman day I had read my friend's questioning letter, and at night had fallen asleep reading Gilbert Murray's chapter on "Hamlet and Orestes," which here would seem to shed no light at all. Yet this immediately suggests, whatever its Freudian implications, a possible relationship between my dream and a pattern of classical tragedy: the hero-father murdered (for Lincoln is a kind of father of 20th-century America), his life evilly sacrificed and the fruits of his neglected labors withering some ninety years in the fields; the state fallen into corruption, and the citizens into moral anarchy, and with no hero come to set things right. Perhaps this is too far-fetched, but when living abroad one is compelled to look homeward through one's own inner eyes and through the objectives that lie at hand. Perhaps, therefore—any lens being better than no lens at all—the present optics provided by Murray's essay on tragedy will serve without too much distortion when we consider the possibility that the last true note of tragedy was sounded (and quickly muffled) in our land when the North buried Lincoln and the South buried Lee, and between them cast the better part, both of our tragic sense—except perhaps the Negroes'—and our capacity for tragic heroism into the grave. On the national scale, at least, this seems true. The sheet-covered figure in my dream might well have been General Robert E. Lee.

So I confess defeat, it is too complex for me to "tell it like it is." I can only suggest that here at least is how the Southern Congressmen's defiance of the Supreme Court joined with matters which bemused my writer's waking mind in Rome; this is how the incident "dreamed." For a writer who depends upon the imagination for his insights and his judgments, perhaps this is usually the way. Current events and events from the past, both personal and historical, ever collide within his interior life—either to be jumbled in the chaos of dream, or brought to ordered significance through the forms and techniques of his art. Following my defeat with the essay, I returned to my novel—which, by the way, has as its central incident the assassination of a Senator.

Rome 1956
New York 1965.

A century ago, the United States committed itself to the task of safeguarding individual rights for its individual citizens. THE NATION has never let go concerning itself with these rights and with individual people. It is a publication which has advanced the public interest and which understands that truthful speaking by an enlightened public is essential to a nation's well-being. I may disagree from time to time with editorial policy or with content, but I am always in hearty agreement with THE NATION'S willingness to speak out.

May THE NATION have another century of busy and active life.

—Rep. John V. Lindsay

THE PEOPLES OF AMERICA

NATHAN GLAZER

Mr. Glazer, former editor of Commentary (1944-54), holds a Ph.D. in sociology from Columbia University. Author of many ethnic studies, he now is a professor of sociology at the University of California (Berkeley).

THE HISTORY of ethnicity and ethnic self-consciousness in this country has moved in waves; we are now in a trough between two crests, and the challenge is to describe the shape and form of the next crest. That there will be another crest it is hardly possible to doubt. Since the end of European mass immigration to this country forty years ago we have waited for the subsidence of ethnic self-consciousness, and often announced it, and it has returned again and again. But each time it has returned in so different a form that one could well argue it was not the same thing returning at all, that what we saw was not the breakthrough of the consciousness of common origin and community among the groups that made America, but rather that ethnicity was being used as a cover for some other more significant force, which was borrowing another identity.

During the early years of the depression, ethnicity withdrew as a theme in American life. Both those who had urged the "Americanization" of the immigrant and the creation of "cultural pluralism" now had more important concerns. Immigration was matched by a counter-emigration back to the countries of origins; one episode of American history it seemed had come to an end. Then with the rise of Hitler the ethnic texture of American life began to reassert itself. First Jews; then Germans; then Czechs, Poles, Italians, and even the "old Americans," remembering their origins in England, all were spurred to action and organization by Hitler and the great war that he began. Samuel Lubell has traced how the support for Franklin D. Roosevelt in the great cities shifted from class to ethnicity, as the international conflict developed and various groups responded to, or against, Roosevelt as he displayed his sentiments and allegiances.

In 1945 this great crest began to withdraw. True, there was the continuing impact on ethnic groups of the confrontation with Russia and communism, but with the passage of time this began to lose its ethnic coloration. Catholics in general were more anti-Communist than others, Poles still more so, Jews much less so. But the international conflict was so sharply colored by ideology rather than national antagonism, that with the passage of time it no longer served to set group against group (as it had in the Hitler years). Soviet opposition to Israel and Soviet anti-Semitism; the rise of a measure of cautious Polish independence; de-Stalinization in Russia—all these developments softened the sharp conflicts which had created a powerful resonance among immigrants and their children in this country.

The Eisenhower period marked thus a new trough, and it was possible to conclude that the workings of the melting pot had been retarded only slightly by the Neolithic tribal ferocity of Hitler and the counter-reactions he evoked. But now a new wave began to gather force, a wave that had nothing to do with international affairs. Will Herberg interpreted the increased religious activity of the postwar years as a half-embarrassed means of maintaining group identity in a democratic society which did not look with favor on the long-continued maintenance of sharply distinguished ethnic groups. The "triple melting pot" theory of Ruby Jo Reeves Kennedy, along with her data on intermarriage, suggested that old ethnic lines were being replaced by new religious lines. The chameleon-like force of ancestral connection, one could argue, was being transmuted into the forms of religion. Those who were concerned for religion could of course take no comfort in this analysis, even if the religious denominations benefited from higher collections and new buildings. If our major religions are replacing ethnic groups, one could not yet herald the creation of a homogeneous and undivided American group consciousness in America, but at least our divisions no longer paralleled those of old Europe—something which had deeply troubled our leaders from Washington to Woodrow Wilson—but the more acceptable divisions of religion, which ostensibly had an older and more respectable lineage and justification. Thus, if Herberg could still discern the forces of ethnic identity at work in the new clothes of religious denominationalism, at least they no longer expressed themselves openly.

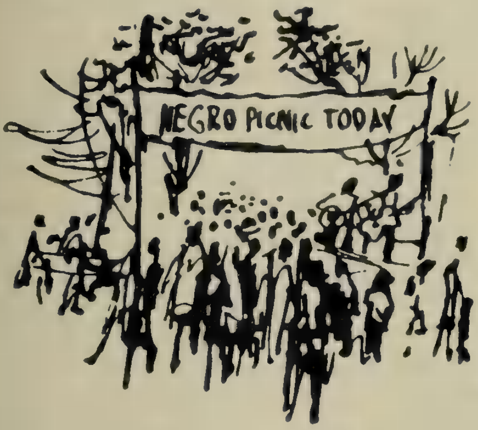
BUT ONCE AGAIN an unabashed ethnicity reasserted itself, in the campaign of John F. Kennedy and his brief Presidency. In his cabinet, for the first time, there sat a Jew of East European origin, an Italian American, a Polish American. If the Jews were no longer being appointed primarily to represent a group, there was no question that this was the explanation for the appointment of an Italian American and a Polish American. The Catholic President was reminded by everyone that he was an Irish President. He was the first President to be elected from an immigrant group that had suffered discrimination and prejudice, and that still remembered it—and those of us from later immigrant groups, who had experienced the lordly position of the Irish in the cities of the East, discovered only with some surprise that the Irish did remember their days as a degraded minority. Those who stemmed from the new immigration now realized that the Irish shared very much the same feelings of resentment at past treatment, of gratification in present accomplishment and recognition. But the old Americans too responded to the realization that they had an Irish President, as well as a Democratic, Catholic and intellectual President. Certainly it is hard to explain otherwise the mutual antagonism that rapidly sprang up between the new Administration and such a large part of the big business establishment, the seat of the old Americans, the "WASP" power. The Administration's policies were not antagonistic to big business. There was of course the President's violent response to the steel price rise, but was not that, too, a reflection—at least in part—of old ethnic images and conflicts? No one who spoke to anyone close to those events could doubt it.

I would suggest a gentle recession, if not a trough, in the period since President Kennedy's assassination. Two events to my mind suggest the retreat of an open and congratulatory ethnic self-assertiveness, and they are related. One is the new concern with the poor, which complementarily marks all the nonpoor as members of the same group, with the same social task laid upon them; and the second is the steady radicalization of the civil rights movement and Negro opinion, and this increasingly places all the whites in the same category, without distinction. And once again a symbolic political event marks the recession of ethnic self-consciousness: the accession of President Johnson, who, like President Eisenhower, comes from a part of America that was relatively unaffected by European immigration.

I have marked recurrent crests and troughs of ethnic self-consciousness by political events, but the political events have of course paralleled social events. The crisis of the depression erased for the moment ethnic memories and allegiances. The agony of the European peoples reawakened it. Prosperity and the rapid rise of the new immigrant groups to upper working-class and middle-class status again reduced their sense of difference. The security that came with long sustained prosperity made it possible for the descendants of despised immigrants to again take pleasure in their origins and their differences. One of the less observed effects of affluence is that it leads people to their real or hopefully reconstructed origins. In Europe and among Americans who look to the European upper classes this may mean acquiring crests, forebears, and antiques. Among the American descendants of European peasants and artisans, it meant, in a surprising number of cases, a new interest in the culture of the old country. But in the most recent period, the rise of the joint problems of poverty and the assimilation of the Negro raises a new set of questions. For the moment, ethnic self-assertiveness is in eclipse and even in bad odor. And the eclipse is directly related to the new problems.

MICHAEL HARRINGTON put the matter quite directly, when he said in a recent speech that the accumulated wisdom of the great European immigrant groups in this country has become irrelevant, for it will not help the current poor and it will not help the Negroes. In varying degrees, we are hearing the same from Louis Lomax, from James Baldwin, from Nat Hentoff, and from other supporters and defenders of Negro militancy. Inevitably the next wave of ethnic self-consciousness must reflect one of the most remarkable and least expected consequences of the Negro revolution—the growing estrangement between European ethnic groups and the Negroes. Its beginnings were studied by Samuel Lubell in the early postwar period, and we have seen the estrangement develop to the point where the fear of the white backlash—and this meant generally the backlash from recent white immigrant groups in the cities—became one of the major issues of the Goldwater-Johnson campaign. The separation, first the barest of lines, has deepened through conflicts over the adoption and administration of fair employment laws, fair housing laws, measures to combat de facto school segregation. The patterns under which and through which the European ethnic groups have lived—the trade unions and branches of industry dominated by one or a few ethnic groups, the ethnically concentrated neighborhood with its distinctive schools and churches and organizations—all have come under increasing attack. And thus the distinctive social patterns of the North and West, which the immigrant and the ethnic groups helped create, are now being slowly but surely turned into a Southern-like confrontation of white and black. The varied, more balanced and more creative ethnic conflicts of the North are now in danger of being transformed into the monolithic confrontation of the South.

In the South, Northern variety never developed. One great division dominated and smothered all others, the division between black and white. In this area, the European immigrant of the later 19th and early 20th century never penetrated. All he had to offer generally was unskilled labor, and in the South the unskilled labor was the work of Negroes. The white immigrant laborer refused to enter an area in which the laborer was degraded not only by his work but by a caste system, where wages were low, and racial conflict hindered trade union development and social legislation. The immigrant worked in the parts of the country where work had greater respect and was better rewarded. If he entered the South, it was more often as a merchant than as a worker.



But in the Northern cities, where almost half the Negroes now live, it was not inevitable that the same line of division should be imported from the South. The entry of the Negro into the Northern cities in great numbers during and after World War I and again during and after World War II raised a critical question: was he the last of the great immigrant groups? Would his experience parallel that of the Irish and the Poles and the Jews who had arrived as exploited and unskilled workers and had moved upward, at varying speeds, into middle-class occupations, the professions, business? How would those who were themselves children and grandchildren of recent immigrant waves view him? How would he view himself and his prospects? Against whom would he measure his circumstances? And would the inevitable conflicts between the poorer and the more prosperous resemble the conflicts between Yankees and Irish, Irish and Italians—or would they take the form of the far more deadly and longer established conflict between black and white? I feel the answers are still not given. They will be shaped both by the established ethnic groups and the Negro migrant. But I fear the answer from both sides will be . . . yes, the Negro is different.

It is impossible for the history of ethnic self-consciousness to escape from the impact of Negro urban migration, for all the waves of immigration have affected the self-consciousness of waves that came before. The old Americans reacted to the first great waves of immigrants of the forties and fifties of the 19th century with an exaggerated sense of their own high status and aristocratic connections. The early immigrants from each group withdrew from later immigrants, but were generally forced together with them because the old Americans imposed a common identity on them. The history of ethnic self-consciousness, it is clear, has not worked itself out independently of social and economic and political events. If anything, it has been a reaction to these events: the rise of one group, the occupancy of the bottom by another, the political conflicts of Europe, the sequence of immigration in each town and city and section. All these have helped mold ethnic self-consciousness, and its reflection in social activity, in political choice, in economic history.

But on the whole this self-consciousness, whatever its stages, has been marked by optimism and hope. I have described the Kennedy mood among the more recent and more sharply defined American ethnic groups as self-congratulation. Indeed it was that, though each of the groups might have found some basis for resentment rather than pride. The Irish had reached the heights of political success, and the Jews were prosperous, but both were still in large measure excluded from the pinnacles of economic power—the great banks, insurance companies, corporations. The Italians still were remarkably poorly represented in high political posts, and had a much smaller share in every establishment—economic, political, cultural—than the Jews, who had come at the same time and were less numerous. The Poles were even poorer. And yet such invidious comparisons—which the census made clear—were rarely made. All the new groups seem to have escaped from the difficult period of second generation self-depreciation and exaggerated Americanism. All seemed to wear ethnic connection with self-assurance. Certainly the growing prosperity of Europe, the increased trade with Europe, the wide acceptance of its consumer goods here, the large influence of European culture, all made the acceptance of one's ethnic connections easier—for by doing so, after all, one was no longer acknowledging poor relations. It was fascinating to remark upon the change in the image of the homeland among the more self-conscious and better educated descendants of the immigrants. Ireland was no longer the home of potatoes and cabbage, but of Joyce and the Abbey theatre, good Irish whiskey and Georgian architecture, horse-racing and tweeds. Italy became the land of chic, while Israel and Poland, if they could not compete in the arts of affluent consumption, became now paragons of political independence and heroism. Every group fortunately found something to admire in the old (or new) country, and found it easy to acknowledge the connection that had once been obscured.

But if this characterizes the most recent mood of ethnic self-consciousness, it is now challenged by the new Negro militancy and the theory on which it is reared. The self-congratulatory expressions are strangled in the throat. For a while, in the forties and fifties, when Jewish and Catholic groups worked effectively with Urban League and NAACP, with Negroes proud of having achieved middle-class status, the older ethnic groups and their representatives could present themselves as models and elder brothers—in community organization, group defense work, in cultural and political activity. But the radical Negro mood, and its growing reflection among intellectuals, turns all whites into exploiters, with old Americans, old immigrants, and new immigrants lumped together. The success of the ethnic groups—limited as it is for many—now becomes a reproach. Their very history, which each group has been so busy writing and reconstructing, now becomes an unspoken (and sometimes spoken) criticism of the Northern Negro. Both sides see it, and rush to explain themselves.

What after all is the history of the American ethnic groups but a history of group and individual adaptation to difficult circumstances? All the histories move in the same patterns. The immigrants arrive; they represent the poorest and least educated and most oppressed of their countries in Europe and Asia. They arrive ignorant of our language and customs, exploited and abused. They huddle together in the ghettos of the cities, beginning slowly to attend to their most immediate needs—organization for companionship, patterns of self-aid in crisis, churches for worship, schools to maintain the old culture. American society and government is indifferent to their needs and desires; they are allowed to do what they wish, but neither hindered nor aided. In this amorphous setting where no limits are set to group organization, they gradually form a community. Their children move through the public schools and perhaps advance themselves—if not, it may be the grandchildren who do. The children are embarrassed by the poverty and ignorance of the parents. Eventually they, or the grandchildren, learn to accept their origins as poverty and ignorance are overcome. They move into the spheres of American life in which many or all groups meet—the larger economy, politics, social life, education. Eventually many of the institutions created by the immigrants become a hindrance rather than a necessity; some are abandoned, some are changed. American society in the meantime has made a place for and even become dependent on some of these institutions, such as old-age homes and hospitals, adoption services and churches—these survive and perhaps flourish. More and more of these institutions become identified with the religious denomination, rather than the ethnic group as such.

NOTE ONE element of this history: demand on government plays a small role; response by government plays a small role. There is one great exception, the labor movement. But even the labor movement, which eventually found support in public law and government administrative structure, began its history as voluntary organization in the amorphous structure of American society, and achieved its first triumphs without, or even against, government.

Does this history have any meaning for the American Negro? This is the question that Jews and Japanese, Irish and Italians, Poles and Czechs ask themselves. Some new immigrant groups—Puerto Ricans and Mexicans—think it does have a meaning for them. They try to model their institutions on those of earlier immigrant groups. They show the same uncertainties and confusions over what to do with the culture and language they have brought with them. The militant Negro and his white allies passionately deny the relevance or even the truth of this history. It is white history; as white history it is also the history of the exploitation of the Negro, of the creation of privilege on the basis of his unpaid and forced labor. It is not history he can accept as having any meaning for him. His fate, he insists, has been far more drastic and frightful than any other, and neither Irish famines nor Jewish pogroms make the members of these groups brothers in understanding. The hatred with which he is looked upon by whites, he believes, has nothing in common with the petty prejudices that European immigrant groups have met. And the America of today, in which he makes his great and desperate effort for full equality, he asserts, has little in common with the America of mass immigration.

A subtle intervention of government in every aspect of social life, of economy, of culture, he insists, is necessary now to create justice. Every practice must now be scrutinized anew for its impact on this totally unique and incomparable group in American life. The neighborhood school, the civil service system, the personnel procedures of our corporations, the practices of small business, the scholarship systems of our states, the composition and character of our churches, the structure of neighborhood organization, the practices of unions—all, confronted with this shibboleth, fail. The Negro has not received his due, and the essence of all of them is therefore discrimination and exclusion, and the defense of privilege. It is no wonder that ethnic self-consciousness, after its brief moment of triumph, after its legitimization in American life, now turns upon itself in confusion. After all, it is these voluntary churches, organizations, hospitals, schools, and businesses that have become the pride of ethnic groups, and the seat of whatever distinctiveness they possess. It is by way of this participation that they have become part of the very fabric of American life. But the fabric is now challenged. And looked at from another perspective, the Negro perspective, the same structure that defends some measure of uniqueness by the same token defends some measure of discrimination and exclusion.

It is impossible for the ethnic groups in America, who have already moved through so many protean forms, to be unaffected by the civil rights revolution. For this raises the question of the status of the largest of American minority groups, the one most closely bound up with American history from its very beginnings. Chinese and Japanese, perhaps Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans can accept the patterns of development and gradual assimilation into American society that are exhibited in the history of the great European immigrant groups. For a while, some of us who studied this history and saw in its variety and flexibility some virtues for a mass, industrial society, which suppresses variety and flexibility in so many areas, hoped that the American Negro, as he entered the more open environments of Northern cities, could also move along the paths the European immigrant groups had followed.

We now wonder whether this hope was illusory. Whether it was the infection of Europeans with the virus of American racial prejudice; or the inability to confine the direct and violent conflict in the South; or the impact of slavery and Southern experience on the American Negro—it is clear, whatever the causes, that for one of the major groups in American life, the idea of pluralism, which has supported the various developments of other groups, has become a mockery. Whatever concrete definition we give to pluralism, it means a limitation of government power, a relatively free hand for private and voluntary organizations to develop their own patterns of worship, education, social life, residential concentration, and even their distinctive economic activity. All of these inevitably enhance the life of one group; from the perspective of the American Negro they are inevitably exclusive and discriminatory.

THE GENERAL ideas that have justified the development of the ethnic group in America have never been too well explicated. We have tended to obscure the inevitable conflicts between individual group interest and national interest, even when they have occurred, rather than set down sharp principles to regulate the ethnic groups. If an ethnic group interest clashed with a national interest, we have been quite ruthless and even extreme in overriding the group interest. Thus two World Wars radically diminished the scale and assertiveness of German-American group life. But we have never fully developed what is permitted and what is not. Now a new national interest is becoming defined—the final liquidation of Negro separation, in all areas of our life: the economic, the social, the cultural, the residential. In every area, Negro separation, regardless of its causes, is seen as unbearable by Negroes. Inevitably this must deeply mark the future development of American ethnic groups, whose continuance contributes, in some measure, to this separation. Recently in this country there has been a positive attitude to ethnic distinctiveness. Oscar Handlin and others have argued that it does not divide the nation or weaken it in war; rather it helps integrate the immigrant groups and adds a rich strand of variety to American civilization. Now a new question arises: what is its effect on the Negro?

Perhaps, ironically, the final homogenization of the American people, the creation of a common nationality replacing all other forms of national connection, will now come about because of the need to guarantee the integration of the Negro. But I believe the group character of American life is too strongly established and fits too many individual needs to be so completely suppressed. Is it not more likely that as Negro demands are in varying measure met, the Negro too will accept the virtues of our complex society, in which separation is neither forbidden nor required, but rather tolerated? Perhaps the American Negro will become another ethnic group, accepted by others and accepting himself.

C. VANN WOODWARD

FLIGHT FROM HISTORY
The Heritage of the Negro

Born in Arkansas, Mr. Woodward spent most of his professional teaching career in the South. Now Sterling Professor of History at Yale University, he is the author of The Strange History of Jim Crow and of other histories of the South and of Southern mores.

EMERGING SLOWLY from the crippling handicaps of the past since World War II, Negro Americans have been seeking some viable conception of their history, some meaningful way of relating the past to the present and the future. They have responded to this problem with a variety of solutions, some of them quite contradictory and mutually incompatible. The simplest and most drastic solution is to turn their back upon the past, to reject history outright. A second is to identify themselves with the past, the legends and the myths of some other group. A third is to make over the past on some heroic model in order to furnish a crutch for racial pride and self-esteem. All of these solutions have a common source in a misguided sense of shame and self-hatred.

The most extreme of the solutions, the complete rejection of the past, is commonly though not invariably associated with attitudes toward the period of slavery. "I do not think I would be stretching a point," writes one Negro historian, "by saying that the bulk of Negro scholarship reveals a sense of shame on our past for the period of slavery." In reacting to an issue of a popular magazine devoted to the history of slavery, a Baltimorean declares, "It is high time we buried atrocious reminders of our shameful past." And a professional historian, writing not long before some of the most revisionary and liberating studies of slavery had been made, says, "Let it be declared here and now that for the purposes of Negro history . . . the topic of slavery in the United States has been virtually exhausted." Further study would be a "further waste of time."

Rejection of the past since the period of slavery has been urged by Negroes as well as by well-meaning white advisers who regard all history as some sort of curse, an incubus upon progress. "History, white and black," declared a speaker at Tuskegee Institute recently, "has defeated us too long. And I want free of that history, that burden. The good South wants free of it too." A white civil rights worker and trained historian feels that "we are too much impressed with the power of the past" and that "history has become a burden rather than a guide." He would somehow blot it from public memory. And a white anthropologist addressing a race conference advises that "the norms of the past have been transcended," and that "the American Negro no longer has to seek a past."

An alternative to the radical solution of rejecting the past completely is identification with the history, tradition and religion of another ethnic or national group. This solution, rarely endorsed by intellectual leaders, usually finds expression in popular cults with charismatic leaders and mass following. Remoteness in time or space or cultural origins proves no impediment to such identifications. The Black Muslims appropriate without compunction the myth, symbols and religion of Islam. The Black Jews of Harlem, a smaller sect, conceive of themselves as descendants of Ethiopian Hebrews and the lost tribes of Israel. Back-to-Africa movements have come and gone for more than a century, each with a strained and artificial identification with African myth and heritage. But only since World War II, and more particularly in the last decade and the sudden emergence of some thirty new independent African republics from white colonial rule, have Negro Americans at large been stirred by impulses of identification with African history and myth in the making.

Another alternative is a bold recreation of the past, a reshaping of history to meet present needs, inspire courage, and promote race pride. For the Negro, writes Arthur A. Schomburg, "group tradition must supply compensation for persecution, and pride of race the antidote for prejudice. History must restore what slavery took away. . ." History should be guided by a "purpose-philosophy," writes one historian. "Negro History is quite different from the study of the Negro. Frankly, the former differs from the latter in that Negro History has a purpose which is built upon faith." This all sounds very much like the "purpose-philosophy" of certain schools of white history, hauntingly similar to much of Southern history. There are, of course, perfectly sound Negro historians who do not accept this philosophy. But in the opinion of the sociologist Arnold Rose, "The whole tendency of the Negro History movement—not as history but as propaganda—is to encourage the average Negro to escape the realities—the actual achievements and the actual failures—of the present."

BEFORE NEGRO Americans in the excitement of their revolution carry their experiments with the past any further or become more deeply committed to the total rejection, the false substitutions or the purposive recreation of history, they would do well to consider the actual historical environment in which they were fated to conduct their struggle for equality during the century since the Civil War. They might gain thereby some appreciation of the handicaps history imposed on their struggle—exceptionally harsh handicaps that were not of their own making. And they might at the same time purge themselves of the false shame that has inspired their misguided experiments with history.

History usually confounds more prophecies than it confirms, but it takes its time about doing so and by the time the prophecies are fully confounded they have usually been forgotten. One useful preliminary perspective of the century of American Negro history since 1865 may be gained by a brief survey of the forgotten and confuted prophecies made about the future of the freedmen at the time of their emancipation. They were not the prognostications of fanatics and cranks, but views endorsed by men of learning or responsible statesmen and sometimes widely entertained among the citizenry. In origin they were exclusively white and predominantly Northern, and they were preponderantly pessimistic. Optimism about the Negro, even among his friends and champions, was rare and continued to be rare for a long time.

The following predictions are listed as samples in no particular order: (1) that American Negroes were a disappearing race doomed to early extinction under the exposures and competitions of freedom, a view that continued to crop up for two decades; (2) that their best hope for peaceful survival lay in deportation and colonization abroad, a panacea to which President Lincoln clung to the end; (3) a variation on the same theme, that free Negroes could not live in peace among whites and should be isolated on reservations like the Indians; (4) that they would quickly swarm over the North in a mass exodus from the South and meet a hostile reception, a phobia prevalent in many parts of the North; (5) that they could never fit into a democracy as citizens fully qualified for self-government; (6) that gradual loss of racial distinctiveness through amalgamation was the only hope, that this would take ages, and that in any case it would be a solution abhorrent to the white majority.

THE BLEAK climate of expectations in which freedom was born was to grow even less friendly to Negro aspirations of equality, full citizenship and assimilation as the century drew to a close and the new century started. It is in fact hard to find a period of history less congenial to the success of the movement than the eighty years following the end of the Civil War. From the start the equality movement was haunted by a fateful coincidence of ideas and events at home and abroad deeply antagonistic to the experiment. If the American struggle for national independence had been conducted under historical handicaps half so heavy, it is doubtful that it would have lasted very long, if indeed it could have been carried off at all. Any attempt to understand the failures, regressions and betrayals of American race policy during the century that has just ended will have to take into account those fateful handicaps.

One large category of these handicaps was ideological. The first half-century of Negro freedom in America happened to coincide with the dominance of racism in Western thought generally and American social theory in particular. It is true that American racism did not start with Darwin, and the Southern variety owed nothing at all to him. But after Darwin the vulgar dogma of race superiority found a reputable rationale. This was provided not by what Darwin himself wrote, but by unwarranted analogies his followers drew between biological and social organisms, between natural selection among lower species and conflict between nations, classes and races. Genetic symbols rapidly took priority over all others in social thought. This meant that the high incidence of poverty, illiteracy, disease and crime among Negroes was attributed to race and held to be congenital and unalterable.

This fashion of thought infected virtually all levels and classes of white society. It even permeated the Negro's old anti-slavery friends and Abolitionist allies and penetrated the ranks of Radical Republicans who framed the first Civil Rights Acts, the Reconstruction Acts, and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Even in these measures—the very legal foundation for the new order of freedom and equality—can be found the compromises, half-measures, and ambivalences that are in essence concessions to racism. Even THE NATION, founded in 1865 by Abolitionists as successor to The Liberator, had made concessions before a year was out that alienated the founders and disappointed the freedmen. Some of the Abolitionists themselves soon began to mouth the stereotypes of race and repudiate their equalitarian doctrines. The party of liberation and reconstruction was ready to repudiate its equalitarian principles before it had completed a decade of the reconstruction experiment.

IN THE post-Reconstruction era the liberals, reformers, mugwumps and intellectuals who might have been expected to carry on the defense of principles after politicians had abandoned them were swept along in the current of racist thought. The Adams brothers, Henry, Charles Francis and Brooks, had nothing to say of the Negro's betrayal. Leading academic figures such as Charles H. Cooley, Richard T. Ely, John R. Commons and E. A. Ross were often democratic idealists, but they also subscribed to racism of one variety or another and left the Negro out of their vital concerns. Social Gospel clergyman Josiah Strong, Washington Gladden, Walter Rauschenbusch and George T. Herron were outspoken critics of economic and social injustices of their time, but some of them were of the racist persuasion and none of them proved aware of the Negro's special plight.

Negro labor had found something more than rhetorical hospitality from the old Knights of Labor in their heyday, and after their collapse in the mid-eighties the American Federation of Labor kept up a show of cordiality. By the end of the century, however, the A. F. of L. was in full retreat on the race issue. Much as the federal government evaded responsibility by deferring to the states, the Federation of Labor deferred to the autonomous unions that restricted or excluded Negro membership. Samuel Gompers welcomed "with much pleasure" the affiliation of railroad brotherhoods and other unions that were among the worst offenders against Negro workers. Racial discrimination and exclusion spread unchecked through the trade unions.

The Socialist Party of America appeared to get off to a strong start in 1901 at its first convention by adopting, in spite of significant opposition, a resolution inviting the Negro to join the party on a status equal with white men. But the resolution was quickly forgotten and reference to the Negro disappeared from party platforms and resolutions as racism spread among the members during the very years of greatest Socialist strength. Victor Berger, the first Socialist elected to Congress and a representative of Milwaukee, the strongest Socialist city, was an outspoken believer in Negro inferiority and an advocate of white supremacy. Other prominent Socialists who took the white-supremacy line included H. Gaylord Wilshire, Ernest Untermann, J. Stitt Wilson and Alexander Jonas. A. J. Wayland, a prominent Socialist editor, was a strict segregationist. Racism in some measure infected nearly all factions, though some, like Untermann and John Spargo, combined expressions of sympathy for the Negro with explicit disavowal of what they called "social equality." Even Eugene Debs, a sincere friend of the Negro, nevertheless felt impelled to disavow "social equality" and to deplore the present "animalism" of the Negro. Jim Crow Socialist locals were the rule in the South and not unknown outside.

As the conscience of the Progressive Movement, the muckrakers performed an indispensable service to reform by exposing injustice, corruption and wrong doing. They probed into a remarkable variety of aspects of American life, sometimes superficially, sometimes deeply. But with the exception of Ray Stannard Baker, who published Following the Color Line in 1907, they proved largely indifferent to the Negro and racial injustice.

The greatest blind spot of the whole Progressive generation was the Negro. Never was the "invisible man" quite so invisible as he was to this highly ethical, idealistic, liberal and reform-minded group of men. They looked at him, but they saw only stereotypes. They thought about him, but only in defeatist and negative terms. They legislated about him, but only to protect white privilege. They litigated about him, but only to weaken constitutional protection of his rights. Under Progressive government, national and state and local, the Negro's status deteriorated steadily. With Progressive connivance, or permission, or encouragement, Jim Crowism made its most rapid gains for legal sanction, disfranchisement was carried to its greatest extent, economic and social discrimination reached its peak, and constitutional guarantees of civil rights were reduced to a new low. As one Progressive described the process, "The more white men recognize sharply their kinship with their fellow whites, and the more democracy in every sense of the term spreads among them, the more the Negro is compelled to 'keep his place.' " Progressivism and racism, one and inseparable.

THE RACISM of the Progressives had the endorsement of the highest authority and their foremost spokesmen, including the two most famous Presidents they elected. Theodore Roosevelt is often remembered for inviting Booker Washington to dine at the White House. But he never repeated this "mistake," as he later called it, and he went further than any of his predecessors since President Rutherford B. Hayes in appeasing Southern prejudice. "Now as to the negroes!" he wrote Owen Wister in 1906, "I entirely agree with you that as a race and in the mass they are altogether inferior to the whites." He privately pronounced the enfranchisement of the Negro a terrible error and thought the restoration of the francise would reduce the South to the level of Haiti. Under the Wilson administration Negro employees in the Washington bureaucracy were segregated with the President's approval. "I would say that I do approve of the segregation that is being attempted in several of the departments," wrote Wilson, and added that segregation was "distinctly to the advantage of the colored people themselves."

Nothing occurred in the 1920s to mitigate official race policy and much occurred, including the recrudescence of the Ku Klux Klan on a national basis, to intensify popular race phobias. In the depression decade social crises of a different character preoccupied national attention. Racist rhetoric was alien to the style and temper of the New Deal, and some of its reformers made the Negro a special object of concern in welfare programs. But the fundamental approach of the New Deal toward the Negro was paternalistic rather than equalitarian. The basic structure of segregation, disfranchisement, discrimination and subordination was rarely challenged, and gestures of protest were largely ineffectual. White supremacy made itself thoroughly at home in the councils of the New Deal. The country entered World War II under a government in which this congeniality remained virtually undisturbed and proceeded, unembarrassed by any real sense of inconsistency, to fight a crusade against the racist ideology of enemy powers.

In the meantime, working within the national climate of opinion that prevailed with only temporary fluctuations from 1865 to 1945, Southern whites experienced little difficulty in confining the Negro in the South to the degree of subordination required by dominant white opinion. Even during the brief interval of Radical Reconstruction under federal military protection the exceptions were relatively few and the difficulties minimal. It is absurd to speak of "Negro domination" in any Southern state during Reconstruction. White domination in various combinations, native or Northern, prevailed throughout the region in that period. After Reconstruction the Negro continued to vote in large numbers in most Southern states, to hold office in several, and to send a few representatives to Congress from the South down through the end of the 19th century. That in itself served as some check upon the deterioration of their status. White racial extremists, moreover, were not yet dominant in the South. So long as white conservatives retained control they maintained a tacit political alliance with the Negro against white rivals and dissenters. In return conservatives provided the Negro some degree of paternalistic protection against extremist aggression. In their struggle against conservative rule, white agrarian radicals in various third-party organizations attempted to attract Negro support for their own movements, most notably the Populist movement of the nineties. As bad as his plight was in the South, therefore, the Negro was not without protection of some sort.

Toward the end of the 19th century these various restraints on racial aggression began to collapse. To protect their own power the conservatives gave rein to race extremists and called for white unity against the Negro. Populists responded to the race issue and together the white man's party proceeded to deprive the Negro of what remaining protection the law provided. The most important step was disfranchisement, which was virtually complete by 1910 and quite thorough. The Negro quickly disappeared from the polls, the petty offices, the jury lists, and such small political patronage as he had enjoyed. Segregation had been informal, erratic and extra-legal up to the nineties, but then became legal, rigidly enforced, and universal. Jim Crowism advanced to fantastic extremes, and more and more doors of opportunity closed. Negro workmen were driven from crafts and occupations they had long practiced and some they had virtually monopolized. The 20th century witnessed a degradation in status that the Negro had not known since emancipation.

National consent and approval kept pace with Southern developments. The sections were never far apart on race policy. All retreated more or less in step toward reactionary extremes. Acquiescence and endorsement came from press and pulpit, from Congress and Supreme Court, and flowed from the highest levels of American moral and intellectual aristocracy. On a trip through the South in 1907, Henry James found himself at once able to share and sympathize with the Southern point of view. He was "introduced at a bound to the formidable question, which rose suddenly like some beast that had sprung from the jungle," and he "understood at a glance." In the same year President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard likewise called for sympathetic understanding of the South and its segregation system. "Perhaps if there were as many Negroes here as there," he wrote, "we might think it better for them to be in separate schools. . . . If they were equal in numbers or in a majority, we might deem a separation necessary."

The fateful coincidence of history since 1865 that haunted the Negro's strivings at home was matched by a climate of opinion and a calendar of events abroad that was equally hostile to his aspirations. Emancipation and enfranchisement of the African in America coincided with European colonization of the African in Africa and the rapid partitioning of the continent by imperial powers. Before 1861 there had been no permanent European settlement to speak of south of the Sahara Desert, save in South Africa and the few scattered Portuguese plantations. But with the annexation of Senegal by Napoleon III in 1861 the great partitioning and colonization of the continent began. Belgium took the Congo basin, Germany seized vast expanses of eastern and southwestern Africa, and England staked out a huge empire stretching from Cairo to the Cape. The Europeans who were engaged in these imperial enterprises could hardly have been less morally concerned with the fate of the abortive experiment of African equality in America, or more sympathetic with American doctrines of innate Negro inferiority that were thwarting the experiment. The international climate of imperialism was as unfriendly as the domestic climate of racism.

When the United States belatedly shouldered its share of the white man's burden overseas it took direct or indirect dominion over more people of color abroad than it had within its continental borders. In doing so it not only imported all the fashionable European attitudes but isolated its own colored population from such sympathy and support as might have come from other people of color. And at the same time it involved the entire nation in policies of racial discrimination and oppression abroad that were thereby given further license and encouragement at home.

THAT IS THE historical predicament from which American Negroes have only lately begun to emerge. Their predicament was to be caught in a confrontation with the white man throughout the years of his greatest racial arrogance, when his will could not be seriously challenged anywhere in the world and all races bowed to his rule. In America the Negro was not sustained, as were the subject races of Asia, India and Africa, by an unbroken cultural heritage and the presence of his own kind in force. He faced his ordeal as an isolated minority newly emerged from two and a half centuries of a bondage that had stripped him of his native culture and left him defenseless before his enemies. That he survived at all is remarkable, but that some should regard the achievement with shame is even more so. Only a people who have endured such an ordeal and could draw upon the collective wisdom of the experience could have marshaled the patience, the restraint and the discipline under the most intense provocation in their great movement of protest. Gerald W. Johnson calls their determined adherence to nonviolence in the South "a demonstration of political maturity that is among the most impressive in all history." Before the Negro turns his back on his own history, or exchanges it for the tradition of another people, or invents a false history for himself, he might try to appreciate the value of the special heritage that is his own.

Sometimes I have thought over the half-century I've read THE NATION that I could get along without it—among all the periodicals demanding my attention. But I found I just couldn't. I need its confirmation of my views just as I need its critical dissent from them. Always alert, never irrelevant, hard-hitting in advocacy or opposition, it has remained faithful under all its editors to the principles of its founders.

—Roger N. Baldwin

THE SOUTH REVISITED

A contemporary observer follows in the footsteps of another reporter, John Richard Dennett, who 100 years ago toured the post-bellum South for the new Nation. Extracts from Mr. Dennett's century-old series immediately follow Mr. Zinn's article.

HOWARD ZINN

Mr. Zinn taught for seven years at a predominantly Negro college in Atlanta, Ga., where he was Chairman of the Department of History and active in the civil rights movement. He is now Associate Professor of Government at Boston University. He has written extensively on civil rights. His latest book, New Deal Thought, will be published soon by Bobbs Merrill.

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA. On the Piedmont plane from Washington to Lynchburg at dusk, a plump-faced man in a business suit began a conversation, his accent soft-Southern:

"You going to Lynchburg? So am I. I'm in the pharmaceutical business. Just come from Baltimore, trying to find me a salesman there. . . . Understanding people is the main thing in selling. . . . It's like this whole business now with the nigra. Why naturally the nigra's going to demand his rights so long as he's oppressed. And naturally the white man's going to oppress him so long as he can get away with it. . . . I don't know what your religion is, but this is what I like about Christianity—it preaches moderation. . . .

"Now look, I can tell a nigra's voice any day of the week. I was brought up on a farm outside Greenville, South Carolina, and I played with nigra boys, wrestled with them, fished with them. I can tell their talk anywhere, through a wall, through a curtain, on the telephone, anywhere. Well, in Baltimore, this fellow calls me up for an appointment. Very nice, intelligent, credentials first-rate, I couldn't tell a thing from his voice. We made an appointment, he came to the hotel, walked up to me in the lobby. A good-looking nigra, neat, pleasant. We shook hands and talked. I told him I'd let him know later about my decision. Would our company hire a nigra? I don't know. I would. The world's coming in on the South. . . ." [Compare with item 1 of Mr. Dennett's 1865 report.—Ed.]

On a hill south of Lynchburg, an old Negro man, short and thin, in a blue Air Force jacket too big for him, stood outside his wooden cabin and talked, looking out on the road most of the time and only occasionally a quick glance at me. Rain came suddenly and drenched us, and we went up on his porch. A little Negro girl peered through the window at us, disappeared, then came back and looked some more.

"No, this is my son's jacket. I got a pension from the first war. My wife works in a dry cleaning place in town, and my son's in the laundry. He's a washer, been there a long time. They throws the clothes in and he washes them. Got two other sons, they works in a foundry in town, makes good money, maybe a hundred dollars a week. Then they start taking off from that and it's not that much. . . .

"Farmin's poor here. I just got two acres. Used to grow tobacco. Now they won't let you grow but an acre. Grow two rows more and they come along and pull it up. They gives you lime to keep the soil good, but all they let you grow is grass. Used to grow wheat, oats, sell them. No more. Oh, I got a half acre planted now, a little onions, cabbage, peas. Too cold to grow potatoes. Yes, the old folks stay, the young ones go, off here, there, everywhere in the world. They work, make just enough for themselves, can't send nothing back to their daddy. Folks remaining here, they go off during the day to work, in Lynchburg, Bedford, far away as Roanoke—fifty miles each way, every day. Farmin's bad around here."

Farther down the road, two Negro women in a two-room cabin of stone and wood invited me into the living room. One of them, slim, animated, with bright red lipstick and a high-pitched voice, did all the talking, while the other sat nearby, not saying anything but smiling at me, nodding her head in agreement with what the other was saying, occasionally interposing "That's right, that's right." A boy of six sat nearby, silent, listening. The walls had dozens of calendar photos, including one of Jesus and one of President Kennedy, and there were hundreds of little knickknacks all over the room. The bed was covered with clothes to be ironed. Nearby was an old TV set and a damaged piano. "Got the piano last year," the woman said, "but it got to be tuned." She waved her hand at the crowded room. "White folks gave me all these.

"No, we got no running water. We'll be putting in a pump soon though. We carry the water from the well, once, twice a day, heat it on the wood stove in the kitchen. Me, I work for a trained nurse. My boy here was playing in her house with her little boy—they got lots of toys all over the house—and she called me over and said, 'Look how my little boy doesn't know about color—they're just having so much fun together.' Yes, he's going to school next year; we got one school integrated—just a little. One ain't."

She pointed to the other woman. "She works in town for other folks. They calls her on the phone at her sister-in-law down the road. White folks been good to us. My house burned down, everybody got together and built me a new one. Folks around here get along fine. Yes, we had a few sit-ins downtown, five and dime is integrated now. But those people on the March in Alabama. They're silly, just plain silly!

"We do different kinds work around here. According to our education—you know what I mean. They classify us, fourth grade, sixth grade, eighth grade. And we get jobs by that. . . . No, I don't vote. It's no use voting. No, no one here stops me from voting. I don't see any point to it. They'll do what they want anyhow. I won't make any difference. . . ." [Compare Dennett's II.]

* * *

On the road from Lynchburg, a poster signified the South: "Sister Christine—Palm Reader." The highway raced the railroad, close alongside, twenty-five miles to Appomattox. The earth beside the highway was angry red where machines had worked. It was early morning, and two Negro girls piled high with books were squirming, trying to keep them intact while waiting for the school bus. Nearby a tiny white girl with a pleated coat and high, yellow stockings raced across a debris-littered field to climb onto a pile of stones, earth, grass, out of which stuck an uprooted, mutilated tree.

A few miles distant, where a cool wind blew unchecked across an open field, was a green granite plaque reading: "Here on Sunday, April 9, 1865, after four years of heroic struggle in defense of principles believed fundamental to the existence of our government, Lee surrendered 9000 men, the remnants of an army still unconquered in spirit, to 118,000 men under Grant." An iron gate enclosed nineteen tiny blackened stones, representing eighteen Confederate soldiers and one Union soldier, who had died on the day before the surrender was signed. [Compare Dennett's III.]

JOHN'S ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA. Out to John's Island, across a neck of water from Charleston, the road is rutted and muddy. There was a shattered bridge across a creek, little houses widely separated, three boys moving through the woods. Negroes turned from slaves to sharecroppers after the Civil War and some bought pieces of land for themselves. But the sons left, and the old folks couldn't pay the taxes, so white farmers bought them out. "Just me one in this house," an old Negro woman said.

Down the road was the "courthouse" where the magistrate, virtual king of the island, held court in an incredibly tiny white wooden box. In front of an auto graveyard, where even the earth was rusty, a Negro woman lived in an old storage shed. In the front yard, a little girl washed clothes in two basins, while her brother rode his twisted bike crazily through the mud.

Back in the middle of the island, in a glen under huge spreading oaks thick with Spanish moss, a white man and a Negro were unloading bright-colored fertilizer sacks from a truck. They were about to plant 600 acres of beans and cabbage. "No, we're not both farmers," the white man said firmly. "I farm. He's workin!"

Down the road, near a planted field, with hens puttering all around, a young white girl, thin, pimply-faced, held a healthy-looking baby and walked beside her seven-year-old sister. She talked, at first carefully, then more and more at ease. "This is my daddy's land. He plants peanuts and cabbage. But we're moving to the mainland. He'll come back just for sowing and harvesting. Can't live here no more. Got no one for this little girl to be friend with." She pointed to a cluster of Negro children playing a hundred feet down the road. "Nothin but nigger kids to play with, and daddy won't let us play with nigger kids. They sicknin, they ugly, that's why."

Later, on the island, in the house of folklorist Guy Carawan and his wife Candie, I pored over the recorded musings of Negroes living on the island:

"The world is a lot of better now; day is past and gone the people use lamps. This is a lot of change, this electric light. In my time coming up people had jimbo light—you put oil in any kind of bottle, and light 'em for see by. Jimbo light. You must pull the string now, your house light go up . . . My mother died and gone when I's a girl. Said: 'I may died and gone, but you going see things fly up in the air!' And it's so. The airplane carrying you across, any which way you want to go."

Another: "Whoopin cough, that's what my baby had. Fiddler crab—some little thing down the creek run back in the hole—well you catch that, you put something else along with that, and you boil em. And once you done boil em, you strain em through a white cloth or a strainer. That'll cure whoopin cough. . . ."

Children talking—

Girl: "In Charleston I see a colored girl go with a white boy—people I don't know. People around here say that's a disgrace. I don't say is a disgrace."

Johnny: "See lot of em in New York. Lot."

Girl: "My friend told me that she was in New York. And she go sit down on the step or somethin like that, and she watch the girls and boys—the white boys and the colored girls—go by, and they stand right up in the street, and kiss each other."

Johnny: "If they did that on John's Island, the Mayor would come out. Mayor!"

A young girl: "We go dance at 'gressive Club, and Fields, and Bernard. . . . We do just dances out now. The Jerk, the Camel Walk, and Shake, and the Twine Time. Some old dance been out, the Twist, the Mocking Bird, and the Dog, the Bird, the Fly, the Swim. The people who sing the record come on the television first, and so they is get the dance from the people."

A woman: "I am a mother of ten head of kids. That's enough. Lost three and raise seven head; lost one and got six head. So God take good care of me. . . . My daughter Hattie have to work. She got two head of kids. . . . She housework. She go on in with the husband in the morningtime, and she don't be home 'fore seven cause she have wait on husband till he knock off. You know we have to bum for catch a ride back. I do work. I work on the farm. But now my old man sick. Willis sick and I cannot work, cause I have to take care of him. Some days I don't know how I going to lay my weary head, how we going make it." [Compare Dennett's IV.]

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA. The march from Selma, a little over halfway along, turned into a field a hundred yards off the main highway to Montgomery, deep in Lowndes County ("a bad county") and settled down for the night. The field was pure mud, so deep one's shoes went into it to the ankles, and to pull out after each step was an effort. A chunk of moon shone, the sky was crowded with stars, and yet the field was enveloped in blackness. Two huge tents went up, one for men, one for women, and inside people spread plastic sheets over the mud, unrolled their sleeping bags, lay down, weary.

There were three hundred of them, the "core" of the Long March, mostly black people from Selma, Marion and other little towns in central Alabama, but also young Negroes from the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and some white people, young and old, from all over the nation. Space under the tents was soon gone, so people sprawled outside along the mired road that cut through the field.

At the edge of the field were gathered the jeeps and trucks of the U.S. Army, soldiers in full battle dress, called out finally by Presidential order after thirty days of murder and violence in Alabama and cries of protest through the country.

Moving through the darkness in and out of sleeping forms on the ground were men with white ragged emblems marked "Security." They carried walkie-talkies, the aerials glinting, and communicated with one another across the encampment. There was a central transmitter in a parked truck. People coming in off the main highway were checked at the end of the mud road by two husky "Security" men, young Episcopalian priests with turned-around collars. One of them said: "I don't really know who to let in. If he's black I let him through."

Lying down in the darkness near the road, I could hear the hum of the portable generators and an occasional burst of sound on a walkie-talkie. The plastic sheet under me was soaked in mud and slime, but the inside of the sleeping bag was dry. Two hundred feet away, in a great arc around the field, were fires lit by soldiers on guard through the night.

I awoke just before dawn, with a half-moon pushing, flat side first, through the clouds. The soldiers' fires at the perimeter were low now, but still burning. Nearby, the forms of perhaps twenty people wrapped in sleeping bags or blankets. The generator still whirred. Other clusters of sleepers were now visible, beginning to awaken.

A line formed for oatmeal, hardboiled eggs, coffee. Then everyone gathered to resume the march. A Negro girl washed her bare feet, then her sneakers, in a stream alongside the road. Near her was a minister, his black coat streaked with mud. A Negro woman without shoes had her feet wrapped in plastic. Andy Young was calling over the main transmitter to Montgomery: "Get us some shoes; we need forty pairs of shoes, all sizes, for women and kids who been walking barefoot the past 24 hours."

An old Negro man took his place beside me for the march. He wore a shirt and tie under his overalls, also an overcoat and a fedora hat, and used a walking stick to help him along. "Yes, I was in Marion the night Jimmy Jackson was shot by the policeman. They got bullwhips and sticks and shotguns, and they jab us with the electric poles."

At exactly 7 A.M. an Army helicopter fluttered overhead and the march began, behind an American flag, down to the main highway and on to Montgomery. The marchers sang: "FreeDOM! FreeDOM! Freedom's Coming and It Won't Be Long!"

It was seventeen miles to the edge of Montgomery, the original straggling line of three hundred thickening by the hour as thousands joined, whites and Negroes who had come from all over the country. There was sunshine most of the way, then three or four bursts of drenching rain. On the porch of a cabin set way back from the road, eight tiny Negro children stood in a line and waved, an old hobby horse in the front yard. A red-faced, portly Irishman, newly-arrived from Dublin, wearing a trench coat, held the hand of a little Negro boy who walked barefoot next to him. A Greyhound bus rode past with Negro kids on the way to school. They leaned out the window, shouting "Freedom!" A one-legged young white man on crutches, a black skullcap over red hair, marched along quickly with the rest. Two Negro boys with milky sun lotion smeared on their faces looked as if they had stepped off the stage in Genêt's The Blacks. A group of white workingmen along the road watched silently. On the outskirts of Montgomery, students poured out of a Negro high school, lined the streets, waved and sang as the marchers went by. A jet plane zoomed close overhead and everyone stretched arms to the sky, shouting, "FREEDOM! FREEDOM!" [Compare Dennett's V.]

VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI. As I paid my bill at a motel just outside of Jackson, Mississippi, an attractive young Negro couple, smartly dressed, came down the stairs and into the lobby. A white man, sunburned, in shirt sleeves, leaned on the desk, staring at the couple. The motel manager said, apologetically: "Mississippi school teachers." The white man said: "Should charge them thirty dollars a day!" The manager was silent.

Somehow, I was back on Highway 80, the same that went from Selma to Montgomery, here running west from Jackson to Vicksburg and the Mississippi River. A dirt road cut off towards the horizon and a Negro man on a wagon pulled by two mules waited for a chance to cross the highway. He was glad to talk a while.

"Oh I got plenty of time. Don't have to be where I'm going until maybe about three. Got cottonseed cakes in the wagon, for the cows to eat. You know, cows will eat cotton too, right off the ground, just cause it's white. Funny how it is, we grows the seed, then buys it back from the mill, dollar and a quarter a hundred pound sack. . . . No, these ain't mine. Man I work for, he's got over a hundred cattle. His land goes a mile. I don't make enough to talk about. Three dollars a day. I work three days a week sometimes. And I got six children out the house. You come out less than you started. . . ."

* * *

The highway approaches the Mississippi just south of Vicksburg, the river impressive at that point, wide, slow, misty, the opposite shore dim, the Yazoo River sweeping in from the Northeast. In the bend near the shore were railroad tracks, storage bins, smoke gushing from stacks, and the sound of engines.

In Vicksburg, the county courthouse carried a sign that it was built under Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Public Works Administration. Inside the Registry office, on the counter, were two massive books bound in red leather. One was inscribed: Warren County Marriage Record—White; the other: Warren County Marriage Record—Colored.

Two miles up the river, I turned into the yard of a large feed mill and signed in at the shack of a guard before being allowed to go to the president's office. A distinguished-looking man, with an accent mildly Southern, he was at first wary and unsmiling, but soon became more friendly.

"This is, I guess, the biggest mill in the area. No, I don't own it. It's part of a big Mississippi company that has all sorts of diversified interests: feed mills, grain merchandising, breeder flocks of broilers, hatcheries—maybe 200,000 layers and 60,000 dozen eggs a week—hog operations, meat packing, steel, paper. I guess 20-25 families control the majority of stock; we are really a Mississippi company, which is rare these days; we've got no major Northern stockholders. Here at this mill we process grains and seed. Yes, we make these cottonseed cakes for cattle feed—we call them 'range cubes.' Strange how history comes back at you; water transport is more important again, because operations are bigger. Grain used to come in sacks, now it comes in bulk, and for that barges are best to send the grain down the Mississippi. Can ship twenty-five times as much in a barge as in a boxcar.

"We in the Chamber of Commerce are trying to move Vicksburg ahead. Nine years ago, when I came here (Kansas City is my home) it was a sleepy town, completely devoted to the past. Tourism was the big thing. You know we have these battlefields all around, monuments and statues. People wanted to leave things as they were. There's still a lot of old thinking in town, but that's what we're trying to change. This town has a big potential. It's a crossroads. . . .

"Twenty-five per cent of my boys here at this mill are colored—about 200 out of 700. I call em boys whether they're white or black. I don't think of them as white and black, and didn't until this whole thing came up. They've got no problem registering to vote in Vicksburg. I believe 2000-3000 are registered in the county. Why up in Kansas City I had 250 niggers in a mill, and not 5 per cent of them ever registered.

"Some of the colored boys here in the mill could be considered supervisors—they're lead men. Why, I have fired supervisors for abusing people. They're people, I say. . . .

"Why are policemen vicious? They're underpaid. You pay low salaries, you attract a certain kind. . . . I know the COFO office here in Vicksburg was bombed, but I don't believe any local people did it. I would guess it was done from the outside. . . . No, I haven't ever seen one of those COFO people.

"We had a fellow come down here from a Northern corporation to look the town over. He tells me, I like it fine down here, and I'm going to recommend we build a plant here. But he goes back North and says to his directors: we're planning to build a plant down in Mississippi, and they say: You must be crazy! Well, he tried, but he can't argue with them. That's why Vicksburg has got to change. . . .

"Now I wouldn't tell this to everyone. But we pay for two sets of schools down here, and that's why we can't afford to pay good wages to teachers. And so we're not getting good teachers like we had when I was a kid." [Compare Dennett's VI.]

* * *

At the COFO "office" in Vicksburg, an old frame house deep in the Negro part of town, cluttered with mimeographed announcements, the walls covered by posters and clippings and home-made signs, fifteen or so Negro high school youngsters were listening to some jazz records. One sat in a corner, typing. Three others, "the staff," sat at a table with me and talked.

There had been two bombings in the past week in Vicksburg. One was the Anderson Café, used by COFO workers. No one was hurt there. The other was the Vicksburg Café, owned by a white man downtown, and once boycotted because it would not admit Negroes. Three months ago it was integrated, and a week before the bombing three whites beat up a Negro there. Then came the fire bomb. A Negro waitress tried to jump behind the counter to escape the flames and broke both her arms.

The three young Negro staff fellows—all eighteen or nineteen—were from different towns in Mississippi: Vicksburg, McComb, Drew. One was a SNCC man, one was a CORE man, and one, chuckling, said he was a combination of SNCC and CORE. They agreed: the NAACP had been in Vicksburg since 1919 and hadn't done much of anything. All were veterans of boycotts, of demonstrations, of jail. No, there was no Freedom School operating in Vicksburg now. They had started one in the summer, but last October it was destroyed by a bomb, and its library with it. Fifteen people were there at the time, but no one was seriously hurt. A baby was scratched, and one lady's leg was cut.

There were two rooms in back, the walls lined with books, and cases of books crisscrossing the floor. There were 7000 books, donated by people all over the United States, and 1000 were out on loan. (The city library had been open only to whites until a month ago.) In the spaces between the bookcases were bare mattresses. Staff people slept there, and one was stretched out on a mattress as we walked through. Since the bombing, they were maintaining a twenty-four-hour vigil.

A white girl walked in. She had spent last summer in Florida with a CORE task force on voter registration; during her winter break from the University of Rochester she had come down to Vicksburg. Had been here now 73 days ("Yes," she smiled. "I count them.") She'd just come from a meeting of Negro women. She was tutoring one high school senior in math. She took me to visit Mrs. Dilla Irwin, a Negro woman who was editing a newspaper born out of the Mississippi Summer Project of 1964, the Vicksburg Citizens' Appeal.

Mrs. Irwin turned from her typewriter: "I was born in Vicksburg, and hatred sort of grew in me as I listened to my father and mother talking. I had seven brothers, and I remember after we got up to some size they were told to call other white boys, their own age, mister, and sir. . . .

"I recall my first fear, when I was seven or eight years old. Parents were driving one night from church on this horse-drawn buggy, a beautiful night, those big cannon from the memorial gleaming on the highway. All at once someone said halt, all these men with guns. They asked Daddy about some Negro man who was a friend of a colored woman who had killed a white man. We got out of it all right. But that fear stayed.

"My dad was a sharecropper, and I lived in the Delta as a child, went to high school here in Vicksburg, got into fights with white kids. Then I went to live with my older sister in Chicago during the Second World War, and went to Northwestern night school, school of journalism, also a teachers college at night. Worked in defense plants in the day.

"I got married in Chicago, have one son who volunteered for the army when he was seventeen. Now he's twenty-one and in Vietnam. Was always proud to be in the service. But the other day I got a letter from him asking if it was true what was happening in Alabama, and if so, what am I fighting for, he said."

* * *

On March 1, 1965, the eight-page Vicksburg Citizens' Appeal, an attractive, photo-offset paper, tabloid size, ran its lead story on a county-wide meeting of the Freedom Democratic Party, where people from different precincts discussed problems they wanted to solve: poorly surfaced county roads, overcrowded schools, unequal welfare payments, drainage ditches overflowing with sewage onto people's land because of lack of pipe sewers. People spoke of needing gas and electricity, and new fireplugs.

Another story told of a continuing boycott of schools in Issaquena and Sharkey Counties in another part of the Delta, with five Freedom Schools set up there for students staying out of class. The boycott had begun a month before when 181 students were suspended from school for wearing "Freedom" buttons.

There were two editorials in that issue. One was on the role of Negro ministers: "The Negroes have always respected the minister and looked to him for guidance. He has, since Reconstruction, been a symbol of leadership to his people. Where is this leadership that is so sorely needed at this time? . . . Preparing souls for life in heaven is very good. However, some thought should be given to life on earth. . . ."

The Appeal printed an essay written by a high school boy:

> Life is real, life is honest, and the grave is not its goal. . . . I as a Negro teen-ager am interested in people whether they be Negro, Chinese, Jew, Indian, white, Mexican, Spanish. . . .
>
> The color of my skin in Southern America sets me aside from the general treatment of humanity. My life is a keep quiet: my thoughts are hidden secrets. . . .
>
> Can I forever live as a bird in a cage? When will the door be opened? As I view the situation in Mississippi I can truly see a bird's cage with tiny little Negro birds flying around in it. I can see the feeders with their little sacks of food. I see Governor Paul Johnson as he pours a little bit of prosperity into the trough of my cage. I see Mr. Ross Barnett as he removes the waste from my cage. . . .
>
> But I, one little happy bird, am ready to fly out of my cage and enjoy the sweetness of freedom. . . .

[Compare Dennett's VII.]

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS. Anthropologists say the world at any moment shows all the stages of its evolution; and so the South now reveals every trait of past and future. Diverse currents flow, mix, collide there: the Negro, the white, the national government, the Northerner, the world beyond the seas. . . .

Negroes, a century ago, crept out cautiously over the battle ruins but, except for a few bold figures, did not move far from slavery. Northern and Southern politicians one year bid them forward, the next pushed them back.

In 1965, however, the initiative is with the Negro militant, and everyone in the nation watches nervously for the next move. The lady in the cabin outside Lynchburg waits, as did the non-rebelling slave, but she waits on a moving belt, pulled by the bodies of black youngsters in Mississippi and Alabama, by the brave ones of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, by the high school student in Vicksburg ready to fly out of his cage. In a Mississippi Freedom School in the summer of 1964, Negro youngsters read Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, in which Joyce wrote:

> The spell of arms and voices: the white arms of roads, their promise of close embraces and the black arms of tall ships that stand against the moon, their tale of distant nations. . . . And the air is thick with their company as they call to me, their kinsman, making ready to go, shaking the wings of their exultant and terrible youth.

To the dark burst of feeling, the half-uttered thoughts of the Negro, Southern white men respond in confusion. Some pick up guns, as did their ancestors in gray, but their chance died at Gettysburg, and the murders they commit only quicken the pace of change. Most mutter and complain, but inch by inch make peace with the encroaching new order. A few of the young ones give a new kind of rebel cry, one of protest against the sins of their fathers, and they join black boys and girls of their own age, mingling their accents and their dreams. (Two hundred of them, white college students from Tennessee to Mississippi, gathered in Atlanta in the fall of 1964, planning their assault on the past.)

The salesman from South Carolina keeps his eye on the morning newspaper and the business ledger, preparing to roll with the tide. He has traveled, seen the North, and knows, or perhaps just senses, that once the furor is over his daughter won't really marry a nigra, will probably not even go to school with one; that a business society which makes the gestures of equality need not be overturned.

The national government behaves very much as it did in the time of Lincoln, with that priority system which all governments everywhere dutifully observe: "Union first, freedom second." As Lincoln with the Abolitionists, it is sensitive; it trims and heels with the gusts of protest. One hundred years after the Emancipation Proclamation, ten years after the beginning of the Negro Revolt in Montgomery, thirty days after policemen began swinging their clubs against human heads in Selma, Alabama, there came the first forthright Presidential plea for racial justice couched in the language of morality rather than expediency.

And the legislative machinery began cranking out still another civil rights bill, the fourth in eight years. Continued fire-bombings, beatings, jailings, in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Louisiana, indicated none of this would be enough. Yet no atrocity, not even the organized murder of three young civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964, seems able to induce the President to invoke his statutory powers to set up a permanent protective force of special agents in the South to guard citizens against both private and official violence. The federal government will use the ordinary, slow processes of litigation and legislation on behalf of Negro rights, and, on extraordinary occasions, to call out the army for short-term duty. But, perhaps knowing the American citizenry is moved only by major disaster, the President chooses not to take preventive action against the intimidation and terrorism that is recorded by the hour in matter-of-fact SNCC field reports. In the matter of racial equality, the Administration remains, as always, a liberal government, and therefore a minimum government.

THE WHITE NORTH REACTS with horror at murder in the South, with indifference at the less dramatic, daily pain of poverty and fear, with trepidation at Negroes pushing too fast into their neighborhoods and schools. People approach their government as politicians, not citizens, considering what is practical over what is right. Politics itself becomes the art of the probable. The limits to change in Atlanta and Birmingham can be seen in New York, Chicago and Washington, D.C.

What begins to disturb the North now is that thousands of its youngsters—college students mostly—are straining to look beyond these limits. They go South to walk hand in hand with young black radicals. They come back with a deep irreverence for everything whose worth has been established over centuries. A Radcliffe girl wrote from Gulfport, Mississippi, in the summer of 1964: "For the first time in my life, I am seeing what it is like to be poor, oppressed, and hated. And what I see here does not apply only to Gulfport or to Mississippi or even to the South. . . ."

"The world is coming in on the South," said the white businessman from South Carolina, and he was understating the reality. At a meeting on the Mississippi Gulf Coast, a young Negro SNCC worker told me: "You know, I saw one of those Vietcong guerrillas on TV the other day. He was ragged, angry, dark-skinned, and poor. I swear he looked just like one of us!" The revolution of the hungry is rising on all sides, in Asia, Africa and, frighteningly close, in Latin America, and we are just beginning to understand that it is more awesome, more inexorable, than communism.

That revolution's only representatives in the United States are young Negroes offering their bodies in the deep South. They may eventually be isolated and crushed, or simply absorbed into the mainstream of moderate American reform; these are the two traditional ways of dealing with dangerous movements in this country. Or, with some special strength, gathered from like people in other parts of the world, they may yet fan a flame of change through this nation.

In the ramshackle COFO office in Vicksburg, Mississippi, someone had copied some lines from Christopher Fry and tacked them on the wall:

> Dark and cold we may be, but this > is no winter now. The frozen misery > of centuries breaks, cracks, begins to move, > the thunder is the thunder of the floes,
> the thaw, the flood, the upstart spring . . .
> Affairs are now soul size.

1865:
'The South As It Is'

The following are extracts from a series written for THE NATION during its first year of publication by John Richard Dennett, a Canadian-born Harvard graduate.

I

Lynchburg, Va.

"The negro," said Mr. K., "I sincerely hope may disappoint my expectations. But if he does not, he is doomed to undergo extinction. Less than a hundred years of freedom will see the race practically exterminated. The negro will not work more than enough to supply his bare necessities. There isn't a county of Virginia where we haven't had some hundreds of free negroes, and they have been always perfectly worthless and lived in wretchedness. The negro stands as much in need of a master to guide him as a child does. When I look at my servants, I feel weighing upon me all the responsibilities of a parent. In the course of my life I have known many men who for that reason alone would never become the owner of a slave. I have brought up my children to feel so, and accustomed them to the thought of dispensing with slave labor. Those of them who are old enough share my views on the subject. But the negro will always need the care of some one superior to him, and unless in one form or another it is extended to him, the race will first become pauper and then disappear. Nothing but the most careful legislation will prevent it. Now take an example: of my negroes, nearly half were not on the working list; but I had to support them all. What will the negro do when he is called upon to support not only himself (he isn't inclined to do that, and I don't believe he will do it), but also to get food, and clothes, and physic for the infants and disabled people belonging to him? Why, I doubt if my farm ever returned me one per cent interest on the capital invested in it. He cannot do it. He couldn't do it if all the Southern States were confiscated and given him to do it with."

II

Greensboro, N. C.

To-day I had an interesting conversation with a man who belongs to what, as I suppose, must be a new class in the South—the class of negro lessees of land. He had been a slave all his life, he said, and was now "a settled man" (he appeared to be forty-three or four), but he was going to strike out for himself and see what he could do in a state of freedom. He had already rented some land, and that he thought was what every colored man ought to do, if he could. Perhaps only a few would be able to do it at present, because the masters were opposed to it; wanted to keep the people in such a condition that they could be hired as laborers at low wages, and preferred to let a "no-account white man" have a plantation rather than rent it to negroes. His former master and the gentlemen living in the neighborhood refused to lease out land to him. But a few miles away from home he had been more successful. The owner had selected certain parts of his plantation, and told him to take up as many acres as he could properly care for and cultivate. The land was not good, most of it being "old field;" but if he could make enough this first year to feed his family, he would be content. He had bought a condemned horse from the Government corral for fifteen dollars; he was low in order, but would be fit to plough next month. His wife had been knocking about the house most of her life; but he could depend upon her assistance if the work got too hard for him, and he had two children big enough to do full work in the field. Both were good ploughmen, and when his own crop did not call for their labor he could hire them out to the farmers, and he also could do hauling for his neighbors, and thus pick up a little ready money. If God spared his life, he expected to have twenty acres of corn, eight acres of wheat, five acres of oats and some potatoes on his land. His landlord was to receive one third of all the corn raised.

This year he had been working for his old master, who had promised to give his hands such a portion of the crops they made as should be pronounced equitable by two white men whom he designated. The apportionment had not yet been made. On most of the plantations of which he had any knowledge the workmen received some part of the crop in payment for their labor, and, as a rule, the masters were endeavoring to hire them for the coming year at the same price—their board, namely, and so many bushels of corn.

This man said that he knew it to be still usual on some of the plantations to beat the negroes for any offence; and that especially is this the case in the country districts. Negroes living in the vicinity of Greensboro could complain to the soldiers, but twenty or thirty miles out they were without redress.

He was very anxious that schools should be established. A while ago some of the colored people had spoken to a white man who lived near, a poor man, but "with good learning," asking him to open a school which he had promised to do. But he did not like to begin without having first obtained the consent of the gentlemen in the neighborhood; so he called on five or six of them and made known his intention, but he was told that if he tried that game he would be shot in his school-room; he therefore desisted. The gentlemen who told the man so were just the kind of men that would have done it, too; but the Yankees would set up schools, he hoped.

III

Liberty, Va.

The little village of Appomattox Court-House, distant from Lynchburg about twenty-five miles, is situated on low ground at the source of the Appomattox River, and in a district devoted exclusively to farming. It is, therefore, small even among Virginian towns, containing, besides the court-house and a jail in ruins, only some twenty or thirty buildings, mostly the dwellings of farmers; but small as it is, no other collection of houses in all the county so well merits the name of town. It boasts one hotel and one country store, the stock of goods in the latter sadly needing to be replenished. During the time of my visit, both of these buildings were pretty constantly occupied by men who seemed to have no other business on their hands than to lounge in some easy attitude chewing tobacco and talking to each other, or watching across the muddy road and pools of rain water the movements of the soldiers quartered opposite in the court-house yard. In the country parts of Virginia I have seen at one time and another hundreds of white men, and I doubt if I have seen in all more than ten men engaged in labor of any sort. At the store or tavern of every village just such a group of idlers is sure to be found. In accounting for these assemblages, the fact that apple brandy is always for sale by the glass at such places can hardly be considered a sufficient cause, apple brandy being exceedingly abundant in all this region, as nearly every farmer has a still in operation on his own premises. It is to the custom of the country, which throws all work upon the negroes, that the general idleness must in great part be attributed, and in part also, I suppose, to the unsettled condition of public and private affairs, which furnishes to every man a wide and fertile field for conjecture and conversation.

The newspaper which I mentioned above, The Nationalist, is conducted by white men, but is owned by an association of colored people, and of course relies mainly for support upon that class of the population.

IV

Mobile, Ala.

Besides their attempt to establish a newspaper, the colored people here, in their desire to elevate themselves, are making efforts in other directions that merit a favor and encouragement little likely to be given them by the white citizens of Mobile. The books of a branch bank of the National Freedman's Savings and Trust Company have within a month been opened, and the deposits made already exceed $4,000. By means of a fair recently held in the Medical College building they succeeded in raising $1,200, to be devoted to the founding of an asylum for orphan children. Six hundred children are under instruction in the schools, which are to a considerable extent self-supporting, the scholars buying their own books and paying the salaries of two teachers out of eight. In these schools the scholars were well behaved, and the lessons were recited very well. The teachers, who have been engaged in the schools since they were first opened in May last, speak in high terms of the docility of their pupils, and say that it is seldom necessary to resort to punishment. Here I saw, for the first time in the Southern States, colored boys reciting in the same class with white. The latter, however, were children of the teachers, and not natives of Alabama.

V

Raleigh, N. C.

I have been attending some sittings of the colored men's convention recently held in this city. The first steps in the matter were taken by negroes resident in Newbern, and it seems to have been generally thought by the people of the central and western counties, by such of them as took any thought at all about it, that the call was issued prematurely. They would have had it deferred until after the adjournment of the State Convention, thinking it more proper to address the Legislature in the event of the convention's leaving the colored population unnoticed. An appeal to the convention would wear the appearance of addressing itself not alone to the kindly feelings and the sense of justice of their white fellow-citizens, but partly to their fears also, and thus would provoke resentment. Moreover, the petitioners would put themselves in an attitude of complaint, when as yet they had suffered no injustice by any State action. But, on the other side, it was argued that in this State the negroes were surely suffering enough at the hands of individuals to justify them in petitioning; that in other States their brethren were suffering under unjust enactments, both ancient and recent; that in the North Carolina statutes there were evils to be cured, and there were other evils to be prevented from getting there; and, finally, with regard to the body before which the negroes' petition should be laid, that North Carolina would be more likely to slight the claims of her colored citizens after she had obtained full power to legislate for them as she pleased than now, while it is still doubtful if justice towards them may not be the lowest price at which she can purchase the enjoyment of all privileges belonging to a State in the Union. So it was decided to adhere to the original call, which was sent as far as possible throughout the country districts, and on the day of assembling nearly forty counties were represented. Some of the delegates were duly elected by meetings regularly organized for that purpose; others were sent up from churches, from prayer-meetings, from neighborhood conferences where a few men met together in secret. Of course, many were unprovided with credentials, their constituents, very probably, like themselves, being unable to read or write, and but little versed in the business of politics. "They'd hed no time fur credentials," one said; "they'd hed to run off in the night season fur fear;" so it was voted that the convention should be a mass convention, and all should be entitled to seats who had come up to attend. This motion, for which everybody voted, did much to take everything out of the hands of those who originated the convention, but, perhaps, made its action more truly represent the opinions and feelings of the colored people, not of the coast counties and the eastern cities, but of the whole State. For at this present time the negroes in central and western North Carolina have given but little thought to political subjects, and take no great interest in them. In Wilmington, Newbern, and Beaufort, judging by their representations at the convention, the case is different.

The session was held in the African Methodist church, a small edifice in a back street of the city. The delegates were about a hundred and twenty in number, but crowds of colored citizens were interested spectators throughout the four days, and the house was always filled full. It was neatly but cheaply furnished, the only ornament being a large plaster bust of Lincoln, fixed to the wall above the pulpit, against a background of mourning drapery. Just over his head were inscribed some of the closing words of the last inaugural address—that passage which begins thus: "With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right."

Among the delegates were some that wore the Federal uniform, and these were treated with much respect by their fellow-members. In pursuance of a fashion that seems to obtain everywhere, one of them, a sergeant, was chosen to office, and served among the vice-presidents. He, like the others, was a fine-looking young fellow, perfectly neat and clean, with every button polished, and even his face shining. "I's black," he said; "just as black as ary black man goin', I is."

There were several men dressed in black broadcloth, ministers and chaplains, who did a large share of the talking, and bore a main part in the management of the business, and here and there was a younger man, nattily dressed, and evidently a hotel waiter by profession or a barber; but the great majority were mechanics and plantation hands, men who had grown up in ignorance, whose forms were bent with long labor, whose faces expressed patient endurance rather than thought or any passion, and who for the most part sat mute on the benches. On two or three occasions some one of these men would rise to deprecate long discussion of things merely formal, or debate that was only personal, beginning his speech perhaps in this way: "My dear brothers, I don't place myself in this honorable convention as a Henry Clay or a Webster, fur I know I kin not do it, nor to speak afore you. I know I's a poor, destituted, onlarnt don't-know-A-from-B. I's been rocked in a hard cradle, from my youth up to the present age." And then he would go on to urge the propriety of at once transacting all necessary business, so that delegates could go home, and, warming as he proceeded, he would very likely fall into the sing-song of the class-meeting and become nearly unintelligible to those whose excitement had not kept pace with his. At the end of his remarks, however, there was always renewed diligence. But these men though ignorant were intelligent, and often spoke exceedingly well. "Yes," said one of the cleverest among them—"yes, we are ignorant. We know it. I am ignorant for one, and they say all niggers is. They say we don't know what the word constitution means. But if we don't know enough to know what the Constitution is, we know enough to know what justice is. I can see for myself down at my own court-house. If they makes a white man pay five dollars for doing something to-day, and makes a nigger pay ten dollars for doing that thing to morrow, don't I know that ain't justice? They've got a figure of a woman with a sword hung up thar, sir; Mr. President, I don't know what you call it—('Justice,' 'Justice')— well, she's got a handkercher over her eyes, and the sword is in one hand and a pair o' scales in the other. When a white man and a nigger gets into the scales, don't I know the nigger is always mighty light? Don't we all see it? Ain't it so at your court-house, Mr. President?"

VI

Virginia.

The white people are often very far wrong in their notions of the object for which the Bureau of Freedmen was organized, and the power committed to its officers. I was waiting the other day in the office of the superintendent when two gentlemen of respectable appearance entered and announced themselves as planters from the State of Mississippi. The conversation on their part was carried on by one, the other saying nothing. Both seemed to listen with very great interest to all that was said to them. The speaker said their business with the superintendent was to get from him about a hundred Virginia negroes to be taken down to Mississippi to work on cotton. They were informed that the officer had no power to send away negroes unless they chose to go. They asked if they couldn't get a hundred paupers or criminals. But the superintendent had not at command so many of either class or of both together. They asked if negroes could not be apprenticed to them for a term of years. But apprenticeship, except of boys in cities, who in exceptional cases may be put with a tradesman to learn his craft, is not permitted.

"Well, now," said the gentleman, "this is how the thing is. I've got land there, and I'm going to raise cotton. I've spent pretty nearly $20,000 for mules and harnesses and a complete outfit generally. What I want to know is this—you say you can't use compulsion to make these Virginia niggers go down there—what compulsion will the Government let me use to make them work when I've got them there, anyhow?"

"You seem to think all negro labor must be compulsory."

"Why, of course it must. How long have you lived in a slave State sir?"

"I have lived within twenty-five miles of one a good part of my life. But you must look to the experience of those who have tried free labor. There is Mr. B. G.—, on the James. He has about two hundred and eighty-seven negroes. They were with him as slaves, and he has employed them all since they were emancipated. Only three went away from his place, and the rest, he says, are doing very well indeed. One example like that is worth a great deal of theory."

"Yes, I know him very well. Didn't know he had so many as that, though. But I know the nigger. The employer must have some sort of punishment. I don't care what it is. If you'll let me tie him up by the thumbs, or keep him on bread and water, that will do. Over here in Rockbridge County, as I came along I saw a nigger tied up by the wrists. His hands were away up above his head. I went along to him, and says I, 'Boy, which would you like best now, to stay there where you are, or to have me take you down, give you forty good cuts, and let you go?' 'Rather have the forty lash,' says he. So he would, too. You folks used to make a good deal of talk because we gave our niggers a flogging when they deserved it. I won't ask leave to flog, if you'll let me use some of your Northern punishments. All I want is just to have it so that when I get the niggers on to my place, and the work is begun, they can't sit down and look me square in the face and do nothing."

The superintendent could not encourage him to hope that the Bureau would deport negroes to Mississippi, nor that it would allow him to use on his plantation the punishments which he seemed to think necessary. If the negro wouldn't work, he could be complained of. When a Northern laborer violated a contract he was sued.

"Ah! sue the nigger! Can he give his testimony in court? Will his testimony be taken?"

"It is taken here, sir; and it will be in Mississippi—at any rate, while that State is occupied by Federal troops."

"Why, no nigger can be believed whether he is under oath or not. No one that knows a nigger will ever think of believing him if it's for his interest to lie."

The gentlemen took their leave, very much dissatisfied with the state of affairs in Virginia, and with the prospects of planters throughout the Southern country.

VII

Lynchburg, Va.

Walking along the main street the other morning, I met several parties of negro boys and girls with primers in their hands, evidently on their way to school. Turning about in my walk, I followed two grotesque-looking little creatures till I came to the door of a large brick tobacco warehouse or manufactory. Looking in, I saw that it was empty of merchandise, and fitted up with benches as if for a school. The scholars were there also, and two soldiers, to whom I introduced myself, and by whom I was invited to stay and see the school when in session. Both teachers were enlisted men, privates in a Pennsylvania regiment. They were detailed at their own request for this duty. No pay is given them, but while engaged in teaching they are relieved from all camp duties. One was without experience as a teacher, the other told me he had been a schoolmaster before entering the army.

By nine o'clock about one hundred and thirty children, of all ages between three and twenty, were assembled, and the school exercises began. "I want to be an Angel" was sung in clear and pleasant tones, and with great correctness of emphasis and pronunciation. The first stanza and the chorus all the children knew, and the rest of the hymn they sang two lines at a time as the teacher dealt it out to them.

While the singing went on, I amused myself by counting the faces which gave unmistakable evidence of their owners being of mixed blood. There were all tints and shades of yellow among the forty-nine boys present, and I could find but twenty-seven who seemed to me to be purely African. Among the girls the proportion was much the same.

After the singing a chapter of the New Testament was read, and then the alphabet class recited. They knew their letters backwards and forwards, they could pick out the letters by name, and they could tell which were vowels and which were consonants. I thought they had made rapid progress in the four weeks during which they had been under instruction.

A more advanced class then read a column of a child's paper. One or two of the little girls read exceedingly well. They had been taught, they said, when they were slaves.

In Lynchburg, besides this school, which contains about one hundred and fifty pupils, there is another, taught in the same way, which contains three hundred and fifty more children. It is a pleasant and encouraging sight to see the willingness with which the scholars apply themselves to their lessons, and the very respectable measure of success which rewards their efforts.

It is a sight, too, which has attracted some attention in Lynchburg. The Republican, urging upon its readers the importance of providing for the education of their children, speaks of the freedmen's schools, and says, "How utterly important is it that benefits should not accrue through governmental or other philanthropy to these children of a degraded race of which our own are deprived through our culpable neglect and thoughtlessness."

JOHN OLIVER KILLENS

HOLLYWOOD in BLACK and WHITE

Novelist and TV and film writer, Mr. Killens is at present Author-in-Residence at Fisk University. Trident Press will shortly publish his Black Man's Burden, a book of essays, and he is now completing a book on Africa.

IN THE BEGINNING was the Word, and the Word was God, and the Word was with God, but somewhere along the line Hollywood preempted God's dominion.

My first trip to Hollywood occurred when I was twenty and impressionable. I thought at the time that Los Angeles, especially the Hollywood-Beverly Hills part of it, was Paradise Regained with glamorous moving picture stars thrown in for good measure. I had driven with three friends of mine across the vast and varied country. My friend who owned the car in which we made the trip was a Negro American Legionnaire, and his reason for making the trip was to attend the Legion's convention. My reason for going was the actual going and the seeing. We saw a huge hunk of America that summer and fall. We drove from Washington, D. C. through Maryland, through Pennsylvania, through Ohio, through Illinois, through Indiana, over the muddy rutty roads of Nebraska. And we "Americans" were perfectly willing to "give Nebraska back to the Indians," which was a rather masochistic pun on our part, coming as it did from four black men who never owned Nebraska or any other of the Forty-Eight. I shall never forget one of the billboards on a Middle West highway outside a great industrial complex:

EVERY WORKER WITH HIS TOOL IS AN AMERICAN CAPITALIST

This made us feel better about the whole thing.

We went through gorgeous, luxuriant Wyoming, through Lusk and Cody and on and up into Yellowstone National Park where nature runs amuck in all her naked shameless beauty, and then two days later down out of the mountains to Salt Lake City where we spent the night in a "chinch harbor" (which is Afro-Americanese for all the dinky colored hotels with hot and cold running roaches and bloated bedbugs and a public, alligator-legged showerless bath at the end of the dark and dingy hall). It seemed that our money did not spend at the white hotels of that fair city. The next afternoon we followed the Okies in hapless trek across the hot Mojave Desert and on and on to sunny California, where the earth is lush and glistening green and breathing with fertility. We also stopped in a chinch harbor in Los Angeles, but we told ourselves it had nothing to do with our color this time, but was because our money was not long enough for the fancy white hotels. We also noticed, but overlooked, the discrepancy between Central Avenue and Wiltshire Boulevard, which was even more glaring than the difference between Lenox and Madison Avenues.

THE NEXT OCCASION for visiting the City of Angels was years later when I flew West on a lecture tour. I was older and had been to a great World War to fight against fascism and to make the whole world safe for democracy. I had come home and quit Washington for New York, had written a novel, and had been published. I was wiser and I should have been wise to L.A. and to Hollywood. I should not have been taken in a second time. Probably because I came to the city that second time as a "celebrity" it was difficult for me to see the city, realistically, through all that smog and adulation. The weather, the people, the cleanliness, the expanse, life slower-paced, the glowing landscape, all that pretty superficiality. And, of course, the inevitable stars all over again. I was going to New York, I told a couple of my California friends, and bring my family out there to live. "Fine! Great!" they said. "This is the place for an artist like you to live and work. And you can write scenarios for Hollywood while you're at it." There was one dissenting voice. Almena Lomax, editor of an angry incorruptible newspaper, the regrettably defunct Los Angeles Tribune, told me: "The worst thing someone like you could do would be to move out here. Los Angeles is moribund. Most of the people are empty, a legion of lost souls. The town is a deadly poison to the creative spirit." I have been back several times since to do film work and I found out, painfully, how right Almena was.

By "Hollywood," I mean the film industry and its comparatively younger brother, television. And anything we say about Hollywood may be said of Madison Avenue—in spades. Hollywood just happens to be where it is. Madison Avenue determines what it is. Hollywood is Fake-town, the great city of make-believe. Here are the culture-makers of our society, many of whom are the most uncultured of men. Here are the true head-shrinkers and the brainwashers of America. I was out west working on a screen treatment once, when my producer, who had a reputation for being the most sensitive of the Hollywood species, got that faraway wistful look in his eyes and said longingly: "Ah, John, if I could only come across just one good 'monster' script to put on my schedule for this season. I don't ask for much in this life." He sighed. I shuddered.

Hollywood, moreover, is a Southern-oriented city, as is all of Greater Los Angeles. This statement should surprise no one, since Hollywood, more than any other institution, has been responsible for the glorification of the South, past and present, and for creating the image of black inferiority. It created the lying, stealing, childish, eyeball-rolling, feet-shuffling, sex-obsessed, teeth-showing, dice-shooting black male, and told the world this was the real Negro in the U. S. A. It invented the Negro "mammy" whose breasts were always large enough to suckle an entire nation, and who always loved old massa's chilluns more than she loved her own. The men of Fake-town have brainwashed America and the entire world with the brush of white supremacy.

I accuse Hollywood of being the most anti-Negro influence in this nation in the 20th century. With Birth of a Nation, Hollywood fired its first big gun in its war against the black American, and the gunfire has continued unabated ever since. Hollywood has ever glorified the Confederates' and slavery's cause, with such magnificent monstrosities as Gone With the Wind, Virginia, Kentucky, ad infinitum. Oh, how many oceans of bitter tears have been shed for the likes of Rob Lee and Jeff Davis? How much weeping and nostalgia for the good old days down on the plantation with the pretty, white and Southern-hooded ladies and the handsome white colonels in the Big House at their grand and gracious parties, replete with dancing and live (and sometimes black) musicians? What kind of distortion of history has made Grant and Sherman anti-heroes and Lee and Stonewall Jackson men of unblemished character and unquestioned loyalty and heroism?

I WAS SEATED IN a Hollywood movie house with a friend in 1959 watching a ridiculous version of slavery entitled Band of Angels, based on a novel by Robert Penn Warren. In one particular scene, Clark Gable, who was Sidney Poitier's good massa, was coming from New Orleans via the Mississippi River back to his plantation. When the boat neared the shore, all of his happy faithful slaves were gathered there singing a song of welcome to old massa. White people in the theatre were weeping, some slyly, some unashamedly, at the touching scene, when suddenly my friend and I erupted with laughter, because we thought that surely, in the time of Montgomery and Little Rock, this must have been put into the film for comic relief.

The other great myth created by Hollywood was the "good" cowboy and the "bad" Indian, again standing truth and history on their heads. Again white folks were inevitably cast in the role of supermen. Surrounded and outnumbered by wild and screaming Indians, the gallant whites crouched with their women and children behind a barricade of broken-down covered wagons, and they somehow always managed to break out . . . . Either that, or they held the bloody bastards off till the Cavalry arrived. The only good Injun was a Gunga Din type, who sold out his tribe to the whites, or one like Tonto who was the white man's lackey. The pity is not so much that Hollywood distorted history, but that most Americans, black and white, accepted the distortion as truth.

Once upon an afternoon in the middle fifties, I got a phone call from a friend. He was in Hollywood and I was in Brooklyn, and the conversation went something like this: "John, what do you think of Emperor Jones?"

"Emperor Jones? What do you mean?"

"I mean—making a movie of Emperor Jones. I've been meeting most of the day with the executive producer of a major studio, and they want me to do Emperor Jones, and I told them you were the only writer I would trust to do the screen-play, because that way I would be certain that the dignity of the Negro people would not be violated."

I said, "But, Harry, crap-shooting, razor-toting, all the tired stereotypes—who needs it in 1957?"

Harry said, "The man assured me we could do anything we wanted with the script, make any changes, so long as we called it Emperor Jones, based on the play by Eugene O'Neill."

I said, "But—"

He said, "Look, why don't you come out here for a few days at their expense and we'll sit down with them, and if you don't like what you see or hear, I don't like it either. All you can lose is a couple of days."

I agreed. During my flight to the coast, I did a hasty three- or four-page outline in which I rewrote O'Neill's Emperor. I took the studio at its word. Instead of Jones being a train porter, I made him a slave on a Southern plantation. Instead of his getting into a fight with another Negro in a dice game and slashing him to death with a razor, I had Jones hit his white whipping boss in the head with a hoe and escape to an island in the West Indies, where he meets Smithers and so forth and so on, change after change after change. When I arrived in Los Angeles, I found that the studio had set me up in a suite across from Belafonte's at the Hotel Ambassador, where he was appearing nightly at the Coconut Grove. I went over to Harry's suite, and Sidney Poitier was visiting, and we had a lengthy bull session about what we were going to do in Hollywood to change the Negro's image of himself. I remember Sidney saying very excitedly, "I will never make a movie that will reflect against the dignity of Negro people." As sophisticated as we three deemed ourselves, we naïvely thought we could set jaded Hollywood on her uppers.

The next day Harry and I sat for hours with the executive producer and staff members of the major studio. After I read my outline with a straight face, Mr. Executive Producer said, "Well, Mr. Killens, you will admit that this is hardly what Mr. O'Neill had in mind."

I said, offhandedly, "You can still call it Emperor Jones."

What we tried to get them to do was to tell the real story of Henri Christophe, the magnificent Emperor of Haiti, upon whose life O'Neill apparently based his story. Belafonte talked to them as if he had just stepped out of Haitian history. We would make a movie that would include not only Christophe, but Toussaint L'Ouverture and all the other Haitian heroes who made history in the war against Napoleon. As we depicted it, it would have involved all of the major Negro actors as well as white ones. A spectacular. I could almost hear the sound of the cash register clanking in the producer's head. He agreed. Forget about Emperor Jones. This is the movie we would make. And in the epic tradition. A week or so later the studio changed its mind, with this explanation: "We paid one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the rights to Emperor Jones, and this is the movie we will do. If Mr. Belafonte doesn't do it, we will get a Negro star who will." Thanks to the rising consciousness of black Americans as reflected in leading Negro actors, this movie has not been made. Decades before, the great Paul Robeson, who is a hero-symbol to every black artist with a heart or memory, played Emperor Jones on Broadway and in Hollywood. An era ended when Mr. Robeson denounced the film capital after making Tales of Manhattan.

In 1959, I spent five months in Hollywood writing a screenplay of my novel, Youngblood. When my family (which consisted of my wife and two children) were ready to spend five weeks of the summer with me, I had to look for larger living quarters. This was when I came to know Hollywood for what it really was. I spent two frustrating weeks trying to find a vacancy in the hotels and motels of that city. My producer would call a motel and ask about accommodations for his writer and his writer's family, and of course, "We have just the thing you're looking for; come right over." We would drive to the spacious motel, but as soon as the manager realized what the deal was, the vacancies would disappear mysteriously. One proprietor took my producer aside and told him: "I sympathize with the colored people, especially the kind that's made something out of themselves, like your writer. I'll take a chance and take him and his family in, provided they agree not to use the swimming pool." Imagine how ungrateful he must have thought I was, since I would not agree that my family would not use his old lily-white swimming pool. Fortunately, a friend of mine came to the rescue. His family was visiting in the East, and he offered us the use of his house.

I DO NOT, cannot, care for Hollywood because it has ever been my arch enemy, even with its enlightened films like Lost Boundaries and Home of the Brave. If the latter one says anything at all, it says that the American Negro is a "nigger" not because of white America but because he, the Negro, believes himself to be a "nigger." And if all American Negroes could be psyched by the white man out of looking upon themselves as "niggers," all their problems would be solved. For, after all, Jim Crow and racial prejudice and lynching are only psychological states of the Negro's mind and have no bases in reality. Thus it is the victim's fault that he is the victim. Following this "logic," history would blame the Jews and not the Nazis, the Algerians, not the French. Thanks particularly to Hollywood, it has already blamed the American Indians and made heroes of the men who practiced genocide against them.

World, Flesh and the Devil, starring Harry Belafonte, Inger Stevens and Mel Ferrer, was another movie of the new "Era of Hollywood Enlightenment." The big hang-up in this one was: Which of the men would get the girl at the end of the story? The story's logic, its artistic integrity, and dramatic necessity dictated that Inger go for Harry. There were only three people left on the earth after an atomic holocaust. Harry was handsome and the good guy. Ferrer was the embodiment of evil. Nothwithstanding, one of the first versions of the script gave Inger to Ferrer. After much debating between New York and California, they arrived at a compromise that satisfied nobody at all. In the final scene of the film, Harry and Inger walk up a deserted Times Square together, and that is how the movie should have ended. But no. Just as we are about to believe that justice has triumphed and that love will conquer all, including racial prejudice, we reckoned without the racial fears of Hollywood. At the final moment, Belafonte turns around and gestures for Ferrer to join them, and the three go off together toward a stone-and-steel horizon.

I remember Ruby Dee commenting once: "I'm not concerned with interracial love and kisses on the movie screen. I'm just looking forward to the day a Negro man can kiss a Negro woman." She noted that with all the roles she had played, as wife and lover, she had never been kissed. It seems that Hollywood is very self-conscious about Negroes being in love and kissing, carrying on like other humans. A Raisin in the Sun made history in this respect. Sidney Poitier was probably the first Negro man ever to kiss a woman in a love scene on the movie screens of America. The woman, of course, was Ruby Dee.

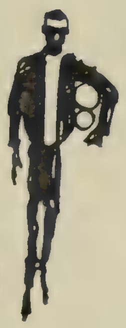
WHY IS HOLLYWOOD the most backward of mass media as far as black Americans are concerned? An obvious reason is that more money is involved in making a film than in producing a play, and, consequently, more money is likely to be lost in case of box office failure. In its turn, Broadway is far more backward than book-publishing. The hard facts are: the more money involved, the less likelihood that the truth about the black man will achieve an audience. And thus black voices, stilled for centuries, are yet committed to oblivion at a moment in history when America needs most desperately to hear black voices. What else is new besides the new Negro? All else is repetition, a gross redundancy. What else is dynamic in this homeland of the brave? The Negro is the nation's mid-century protagonist.

That is why there's never been a crop of black writers for film or television. If you don't work in these two media, you do not reach the multitudes. Hollywood makes great pretensions of doing controversial movies. But the great debate in America today is Negro freedom. This is the fundamental controversy. How does the Negro artist break through this wall of censorship? We black writers and performing artists are ready to pool our creative strength to make our statements to our country. Where are the big-talking liberals?

Television is such a powerful persuader, hidden and overt, it could saturate the Southland with democracy, spreading the word to every nook and corner. Why has not the sunny Southland been sold a democratic image? In the November 14, 1964 edition of the New York Amsterdam News, Jesse Walker wrote: "Of the 35 new television shows this season, none has a Negro on a regular basis." How is that for getting the "real" image of America across? In the entire history of Hollywood, less than a half dozen screenplays have been written by Negroes. In that time not a single black screenwriter has been developed. If he has, it has been kept a deep dark secret. As for television, not a single Negro star has ever had his own weekly TV show (with national hook-up), except the late Nat Cole, who did a very very abbreviated stint. Why? Why is the Negro star forever relegated to the role of "guest in the house"? Why is he never the host? Where are the black news commentators? Sports announcers? Weather "experts"?

Of course, the brainwashers have never in history become the unbrainwashers. The slavemaster has never freed the slave. If a slavocracy had to wait for the slave-holders to overthrow it, it would surely last forever. Slave-masters cannot create free societies, even if they are of a mind to do so. The chains—economic, social, sentimental, psychological—that shackle the master to his slave are unbreakable, as far as he is concerned. On the other hand, the slave's fundamental aim is to break these chains. He awaits the day, the hour, the moment. The Nazis would never have freed the Jews. America has not yet freed the Negro, one hundred years after the word was given.

Ironically, the American Negro, at whom Hollywood has eternally aimed her fire, has been the least vulnerable of all Americans, the least brainwashed. We have never been completely taken in by the hypocritical culture, by film or television. Our belief in our innate inferiority has been, at most, superficial. Yes, the black American is a believer, but not a True Believer in the Word according to Saint Hollywood. That is why we will be the basic folk to free this country. We'll need a great deal of help from you, but we cannot, shall not, wait while you procrastinate.



A DIFFERENT DRUM

GEORGE W. BROADFIELD

George Broadfield designed and directed the country's first Domestic Peace Corps (1962-64) and is now program designer and analyst for the Associated Community Team, a federally sponsored program for underprivileged youth.

DURING MY UNDERGRADUATE years, one of my teachers, a great Rhodes Scholar, often called me the symbol of the "new Negro." I have yet to understand fully what he meant. There was nothing new about my ideas, my ambitions, heritage. He was, perhaps, confusing me with the times, the flow of history—the consequences of man's acts.

By white, middle-class standards, my life had been quite ordinary; compared to the life of most American Negroes, however, I had been most fortunate. I was brought up in a big clapboard house, in Hampton Roads, Virginia, in which my family had been living for more than a century and a half. My great-grandfather established a profitable fishing business in this seaport town, and at one time had a considerable fishing fleet. My grandfather carried on the business for a while. It is a yardstick of the family's position in the community that Broadfield money helped to found the first local bank.

Fortune smiled less on my father. He had a good education, majoring in engineering, but he ended up with a menial job with NACA, the predecessor of the present National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). My mother was a professor of education at Hampton Institute; she was widely traveled, with a vivid interest in people and affairs far removed from the local scene. I don't suppose my father ever earned more than $75 a week, and I imagine that the pay scale for teachers at Hampton Institute could not have been very high. But we lived very comfortably, and there was never any question but that the means were available for me to go to college. Indeed, money was never mentioned at home in my presence, and it is quite possible that my education was paid for, at least in part, by the proceeds of my great-grandfather's fishing fleet.

My father was seen by me solely as a symbol of authority to be feared and obeyed. As an only child, much of my world was the one I made, at first from the heroes and heroines of the books my mother read to me and later from the books I read myself. I lived in an adult world. I don't ever really recall being a child, as I never played. In retrospect, I cannot remember, even to this date, any reference ever being made in our home to race, to color, to religion, to the "differences" among peoples. As a result I was hardly prepared to face the incredible reality that I was to be exposed to as the "new Negro."

All during my childhood, at some time of the day, I would put my hand into the hand of my grandfather, a tall, stately, blind man, and he would lead me from room to room, stepping from window to window, and he would say that "a Broadfield should own the land as far as he could see from every window in the house" (at one time we did). He was a patient man who had been a successful businessman under great handicaps, and he tried to indicate to me that the world would offer opportunities to me, too, and that I must develop the necessary inner strength and courage to exploit them.

In college—I attended Hampton Institute and Talladega, New York University and the University of Paris—I had been a protégé of three great intellectuals: a very young man steeped in the Chicago University tradition of the "Great Books"; a German professor-in-exile; and a French scholar whose mind had been moulded by Dr. André Siegfried of the University of Paris. These three tried to fashion for me a lens through which to view the strange, paradoxical social order which was very soon to confront me. I had studied economics and finance, and was determined to build a future for myself inside the corporate structure. I saw myself, if you will, as an Organization Man.

After graduation, I went through the voluminous listing of job openings in The New York Times. Interviewers very quickly gave me a pleasant, quiet and final "no." I then chose 73 companies and corporations from various directories and knocked in vain at the employment office of each. Finally, I was sent on a round of interviews by such agencies as the NAACP and the Urban League, none of which turned up anything that promised a future. I noted that the boards of these organizations, and particularly of the Urban League, were replete with members of the power elite, including the Rockefellers. It seemed odd to me then, and still does, that the Rockefellers who so generously support the Urban League, should yet fail to open the doors of The Chase Manhattan Bank, or Standard Oil of N.J., or any other of their great enterprises to one or two of the Negro youths who had been to schools and universities with their own sons.

And then, late one evening, at a party given by the Indian Ambassador to Washington, I met an American white man who had lived so long in the Middle East that he no longer saw people as black or white or brown, but as people, competent or incompetent. I told him I wanted to work in the petroleum world. He said he would arrange it. He wrote to his New York office on Park Avenue, informing them that I had been hired as a junior executive-in-training, making no reference to my race. Very soon I received a formal letter inviting me to come to New York at my convenience.

A suite was reserved for me at the Delmonico Hotel on Park Avenue. On a Monday morning, at 9 A.M., I was at the corporation's headquarters and was promptly shown into a magnificent, fruitwood-lined elevator, operated by a man in livery with white gloves, and swept up to the 47th floor. A young lady quite like those on the covers of fashion magazines appeared stunned as I introduced myself as the Mr. Broadfield for whom she had been waiting. Summoning her courage, she ushered me in to see the vice-president with whom I had the appointment. He took one look at me and, visibly shaken, turned in his swivel chair and stared out the window upon the towers of Manhattan for quite a long period before turning back to me.

But I was hired and there was nothing he could do about it. He never asked me to sit down. He talked vaguely about the corporation's operations. It was clear to me that he was either deliberately omitting, or under the stress of circumstance completely forgetting, the normal briefing he was supposed to give the new, young executive.

I stayed with the organization for three years, chiefly because of the encouragement of friends inside and outside the corporation. It was a thoroughly dehumanizing experience. Every day I had to prove anew that I was a human being. There was not a day that I was not center-staged; every act of mine, however small, was appraised against the background of my co-workers' prejudices. There were times that I was overcome by despair. Junior executives were supposed to attend classes; I never did because none were arranged for me. Junior executives are supposed to move from department to department; I remained at the desk to which I was first assigned for the whole three years of my employment.

My plight soon became a source of embarrassment to some of my colleagues; we had become friends and we were all young. But I was determined not to quit. I was foolish enough to think at the time that if I accepted the values of the Organization Man, all the trappings and the jargon, the door could not remain forever closed to me. I wore the right clothes, said the right things, lunched at the right places, talked to the right people. The result was catastrophic: I lost my own heritage and gained no other. Those I was trying to emulate were really little people playing roles in a vast machine of which they had no understanding. In my effort to imitate them, to be accepted by them, I became caught up in their own nothingness.

There is no way to describe the anger, the terror, the loneliness that welled up inside me during my three years with the corporation. And worst of all, almost—I had no one to whom I could unburden myself. My Negro friends, concerned with status and the trappings of success, could never understand why I should be unhappy working for a great corporation with a Park Avenue address. And my friends in the corporation could never understand simply because they were white. For all their natural kindness and generosity, they could not possibly accept that I, as a black man, wanted from life exactly what they wanted, no more and no less.

A sort of death came over me. I worked every day—"performed" is a better way of putting it—like an automaton. My own life began to mean very little. Had it not been, perhaps, for the memory of the things my grandfather had told me, I could never have survived.

But there came a summer morning when I could stand no more. I walked out of my office in a daze, rode down the fruitwood elevator, crossed over to Fifth Avenue and on to Rockefeller Center. Stumbling, I went into the French Line office and booked passage on the Liberté, the first ship sailing. I hated Americans and I hated America. I chose a foreign ship deliberately, thinking that it would be easier to avoid American companionship. I feared that shipboard intimacy with a fellow-countryman would lead me to explode all my spleen upon him, all my pent-up anguish. For me, such an explosion would have been a kind of exorcism; I had been living too long with values which affronted me as a man and as a Christian, and I yearned to throw them back upon the society that had forced me to accept them.

I had booked passage to Paris because I wanted the anonymity of another country, an older civilization. Now, staring down at the people waving goodby, I noticed one of my friends frantically directing my attention to another part of the deck, where a tall, black man was standing by the rail. Later, at sea, we met; he proved to be the highest ranking member of the Cabinet of the President of Liberia. I dined with him and his bride almost every evening during the voyage. "Your destiny is in Africa," he told me one night. And he added: "We need you." I did not answer him; Africa played no role in my thoughts at the time. But he persisted, and when we reached Paris he introduced me to the Liberian Ambassador. "When this man is ready to go," he told the Ambassador, "send him to us by the first available transportation."

After a month in Paris, resting and contemplating my future, Africa loomed larger and larger in my mind. I went to the Ambassador and said: "I'm ready."

I landed finally in Africa—still an angry black man. Looking back, I realize now that I must have been at least as tired as I was angry, involved as I had been in a harsh and fruitless struggle with others—and in a much deeper struggle within myself. I asked myself the following simple but frightening question over and over again: If I were white, and had the abilities that those whom I respected were willing to grant me, and had been driven to this point of total renunciation, would my life have been worth living?

I arrived in the late evening and twilight was turning into night as we drove in the car which the government had put at my disposal from the airport into Monrovia, the capital of Liberia. I did not feel strange; Liberia is American-supported, a fact of which one becomes immediately aware. By the time we had driven through the vast Firestone plantation, twilight had vanished and we were engulfed in the blackness of night quite unlike the nights I knew. The smooth, black asphalt road, the tall rubber trees on either side meeting at the top, gave one the feeling of moving swiftly through a silent tunnel. A sweet aroma hung in the air; it came, my driver said, from the rubber trees during the rainy season which now prevailed. Here and there, as we raced through the darkness, I caught the glow of small fires; around each, I was told, a family was gathered enjoying the last palaver of the day. About us was the silence of the African night—the silence that comes when all man-made noises stop and crickets, frogs, birds and drums take over. In Africa one is never beyond the sound of drums and the rhythm of one's own life seems somehow related to their staccato beat.

In the peaceful loneliness of that first ride, a fire within me flickered and went out. I found once more the serenity of my childhood mansions—and the strength of a proud old man who wanted to possess all the land his blind eyes could not survey. For me, I realized at once, this was a new homecoming.

The Liberian Government immediately cast me in a role of great responsibility for which my youth and inexperience left me unprepared. As a Special Assistant to the Minister of Public Works and Utilities, I was to be responsible for the coordination of all public services. My duties were largely financial: the allocation of Export-Import funds and of other loans for commerce and industry, and the procurement of new loans from public and private international fiscal institutions for projects that would be both socially worthwhile and economically viable in a country which, after a century of independence and modern government, still remained greatly underdeveloped.

This assignment might have led older, wiser men to take the next plane out of the country. But I was avid for experience and a glutton for responsibility. I stayed. I discovered experience and I learned responsibility.

It took the Africans three years to accept me as one of their own. At first, their acceptance or nonacceptance was a matter of indifference to me. After all, in spite of myself, I was an American, with ways of thinking quite different from theirs. I was surprised and somewhat shocked at what seemed to be an incredible ignorance prevalent even among some of the country's elite; I resented the apathy shown by authorities toward measures for social improvement; I did not like the authoritarian measures used to suppress political opposition. I resented, and still resent, the lavish way in which some of the rulers live at the obvious expense of the people. It hurt me to see black people deny other black people opportunities to serve—just as I had been denied in my homeland. Yet I stayed. And as I stayed, I learned a simple truth: that I could love, and be loved by, people who had been utterly alien to me. I speak advisedly: my colleagues in government service were not so alien. They spoke correct phrases in perfect English, had air-conditioned homes and indulged themselves in polite gossip whenever the occasion arose, which was quite frequently. The women were either fat, loud and sweaty, or else thin and graceful, and seemed forever silent, looking out of the windows of their eyes on a world which they had yet to interpret. I stayed. I learned.

This was living. In my "oil days," I had often dreamed of dining by candlelight in my own Park Avenue penthouse, and had told my friends that I would not settle for anything less than a view of the river. My African days taught me that you can see rivers from any vantage point if you know how to look for them.

I went up and down the country, beholding dream-lakes and sudden silvery falls with the critical eye of one who plans to capture natural beauty for its commercial utility. Waterfalls meant hydroelectricity. I thought of "handicrafts," or "animal husbandry" whenever I saw the soft-haired buffaloes trampling about in the marshier sections of the water.

I had been catapulted into a job which gave me the prestige which I felt I deserved, and which had been so unjustly denied to me in America. This job I learned to love, and I learned humility from the immensity of the tasks set before me. I also learned how it felt to be accepted—nay, wanted. I learned this when people who owned land pointed to a vacant field beside their property and insisted that I settle there that I might be closer to them. I sensed this again and again when problems of African independence were discussed in my presence, and my opinion on various aspects of these problems was solicited by my African friends.

Through five years of experience and exposure, I acquired the knowledge and skills which made me not only an expert on planning for economic and social development, but—and this is infinitely more important—provided me with an understanding of human problems I could not acquire as an outcast in America.

I love Africa. I love its sunsets, the quiet of its countryside, its simplicity. As I discovered it, I also discovered myself. I discovered the joy of dedication, how rewarding it is to "work for a cause" that one believes in. Whatever I may have contributed to African society has been given back to me fourfold, and for this I shall remain eternally grateful.

Five years passed and then, one day, I awoke and found that I could not see. I had contracted a rare, tropical eye disease requiring immediate surgery. Since the required medical care was then available only in the United States, the Liberian Government paid my plane fare back to New York, and also for my stay in one of New York City's expensive hospitals.

The operation was successful and I recovered my sight rapidly. I was overjoyed and began to look around me with brand-new, unspoiled eyes and an open mind.

Friends now insisted that I stay, that I owed something to the country of my birth, that it was better to try to right wrongs than to run away from them. They pointed out that things had changed since I had left five years before, and that I no longer had the right to say that everything was right in Africa and everything wrong in the United States. And so I stayed.

I stayed and I went through a repeat performance of what I had experienced after leaving college. Everybody was polite, everybody was sympathetic, but nobody could use the special services that I had to offer. This time I was wise: I went back to Africa before I had time to become angry and embittered all over again.

After spending three more years in Liberia, and traveling through many other African countries as a representative of the Liberian Government, I returned to the United States once again, this time to see my ailing father. Again I was urged to seek a job in this country that would be consonant with my experience. Again I tried, and again I failed. Now I reached the conclusion that it was impossible for me to attain self-fulfillment and to contribute anything of value to a society of which I still felt that I was a part. But this time, instead of being angered, I was immensely saddened. I decided to leave again, but now it seemed to me as though I was abandoning a friend who desperately needed help, but was too disturbed to be able to accept it. I felt frustration, but not for myself; I merely felt sorry for those who were depriving themselves while they thought that they were depriving me.

Thus, when the government of Guinea offered me a position, I did not hesitate to sign a contract, I was about to leave once again for Africa when the unexpected happened. A Negro woman who has devoted her life to helping the young, and whom I've known for many years, called me. She said that a grant was being made available through the President's Committee and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for a project for the youth of Harlem. She added: "We need you here, George. Please stay."

I cannot say that at first I was overly enthusiastic about the project. A grant is a fine thing, but it doesn't last forever. What would happen when the project came to an end? Did I have the strength to put myself through yet another excruciating job-seeking experience? Then, suddenly, I stopped asking myself questions; I realized that what really mattered was the project and what it could mean to hundreds of Negro children who, as I had, must face a future where color more than ability could determine their destiny. I stayed.

I designed the initial project for the Domestic Peace Corps with the help of three people. Our original plan was to illustrate the real and pressing need for such a corps, and to test its feasibility. In designing the project, I was moved by two personal considerations:

1. I wanted to prove that the spirit of voluntarism inherent in the American democratic tradition is still alive among the young, and that it can be greatly stimulated by a specially designed crash training program.

2. My compelling need to do something for my people in an area where I know I can be helpful, and in which I have competence.

It has been hard work, and it will become more difficult as the project expands. But I feel as gratified now as I did on the day when President Tubman of Liberia did me the honor of asking me to become a citizen of his country. I have at last become a man of meaning in my own country. I have been able to contribute my talents for the betterment of the land of my birth. I know at last not only what to fight against, but what to fight for.

I have, of course, disagreed with a number of articles which have appeared in THE NATION over the years. At the same time, however, I have always respected the courage and forthrightness of the editors in stating the facts and analyzing them. I think the publication has provoked both thought and controversy, both of which are essential in a democracy such as ours.

Keep up the good work for another hundred years. —Sen. William Proxmire

LEWIS A. COSER

THE FEAR of POSITIVE THINKING

When he isn't teaching sociology at Brandeis University, Professor Coser is writing books or contributing to various journals (mostly of dissent). His most recent book is Men of Ideas: a Sociologist's View (Free Press).

THE CLAIM OF THE intellectual to get a hearing in the market place and on the forum has never been securely established on the American scene. Though this nation was founded by men who achieved the very rare feat of combining intellectual eminence with political leadership, anti-intellectual tendencies have been sharply salient in American society and in the American polity ever since the passing of the generation of the Founding Fathers. As the requirements of mass democracy forced the gentleman intellectual from the political scene, the new style political leaders felt the need to flatter the electorate by stressing the superiority of inborn, natural, intuitive and folkish wisdom and to devaluate the ratiocinations of the cultivated. Politics and mind began to be seen as antithetical, and the cultivated retreated into a genteel isolation from political life. Politics was defined as hard, demanding and masculine; ideas and culture came to be seen as effeminate. Though this image partially receded, as Richard Hofstadter has reminded us, during the progressive era and, again, during the New Deal, it has continued to mark American politics in ways often incomprehensible to the European mind.

The very democratic and egalitarian passion which marked the history of America as a nation was also responsible for a distrust of those who might cloak their claims to elite status under the pretext of being the appointed guardians of the arcana of knowledge, be it in science or in the law. As early as 1783, an aroused citizen could be heard calling for a purge of the courts so that "Voluminous laws [could be] curtailed into a plain command, which the common people, of plain sense, may understand."

The common man's disparagement of learning was catered to not only in politics, but in all other institutional spheres. In religion especially, as revivalism and evangelicalism displaced the scholarly traditions of early Puritanism, the conviction grew that head-religion was inferior to heart-religion. From the Great Awakening to Billy Graham, one notices a progressive primitivization of the Christian message, a growing dissociation of sensibilities; religion came to stand for emotion and to be inimical to mind. In their efforts to win over the unchurched frontiersmen and the vast secularized urban masses, evangelical preachers gradually developed a muscular Christianity, stressing the "practical" value of their messages and inspiring distrust in the claims of intellect. The minister but too often became a salesman of the gospel, a booster of Christ.

The all-pervasive stress on practicality explains as well the sorry state of American science and American higher education throughout most of the 19th century. When national support for higher education was forthcoming at all, it was almost exclusively limited to the advancement of the mechanical and agricultural arts rather than to the "impractical" sciences. When an Englishman offered America an endowment for a national scientific institution, Congress refused to accept the gift for many years. When it finally did so, it invested the Smithsonian bequest in bonds of the State of Arkansas, which promptly defaulted. . . .

Lest it be believed that such attitudes belong to a long-surpassed state, it is well to be reminded that but a decade ago a Special Committee of the House of Representatives to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations, under the Chairmanship of Congressman Reece of Tennessee, issued a report warning of a dangerous trend in the social sciences which had led to "an excess of empirical research," based on "inductive reasoning from observed data," which in turn had led to " 'moral relativity', to the detriment of our moral, religious, and governmental principles. . . ."

NO ONE has yet been able fully to answer Crèvecoeur's insistent query, "Who then is the American, this new man?" But one strong ingredient which marked his make-up has clearly been a distrust of intellect born of a commitment to activity, practicality and admiration for those hard-headed men who got a job done without being distracted by excessive ratiocination. In this respect, images derived from the muscular politics and the muscular morality of the 19th century merge effortlessly with the newer images of 20th-century mass culture. Even though the prestige of the scientist has risen enormously in the post-Sputnik era, his portrayal in the mass media is still marked by a great deal of ambivalence. Even though he may nowadays be endowed with powerful magical mana, or perhaps because he is so endowed, he is conceived as threatening, as possessed by a fearful otherness, which marks him off from ordinary men. Even though he may overcompensate for his lack of truly masculine attributes by his ability to manipulate hidden and secret sources of power, he seldom commands more than the kind of awed reverence with which primitives might upon occasion have viewed practitioners of dark and awful tribal rites.

While our commitment to technology provides some protection for the scientist against the claims of practicality, no such protection has traditionally been available to the artist who, in consequence, has been even more vulnerable a target of anti-intellectual wrath throughout much of our history. The prevalence of the theme of estrangement among our greatest men of letters, from Hawthorne and Melville to Henry Adams and Henry James, is a consequence of this. The American artist could rarely feel, like his French counterpart, that he incarnated national purposes or national aspirations. His was almost invariably an interstitial existence, and his work was shaped by his sense of isolation. Throughout most of the 19th century, the arts were seen mainly as a means to soothe and comfort feminine sensibilities. Men devoting themselves to the calling of the arts condemned themselves to exist at the margin of "serious" society. Both Pale Faces and Red Skins alike, to use Philip Rahv's suggestive typology of American writers, were but too often treated with, at best, tolerant amusement.

The negative stereotypes of the artist-intellectual tended to decrease in virulence when the idea of modernity burst upon the 20th century. As artists and literary men began their counterattack against Main Street and Babbittry, as the modern temper gradually eroded genteel tradition and popular know-nothing reflexes alike, as mass education spread at least a veneer of culture over the raw practicality of America, crude anti-artistic and anti-intellectual attitudes began to be driven underground or were left to flourish only in such pockets of resistance as are found in the Bible Belt or the affluent suburbs of southern California. As culture became a conversation piece and status symbol among the nouveaux riches and the well-to-do, the claims of the intellect seemed to gain more ready acceptance. Yet anti-intellectualism was to reach its highest pitch in the fifties.

TO DOCUMENT the anti-intellectual passions of the McCarthy era of pseudo-conservative revolt is to belabor the obvious. Intellectuals were not the only target of McCarthy's rage, to be sure, but they were prime targets. His mindless sorties against educators, universities, writers, diplomats became models for countless minor inquisitors who hoped to rise to power and influence by joining the hunt. During the fifties it seemed at times as if intellectual-baiting would displace baseball as a national sport. All the venom and resentment against the very spirit of modernity which had long smoldered under the surface now came into the open in an atmosphere of anti-intellectual fervor and malice which seemed matched only by the witch hunts which Stalin earlier had instigated against Russia's writers and artists. McCarthyism finally subsided, but the anti-intellectualism of the American Right was by no means dead.

The nativistic crudities of the Goldwater campaign are still vivid enough in our ears as not to need much discussion here. When Goldwater argued that "The moral fibre of the American people is beset by rot and decay," it was not hard to realize that he wished to single out modern intellectuals as the root cause of the decay. When he said in his Memphis speech, "A lot of my enemies call me simple. The trouble with the so-called liberal today is that he doesn't understand simplicity. The answers to America's problems are simple," it was not hard to realize that this terrible simplificateur appealed to the very same anti-intellectual prejudices that have marred American politics since the early 19th century. The call to arms against "permissiveness in the school and the home," the claim that our basic social evils stemmed from a lack of "discipline and punishment" or from the attempt to "eliminate religious sentiment from every aspect of public life," the appeal for a return to the basic simplicities of the Protestant Ethic or of Herbert Spencer, all the dreary inanities of this dismal campaign will serve future historians with ample evidence for the continued virulence of anti-intellectual reflexes on the New American Right and among all those who have not yet accepted the 20th century.

Anti-intellectual prejudices on the Right have been fully documented. But modern liberals often seem to assume, by virtue of a kind of self-comforting hypothesis, that the disease is limited to the Right alone. Such a view might provide a considerable measure of psychic reassurance but it hardly gibes with the facts. The Right has by no means a monopoly in this respect; the Left is similarly, though perhaps not equally, susceptible to the infection. And certain intellectuals have themselves been the purveyors of anti-intellectual ideas.

The roots of liberal and radical thought in the ideas and ideals of enlightenment and rationalism may have provided a measure of inoculation against the virus of anti-intellectualism in the past. But ever since the fin de siècle revolt against the optimistic, enlightened, progressive rationalism of the 19th century which we associate with such otherwise diverse figures as Pareto and Freud, Sorel and Dewey, certain anti-intellectual tendencies have become prevalent among intellectuals. Not that Freud or Dewey can be held responsible for the follies of their disciples—they were, of course highly self-conscious intellectuals fastidiously devoted to the intellectual calling—but the fact is that it was possible, by utilizing bits and pieces of their work, to build an anti-intellectual world view from the materials they had provided. Once the disappointed lovers of progress and rationality discovered the driving force of unconscious desires and untamed instincts, of irrational taboos and nonrational constraints, there came the temptation to turn disappointment in the powers of rationality into an attack on the claims of intellect.

Norman Brown's Life Against Death serves to provide an instructive example. In this strange book Brown attempts to "renew psychoanalysis" by raising the ante over both Wilhelm Reich and Herbert Marcuse. Only the end of all repression, the "resurrection of the body," the total de-sublimation, he argues, can cure "the disease called man." The abolition of repression "would abolish the unnatural concentrations of libido in certain particular bodily organs. . . . The human body would become polymorphously perverse, delighting in that full life of all the body which it now fears." The coming polymorphous revolution would not, however, affect the body alone. Norman Brown entertains the hypothesis that "formal logic and the law of contradiction are the rules whereby the mind submits to operate under general conditions of repression. As with the concept of time, Kant's categories of rationality would then turn out to be the categories of repression." In the light of such cravings poor Wilhelm Reich, orgone box and all, sounds pretty mild. He wanted only to reduce body armor and cure cancer—the categories of logic he left alone.

IT THUS CAME to pass, as Richard Hofstadter has shown in convincing detail, that alleged disciples of Dewey developed a "life adjustment" philosophy of education built on the anarchic idea that the subject matter being taught a child did not matter, be it Latin or homemaking, provided it had "an immediate appeal" for the child. Or, as the National Education Association once put it: "Mathematics and mechanics, art and agriculture, history and homemaking are all peers." No matter that the old master had preached a doctrine of almost puritanical self-restraint, many alleged followers took Freud's writing as a point of departure for a kind of neo-Rousseauistic primitivism, an antinomian stance in which the claims of instinct were taken to be the only reliable guides to "natural" conduct. Similarly, self-styled disciples of Marx disregarded the master's claims to have provided scientifically certified guidelines to action by exalting a kind of generalized activism, an exaltation of doing over reflection.

In spite of, or rather because of our sympathy with and admiration for the youth who have emerged in recent years from apathy and despair in the magnificent upsurge of the civil rights and peace movements, we must not close our eyes to the anti-intellectual strains which can often be discerned among them. Talking to these young men and women one senses often that the failure of the ideological commitments of their elders makes them turn toward a certain contempt for "mere" thinking and a distrust of the intellect. One notices among them a curtailment of time perspective, an immersion in the here and now of immediate experience. They often seem to be given to undifferentiated, almost visceral responses. They are right, of course, to deplore the lack of militancy, vision and commitment of their elders, but this does not exempt them from the obligation to think through the political alternatives open to them. The admirable movements in which the young today struggle against the follies that their elders have bequeathed to them, would be fatally marred were they to succumb to a kind of mindless activism, a know-nothing militancy, a conduct unguided by firm intellectual as well as emotional commitments.

SUCH INCIDENTS as the recent "dirty word" episode on the Berkeley campus—which seems to have been activated mainly by a desire to maintain flagging student militancy—succeeded only in making the Free Speech Movement look ridiculous and sophomoric. Last year's attempt by a few civil rights activists to mar the opening of the New York World's Fair by a "stall in" on the major access roads failed completely and only served to help discredit the movement in the eyes of previously well-disposed middle-of-the-roaders. Some of the antics of Jesse Gray and his followers calling last summer for a "hundred revolutionaries willing to die" in support of rent strikes in New York's ghettos is another example. Militancy for militancy's sake, inability to think through the relations of the means used to the ends striven for, can only injure and weaken the new radical movement which, as a whole, seems to me the most hopeful development we have witnessed in America since the thirties. These young radicals sometimes argue that theirs is a "pragmatic" politics based on personal choice and commitment. So be it. But they might do well to remember John Dewey's advice, "While the solution has to be reached by action based on personal choice, theory can enlighten and guide choice and action by revealing alternatives, and by bringing to light what is entailed when we choose one alternative rather than another."

Nor are anti-intellectual tendencies on the Left limited to the militant young. In fact the exaltation of action and of the primitive id at the expense of the socialized and hence "unnatural" ego is much more pronounced among certain of their elders. Norman Mailer's recent apologia for murder in his neo-primitivist An American Dream may serve as an extreme example in point. This sick and sickening apologia for Mailer's hipster hero, he of the ever active phallus, is far from being the private fantasy of one writer; it reproduces, though in heightened form, a revolt from reason and intellect which far transcends Mailer's case history. His hero who, after having strangled his wife, reflects: "I was weary with a most honorable fatigue, and my flesh seemed new. I had not felt so nice since I was twelve," is echoed by LeRoi Jones's revolutionary hero in his recent play, The Slave, who after having derided his "dickless" liberal-intellectual antagonist, finally shoots him to the applause of many young Negroes in the audience. Genêt's and Burrough's work provide other examples. Genêt's "The only criterion for an act is its elegance" can be said to provide a capsule definition of this new literature of chaos glorified.

THESE ARE EXTREMES, to be sure, but I cannot help but feel that a number of younger novelists, such as Joseph Heller, illustrate a similar anti-intellectual temper in more muted ways. Even as one enjoys the boisterous protest of Catch-22 and its many successors, one senses in its pages a nihilistic rejection of the claims of culture and intellect. This fashionable nihilism has now even made its appearance in, of all places, the Luce publications, which but recently clamored for Men of Affirmation among the intellectuals to take the place of somewhat un-American Men of Protest. Writes John Aldridge on Mailer's new novel in Life: "The novel explores . . . the possibilities, not for damnation, but for salvation to be found in some of the most reprehensible acts known to our society—murder, suicide, incest, fornication and physical violence. It dramatizes the various ways a man may sin in order to be saved, consort with Satan in order to attain God, become holy as well as whole by restoring the primitive psychic circuits that enable him to live in harmony with himself and find his courage, regardless of whether his courage seeks its test in the challenges of love or the temptation to murder, whether he ends by becoming saint or psychopath." Even Nietzsche's nihilism beyond good and evil is still intimately tied to the Western civilization he attacks with such bitter vehemence; certain modern nihilists have "progressed" beyond him into fantasies of total rejection, of rebellion against the very idea of civilization. To them everything is a "racket," or a weird circus. As Mary McCarthy has said of Burrough's Naked Lunch in an admiring review, "The best comparison for the book, with its aerial sex acts performed on a high trapeze, its con men and barkers, its arena-like form, is in fact to a circus. A circus travels but it is always the same, and this is Burrough's sardonic image of modern life."

One realizes, of course, that the anti-intellectual revolt among certain intellectuals becomes understandable only if seen against the backdrop of a world disfigured by the continued threat of atomic destruction. Much of it can be read as a primitive protest against the stultification of bureaucratized mass society. Yet the primitivism which is advertised as a cure for the disease of modern man turns out to be but another form of his sickness.

One source from which anti-intellectualism derives some strength on the current scene lies in the functioning of modern industrialized society, quite apart from the realm of ideologies, of activistic practicalism and the ambiguous appeals of neo-primitivism. Industrialization fosters the preponderance within economy and polity of mental technicians who view the claims of the intellect with barely concealed contempt or, at best, with amused curiosity. In the world of computerized decision-making, of highly skilled operators with extremely narrow fields of specialization, generalizing and critical functions might slowly atrophy. Once the center of the stage is occupied by specialized brain workers and experts of various kinds, surviving intellectuals might find it hard to find an appreciative audience. In Max Weber's "cage of the future," in the disenchanted ice age of managerially dominated mass societies, autonomy, creativity, critical abilities and substantial rationality, the traditional prerogatives of the intellectual, might well be regarded as potential disturbers of peace of mind. And, as I have written elsewhere, much like hunchbacks today, surviving intellectuals would then meet a mixture of pity and awe on the part of the settled denizens of the world. In such a society, should certain present tendencies develop to the full, the claims of high culture and of intellect would become problematic. Such societies would, in fact, not be anti-intellectual at all, they would be a-intellectual. T. S. Eliot once remarked that the blasphemer is still close to the Christian: in as far as he still feels the need to attack the Godhead he recognizes it. Only the indifferent is the truly dangerous antagonist of Christianity. Similarly the truly dangerous antagonists of the intellect might not be those who attack it explicitly, but rather those who treat it as irrelevant.

But this ice age is not now with us, though we might discern some of its lineaments in certain present trends. In fact, defense of the claims of the intellect against all those who for whatever reason wish to restrict and deny it must be seen as an essential component of the struggle against it. Basically the struggle against the bureaucratic ossification of modern society and the struggle against all the varieties of anti-intellectual tendencies is one and the same. Those who defend the claims of the intellect defend the very idea of an open culture against a future in which they would be obsolete.

One hundred years is a long time for anything to last, and for a weekly liberal journal it is a miraculous stretch.

Without THE NATION one of the central components of the American liberal movement would have been missing and the movement itself would never have been the same.

I send congratulations to THE NATION as a liberal journal of serious and lasting importance. —Harold Taylor

PUBLIC SCHOOLS FOR PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

EDGAR Z. FRIEDENBERG

Holding degrees in both chemistry and education, Mr. Friedenberg switched to sociology as he became "increasingly aware of the school as an institution to be evaluated." He is now Professor of Sociology at University of California (Davis).

"TO EDUCATE" HAS BECOME the most transitive of verbs. It is something that is always done to somebody else, usually by adults to children. Long before THE NATION was first published, the word had lost much of its original meaning of "to educe or draw out" the pupils' personal gifts and potentialities. This may possibly be what Aristotle did—rather irresponsibly—for Alexander of Macedon, later to be called the Great. It is seldom what American public schools do for the students who are obliged by law and circumstances to attend them.

Self-education, in the older, eductive sense, is really no longer permitted. Our society has become too anxious for credentials to allow it; the student may read and listen on his own time, or flee the attendance-taker and the draft board by going on the road; but such self-cultivation has become eccentric and socially dysfunctional even when not strictly illegal. Students who try to practice it risk bogging down in revolt and preciosity, and losing the self-esteem they started with. Education, today, means schooling. Some readers, perhaps, may find it pedantic even to suggest that it might mean anything else.

Education, or schooling, has been a recurrent concern of Americans—as it must be, perhaps, to all immigrants, who can have no natural feel for their new and alien surroundings. Those who would build a New Jerusalem must arrange for instruction in Hebrew; yet, it takes a while to feel at ease in Zion. Our preoccupation with education has, however, been suspiciously protracted and obsessive. This is not our usual style; our customary habit is to leap from problem to problem like a clumsy and over-confident moose, declaring each in turn to have been solved by our exceptional technical gifts and ignoring the wreckage we have strewn behind us. But we ruminate about our schools; which is to say that we have never quite been able to stomach them.

People only become obsessed with difficulties they are dealing with dishonestly, and whose actual basis they dare not quite face. Our fretfulness about education masks, I believe, an unwillingness either to accept or renounce certain of the most important social functions of our schools. Centrally, these have to do with status and success, and the conditions youngsters must meet in order to have a chance to achieve them. Among those conditions, of course, is that status and success must be the rewards they want and seek; and the schools must intensify their urge to do so, on the terms society makes available.

Community leaders are likely to find themselves in conflict when they face what those terms have become. In fitting American youth for its destiny in the free world of tomorrow, our schools may be virtually compelling them to become a bunch of ratfinks. So, in effect, Jules Henry in Culture Against

Man and Paul Goodman in Compulsory Mis-Education maintain. Though this is not the whole story, they are right, I think. We are inclined to regard our interest in education and our huge expenditure on it as evidence of enlightened commitment to social progress and to the spread of economic opportunity. When we still complain, as we continually do, it is because we believe our schools are not functioning properly; standards are too low, or the dropout rate is too high, or discipline is too lenient, or college entrance is overstressed and competition is too keen. Educational evils are attributed to defective schools. In fact, they are as likely to be the work of effective schools that are being directed toward evil ends by the society that supports and controls them.

There is a sense in which great emphasis on formal education is a sign of stress and social conflict, quite apart from questions about whether the schools are working right. I do not refer here to the overworked and nostalgic idea that primitive people have more élan vital and fun, because they lead more natural lives. This is probably sentimental and is in any case irrelevant to my point. Great educational zeal is a trouble sign in other ways than as a token of possibly excessive artificiality.

SCHOOLS, AS SEPARATE, FORMAL, social institutions, do not appear in a society simply because it is growing more complex and specialized. In fact, the more complex and specialized a particular social role is the more likely it is that it will have to be mostly learned on the job. But, as Margaret Mead pointed out more than twenty years ago[1], schools are a definite indication that a society is divisible into a dominant and a subordinate group, and that the dominant group want to teach the subordinate group something they could not be trusted to learn if left to themselves. Schools are expensive; and when the church, or the state, or the taxpayers set them up and arrange for the young and ignorant to attend them, it is either because they anticipate that they will have to draw on their pupils in the future for the skills and attitudes necessary to maintain and expand their enterprises, or because they have set society up and are running it in such a way that the young can make no contribution to it and become a nuisance if allowed at large (their confinement seems less arbitrary if the place in which they are kept is called a school). These reasons are neither exhaustive nor mutually exclusive; but in our society they are, I believe, paramount.

There need not, of course, necessarily be a conflict of interest between those who run the schools and those who are obliged to attend them. But if public instruction must be heavily institutionalized and strongly supported by legal sanctions there probably is such a conflict. People do tend to learn what fits their pattern of life and their conception of their own interests without other people making a special effort to teach them; though they may want and need assistance in making the necessary arrangements. On the other hand, those social forces that mold the educational establishment also set the terms for later success and even survival as adults; and in this sense, of course, children need to become what schooling makes them. Whether education is conducive, therefore, to economic opportunity or economic exploitation is a highly subjective judgment. Supporters of the school system insist, quite sincerely, that education develops talent and potential by suiting the pupils' skills and character to the opportunities society provides and helping them to make themselves useful. This, indeed, has been the historic function of public schooling in America. Only Paul Goodman, I believe, has spoken of this process as a kind of subsidy by which the personnel problems of private enterprise are solved at public expense. The schools train youth to be the kind of employees corporate bureaucracies need, and do the dirty job of weeding out the unfit by establishing dossiers on them to warn prospective employers away, or guiding them into humble jobs for which their deficiencies of character or competence, from the corporate point of view, are not disabling.

CORPORATIONS, in any case, pay a large proportion of the taxes that support education; so this is no less biased a way of viewing the function of the schools than eulogizing them as the fountainhead of economic opportunity would be. Every society is a kind of organism, and its schools serve as a kind of digestive system, breaking pupils down into goodies that can be transported to and utilized by remote organ-systems. Our school system is excessively faithful to the analogy in its tendency to degrade youngsters it cannot assimilate or finds toxic, and to treat them like excrement. And today, American youth no longer has an alternative to being ingested by the schools. Throughout our history, the average number of years of schooling completed has risen steadily from one generation to the next, as has, of course, the proportion of youth of any age still in school. Our current attention to the "dropout problem" is not the result of any increase in the dropout rate—the rate is still falling, as it always has been—but to our increased difficulty in utilizing adolescents out of school and, I suspect, to the increased political potential of the Negroes who drop out at a rate disproportionate to their enrollment.

---

[1] "Our Educational Needs in Primitive Perspective": American Journal of Sociology, p. 48, May 6, 1943.

We now expect all adolescents to complete high school, and most of those who do have declared at some point in their high school career that they expect to attend college, while communities, faced with a higher unemployment rate among youth than among any other age group, strain their resources to give young people some sort of respectable civilian social role in institutions they hopefully call colleges.

This process is supposed to be progress: more and more young people, both relatively and absolutely, are being granted greater and greater educational opportunity. Perhaps; but only if we assume that what is taught in school is necessarily more valuable than what might have been learned outside it, if society had troubled to provide alternatives, so that youngsters might be free to stay out and make their own way, and had legitimate opportunities to get jobs and live according to their natures. This too is an American tradition, celebrated most triumphantly, perhaps, by Huck Finn in his closing statement. Only recently have we refused absolutely to permit adolescents—as we would now say—to program their own activities.

SO, INSTEAD OF CITING our approach to total school attendance as evidence that youth is being served better and better, I should prefer to accept it for what it certainly is: one more instance of the centralization of American life, with corresponding elimination of the "path less traveled by" that might have "made all the difference." For some youngsters this constitutes reduced educational opportunity; and for all it constitutes more limited—that is, less diverse—educational opportunity. Expansion of the scope and authority of formal education in this country is a pivotal part of the process by which human diversity is stultified or extinguished; not just because of the simple fact that all must now attend school for ten years or longer, but because of what school is usually like. With school consolidation, the increased dominance of standards and curricula set through state departments of education, the consequent practice of state adoptions leading to the growth of a mass textbook industry, and the emergence of an ideologically uniform educational establishment represented by the NEA, there is not as much variation in that as there used to be, either. If Dr. Conant's recent proposal for an "Interstate Commission for Planning a National Educational Policy" [2] is accepted there will soon be still less.

In compensation for the more limited range of his educational opportunity, the increased term of compulsory school attendance is supposed to provide the student who completes high school—and, preferably, college—greater economic opportunity. This is the argument advanced by those who most vigorously combat the "dropout problem." I have never heard a participant at any of the numerous conferences on this topic that I have attended argue that what was learned in school would have improved the quality of the dropout's life except insofar as it made him more employable and raised his income; nor have I heard it suggested that such an argument, even if valid, would have moved many dropouts to reconsider. The case for protracted school attendance usually rests on its economic merits. But the economic argument is largely circular. It is certainly true that people with diplomas get further and have less trouble than people without them. So do people with passports, and for the same reason; there is general agreement to require them. Employers who refuse to hire anyone but high-school graduates hardly ever specify what it is that the job requires that could only have been learned in school. If they did, they could usually find out whether a youngster had it with much greater certainty by testing than by asking for his diploma. Nevertheless, the requirement is not irrelevant; they most often want the kind of employee who could have succeeded in high school; who is docile, reliable, not a troublemaker; who is punctual and symbol-oriented, though not actually literate or responsible.

We are back, then, to the point that the schools are an integral part of the system by which the dominant social and economic institutions of our society staff themselves and propagate their values. What is new to us is the totality of the process. Society no longer brooks any alternative to school attendance; the schools no longer permit their students much voice or choice about what kind of persons they shall be encouraged to become. There is, of course, variation in the curriculum: there are IQ groupings in elementary school, with offerings tailored to the school's assessment of its pupils' abilities; there are general, commercial, and academic tracks in high school, with only the last leading to college. But students are placed in these by a counselor, partly on the basis of test scores and previous academic record; but to a large degree on the basis of his estimate of the fitness of things and the kind of student he is dealing with. This is not, as is sometimes thought, a simple function of social-class bias, for the bias works only negatively. In their subtle and perceptive study of the counselors' role in the educational careers of the students assigned to them, Cicourel and Kitzuse[3] found that though counselors usually kept students with pronounced lower-status characteristics out of college preparatory courses to which they would have admitted most middle-class students with the same grades and aptitude scores, the counselors also excluded qualified middle-class candidates with too much hubris: who were arrogant, or highly confident, or who professed to be happy and self-satisfied and refused to provide the counselors with the "problems" they needed in order to maximize their own operation. Very able upper-status students, if they were blithe and insouciant, were put-down as "underachievers" by counselors who made dire—and self-fulfilling—prophecies that such rogues would never get into a good college. "He thinks he's handsome," one counselor snapped in appraising such a student. "He's nice looking, but not handsome."

---

[2] James B. Conant, Shaping Educational Policy. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1964.

[3] Abraham Cicourel and John Kitzuse, The Educational Decision-Makers. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1963.

CONSIDERING, THEN, that there is no longer an alternative to school attendance, the schools' assumption of the right to prescribe the student's personal tastes and style of life is wholly insupportable. I have discussed elsewhere[4] the means, both subtle and brutal, by which students were kept in line in certain exemplary high schools whose climate of values I was studying. More recently, some schools have become so egregiously presumptuous that their actions have been reported by a press not notably zealous in defending the civil rights of adolescents. Thus, on December 16, 1964, The New York Times carried a story from Hartford, Conn., that Edward T. Kores, Jr., has been ordered to change his hairstyle or face prosecution as a truant. The school superintendent had suspended him on November 13 "for wearing his black hair in bangs Beatle fashion" though > . . . trimmed in the back and on the side. Edward, with the backing of his father, Edward Kores, Sr., a carpenter, refused to change his haircut. His father denounced the subsequent suspension as an invasion of personal rights. . . . Westbrook's Board of Education voted unanimously last Thursday to uphold the suspension. Yesterday Mr. and Mrs. Kores came here and met with [State Education Commissioner] Dr. Sanders after trying unsuccessfully to file a complaint with the State Commissioner on Civil Rights.

>
> Dr. Sanders heard their case, then pointed out that a state law required all children to attend school until the age of 16, which Edward will not reach until February. Today, a spokesman for the Commissioner said he has written the Westbrook School Superintendent, asking him to seek the cooperation of Westbrook's Town Counsel in enforcing the law against the family.

As I read this account in The Times I recalled—too vaguely, unfortunately, to be able to look it up and check out the details—a local case which had recently been reported in The Sacramento Bee. This, too, involved a boy who had been suspended for having a Beatle haircut, and who had appealed his suspension. But the courts had sustained him, on the grounds that he was a member of a musical group that got paid for its services, and his haircut was therefore a necessary item of professional equipment and not, like Kores', just personal.

MANY SCHOOL PERSONNEL are exceptionally well-suited to the role of Delilah the Philistine, and I would not deny them their dramatic triumph in it; though one might have hoped they would choose to appear in a more significant vehicle. One should not, however, underestimate the significance of the role they have chosen. It is no small thing to serve as the instrument by which the entire youth of a great nation is subdued in spirit and taught that it has no rights except those it can wheedle and no inherent dignity that anyone is obligated to respect. This, too, is an indispensable part of the program by which youth are fitted into a mass society, which protects itself from faction and bitterness by discounting the claims of distinction in advance, before they can become a threat or arouse envy and resentment. Young Kores' experience sums up, in microcosm, the entire social transition by which the word "character" changed its meaning from something we were proud to develop to something we are ridiculed for being. This must all have been a very important lesson to him.

In principle, however, it has its ironic side, which becomes more apparent when the lesson is carried to extremes. A few months ago I had occasion to visit a Juvenile Hall, or detention prison, in a nearby county. This was not a punitive institution. Some of the kids who were locked up in it were being held for trial. But most of them had not been charged with any offense; they were "dependent minors" or "potential delinquents" or, in some cases, simply abandoned and homeless. These had not been confined by any formal legal process; and no process existed by which they could demand release. They would have hearings, in the course of time, at which the juvenile authorities would dispose of their cases administratively; but some would be kept there, though accused of no misconduct, till they were 21 if there seemed to be no place else to put them. They lived in cells that smelled like cells; but the place was humanely run, and some effort was made to give it a normal, institutional atmosphere. There was an enclosed garden, though the youngsters were not permitted in it except under guard; and there was a wing with schoolrooms. In the corridor to this, as usual, was a framed facsimile of the Constitution, open at the Bill of Rights.

---

[4] "The Modern High School: A Profile": Commentary, November, 1963.

"What would you do," I asked, "if one of them read that?"

"Then," the Director replied, "we'd be in trouble."

It seemed discourteous to say so, but I had the distinct impression that we already were; and had been for some time.

As a kid in the Public Library in Fresno, on Broadway, across from the Orpheum Theatre, I discovered THE NATION, and I looked forward to examining the new issue every week. It always had fight, which a kid has, too, and I felt that I was in there, in that fight. —William Saroyan

When I was a college student, a friend introduced me to THE NATION. As I read it week after week, I began to look at the world differently, and began to see what I had never seen before. Now it is over twenty years that I have been reading THE NATION. Whatever I have been able to do to promote social justice, in the course of my ministry, my writing, teaching, or influence, has in no small measure been inspired by this great American magazine. —Rabbi Robert E. Goldburg

IS FREEDOM ACADEMIC?

LOUIS JOUGHIN

After a quarter-century of teaching, Mr. Joughin became director of the Academic Freedom Committee of the American Civil Liberties Union. He is now associate secretary of the American Association of University Professors. He has co-authored books on Sacco-Vanzetti and on higher education.*

A VERY SHORT ACCOUNT of academic freedom and a glance toward its future requires us mainly to examine pertinent forces at work in society and ensuing general results. There can be little discussion of the "cases" which provide for academic freedom its foundation in clinical material and which supply its human drama. Nor can a short history, of any kind, carefully develop its own governing ideas; the conceptual base must be presented with apology for its brusqueness. Thus—

Inquiry into the nature of academic freedom—retrospective, in present terms or with regard to the future—appears to warrant these postulates:

1. Academic freedom is a principle applied by a civilized society to protect the functional independence of an important group of civil servants.

2. Society assigns this freedom to responsible experts with the understanding that the liberty involved is to be used for the common good, and that the collateral personal privileges which accrue—inseparable and indispensable as they may be—are in fact derivative.

3. Because it is an idea and an ideal, academic freedom is subject to the inaccuracy of communal memory, to rough handling by mythology, and to emotional coloration from the lurid lights of crisis situations. Taking the long view, academic freedom flourishes when the community feels secure, and sickens when its world is frightened.

I

The history of American colleges and so-called universities for the background period, 1636 to 1865, yields many instructive episodes throwing light on the immemorial conflict between liberal and repressive forces. However, one seldom discovers a distinct academic freedom issue clearly defined; if an educational institution does well in terms of liberty, its good fortune is likely to be incidental to the happy resolution of some political or religious problem. Harvard, it is sure, did well most of the time; but this blessing probably resulted from the fact that liberalism was endemic among the successful men of Massachusetts. At the prevalent religiously affiliated colleges, students had a fair measure of freedom, sometimes because of inherent tolerance or latitudinarianism in the controlling sect, but perhaps more often because the competition for students was keen.

Not many persons had much to say about the principle of the freedom of the academy as an institution. The usual view, as Hofstadter notes, is that expressed in a letter of 1826 by Jefferson to Madison; in politics, at least, there was to be a clear-cut party line:

> In the selection of our law professor we must be rigorously attentive to his political principles. If we are true and vigilant in our trust, within a dozen or twenty years a majority of our own legislature will be from one school, and many disciples will have carried its doctrines home with them to their several states and leavened the whole mass.

II

Beginning in 1865, higher education in the United States joined in the steady march of our institutions toward maturity; available liberal forces came to a focus in a system which was becoming conscious of its own meaning and structure. Hofstadter, whose thinking on these matters is inescapable, reviews the contributory elements:

> The modern idea of academic freedom has been developed by men who have absorbed analogous ideas from the larger life of society. From modern science they have taken the notion of a continuing search for new truths, fostered by freedom of inquiry, verified by objective processes, and judged by those who are competent. From commerce they have taken the concept of a free competition among ideas—hence the suggestive metaphor of a free market in thought. From the politics of the liberal state they have taken the ideas of free speech and a free press and an appreciation of the multitudes of perspectives in a pluralistic society. From religious liberalism and from the long historical development which led to the taming of sectarian animus have come the ideas of toleration and religious liberty by which they have benefited.

---

*In this article he writes expressing his personal opinion and not as a staff member of his organization.

One other contributing influence, of slightly later date, should be noted: the law gave to academic freedom the powerful instrumentality of due process, which serves to guard individuals who have elected to surrender the protective armor of a competitive disposition.

Moving on, it appears that the seventy-six-year period from Appomattox to Pearl Harbor witnesses the effect of at least three of the positive forces just noted—science, religion and politics.

In the Ross case at Stanford, involving a social science, one encounters a common pattern in academic freedom controversies: the man loses out—briefly; the institution is disgraced—briefly; informed public opinion soon takes hold and the prime importance of science is established; a view hostile to freedom is discovered to be obsolete even for its own unintelligent end; and education goes forward in generally better shape. So at Stanford, in 1900, private wealth and personal power were dedicated to the advancement of knowledge; this arrangement perspicaciously brought to the campus a vigorous and articulate social scientist, E. A. Ross. Unfortunately, sponsorship and support were not adequately separated from a feeling of vested control. Mrs. Stanford, the owner of the establishment, with the aid of President Jordan, forced out Professor Ross. The issue was clear: was Stanford to be operated in the interest of functional competence or according to the will of those holding a proprietary interest? Ross left, to go to a better scene, but this proved nothing. In no time at all Stanford was regarded as a less suitable place than it had been for the conduct of scientific work; this loss of repute then became intolerable to prevailing public will; a change was made and Stanford University set its chastened face toward a future in which science was clearly better understood.

RELIGION IN THE colleges during this period can be regarded as a mildly suffocating force, even—for a disputatious adversary—a power to be feared. But in most institutions most professors were left alone most of the time. On an absolute scale, religion in the United States from 1865 to 1941 probably endangered academic freedom only occasionally. An unplanned accommodation seems to have been achieved, for which Woodrow Wilson might serve as a symbol. Wilson was intellectually trained and competent, but at heart he was a didactic moralist; his personal transcendence took the form of university and national presidencies.

Politics presents a mixed picture: a low fog settling in areas where not much action of any kind stirred the air, or a ridiculous bolt from above—as in the form of a Texas Ferguson—which set things back but did not destroy. But these depressing or irritating elements may be put aside because, in due course, the relationship between academic institutions and politics became extraordinarily fruitful. An increasing number of first-class minds came to be lodged in colleges and universities. When the Great Depression struck, the country discovered that much of its needed guidance would have to come from the academies. For the first time in the history of the United States it was apparent to the political power structure that the substance and method of higher learning was essential to national survival. Beginning in 1932, the public changed its mind about academic freedom. A principle which had been regarded as esoteric became a public necessity. The persons involved were no longer regarded as somewhat quixotic figures, but as civil servants. Justification was accomplished during the years of FDR—a perceptive aristocrat whose wholesale purchases of academic talent constituted a major social revolution.

However, in these same years—between the Civil War and World War II—one also encounters powerful forces greatly disadvantageous to the independence which we have called academic freedom. It was not so much a matter of overt anti-intellectualism or the rumbles of anti-collegiate mobsters; rather, the great enemies were lodged in the mindless currents of the social stream. Poverty, orthodoxy, obscurantism, naïveté and the war spirit hurt academic freedom just as they did other vital instrumentalities.

POVERTY, FOR professors, in these years was a matter of degree; a few were rich, no one starved, most were underprivileged. Life was seldom desperate but usually depressing. At the very end of the period, in the mid '40s after fifty years of national industrial growth, a faculty member at a distinguished private college found himself in a curious situation: his students paid the highest tuition-room-board rate in the country, and no member of the teaching staff could hope, from his own salary, to send his child to his own institution. The inevitable result was exhausting moonlighting, student disrespect for faculty, and a sentimental revolutionary spirit—activities and emotions quite incompatible with academic freedom.

The orthodoxy of the inter-war period was multiform and frequently became a demand for conformity with a particular religious or political position. In this there is surely nothing new. The insolent are always with us. What causes uneasiness is the general lack of challenge or resistance; we discover a more general orthodoxy, one so pervasive as to be without sect or party—in short, the universal adherence to the myth of progress. Granted an increasing population, industrial expansion, new resources, wider education and better health: all of this was happening and created happiness. The weakness in the structure was the marked irritability with which even modest dissent was greeted. Fifty years before Brown v. Board of Education, Professor John S. Bassett in 1904 nearly lost his post at Duke (not yet so named) because he dared to question the reality of progress in a scene where the racial question was unsolved. Bassett's unexpected survival, it should be emphasized, was due to the influence of millionaires and sectarian religious leaders who were rich or righteous enough to stand up for academic freedom.

Obscurantism is a harsh word and few really deserve to have it applied to their habit of mind. Perhaps it fairly fits only those who are both innocent and congenitally stupid. For example, Regent X. About thirty years ago a professor wrote a learned paper in which he held that properly fortified oleomargarine was equal in nutritional value to natural butter. He had the misfortune to hold an appointment in a state where the dairy industry was a major economic fact, and nearly lost his post. Regent X, a famous banker and trustee of a major state university, was asked what he thought of the oleo case. The reply was quick: "He should have looked for a job in a state where milk didn't matter." One hardly needs to pass judgment on so apt a premise for self-destruction, but the import is disturbing. Here is a frightening quickness of response, a rejecting "on principle" of intrusion upon things as they are. That kind of sensitivity does not weigh any proposal for change—be it bad, indifferent, or based upon the considered advice of a responsible expert.

Naïveté is a somewhat less disagreeable term, but it also leaves the labeled person with no effective appeal. Still it can be used fairly in such extreme cases as that of Professor William Graham Sumners. When President Noah Porter of Yale objected to Sumners' use of a Herbert Spencer book as a text, the president simply did not understand how little he knew and how out of date he was. Whatever the judgment of eternity on the whole man may be, in 1879 Sumners was a modern man and Porter was a wistful innocent. Sumners won and thereby laid a stone in the Yale foundation. One might hope that similar conflicts achieve similar resolutions elsewhere, but it must be confessed that not all protagonists of academic freedom have been of Sumners' magnitude.

TURNING TO THE influence of war spirit, it is at once evident that one of its important duties is to excuse the lamentable failure in social intercourse which has occurred. And refusal to join in the sacrament of justification is a serious matter; an individual who does not like war, or a particular war, finds himself in trouble—all the more so if he has been assigned to instruct the young. Coming to the point, the United States has reason to regret the easy acceptance of 1898 and the childish romanticizing of 1917. Then, with somber satisfaction, one encounters 1941—when for all practical purposes no one exulted. A single illustration must suggest the vast implications of war for academic freedom:

1. In 1918, Professor William A. Schaper, chairman of the Department of Political Sciences at the University of Minnesota, was dismissed because he said that he did not wish to see "the Hohenzollerns . . . wiped out root and branch."*

2. In 1938, the University of Minnesota Board of Regents declared:

> The Board of Regents sitting in 1938 recognizes with regret and not in a spirit of condemnation of its predecessors that periods of national crisis are characterized by widespread loss in social perspective and a strain upon values that prevail when conditions are more nearly normal. It would also affirm in these calmer days and against another day of storm and stress that in times of crisis the need for adherence to accepted values and traditions and procedures, especially by institutions of higher education, is most necessary.

The Board at this time made Schaper a Professor Emeritus and gave him substantial token redress.

3. In 1957, the wills of William A. Schaper and his wife gave to the University of Minnesota a considerable sum.

From 1865 to 1941, in summary, one discovers essentially the expected. Fear, ignorance, inertia, material denigration and romantic commitment tangle with intellectual quantities and procedures and plainly hurt them. Some help is had in these years

---

*At this point the writer of a general essay acknowledges his indebtedness to the chief book in the field, The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States, by Richard Hofstadter and Walter P. Metzger.

from a nonobstructive world of religion, a growing public awareness of the irrefutability of an established fact, and the warm receptiveness accorded to learning by expert practitioners of political democracy.

III

In the quarter century from Pearl Harbor to the present, academic freedom has had to meet as well as it could such challenges as World War II, the cold war and the complicated racial issue. In addition to these cosmic turbulences there has continued a stream of unformulated pressures, with some change in the configuration of the rapids.

Poverty threatens in a new way. One may grant that people have more money to buy education, and that a vast number of new facilities have been opened up. But in the great urban centers toward which Americans are steadily gravitating, one finds that much physical structure and equipment which was obsolescent in the '30s is still with us, and that many school teachers are now less well paid in 1941 dollars than they were a generation ago. This means, for higher education, poorer prepared entrants in the colleges and universities. Furthermore it is unquestionable that the huge increase in the cost of four years of application to collegiate study has created profoundly shocking class differences in American youth of 18 to 22 years. It seems that higher education has done no better than any other cherished institution in avoiding payment of the inescapable bill for war. With respect to academic freedom, as before, the story is not one of overt strangulation by the weird henchmen of some bizarre vested interest in poverty. It is rather that educational opportunity has become too closely related to a single function of higher education—the enhancement of the student's economic power.

Every adult American has his own view of the cold war, of its inquisitions, of McCarthy, of pressures from the Birch Society, and all the other forces which have bedeviled higher education and academic freedom for a generation. The question of the moment requires only that we discover how far a flare-up of insecurity will take a people in its quest for stupid or immature victims. Such is the witch hunt. But a deeper and more troubling confrontation of reality is also in order; if academic freedom is to be more than a sitting duck, some answer must be found to enable us to escape the despair of Chafee's conclusion that freedom's fate at any moment is determined by the degree to which the public mind and heart is controlled by fear.

The issue of racial justice demonstrates clearly that academic freedom leads a hard life when it is caught in crossfire on a battle field. If deep social controversy arises on a campus, it is obvious that heinous forces will wish to beat the living daylights out of an adversary, even if he is mild, argues soundly, and is right; in some places—Texas Tech., Alabama State and the University of Arkansas—teachers have got into trouble by no more than recognizing the existence of a problem. Unfortunately it is also true that some proponents of justice have brought techniques fit for the handling of a law-breaking sheriff into the academic world; and peremptory demand, from any quarter, is no fit classmate for independent judgment.

Turning to a consideration of forces at work in positive support of academic freedom between 1941 and 1965, it is deeply satisfying to note the passing of a great anniversary. In 1862, the Morrill Act directed the youthful pride and vitality of the states to realization of their opportunity to develop and protect higher education. Now in 1965, a people which still retains some capacity to make its voice heard has instructed the nation's executive and legislative leadership to apply a quite different concentration of national resources to the service of education. For the moment the main focus is not on higher education, but that will have its turn. Mistakes will probably be made, and some of them are likely to compromise academic freedom. But no true student or teacher would wish to reject opportunity because risk is attached.

ANOTHER HEARTENING element of the past quarter century has been the continued flourishing of American romantic democracy. Many of us, without paying too close attention to the facts of life, still believe that in some degree a single honest voice can make itself heard in a crowd, and can even sway its hearers. In the academic freedom situation, the lonely voice is most often raised in defense of a principle or a mistreated colleague; proof of successful influence in the early stages of a controversy is, for good reasons, usually not blurted out. However, it is the general experience of those who deal with these matters that a large number of potentially nasty situations are each year kept from developing because some individual—a teacher or an administrator—has had the courage to give warning of the likely wrath of an informed public.

Looking back more precisely to the historical record, it would probably be correct to say that since 1941 the main alteration in the academic freedom situation has been a shift from overt attack upon the unpleasing professor because of what he said in the classroom, i.e., an attack directly infringing upon academic freedom, to penalizing the professor academically because he is disliked or suspect as a citizen. The shift admittedly leaves the college educator no better off personally, and offers no better protection to his independence and his ideas. But it does in some measure relate the academic issue to an essential civil liberties problem. Thus in one recent case a legal argument was advanced to the effect that a dismissed professor had been deprived of his property without due process of law because the dismissal had involved a judgment restricting his freedom of speech. The argument found no acceptance in the courts, but another set of facts, other tribunals and a later day might yield a different result.

And so, in 1965, academic freedom stands just about in equilibrium. It is threatened or violated in the main only by hasty, stupid or mean actions, and not with horrifying frequency. However, it is quite possible that a great deal of academic freedom is not used by those charged with its practice, because of softening or fearsome social forces. With respect to possible crises, there is regrettably no clear sign that we have learned much from the past.

IV

Assuming a context of human survival, the history of academic freedom in the next twenty years may very well offer fewer instances of "criminal" behavior stories. Instead, there will appear increasingly ambiguous situations in which the essential violator is a changed attitude of society or the unreckoned power of a new social instrument. If such new threats appear, there must of course be changed and, perhaps, as yet unthought of defenses. Some portents exist to guide our thinking.

If this country goes forward at its present pace of economic development there is a possibility that the more subtle values of our civilization, such as academic freedom, may find themselves freed from the destructive force of poverty only to be threatened by the stifling power of wealth. It is now time for our institutions of higher learning to begin a study of how independence of thought can best survive in a world of spiraling riches. The main problem will not be that of the few dissenters who reject the advantages of wealth, but the threatened paralysis of the many academic persons who are genuinely eager to make the system work. One possible hope might lie in a new humanism which would really be divorced from the world of material substance, perceived by all as clearly alienated, and genuinely approved of therefor.

Personal wealth, after the great and little societies have staked their claims, may also present a problem for academic freedom. When people are poor and have little to lose, a fair number need only find courage if they are to achieve independence. The situation becomes more complicated when wealth abounds and one must both risk one's wealth and be brave to be free. These generalities may not apply so much to faculty members who wish to demonstrate their functional liberty as to the attitudes which society will adopt. What will be expected of our institutions of higher education?

The danger of technological innovation has of course always beset the human race; undoubtedly the first wheel threw thousands of pushers and pullers out of their jobs, and in those days victims undoubtedly starved to death. Professors, happily, are in a better situation as they face the threat of computers; their independence has always embraced the postulate of frontier job location—to the inquiring mind there is always a new point from which to take off, whatever ground may have been yielded. But the technology of our day has one element which offers cause for real uneasiness—its velocity of development. For the independent person, in or out of the academy, the problem is one of thinking fast enough to avoid being sidetracked, totally and irretrievably. And a considerable investment in men, programs or whole institutions may be lost before the expected return is realized. Even now the day is late for coming to grips with the problems of obsolescence and retraining in the academic world. We no longer live in markets where a better mouse trap supplants the poorer machine of the previous century. Our present pace clearly indicates that the idea which will come to maturity in 1975 is indeed seriously threatened by the line of thought which will be fully developed in 1985. Such velocity, even where there is all good will, is intimidating, needs analysis and all possible management in the interest of human beings and social institutions.

ORTHODOXY IN our day has gone underground. The world of college textbooks will serve as an example. The publishing trade faithfully reports the annual spate of scandalous incidents in which self-appointed censors attack first-class books. That problem seems to be manageable; furthermore, such a catalogue of crimes is helpful because it serves to stir the public to a healthy state of fear that it might miss useful knowledge or opinion. But in the meantime the economics of the situation is also possibly lessening the independence of academic persons to a considerable degree. It works this way: (1) the competition among publishers is such that a 2 per cent loss in unit sales can have serious import for survival; (2) that 2 per cent may be represented by the sales potential in the most irritable or benighted state in the Union on some such subject as turnips; (3) what then does the publisher do if the typescript submitted to him treats of turnips in a way likely to antagonize forces in the unhappy state powerful enough to make it likely that adoption will not occur in the public colleges and universities, or even in the private institutions? No one knows what is happening; no one is in a position to observe the transformation of the original bold idea to the ambiguity or silence of the final, printed text. Nevertheless one may suspect, judging by the end result, that some bangs have become whimpers.

The essential difficulty with the present orthodoxy is that it is much too mild and pleasant; it does not display the overt asininity which permits an independent mind to recognize it for what it is and to fight back. In all probability some fundamental thinking will have to be done about academic freedom so that its perceptions can be sharpened, its boundaries extended and its enemies exposed.

Comment upon national and personal wealth, technological developments and the new orthodoxy have in each instance led to a suggestion that a critical state of affairs demands immediate reply and prompt action stimulated and guided by the best imagination available. The prescription—no promise, but at least a hope—suggests that we examine the guidance and leadership being given by the chief organizations whose business is the welfare of higher education and therefore of academic freedom.

The government agencies and national voluntary associations which represent or serve colleges and universities, the workers in them and the values of higher education, show unusually similar qualities. Almost without exception they are devoted to objectivity of approach, high accuracy, sensitivity to human values and, above all, to the maintaining of conditions which will foster the advancement of learning. Their leadership is generally experienced and of good judgment; with particular respect to academic freedom, much is usefully explained, some things are corrected and the spirit of liberty is broadly supported. None of these accomplishments should be minimized.

THE DIFFICULTY with the organizational leadership in higher education is that it has not engaged with three main challenges of the contemporary world: (1) the fact that very little is going to survive in anything like the form we know it and like it; (2) the fact that the forms of society are changing ten times more rapidly in each present year than in previous decades, which means that every function must pay attention to acceleration as a condition of its continuance; and (3) the fact that the minimum price for survival of any organization is the creation of an independent division which will have as its fundamental responsibility immediate responsiveness to the stresses which now affect the structure of the human race, and as its operational responsibility rapid thinking and rapid action with freedom to make mistakes as a necessary price for speed. Whether the educational organizations will consider these challenges is an open question; the inertia of a long history of satisfactory performance can be an obstacle. Probably the best that can be hoped for is that a small revolutionary demand of some kind will offer enough stimulus to cause at least a short jump forward.

Among the somewhat new and developing handicaps to academic freedom in our day, and for the immediate future, are a number of broadly diffused psychological attitudes. Three require comment in even the shortest statement: fear, familialism and the habit of reserved judgment.

THE IMPORT OF fear for a nuclear age requires little exposition. But it may be worth pointing out that professors carry a triple burden. Like everyone else they worry about their personal fate; in addition, they find it difficult to justify a chief function which looks mainly to the future; lastly, they are subject to the heavy strain of asserting to the young that life has some significance other than termination.

The United States is frequently described as a family-oriented culture, excellent in many useful ways but also tinted by a pervasive desire for domestic security and a gourmand appetite for the satisfactions of a warm hearth. To the degree that these urgencies dominate, they can be inimical to any notable spirit of adventure or strong external dedication. Thus, it has been observed that American soldiers complain loudly when asked to take up positions to which they cannot bring their families or their household baggage. And in all walks of life the proliferation of insurances and other fringe benefits has created a marked spirit of stasis. Probably this is all unavoidable; it is even arguable that physical security and comfort will build a firmer base for flight into new realms of thought. However, presently, for most academic personnel, there is apparent some degree of conflict between mundane, agreeable safety and the charge laid upon scholars to practice independence at all cost.

The third in this series of possibly debilitating attitudes, that of reserved judgment, is desirable in itself but difficult to manage well. For many years teachers have been urging students to hold back from judgment until the facts are in. This excellent counsel must, in our day, be related to the universal problem of acceleration which has been referred to earlier. There are constantly arising nice points of accommodation between consideration and conclusion, or even between thought and action. In the colleges and the universities too little attention has been given to the problem of adjusting scholarly methods to the imperious demands of crisis, a problem which faces academic persons as individuals and is of vital concern to academic freedom itself.

The story of the past century, the difficulties of the present, and the likely difficulties of the immediate future demonstrate quite clearly that academic freedom has not yet acquired that gravitational mass which well recognized social principles possess. Academic freedom is an admirable idea but not yet an established governor of public thought. What then can be done to strengthen it?

Three practical approaches can be tried: (1) an attack on a chief cause of confusion which obscures the issues, the accreditation situation; (2) a call to institutional allegiance, and (3) a reaffirmation of the kernel truth which justifies academic freedom.

More than two thousand institutions of higher education serve the United States; the great majority are accredited. But accreditation means only that the minimum standards of educational sanitation have been met. There is no effective guidance to the broad division of these institutions into a group of 300 or 400 which offer adequate to excellent instruction and the remainder which are significantly inferior in their work. Of course, the American consumer is a clever creature, and by some means he does in fact make the separation—if any meaning is to be attached to the enormous demand for entry into the smaller group of institutions and the known empty seats in the large remainder. Unhappily, for the more refined analyses needed in professional studies of education, market demand does not help to fill the informational gap.

The import of the accreditation situation for academic freedom is obvious. A good institution, one whose services are probably the object of enlightened demand, can afford to encourage that strong-willed habit of mind which is at the heart of functional independence. Good colleges and universities not only have more academic freedom than poor institutions, but have so very much more as to be essentially a different kind of social instrument.

The idea of loyalty is old and inescapable. In bad times strong men shine out, and something like this phenomenon is now apparent—except that in higher education the emergent champion is likely to be the institution itself. Members of the academic profession are reasonably well able to judge the degree to which a college or university supports the academic freedom of its faculty and calls on them to use it. And there exists in the United States a surprisingly large number of institutions which have been tested and found to offer both a history and a promise of at least this much: a governing board which will defy unwarranted external pressure, a chief administrator who would resign rather than fail in his accepted duty to lead and protect free scholars, and faculty members and a student body who understand the meaning and method of their work as present and future servants of their fellow men.

It is suggested that a more intense loyalty be given to such institutions by faculty, students and the community. Faculty members should give careful thought to the relative worth of high salaries and high freedom—and the two by no means necessarily go together. And if a teacher has the good fortune to be truly at liberty in Academe, he might well give his best in its defense when occasion demands. Similarly, students might ponder the value of freedom to practice independent, self-disciplined thought as opposed to the indulgence demanded by some of the antic camp followers of our intellectual armed forces. And signs of greater loyalty by faculty and students might be an important stimulus to improved support of good colleges and universities by the general public.

When the findings are in, and history has been written, one must still face the philosophic question of meaning. For academic freedom the question can be put without too much difficulty. Yes, functional independence for the institution and its people, but to what end? Why should one try to serve a chaotic or suicidal world? It is here that one can hope that academic persons and the rest of the race can meet in recognizable unity. We all have our ways of getting on with life—systems of thought, systems of feeling and beauty, systems of God—but the ultimate choice is the same for each man, negation or such truth as he can see use in. It would seem fair to say that the present working term for the rejection of death and the choosing of self-knowledge, in our colleges and universities, is academic freedom.

To congratulate THE NATION is a kind of impertinence, for it has served for a century, and serves now, as a goad to the consciences of Americans who think about social matters. Without it the country would be the stupider and more complacent. Not congratulations: gratitude, to those whose devotion has given it existence.

—George P. Elliott

HONOR BRIGHT AND ALL THAT JAZZ

DALTON TRUMBO

Dalton Trumbo is a novelist, playwright and screenwriter. Among his more notable contributions to Hollywood were Kitty Foyle, 30 Seconds Over Tokyo and the Oscar-winning The Brave Ones. Among Hollywood's more notable contributions to Mr. Trumbo was to include him in its Black List as one of the Hollywood Ten.

IN THE AUTUMN OF 1947, nineteen members of the Hollywood film community were summoned to Washington for political purification before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. They were not the first celebrants of the committee's bizarre ritual, but their motion-picture background made them temporarily the most famous, or—depending on how fastidious you are and what you paid for your seat—the most notorious.

There ensued a week of clamors and alarms the like of which the Republic hadn't known since Mr. Morgan tried to explain why he wanted to marry a midget. He never did get it straight, and neither did the chaps from Hollywood. After the first eleven of them flunked its version of the Apostles' Creed, the committee abruptly dismissed the eight witnesses who remained, and adjourned in dudgeon.

The eleventh witness was Berthold Brecht, who received so strong an impression of the committee's non-benevolence that he grabbed the first Swiss-bound plane out of LaGuardia and never again set foot on free American soil. He seemed to have the uncomfortable feeling, based, perhaps, on earlier hassles over un-German activities, that all those doctors of humane letters who earned their bread by writing about his plays and describing his genius, would forget, somehow, to set the alarm clock on the day he went to jail. The more one thinks on it the more plausible the idea seems.

Those he left behind had no taste for martyrdom and no conception of the storm their conduct would arouse. To this day I suspect there is not one of them who feels anything but pleasure when he opens the morning paper and finds his name not there. They did not ask to play the parts assigned them by the committee, and, like any other group of even passably intelligent men, would have ducked the game altogether had the chance arisen. They were as confused as anybody else, and probably made more mistakes. They were, after all, down there on a ballfield which is error's favorite breeding ground, while Brer Rabbit sat cool in the bleachers and judged form.

What actually happened to them was almost as simple as changing pig to pork, although it took longer. Charged with trying to subvert Hollywood to communism by a gaggle of witnesses friendly to the committee, including George Murphy, then a leading man, now the junior Senator from California, and another leading man named Ronald Reagan, who may be California's next governor and Goldwater's candidate for the Presidency, the Ten took the stand in October, 1947, invoked the First Amendment, and declined to reveal whether they were, or ever had been, members of the Communist Party and the Screen Writers' Guild. In November they were cited for contempt of Congress, a misdemeanor. In December they were blacklisted by the producers in a public statement known as the Waldorf Agreement. The following year saw them indicted, arraigned, tried, convicted, sentenced and released on bail pending appeal.

During the first phase of the battle their principal support came from the film community itself. Those actors, actresses, directors, producers, writers, musicians and artists who formed the Committee for the First Amendment took to the air in a series of remarkable broadcasts and petitioned the House for relief from "the abuse of civil liberties we believe to have occurred at those hearings."

A few weeks later, Representative John E. Rankin, whose parliamentary legerdemain had made the Committee on Un-American Activities a permanent committee of the House rather than a temporary one, and who was himself its senior Democratic member, rose in the House to attack those who dared to critize its conduct. It is impossible to understand the spirit of the times, the quality of the committee, or the issues confronting the Ten, outside the context of what he said, and what no member of the Committee—not even Representative Richard M. Nixon—disavowed or sought in any way to ameliorate:

> They sent this petition to Congress, and I want to read you some of these names. One of the names is June Havoc. We found out . . . that her real name is June Hovick. Another one was Danny Kaye, and we found out his real name was David Daniel Kamirsky. Another one here is John Beal, whose real name is J. Alexander Bliedung. Another is Cy Bartlett whose real name is Sacha Baraniev. Another one is Eddie Cantor, whose real name is Edward Iskowitz. There is one who calls himself Edward Robinson. His real name is Emanuel Goldenberg. There is another one here who calls himself Melvyn Douglas, whose real name is Melvyn Hesselberg. There are others too numerous to mention. They are attacking the Committee for doing its duty to protect this country and save the American people from the horrible fate the Communists have meted out to the unfortunate Christian people of Europe." [Emphasis added.]

For almost a year the Hollywood community and the Committee for the First Amendment gamely continued the fight—the bravest, most attractive, most generous, and by far the most vulnerable defenders of free speech the country had yet seen. Whatever position each of them held in the world had been achieved lonesomely, without institutional support or grants-in-aid, and their futures held no hope of tenure. They had sensed the House committee's purpose more accurately than the rest of the country, and were willing, at that time and in those circumstances, to stake their reputations in a fight against it.

What they did not expect, and could not have anticipated, was betrayal at the hands of the same intellectuals who had first instructed them in the liberal credo and the virtues of democratic action. They listened intently to the enormous silence that had fallen over the airwaves, the press, the theatre, the reviews, the universities, the academies. They knew, too late, exactly what it meant. Many of them in later years paid heavily for their misjudgment, and all of them were affected by it in one way or another, but while they lasted they made a light.

By 1949, when the Circuit Court of Appeals, to no one's surprise, ruled for the committee, the Ten had become objects of almost superstitious horror and execration. All channels of communication, aside from an occasional hired hall, were closed off to them, and even the hall was a sometime thing: when it wasn't cancelled altogether, it was packed to the eaves with stormily applauding agents of the FBI. Press relations, never good, turned lamentable, and even personal relations left something to be desired, as evidenced by the writer who jumped to his feet at a meeting of the Screen Writers' Guild, shouted "Beware of the bear! Beware of the bear!" and sat down as irrelevantly as he had stood up.

There were, of course, contrary voices. Bernard de Voto and Archibald MacLeish and Van Wyck Brooks and Prof. Thomas I. Emerson of the Yale Law School tirelessly warned their confreres what the committee was doing, not primarily to the Ten, but to themselves and to the country, while men like Harlow Shapley, Thomas Mann, Albert Einstein and Linus Pauling, in addition to opposing the committee, associated themselves personally with those the committee hoped to imprison.

But personal support, however gratifying, was not the primary requirement. The liberal establishment simply could not be made to understand that the point at issue was not defense of the Ten but opposition to the committee; that it didn't matter whether the Ten were Communists, Nazis, homosexuals or giraffes, what did matter was the committee's assertion of power in areas forbidden to it. They would learn the truth later, and ADA would muster 58 votes against the committee in 1965, but that would be the result of changing generations and different battles. The first generation skipped the one that counted.

William F. Buckley, Jr., finding himself recently at odds with James Baldwin, knows exactly how to resolve these annoying differences of ideology and intellect: "How long," he wonders, "before the Baldwins will be ghettoized in the corners of fanaticism where they belong?" It's a lovely project, but Mr. Buckley himself is scarcely the one to bring it off. For that job you need a sheep in sheepskin, not a wolf.

It wasn't the committee or the American Legion or the DAR or Parnell Thomas or Francis Walter or Walter Judd or Joe McCarthy or Roy Cohn or Westbrook Pegler or George Sokolsky or Victor Riesel who convinced the liberal establishment that the best way to fight the committee was to "ghettoize" anyone who did; it was Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.'s "non-Communist Left" bursting out of the river and crossing the trees in its first wild stampede toward the Center, startling to their feet great herds of creeping Socialists, while Max Eastman and Sidney Hook, riding the flanks and bearing down hard, fired buckshot and bacon-rind at the face of the wondering moon.

They were going so fast they overshot their mark, but toward dawn they found themselves in some pretty fair pastureland slightly to the Right of center. The grass was ankle-high, there was a stream to drink from and defecate into, the horses were winded and they were all bone-tired, so they decided to settle in permanently. Bugles blared, enlisted men stood at attention, and censors swung great pots of diabolofuge, and the chief idealogue christened the place Vital Center. After the songs were finished they proclaimed a new alphabet and sent guerrilla bands fanning out through the countryside in all directions. They had been secretly trained to throw aspersions instead of cast them, their aim was deadly, and whenever they scored a hit they swarmed down on the poor devil and forced him to draw his own conclusions in the mire, while everybody stood around and jeered. By the time they were through you couldn't cross the Charles River without three salutes and a police permit.

The only remaining support for the unwanted and unholy Ten lay in that sorely pressed coalition which emerged under Henry Wallace as the Progressive Party. It wasn't much, but it was enormously better than nothing. The committee and the press took the more sinister view that their sustenance came almost exclusively from the Communist Party, but as usual they hadn't the vaguest notion of what they were talking about. In New York City, which is the money capital of the country for everybody, including political mendicants, the national leaders of the Communist Party were backed up against almost every wall in town, bedeviled by more investigations, indictments, trials and convictions than any dissident outfit really needs. In such circumstances, it didn't overmuch pleasure their hearts to discover some (still) well-suited member of the Ten prowling their precincts instead of his own in pursuit of Yankee dollars that stood in hideously shortening supply. Although they didn't picket the Ten, or gun them down, neither did they take joy in the sound of their approaching footsteps, nor steer them to those secret places where the big money broods on social injustice.

HUAC, too, had its problems. The massive purge it had planned and actually announced obviously couldn't be pulled off until the courts decided whether it had the right to pose the purgative, or $64 question, which the Ten had challenged in the courts. A majority of law faculties and legal reviews predicted a reversal which would free the Ten and forbid the committee to pose the only interesting question it knew how to ask. Then in 1949, as the case passed upward for final disposition, Justices Murphy and Rutledge died in swift succession. The Supreme Court's liberal majority was diminished by two. Yet still the Committee did not move. It turned otherwhere, to be sure, but for thirty-two long months it made not so much as a feint toward the lush lands it had publicly staked out for its own. It was that near a thing. Then, as the summer of 1950 approached, the Supreme Court refused review; the power of the Congress to compel political revelation was legitimized; the Ten were swiftly distributed throughout the federal prison system—and the dam broke.

For a full decade thereafter the hunt raged at blood heat, roving wherever its masters wished, summoning whomever it pleased, demanding answers to questions never before heard in chambers that displayed the American flag—not, as some may have hoped, only in Hollywood (where over 200 decent American citizens, including 44 returned veterans, were humiliated, bankrupted, and driven from their professions), but in every area of American life that dealt with ideas and their dissemination.

WHAT A CURIOUS era it was, and how sad: actors driven from radio, television, film and theatre—their fellow-actors working all the while; doctors removed from the registry of such hospitals as Cedars of Lebanon in Los Angeles—their colleagues never once considering a move en masse to more civilized quarters; professors hounded from lecture halls, musicians from recording studios and symphony orchestras, artists from galleries and museums—their brothers contentedly continuing to teach, perform, exhibit; scientists banished from laboratories, ministers from pulpits, students from colleges, reporters from newspapers, editors from publishing houses, craftsmen from unions, lawyers, economists, sociologists and statisticians from government posts; hundreds, perhaps even thousands of civil servants at every level insulted, destroyed, cast aside—and nothing, really, done about it, no cry in the streets that murder was afoot, nothing at all to be heard except a few cranks and do-gooders howling in vain to the rising wind. Colleagues, friends, fellow-workers stepped softly into the jobs of the damned, and the hole which their disappearance left in the fabric of community life was scarcely noticed except when one of them killed himself or required commitment.

The eeriest aspect of a decade that lost its mind because men and women refused to take the national spotlight and swear they were or were not Communists, lay in the fact that a surprising number of those who declined the question had private yearnings to answer it and be damned to everyone.

The idea of compulsion, however, changed everything. For if Congress could compel public confession of political affiliation, it could also compel confession of candidates voted for, which would do queer things to the Australian, or—as we call it—secret ballot. Beyond this, there was the annoying moral quibble that compliance with the committee's request vastly simplified the task of destroying all who would not comply, or couldn't give the approved answer. In such a game the prize for winning seemed scarcely worth the trouble. Or perhaps one thought of all those good German intellectuals and artists and craftsmen who swore so eagerly they were not Jews and never had been. Hals und Beinbruch! as the toast goes.

In any event, error and contempt swept the field despite the feeling of many non-swearers that every aspect of a man's life is relevant to aesthetic evaluation of his work; that the more one knows about the life of a painter, the more one understands his painting; that, in fact, to study one and ignore the other is to diminish the available truth by half. Just so for writers: it makes a considerable—and by no means invidious—difference if one knows whether a book about hanging was written by the judge, the hangman, or the widow of a man who was hanged.

Granting that the amount of useful information varies from person to person, it would generally seem relevant to know the author's sex, race, nationality, age, religious belief or lack of it; and, in a time when politics invokes fiercer passions than religion and kills more people, what political group he belongs to. In an open society, a rational society, a society in which diversity is cherished rather than penalized, such information would be known to all as a matter of normal human intercourse.

UNHAPPILY WE DO NOT have such a society in America, and with the exception of something that suggested its possibility during the Roosevelt years, we have not had for more decades than one cares to remember. France has it in degree at least, and England in a larger degree. With local variations, Italy has it, and so do the Scandinavian countries. It is quite possible almost anywhere in Europe to find oneself at table with a priest, a Social-Democratic politico, a journalist of the Right or Center, a Communist novelist, a rentier, and an ex-resistance fighter turned salesman, each in lively disagreement with all except his hostess (whose deceased husband was suspected of collaboration) and none concealing the viewpoint from which he speaks or the goal to which he aspires.

Each election year in Italy the banner of the Communist Party hangs in its turn from the battlement of Castel Sant' Angelo, the Vatican's great citadel on the Tiber—yet only a thousand yards away the Pope still reigns, the saints and martyrs atop the Bernini Colonnade still marvelously praise both God and man.

They may not have our form of government, or a First Amendment, or a Supreme Court to interpret what it so plainly says, but most Europeans do have the right to join anything they wish and to shout their opinions and affiliations from the highest hill they can climb without fear of criminal prosecution or professional death. That is what an open society means, and what we do not have in America.

We do not have it because, taking from the Soviet Union a tip that nearly destroyed it and drowned a whole generation in blood, we have transformed our politics into faith, our way of life into a religion, and our national purpose into a world crusade of absolute good against Satan's utter evil. Between such extremes there can be no dialogue, no agreement, and no peace until Satan is annihilated and communism vanishes from the face of the earth. In every area of his life we confront modern man with a choice of our absolute over Satan's. If he declines the choice, we isolate or bribe him until he acquiesces. If he chooses Satan's absolute, we kill him on the spot, or, if that be found inopportune, add his name to the lengthening list of those to be ministered unto at Armageddon. The first commandment of the new secular religion is to hate: its last commandment is to kill. We have heard them repeated so often in schools, churches, government and press that no one dreams any longer of challenging the concept that brought them forth. By rote we have learned the faith and now by rote we believe it.

Beyond mere belief, we worship and fear it, and sustain it with processes more ritualistic than legal, tribal in nature, propitiatory, and sometimes magical. The committee, as inquisition, smokes out the heretic and hands him over to the secular arm of the courts for punishment. Ordeals of purification become mandatory for admission to the higher orders, confessions of faith to the lower. The community of the unbaptized suffers arcani disciplina; backsliders do penance through contrition, confession and satisfaction; diaboleptics are exorcised with great regularity, and permanently interdicted from fire and water if the treatment fails. A Malleus maleficarum issues annually from the Government Printing Office.

A new language of incantation grows up. Phrases like "international Communist conspiracy" and "slave world," repeated frequently enough and in precise word-order, have great value as spells to confound the enemy. "Free world," "free enterprise" and such function as charms for our side. We no longer confront the external world with ourselves as we are, but with our "image". Images as means of casting spells stand very high in the thaumaturgic lore. Today, however, images, effigies and statues are regarded as generically the same, differentiated no longer by what they do, but by what is done to them; i.e., a statue is looked at, an effigy is more often burned than not, and an image is venerated. The veneration, Webster says, is religious. Clearly, then, we present our image for the world's veneration. If it venerates, our spell has worked. If it doesn't, more powerful magic and better sorcerers will make a new image, one of such absolute bewitchment they'll have to venerate it whether they wish to or not. But stand before them as ourselves? Indeed not. They would steal our mana.

In this curious atmosphere of charms, oaths and incantations, meanings have a way of becoming their opposites, values reverse themselves, tergiversation becomes the rule, and "pragmatic truth"—meaning a lie that works—stands much higher on the scale of virtue than simple truth that hurts. Is it, then, a matter of astonishment that the State Department denied we were making U-2 flights, or that we organized and supported the Bay of Pigs? Of course not. They were telling God's absolute pragmatic truth right up to the hour they were caught. And when mundane rather than theological truth finally stood revealed, it was not the lies we deplored, but the admissions of truth that exposed them.

WITH THE FOUNT of honor thus polluted at its source by a single word that changes everything and packs the killing power of a bullet, the simple act of staying out of trouble requires more guile than most men have on call. ". . . Mother Bloor is an old lady," said the witness to the committee's counsel. "Wouldn't you say an old Communist lady?" [Emphasis added.] "I certainly would," cried the witness, "I certainly would!" The word had to be inserted into the sentence with great delicacy, but once there it changed the old lady and the witness and the counsel, too.

Just so, they are not ordinary families we inadvertently incinerate in North and South Vietnam, they are Communist families (or families saved from communism), and that, somehow, excuses the inadvertence. Occasionally it has to be explained why we can't, or don't kill Communists. President Kennedy, that extraordinarily humane and graceful man, once felt obliged to explain to the press that it was the danger of killing Russian personnel, with consequent possibility of Soviet retaliation, that prevented us from bombing Cuban missile sites. The danger that we might kill a Cuban child wasn't discussed. It wasn't relevant.

Our new faith accounts it a noble act for one to die for all. The idea that it may be nobler for all to die for one—that this, indeed, is the whole meaning of brotherhood—finds no sanctuary in our hearts. If in fighting communism we find it necessary to kill a child, we will surely kill it. We have killed them already in substantial numbers. Exactly how many we do not know because we do not ask. We will continue to kill them as long as the word "Communist" triggers hatred and steels us to murder.

THE WHOLE DEGRADING process of politics-as-magic and incantation-as-intellect will continue until that terrible word, "Communist," is wrested from sorcerers and robbed of its necromaneous power to drive us mad. It will not stop until all the orders and estates of the intellect—education, law, science, art, philosophy, religion—not just a few of them as in the past, but all of them together—rise to their feet and perform at last the function for which they were ordained, which is to speak the truth, the extremely simple truth without which reason and the rational world cannot survive: that there are no absolutes, neither absolute good nor absolute evil, neither absolute truth nor absolute falsehood; that all men partake of good and evil, and all faiths, and all nations; that—and this will be the hardest and bravest because it touches on the word that kills—there is a rational probability that Communists, as individual human beings, have as many (though possibly different) virtues as we ourselves; that just as our society is not completely good, neither is it likely that Communist society can be held completely evil; that in one area, at least—a determination to avoid being bombed from the face of the earth—both societies seek the same goal; and that common ends provide the surest basis for rational discussion of common means.

Even if such an improbable consensus of the estates occurred, the time may already be too late and the steadily diminishing area of allowable dissent too small for it to be effective. Five million voters in the Presidential campaign of 1924, declining a choice between Coolidge and Davis, distributed their votes among LaFollette and five other minority candidates. Forty years later the voters of thirty-six states, including the six most populous, had no third choice at all: it was Johnson-Goldwater or nothing. Three minority candidates got their names on the ballots of some of the remaining sixteen states, although none on all of them. Instead of 1924's five million votes, the minority candidates of 1964 polled fifty thousand. The dissenting independent vote had shrunk from 17 per cent of the electorate to .009 per cent in four decades. The radical Left had disappeared entirely: the radical Right had captured one of the two major political parties, and 26,000,000 Americans had voted for its candidate.

It was not only the radical Left that had disappeared: with it also had vanished the whole vigorous coalition of the general Left that had provided the sinews of four Presidential campaigns, and inspiration for a large body of New Deal legislation. In the area of organized political and legislative action, the ADA stands as far Left as the action goes, and it isn't Left at all, it's a coalition of the liberal Center. There remain only the peace marchers and the civil rights movement. The peace marchers want peace, and the civil rights organizations are out not to challenge the law but to enforce it, not to change the Constitution but to restore it. Neither is a political organization or a left-wing movement (July, 1965), although civil violence and red-baiting could, at a decisive moment, turn each into both. For all practical purposes, however, the Left, as a movement proposing new ideas and decisive social change, doesn't live here any more.

THE HARD-HEADED, rock-ribbed gentlemen of the far American Right had known what they wanted all along, and their methods, though cruder and more brutal than their opponents', were expertly chosen for the job at hand. The anti-Communist campaign they had inaugurated on that cold January dawn in 1920 had been aimed at the entire left-wing of American political life, and only incidentally at Communists. Though the targets changed, the method didn't. The same weapon that blasted the incidental target wreaked such damage on the primary one that its defenders fell silent or vanished in retreat.

The whole campaign had been a fraud, and it still is. The American Communist Party, unarmed, fluid in its membership to the point of instability, outmanned 80,000 to 131,000,000 at its peak, posed about as grave a threat of revolution as the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, which out-manned it ten to one and had much more fun. Until 1945 no one even suggested the possibility of a Soviet attack on the United States, and after that date, unless the military has lied to us for twenty years running, there hasn't been a day we couldn't overawe, over-bomb, over-kill and overwhelm not only Russia, but the rest of the world with her. It is not communism these amiable, soft-spoken, tribal epigones are out to destroy, it is the right of the majority of the American people to legislate in their own behalf. They mean to curb that right and control that majority, and they perfectly understand it will take the full power of the federal government to do the job. They propose to capture that power. They have created the weapon with which to do it, and the climate of insanity that suits it best. They will turn it against anyone who stands in their way. Far from fighting revolution, some of them already ponder one of their own. A legal one, of course. Perhaps something like . . .

Yet everywhere people tell me things are getting better. The sun comes up earlier these days, the blacklist tapers off, and children seem to be growing taller than they used to. Splendid sentiments flower in the most improbable gardens, and there's going to be the damnedest harvest in Appalachia you ever saw. They even let you read from your own books in the White House parlor, and with Hubert Humphrey where he is, there's an outside chance he may have an opportunity as President to fill with Communists the very concentration camps his sponsorship as Senator made possible. Everything comes up roses, the 1964 election was the greatest victory for our side that anyone has ever seen.

It was also the greatest victory their side has ever seen. Never before had the far American Right been able to carry its program to the whole people from the platform of a national party; never had a candidate of the Right been so attractive, or aroused such profound devotion; never before had hundreds of thousands of dollars—perhaps even millions—flowed to its cause from the "grass roots," that lost, embittered, isolated army of smallholders driven almost mad by the intolerable thought they were not rich, and never would be, and might, under the horrors of creeping socialism, Godless communism, dogoodism and the income tax, become even poorer.

Neither had it ever before received so many votes. There is an idiot theory abroad that 26,000,000 people voted for Mr. Goldwater in a sort of crise de coeur, hating his program but loving the GOP. The reverse seems closer to the truth. Those who couldn't stomach the program bolted; those who didn't bolt were not dragooned, they were either believers or opportunists. Between such there is no choice; their mutual attraction in a happy cause is so powerful that all distinctions vanish.

Each year a constellation of some 250 rich individuals, 100 business concerns, and 70 tax-exempt foundations pours between $25,000,000 and $35,000,000 into such organizations as the American Security Council, Americans for Constitutional Action, the Americanism Educational League, the American Conservative Union, the Congress of Conservatives, the Conservative Party of New York, the Freedom School (all you have to do is put in the word "freedom" and people send you $600,000 by return mail), the Freedom Foundation of Valley Forge, the Christian Freedom Foundation, Young Americans for Freedom, the Free Enterprise Bureau, the Free Society Association, the John Birch Society, the Constitution Party of Florida, the Liberty Lobby, the Cardinal Mindzenty Foundation, the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, the Committee for the Monroe Doctrine, the National Defense Committee of the D.A.R., the White Citizens' Councils in the South, the Americanism Committees of the various veteran groups, and innumerable regional societies of young, old, middle-aged, conservative, disillusioned, indignant, resurgent or free Republicans.

Publications like the National Review, American Opinion, Human Events, The Wanderer, and the Liberty Letter promulgate doctrine for the scores of lesser journals and organizational publishing houses which flood the mails at every level, while Washington Report, Life Line (formerly Facts Forum), Let Freedom Ring, the Deering Milliken Foundation, the Penthouse Trust and others spread or finance the word by radio, television, filmed shorts, and even telephone.

THE VIGOR AND VARIETY and burgeoning health of the movement is somehow reminiscent of the great days of the Popular Front, with the exception that the Popular Front had no foothold in the police and military, and no secret bands of armed auxiliaries. The new Right, of course, has both. The political coloration of most peace officers' organizations, as well as those of the retired military, may be fairly judged by that of the 20,000-member National Sheriffs' Association, which this year elected Sheriff James G. Clark of Selma, Alabama, its vice-president, assuring his automatic elevation to the presidency in 1966. Combine their forces in a time of crisis with such veterans' action groups as fought the labor wars of the twenties, and thousands of their like-minded brethren from the country's organized gun clubs and riflemen's associations, and you have as formidable—and legal—a political army as anyone could wish for.

Deeper in the shadows lurk the real Communist-hunters, the ones who carry guns. They have the special virtue that they can be disavowed or even denounced by their more respectable brethren and still hold firm, since they have no other place to go. They call themselves Councillors, Raiders, Minutemen, Vigilantes, Rangers, Volunteers, Kluxers, Nazis, and other names still more colorful. They are the mountain dwellers, the Scythians, men with hard eyes and emaciated spirits and terrible hungers, bigots, prophesiers, killers, night-prowlers, parading the flag as a hunting license, organizing combat-teams and counter-guerrilla details, spanning the country with counter-conspiratorial warfare schools, secret training camps, hidden ammunition depots, studying A Handbook for Saboteurs and The Secret Principles of Guerrilla Warfare—violent men fed on the violent words of their betters, and armed: armed with mortars, bazookas, bazooka rockets, rifle grenades, hand grenades, dynamite, guns and hate.

They wait, all of them from high to low, and they prophesy crisis, which is to say they pray for it. They know the power of their weapon, and our fear of it, and even a small crisis is better than none. But what they especially dream of is a profound crisis, that anguished crisis of the spirit which tears us to pieces every thirty or forty years, one that will soften our hearts to the tall fierce strangers who stand outside the door and cry salvation. They are certain the door will open; they have no doubts at all that a time will come when the prevalence of devils will persuade us that freedom is best defended by surrendering it altogether.

AND PERHAPS they are right. Perhaps we don't like freedom any more. Perhaps we have listened so long to the concatenation from the swamp that all unknowingly we have passed our point of no return, and now drift closer and closer to the heart of that thick, nadiral stupor in which men no longer want to be free. The cats have killed all the birds, the swimming pools everywhere overflow, and across the street at the old Bella Union—che bella that union was in her time, che bellissima!—the bar is closing down. The midnight air stutters with the magic word, and men with pinched white faces steal through the street. They have long memories, and the shortest tempers you ever saw, and they fondle guns instead of girls. Yet I do not dread them as much as I fear the others—the silent ones, the contented, the alienated, the frightened, the acquiescent.

I DREAM THAT for reasons I do not understand angry men are chasing me through the nightscape of a strange city. I duck into a side street and they do not. I come to a closed door and knock on it. There is no answer. The house is dark, yet I sense someone inside, someone standing "shadowless, like silence listening to silence." I hear sounds of the hunters retracing their steps. I cry my alarms to the silent listener inside. I beg refuge. He does not answer. The hunters whirl into my side street. I try to smash the door but it is too strong. The hunters race toward me. I cross to a window that is only partly draped. I cup hands to my brow and peer through it. The face in the darkness which stares so intently back at me is mine. The hunters strike. I waken.

Only then do I understand that I am of my own time. Only then do I fear that I am lost.

First let me say a word of deep gratitude that THE NATION has lived and prospered for a century and has not escalated into an advertising medium printed on expensive paper and in tiresome colors. Its sheer dedication to simplicity of format and searching for truth is reason for praise. More especially in this constantly shifting political, economic, and social scene, it performs an invaluable service in furnishing a sound basis on which readers may form judgments on the central issues of our day.

May it prosper even in our all-too-affluent society! —Clarence E. Pickett

Anyone actively engaged in the practice of journalist has every reason to say to THE NATION, "Thank you for the last One Hundred Years." THE NATION has proved itself, to me at any rate, not only a source of information but a source of inspiration and influence as well. If THE NATION follows its past formula it will probably live another One Hundred Years. That formula has always been the deliberate choice of not living safely but thinking clearly. —Harry Golden

AMERICA'S SCHIZOPHRENIC VIEW OF THE POOR

PAUL JACOBS

A specialist on labor and poverty problems, Mr. Jacobs is on the staff of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions and the Center for the Study of Law and Society at Berkeley, Cal. His latest book, Is Curley Jewish?, will be published next year.

I

How OLD FASHIONED, almost quaint, the word "pauper" appears today! One thinks of Oliver Twist asking the beadle for a bit more porridge or of an aged couple trudging over the hill to the poorhouse. Yet at least 8,000,000 of the estimated 35,000,000 people living in poverty today are actual paupers, dependent solely on public or private charity. But we prefer to speak of these paupers as "the disadvantaged," the "hard-to-reach," the "senior citizens," or as the "long-term unemployed" with "culturally deprived children" who are born, unfortunately, into a "cycle of poverty" which gives them no chance to get out of the "poverty pocket" or "poverty belt." Are these less offensive terms merely euphemisms, or do they suggest that basic changes have taken place in the American attitude towards the poor?

An ideological schizophrenia with a complex history characterizes the American view of poverty. On the one hand, we believe achievement is related primarily to self-reliance and self-help; on the other, we have been forced to concede that failure cannot always be laid at the door of the individual. Both these views are embodied in the constellation of ideas on which President Johnson's War Against Poverty is based. As a result, that program is schizophrenic, too. It assumes that poverty will be eliminated if only society can alter the circumstances which have barred the poor from access to work, the "American way of life." But it does not question whether such a way of life is possible for all in the new technological order, nor does it seek to alter, in any profound sense, the economic and political system. Instead, the existence of poverty is viewed as an impersonal—and soluble—"paradox." The program's cheerful optimism reflects an almost mystical belief in the infinite potentials of American society. Poverty, like polio, will be defeated when the right vaccine is found.

The first American colonists brought with them from Puritan England the comparatively new doctrine which combined the view that man had a religious duty to achieve material success with the concept that giving direct financial aid to the poor destroyed their character.

Typically Puritan was John Locke's proposal in 1697 "that all men, sound of limb and mind, begging in maritime counties out of their own parish shall be seized by an officer of the parish or by an inhabitant and brought before the next J.P. and be sent . . . to the next seaport town, there to be kept at hard labor till some of H.M. Ships coming in, give an opportunity of putting them on board, where they will serve 3 years under strict discipline at soldiers pay." So, too, Locke suggested that paupers' children between the ages of three and fourteen be taken away from their parents and put in working schools where "what is necessary for their relief will more effectually have that use if distributed to them in bread at school. . . . And to this may be added, without any trouble in cold weather, if it be thought needful, a little warm water gruel, for the same fire that warms the room may be made to boil a pot of it."

IN COLONIAL AMERICA, such Puritan doctrines were buttressed by the belief that every man, except the Negro slave, could break through the class barriers that had held them down in aristocratic England and Europe. In this view, the poor were poor only because of some flaw in their character; therefore, not society, but only their families, bore any responsibility towards them. Only the Negro slaves, for whom poverty was considered the natural state, were exempt from this judgment, and their care was given to their masters. The only explanation for any others who were poor was the one characteristically offered by the Humane Society in 1809, when it said that "by a just and inflexible law of Providence, misery is ordained to be the companion and punishment of vice."

The most popular methods for dealing with the non-slave poor who had no families or friends to care for them were to auction off those incapable of working to the persons asking the smallest amount to care for them, to put them in "almshouses," or to "bind out" the able-bodied as indentured servants. This was usually done by state or local governments; no one dreamed of any federal responsibility for the poor.

Such attitudes began to waver, however, in the first quarter of the 19th century, when the vision of an eternally expanding and ever-more-prosperous country became clouded over by recurring economic depressions. Grudgingly, it was conceded that "non-employment" resulting in poverty was not necessarily the fault of the workers. For those "whose cry was, not for bread and fuel of charity but for Work!", as Horace Greeley described them, destitution was often the ugly consequence of unemployment. The popular faith in the American ideals of self-sufficiency and self help was shaken by this kind of talk. Nevertheless, as late as 1854 President Franklin Pierce, vetoing a bill to grant public land for the use of states to help care for the indigent insane, argued that the government could not become "the great almoner of public charity throughout the United States."

The severe depression of 1857-1859 forced changes in methods of dealing with the poor. Private charity funds weren't adequate to tide over the unemployed, and public funds had to be appropriated by cities. Now, for the first time in the country's brief history, the unemployed organized in protest, demonstrating and marching to force local governments to take action. Shortly there followed the Civil War, which left the South as an entire region of poverty. In the wake of the war, private charity and philanthropy developed on a large scale, while there grew a reluctant acceptance of the fact that the federal government had to assume responsibility for some part of veterans' care and provide for the families of dead soldiers.

But no one, except 19th century radicals, questioned the basic assumption that the free enterprise system was created by God to bring about the Kingdom of Heaven, or something close to it, here on earth. Economic dislocations were believed to be only temporary disturbances from which the country could, and would, always quickly recover. The depression of 1873, like that of the late '50s, brought about demonstrations of the unemployed which were crushed by the police. Private charity remained the main form of welfare during the latter half of the 19th century. Public work projects were adopted only reluctantly, because administration of welfare programs by corrupt officials often led to their abuse for political purposes. In the spring of 1894, thousands of unemployed marchers from all parts of the country gathered in Washington to petition Congress. This was "Coxey's Army." Coxey and a few other marchers were arrested and received short prison sentences for "walking on the grass" and carrying banners. The House Committee on Labor refused to hear Coxey's proposals, and before the end of the year, the first national movement of the poor and unemployed had collapsed.

MEANWHILE, THE REFORM and settlement house movements had started focusing attention on the social and economic conditions creating poverty. Even so, these social workers remained committed to the thesis that the dole destroyed the character of the recipients. In 1883, Josephine Shaw Lowell, the great welfare worker, wrote that using public funds to support the poor in their homes was evil because "the principle underlying [the practice] is not that the proceeds of all men's labor is to be fairly divided among all but that the idle, improvident and even vicious man has the right to live in idleness and vice upon the proceeds of the labor of his industrious and virtuous fellow citizen."

Characteristically, Jane Addams poignantly describes her mixed reactions to this policy in the case of a young man who came to Hull House to secure help for his family:

> I told him one day of the opportunity for work on the drainage canal and intimated that if any employment were obtainable, he ought to exhaust that possibility before asking for help. The man replied that he had always worked indoors and that he could not endure outside work in the winter. . . . He did not come again for relief but worked for two days digging on the canal where he contracted pneumonia and died a week later. I have never lost trace of the two little children he left behind him although I cannot see them without a bitter consciousness that it was at their expense I learned that life cannot be administered by definite rules and regulations; that wisdom to deal with a man's difficulties comes only through some knowledge of his life and habits as a whole; and that to treat an isolated episode is almost sure to invite blundering.

The viewpoint of the business community towards the reformers' concern about the "deserving poor" was expressed bluntly by Elbert Hubbard in 1899:

> We have been recently hearing much maudlin sympathy expressed for the "downtrodden denizen of the sweatshop". . . . Nothing is said about the employer who grows old before his time in a vain attempt to get frowsy ne'er-do-wells to do intelligent work; and his long, patient striving with the "help" that does nothing but loaf when his back is turned. In every store and factory there is a constant weeding-out process going on. . . . It is the survival of the fittest. Self-interest prompts every employer to keep the best—those who can carry a message to Garcia.

Gradually, however, needy children, the aged, the blind, the deaf, the mentally retarded and widows with children were exempted from the strictures of social Darwinism. Pensions for the blind were authorized by law in Ohio in 1898 and spread gradually to other states. In 1911, Illinois passed a law providing cash payments to widows with young children, and over a period of years the boundaries of these laws were extended to take in not only children with dead fathers but those whose fathers had deserted them. But the application of these laws was discretionary rather than mandatory, and since the costs were almost always assumed by the local communities, rather than the states, the grants were very often not made or were inadequate.

